Neither were such names rare as Apollonius, Aphrodisia, Apollinaris, Artemidorus, Bacchus, Castor, Cerialis (from Ceres), Heliodorus, Diogenes, Dionysius and Dionysia, Erculea, Isidorus and Isidora (from Isis); Martialis, Martinus, Mercurius, Monica, Nemesianus, Serapio, Venerius etc. In the common sensibility these theophoric names had perhaps lost their connection with the divinity, but were given perhaps simply because they followed popular practice. Their use in epigraphy, however, shows itself to be less prevalent among Christians than it does among pagans, and their frequency diminishes progressively from the 1st decades of the 4th c. onward. Pope John (532–535) was at first called Mercurius: Ioannes iunior qui et Mercurius (LP 1, 141). Some names can appear specifically Christian because they were frequently used by Christians, such as Elpis and Irene (Εἰρήνη), although in fact they were also used by pagans (Kajanto, Onomastic Studies, 89), even if in lesser measure, such as Agape (Kajanto, Onomastic Studies, 113 s.), Redemptus, Cyriacus (Κυριακός) (a name much used in *Rome by the Christians) and others. Further, it was understandable that certain names which came into use in *Late Antiquity should be used by Christians without any particular significance: e.g., Gaudentius, Hilarus.

The emergence of a Christian nomenclature was slow, being progressively established from the time of *Constantine onward: on the one hand, we see a reduction of names of mythical origin—their use more kept up among pagans—and, on the other hand, we find the use of the glorious names of dead Christians and the spread of new names, sometimes specifically created by Christians in order to express particular sentiments and new ideas. A tradition of truly Christian names is rather patchy: in Late Antiquity many names disappeared from use, while others became popular among both Christians and pagans (Felix, Victor, Vitalis). Some names became Christian with the passing of time. In fact, the recourse to names which had become illustrious owing to the lives of particular figures, and the prestige that they enjoyed in the community, contributed significantly to the establishment of a Christian nomenclature. Mercurius became common among Christians because it was the name of a famous martyr: it was very popular in *Egypt. Other persons were venerated for having withstood martyrdom, and their cult sometimes spread beyond the confines of their own city and region: *Dionysius of Alexandria wrote: "I am of the opinion that there were many who bore the name of the apostle John, who, on account of their love for him, and out of admiration and zeal and desire to be loved by the Lord as he was, took to themselves his name, as many of the children of the faithful are called Paul or Peter" (Eus., HE 7, 25, 14). The name of Paul was common in the pagan world, while that of Peter was for all intents and purposes peculiarly Christian (used only rarely by the pagans); from it derive Petronia, Petrius and Petronilla. Dionysius writes in about the middle of 3rd c., but from the 4th c. the two names of Peter and Paul become ever more popular among Christians. Sometimes they are even taken together: in the cemetery of Priscilla a child is called Paulus Petrus (Ferrua, Memorie, 142f.). That of John is still more popular, esp. in the East, so much so that we know of several thousand persons with that name, which was used also for women (Ioannes, Iohannes, Ioanna, Iohanna); in the West it began to be introduced toward the end of the 4th c., when names taken from the OT also became popular, such as Abraham, Isaac, Daniel, Moses, Abel, Tobias, and esp. Susanna and Mary.

The cult of the martyrs was substantially a local phenomenon; there are few cases, at least proportionately, in which their relics and cult were brought to other geographical areas, fewer still to lands far away. A saint venerated in one region rarely enjoyed a cult and devotion elsewhere. Every church had its own calendar; those of large churches were easily established by imitation in their own region, and some of their saints acquired a more widely extended and popular cult. To cross a geographical area depended also on relations existing between the different cities and regions. For example, the commercial and social links between N Africa and Rome were very strong, so that the cults of some martyrs were exchanged: *Perpetua and *Cyprian were venerated in Rome, and, at *Carthage, Lawrence, Stephen and Sixtus. There were, however, few cultic links between far-flung regions: the only Roman martyr included in the breviarium syriacum is Xyxtus (Sixtus), a martyr of the 3rd c. Some names are more common in one region than in others: e.g., in Africa Donatus, Januarius, Felix; in Asia Minor Abercius, Thecla (found in Rome and Carthage), Ursula; in the Iberian Peninsula Vincentius, in Italy Laurentius. In the Roman church, in Late Antiquity, most Christians took the names of Laurentius, Petrus, Paulus, or Cyriacus, while many fewer took Marcellinus, Sixtus, Eutychius, Stephanus etc; among the most common women's names were Irene, Agape, Laurentia, Paula, Maria, Agnes, Thecla, Anna.

The 30th canon of the Arabic collection of *Nicaea (325), which required a Christian name to be conferred on the occasion of baptism, is a later redaction (Mansi 2, 961: fideles nominagentilium filiis suis ne imponant). The request supposes the common practice of infant baptism. In fact, from the 4th c. the practice spread among Christian families to confer the names of famous martyrs or important figures, and also to create new names relating to the Christian life or to the profession of faith: Adeodatus, Adeodata, Ambrosius, Anastasia (?), Beatus, Benedictus, Christophorus, Deogratias, Deumhabet, Deusdona, Domna, Dominica, Dominicus (which could be a Latin translation of Cyriacus), Habetdeus, Eucharistius, Reparatus (often used by Christians), Restitutus (?), Quodvultdeus, Quodiubet, Renata (?), Spesindeo, Theophylus, Theodolus, Theodosius, Theodorus, Theodora, Vincetdeus. Some of these names are typically African and can only be Latin translations of a Punic word, even if Adeodatus (very common in Africa) and Deusdona could, on the other hand, be Latin translations of the Greek Theodotus or Theodorus (Kajanto, Onomastic Stud- ies, 101-103). Certain Christian names derive from liturgical celebrations: Quadragesima, Eulogia, Paschasia (Pascasia), Paschasius, Sabbatius. Natalis (Natalia), however, was common in a pagan context, as was Natalicus; Epiphanius does not seem to derive from the name of the Christian feast of the *Epiphany. Some names expressed a Christian virtue: Elpidius, Fides, Spes, Piste (Diehl 4104D), Caritas (Αγάπη), with their derivatives Adelphius, Agapetus, Caritosa. Other names were created to express a sentiment: Gaudentianus, Hilarius, Hilarus, Sozomenus, Victorianus, Vincentius. Other typically Christian names were Martyrius, Martyria. Certain names, although also used by pagans, had a different resonance for Christians, and for this reason were used more by them, expressing ideas of the new faith (Anastasia, Redemptus, Renatus, Liberatus, Gaudiosus etc.) or because they had been borne by some famous person; e.g., Felicitas isto | clauditur infelix falso cognomine dicta (ICUR I, 713); . . . Anastasia secundum nomen credo futuram (i.e., vitam) (ICUR II, 6130).

Although there is evidence of Christianizing names (e.g., Stephanus, Perpetua), note should also be taken of the historical evolution of names acc. to fashion and taste, including the introduction of new names and the revival of old ones. The prosopographical collections and Christian inscriptions manifest the popularity of certain names, as does the spread of the cult of certain saints, either locally or elsewhere.

After the mid-4th c. we find certain "names of humility, " such as Calumniosus, Credulus, Importunus and esp. Projectus, Stercorius (Κοπεύς). Kajanto has shown that the name Projectus (Projecticius) does not refer to the fact that the baby was abandoned (Kajanto, On the Problem, 47ff.) nor Stercorius that he or she was recovered from dung. Therefore, although not pleasant, these were not expressions of the lowliness of their bearers, even if they were more common in Christian epigraphy than pagan; rather, they started as nicknames then were used as names. We see the same phenomenon in modern languages (e.g., the Italians names Porcaro, Maiale etc.). Classical Roman nomenclature, by virtue of reference to a vast extended family, included for male cives the use of tria nomina (praenomen, nomen, cognomen), and for women duo nomina: the first was individual (there were very few) within the family, given nine days after birth (in epigraphs usually abbreviated), the second indicated the gens to which the child belonged (transmitted from father to son); the third was personal (a type of nickname) and took its inspiration from a physical characteristic, but then became used by the whole family. The tria nomina distinguishes the free man from a freedman and from a slave. In high society, during the first two centuries of the empire, polyonomy also became widespread, i.e., use of names composed from many elements. This system gradually declined, probably because the praenomen and then also the nomen had lost their meaning, the link with the gens having been lost; there was also the tendency to reduce names to what was necessary, and the need to register or indicate a dead person with their best-known name. After the Edict of *Caracalla, which extended citizenship to all the free inhabitants of the empire (212), the constitutio antoniniana de civitate, the process of simplification became more marked: the first to fall out was the praenomen, as early as 2nd c., then also the nomen, and then in Late Antiquity usually only the cognomen was used. In the 4th c., and also in the 5th, some aristocrats still used the tria nomina. Even important members of senatorial families, such as the consuls, often used a single name for reasons of convenience. Therefore, the use of a single name in Late Antiquity was not a measure of the social condition of the dead person, but a consequence of a change of practice; the use of the tria nomina is, up to a point, an indicator of antiquity, but not always. The cognomen was used most frequently. In inscriptions of the Greek language use of the tria nomina was much less common. However, as Kajanto has demonstrated, from the era of Constantine the use of a single name, with the disappearance of the nomen, became more marked (see The Emergence); further, in Christian inscriptions it is hardly ever mentioned whether the status of the deceased was that of slave or free (Onomastic Studies, 7-8).

A change of name, or at least the taking on of a new name, is rare in the early centuries. *Ignatius of Antioch assumed the title of Theophorus; *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) took that of Caecilius in thanksgiving to the person who had helped him in his conversion. Eusebius of Caesarea took on the additional name of the martyr *Pamphilus, his master. *Macrina secretly had herself called Thecla (Gregory of Nyssa, Life of Macrina, 2: SC 178, 142). Some took a new name at the moment of baptism: in the cemetery of St. Valentinus we read (Pasca) SII, qui nomen habuit Iuda (Grossi Gondi, p. 82); Iudas qui et Cyriacus (LP 1, 167 and CVIII; PL 71, 179). Five Egyptians, at the moment of suffering martyrdom, a baptism of blood, wished to take the names of OT prophets (Eus., De martyr. Palest. 11, 7). The Fathers exhort the faithful to take the names of Christians. *John Chrysostom advises that babies should not be given the names of their parents or forebears, but those "of the just, of martyrs, of bishops and of apostles," because this can encourage imitation of them (Sermo de vana gloria 47-49: SC 188, 146 s.; cf. Homil. XXI in Gen. 21, 3: PG 53, 179; Hom. in Matth. 52: PG 69, 365). Chrysostom notes that many in *Antioch gave the name of the great *Meletius to their children (Hom. de S. Meletio: PG 50, 515). *Theodoret writes that giving the names of martyrs to children assures their protection over them (Graecarum affect. 8, 67: SC 57, 334).

DACL 1, 694-850 (741-746); 7, 635-637; 12, 1518-1519; EC 5, 435-436; Abbé Martigny, Dictionnaire des antiquités chrétiennes, Paris 1889, 504-516; A. Harnack, Missione e propagazione del cristianesimo nei primi tre secoli, Turin 1906 (repr. Cosenza 1986), 314-319; F. Grossi Gondi, Trattato di epigrafia cristiana, Rome 1920, 71-89; Ph. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels [2]1933; I. Kajanto, On the Problem of "Names of Humility" in Early Christian Epigraphy: Arctos 3 (1962) 45-53; Id., Onomastic Studies in the Early Christian Inscriptions of Rome and Carthage, Helsinki 1963; A. Ferrua, I nomi degli antichi cristiani: Civiltà Cattolica 117/IV (1966) 492-498; Id., Memorie dei SS. Pietro e Paolo nell'epigrafia, in Saecularia Petri et Pauli, Vatican City 1969, 129-148; L'onomastique latine, Colloque international au Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris 13-15 octobre 1975, Paris 1977 (the articles of I. Kajanto, The Emergence of the Late Single Name System, 421-430; N. Duval, Observations sur l'onomastique dans les inscriptions chrétiennes d'Afrique du Nord, 447-456; H.I. Marrou, Problèmes généraux de l'onomastique chrétienne, 431-435; C. Pietri, Remarques sur l'onomastique chrétienne de Rome, 437-445); Y.E. Meimaris, Sacred Names, Saints, Martyrs and Church Officials in Greek Inscriptions and Papyri Pertaining to Christian Church of Palestine, Athens 1986; O. de Bruyn, Onomastique chrétienne et culte des martyrs dans la Rome des IIIe-VIe siècles: RTL 20 (1989) 324-335; I. Kajanto, Sopravvivenza dei nomi teoforici nell'età cristiana: Acta Archaeologica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 41 (1989) 159-168; J. Gascou, Notes d'onomastique ecclésiale ancienne (à propos de P. Lond. III 1303 descr.): ZPE 96 (1993) 135-140; D. Mazzoleni, I nomi dei cristiani nelle iscrizioni romane: Forma Urbis 1 (1996) 19-24; I. Kajanto, Roman Nomenclature During the Late Empire, in Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano, ed. I. Di Stefano Manzella, Vatican City 1997, 103-111.

A. Di Berardino

NAPLES

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. Origins of Christianity. The earliest history of the church of Naples remains somewhat obscure even today. The sources available, late and legendary in character, need to be assessed with care. According to the account found in the Life of St. Aspren (in ASS, Augusti I, 200-202) and the biography written by Alberic (in F. Ughelli, Italia Sacra sive de episcopis Italiae, VI, Venetiis [2]1720, cols. 18-25), the Christian community of Naples was founded by St. Peter. The apostle, traveling from Antioch, is said to have stopped at Naples, where he healed and converted the young Aspren, who, acc. to the account, was consecrated bishop of Naples in 44 and suffered martyrdom in 79.

These pieces of information, all from later than the 9th c., are not altogether different from those in the most authoritative sources, such as the Chronicon episcoporum Neapolitanorum preserved in the Liber pontificalis (cod. Vat. Lat. 5007), the Bianchini Catalog (cod. Laur. 604, compendium of cod. Vat. Lat. 5007), and the "Marble Calendar" of Naples, which limit themselves to giving the name of Aspren (also with the variant Asprenus) first in the list of Neapolitan bishops, but without giving any indication of date. The dating of Maximus, the tenth bishop, who died between 355 and 362, far from reducing the length of the episcopacy of Aspren, could indicate the incompleteness of the catalog. Other elements seem to confirm the presence of a Christian community at Naples already in the 1st c.: a fresco in the catacombs of St. Januarius, dating to the 2nd c., suggesting the presence of an already constituted community; the prevalence in the 1st c. of the name Asprenas; the probable cultural influences of Pozzuoli, where there was already an active Christian community already in the 2nd half of the 1st c.

DACL 12, 691-776; EC 8, 1631-1644; BHL I, 117, nn. 724-726; D. Mallardo, Storia antica della Chiesa di Napoli. Le fonti, Naples 1943; Id., Le origini della Chiesa di Napoli: Miscellanea P. Paschini, I, Rome 1948, 27-68; A. Bellucci, Le origini della chiesa di Napoli e nuovi ritrovamenti nel cimitero paleocristiano di San Gennaro, in Actes du Ve Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Aix-en-Provence 13-19 septembre 1954), Paris 1957, 487-504; D. Ambrasi, Il cristianesimo e la chiesa napoletana dei primi secoli, in Storia di Napoli, I, Naples 1967, 625-759; P. Bertolini, La serie episcopale napoletana nei sec. VIII e IX. Ricerche sulle fonti per la storia dell'Italia Meridionale nell'alto medio evo: Rivista di Storia della Chiesa 24/2 (1970) 355-391; G. Otranto et al., Identità cristiana e territorio. Il caso di Napoli e della Campania: Annali di Storia dell'Esegesi 20/1 (2003) 139-164.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

II. Archaeology. Notwithstanding the greater antiquity of the evidence of cemeteries, the topographical plan of the city necessarily must have taken its shape around the episcopal complex. This complex, thanks partly to the results of archaeological investigations, can be described with clarity along with the buildings of which it was composed. According to the framework proposed by Farioli in 1978, we can identify (1) the Constantinian cathedral which ancient sources mention, dedicated variously to the Savior or the apostles, and the church of the Restituta, initially with five aisles (still visible in the modified plan of the present basilica); (2) a basilica constructed by Bishop Stephen at the end of the 5th c., dedicated to the Savior and also named Stephania after its sponsor, which seems to have been oriented on an axis parallel to that of the Constantinian basilica, from which it was separated by an alley. A mosaic floor found in the 1970s has been attributed to the Stephania, but we know nothing of its architectural characteristics. From the 5th c. onward, then, the presence of two buildings for the Christian cult presented Naples with the liturgical and functional problems typical of "double cathedrals"; mosaic fragments underneath the Stephania may even show that the arrangement existed in the 4th c., with the presence of a hall for catechumens adjacent to the cathedral. Between the two churches is the baptistery of S. Giovanni in Fonte, attributed to Bishop Severus (362–408), square, its cupola with an octagonal drum, decorated with a rich mosaic. Apart from these three buildings, the insula of the bishops' residence must have contained a second baptistery ascribed to Bishop Vincent, and an accubitorium, i.e., an episcopal triclinium, of which an apse with mosaic floor, found in the above-mentioned archaeological digs, is said to be part.

In proximity to the insula episcopalis—in the area of the ancient Greek agora and Roman forum—in 1954 the basilica of St. Lornzo Maggiore was discovered, traced to the episcopacy of *John II (535–555); it had three aisles with a semicircular apse flanked by pastophoria, preceded by a narthex and with ample remains of mosaic flooring. The urban religious topography of Naples is completed by the church of S. Giorgio, in the present piazza of S. Giorgio ai Mannesi, not far from the cathedral complex, with three aisles and apsed transept, dating from the episcopate of Severus and restructured radically in the 17th c.; the church of S. Maria Maggiore (today S. Maria Maggiore alla Pietra Santa), placed in the episcopate of *Pomponius (514–532), completely rebuilt in the 17th c.; the basilica of the Holy Apostles, completely restored in the 1st half of the 17th c.; the basilica of St. John (today St. John Major) on the hill of the same name, ascribed to Bishop Vincent (555–578) and rebuilt in the 17th c.; and a group of deaconries, from that of St. Andrew, of which there is clear evidence at the beginning of the 8th c., to that of St. Januarius (today St. Gennaro all'Olmo), which we first learn of at the end of the 7th c., to that of Sts. John and Paul, completely destroyed, known of from the beginning of the 8th c., in the area now of the university, and finally S. Maria in Cosmedin (today S. Maria di Porta Nova) which also seems to go back to the 8th c. As for the monasteries—there are fourteen mentioned by the sources—there are only traces remaining of that of St. Severinus, which we hear of as early as the era of Bishop Victor (492–496), in the castle of St. Elmo, with remains from the church and also from below ground level, with cells of the monks cut out of the rock.

As for the suburbs, four underground cemetery complexes are known: St. Januarius, St. Gaudiosus, St. Euphebius and St. Severus. The catacomb of St. Januarius, created in the hill of Capodimonte, consists of two levels, one above the other, each having developed from ancient nuclei. The lower level, the older, was established around a family burial area, non-Christian, with a large trapezoidal hall—the so-called vestibule—with seating extending along the richly decorated walls, opening out into smaller rooms; its center is a common area where, in the mid-3rd c., the body of Bishop Agrippinus was placed. Around this tomb, perhaps at the start of the 4th c., a small oratory was constructed, and then later, but before 5th c., a more ample basilica. An extension of the catacomb, which can be dated to the mid-4th c., is centered on three principal (and notably wide) galleries, from which smaller ones branch off. Also notable is the variety of typology on the burial places, and the decorative themes. The upper level also developed around a family burial area, this one originally Christian, as the pictures which decorate it bear witness, identifiable in two adjoining and connecting rooms, subsequently expanded with galleries which meet and incorporate other small hypogea. The more obvious transformation, however, is of one niche in the catacomb, to which—it seems at the beginning of 5th c.—the relics of St. Januarius were transferred. This necessitated restructuring of the surrounding area, with the creation of a sort of sanctuary decorated with frescoes on different levels, datable earlier than the 9th c.: the oldest, from the beginning of the 6th c., depicts St. Januarius between Vesuvius and Mount Somma. Also connected with the adaptations made for the deposition of the martyr's relics is the so-called basilica minor, also known as the basilica of the bishops, because it contained the tombs of the bishops of Naples from *John I onward, and of which some mosaic images remain. Immediately to the W of the catacomb we find a large basilica above ground, also dedicated to St. Januarius, with three aisles, its apse interspersed with great arches. Of the later development of the complex we should note the so-called expanding residence of Paul II, made up of various buildings including a triclinium and a marmoreus baptismatis fons, identified in the lower vestibule; also a church dedicated to St. Stephen, constructed at the end of the 5th c., of which only part of the foundations of the apse remain. It is proposed that in this church, along with that of St. Januarius, we see an example of twin basilicas erected in the domain of a Roman suburban villa.

As for the catacomb of St. Gaudiosus—which takes its name from the bishop of Abitina, exiled to Naples at the time of the *Vandal persecutions and buried there—it is difficult to reconstruct the original iconography given the radical transformation it underwent in the 17th c. From what remains, the hypogeum consisted essentially of a large ambulatory, from which opened small niches decorated with frescoes and mosaics.

Even less may be said with certainty of the small hypogea of St. Euphebius and St. Severus. The first, located in the Hill of Capodichino, consists of an ambulatory with niches on both sides, and an oratory at the end, which was the origin of the present church of S. Eframo Vecchio or of the Immaculate Conception. A fresco there, dated to the 5th c., is the earliest evidence, although the sources indicate its existence before this. Of the other hypogeum, which is in the Hill of Capodimente, the only remains are a niche with traces of fresco, datable to the 5th c., accessible through the present church of St. Severus della Sanità.

The sources mention the church of St. Euphemia (5th c.), also in the suburbs, located between the catacomb of St. Januarius and the walls of the city; Sts. Fortunatus and Maximus (ca. mid-4th c.) in front of the catacomb of St. Gaudiosus; St. Sossius (1st half of 8th c.), apparently situated on the Hill of Capodimonte, no trace of which remains. The oratory of St. Aspren, however, in the harbor area of the city, survives, albeit profoundly altered: it has two small rooms, one above the other; the lower reuses a bath structure, perhaps dating from the 6th c., dedicated to a community of fishermen; the upper one is laid out on a "T" plan, its marble remains indicating an early medieval origin.

The topographical structure of the city also included a set of monasteries mentioned by the sources, but the only remains we have are those already mentioned of St. Severus.

Research of recent decades has not brought to light anything new of importance with respect to the insula episcopalis, for which the reconstruction proposed at the end of the 1970s is still valid; in the church of S. Maria Maggiore alla Pietra Santa and of S. Giorgio Maggiore, on the other hand, some limited archaeological work has identified traces of basilicas going back to the 6th. c., in particular in the construction attributed to Vincent, bishop of Naples immediately after the Greek-Gothic war, part of an apse with opus sectile flooring, in which we see the cultural influence of the new Byzantine rulers.

Our knowledge of the late Roman and Byzantine periods of the city has improved in recent years thanks to the large number of archaeological excavations, which show a progressive contraction of the residential areas of the city, indicated by the shrinkage or even obliteration of certain axis roads, the metamorphosis of urban into agricultural areas, and the abandonment of some areas within the walls, which became dumping grounds or cemeteries. In this context, ecclesiastical building projects had a special importance, monumental constructions marking the rehabilitation and revitalization of some areas. The location of the basilicas gives us a good idea of the main centers of the city, which apart from the zone around the cathedral were to be found in the area of the forum (basilica of S. Lorenzo), in the SW suburb containing the flourishing harbor area (basilica of S. Giovanni Maggiore), and in the suburban area to the N, where the catacombs were created, frequented for reasons both funerary and cultic. The older pessimistic view of the state of the city in *Late Antiquity has been nuanced, giving way to a more complex and integrated understanding; the study of the abundant and varied ceramics found in the urban excavations bears witness to a high volume of imports, and to the relative vitality of the city, particularly in commercial terms, between the 5th and 6th c. In this light we understand better the evidence of *Cassiodorus, who extolled the large population and prosperity of the city, a true center in the *Gothic era of political and military power and of peregrina commercia (Cassiod., Var. VI, 23, 3). The importance of the harbor area is shown by the enlargement of the city wall to the SW, on the occasion of the substantial fortification work undertaken by *Valentinian III in 440; from this time onward, thanks to an effective new defensive arrangement, Naples assumed a role of some importance in the region, as a place of refuge for the surrounding rural population and of villages not protected by walls, and also for exiles, such as Africans, who had come from distant places.

New discoveries in the suburban areas have come from the catacomb of St. Januarius, where there have been excavations in the large underground basilica of the upper level: new frescoes, among which is a depiction of traditio legis; a large number of tombs have also been investigated. Of great importance was the finding of a graffito which records structural expansion around the tomb of the martyr Januarius by a certain John, probably to be identified with the bishop of that name, founder of the basilica of St. Lawrence. In the catacomb of St. Gaudiosus, during restoration of parts of the crypt (succorpo) of the 17th-c. church of S. Maria della Sanità (from which at present the catacomb is accessed), an arcosolium has been found with traces of a mosaic depicting a bishop, which interestingly has been identified, albeit hypothetically, with the Nostrianus who, acc. to the Chronicon episcoporum Neapolitanorum, is buried in the ecclesia beati Gaudiosi, so pointing to a location in that crypt. Finally, some parts of a catacomb found at the end of the 19th c. in vico Lammatari, again in the Sanità district, have been reexamined; the catacomb, presently inaccessible, may owe its origin to the nearby presence of the tomb of Bishop Victor, buried acc. to the sources in the basilica of St. Euphemia, perhaps identifiable in the chapel dedicated to the saint also in vico Lammatari.

S. D'Aloe, Catalogo di tutti gli edifici sacri della città di Napoli e suoi sobborghi: Archivio Storico per le Province Napoletane 8 (1883) 111ff., 287ff., 499ff. and 670ff.; B. Capasso, Topografia della città di Napoli nell'XI secolo, Naples 1895; A. Bellucci, Ritrovamenti archeologici nelle catacombe di San Gaudioso e Sant'Eufebio a Napoli: Rivista di Archeologia Cristiana XI (1934) 79-115; D. Mallardo, Ricerche di storia e topografia degli antichi cimiteri cristiani di Napoli, Naples 1936; A. Bellucci, Il cimitero di S. Gaudioso, Naples 1942; A. Venditti, L'architettura dell'Alto Medioevo, in Storia di Napoli, II, 2, Naples 1969, 774ff.; A. Venditti, Problemi di lettura e interpretazione dell'architettura paleocristiana a Napoli: Napoli Nobilissima 12/5 (1973) 177-188; R. Di Stefano, La cattedrale di Napoli. Storia, restauro, scoperte, ritrovamenti, Naples 1974; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; R. Farioli, Gli scavi nell' "insula episcopalis" di Napoli paleocristiana: tentativo di lettura, in Atti IX Congr. Int. di Archeol. Crist., Rome 1978, 275ff.; Id., Aggiornamento a E. Bertaux, "L'art dans l'Italie méridionale," IV, Rome 1978, 153-162, 189-193; N. Ciavolino, S. Maria alla Sanità. La chiesa e le catacombe, Naples 1979; U.M. Fasola, Le raffigurazioni di defunti e le scene bibliche negli affreschi delle catacombe di S. Gennaro, in Parola e spirito. Studi in onore di Settimio Cipriani, Brescia 1982, 763-776; P. Arthur, Rapporto preliminare sullo scavo a S. Patrizia, Napoli: Archeologia Medievale 11 (1984) 315-320; Id., Naples: Notes on the Economy of a Dark Age City, in C. Malone - S. Stoddart, Papers in Italian Archaeology IV: The Cambridge Conference, Part IV, Classical and Medieval Archaeology, Oxford 1985, 247-258; G. Rassello, S. Severo fuori le mura, Naples 1985; Id., Archeologia urbana a Napoli. Riflessioni sugli ultimi tre anni: Archeologia Medievale 13 (1986) 515-525; J. Desmuilliez, Note de topographie napolitaine: Mélanges de l'École Française de Rome 98 (1986/2) 873-879; U.M. Fasola, Le tombe privilegiate dei vescovi e dei duchi di Napoli nelle catacombe di San Gennaro, in L'inhumation privilégiée du IV^e^ au VIII^e^ siècle en Occident. Actes du colloque (Créteil, les 16-18 mars 1984), Paris 1986, 205-210; N. Ciavolino, Nuovi affreschi delle catacombe di San Gennaro: Campania Sacra 20 (1989) 185-206; A. De Simone, S. Lorenzo Maggiore in Napoli. Il monumento e l'area, in Neapolis. Atti del XXV convegno di studi sulla Magna Grecia (Taranto, 3-7 ottobre 1985), Taranto 1988, 233-253; A.M. Giuntella, Napoli, in P. Testini - G. Cantino Wataghin - L. Pani Ermini, La cattedrale in Italia, in Actes du XI^e^ Congrès International d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon, Vienne, Grenoble, Genève et Aoste, 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989, I, 95-97; P. Arthur, Naples: A Case of Urban Survival in the Early Middle Ages?: Mélanges de l'Ecole Française de Rome - Moyen Âge 103/2 (1991) 759-784; G. Liccardo, Le presenze archeologiche: dai complessi ellenistici a quelli altomedievali, in Il borgo dei Vergini. Storia e struttura di un ambito urbano, ed. A. Buccaro, Naples 1991, 93-102; L. Trapanese, S. Severo a Capodimonte, un importante polo religioso nel cuore del borgo, ibid., 275-279; G. Bertelli, Affreschi altomedievali delle catacombe di S. Gennaro a Napoli. Note preliminari: Bessarione 9 (1992) 119-139; F. Bologna, Momenti della cultura figurativa nella Campania medievale, in Storia e civiltà della Campania. Il Medioevo, Naples 1992, 171-275, esp. 178-192; G. Liccardo, Lineamenti di epigrafia cristiana napoletana: RivAC 68 (1992) 259-270; F. Luzzati Laganà, Società e potere nella Napoli protobizantina attraverso l'epistolario di Gregorio Magno: Bullettino della Badia di Grottaferrata n.s. 46 (1992) 101-136; P. Arthur, Il complesso archeologico di Carminiello ai Mannesi, Napoli. Scavi 1983-1984, Galatina 1994; G. La Posta, Neapolis. Storia di Napoli e del meridione d'Italia. Periodo greco, romano e bizantino. Dalle origini al 1140, Naples 1994; F. Bisconti, Il restauro della cripta dei vescovi nelle catacombe napoletane di S. Gennaro, in Atti del II Colloquio dell'Associazione italiana per lo studio e la conservazione del mosaico (Rome, 5-7 Dec 1994), Bordighera 1995, 311-320; M. Esposito, Resti di un pavimento in opus sectile recentemente scoperti nella basilica di San Giovanni Maggiore in Napoli, ibid., 31-38; C. Scarpati - F. Fratta - D. Giampaola, Neapolis. Le mura e la città. Indagini a S. Domenico Maggiore e a S. Marcellino: Annali. Sezione di archeologia e storia antica 3 (1996) 115-138; M. Schmauder, Das sogenannte Cubiculum des hl. Nostrianus in der Gaudiosus-Katakombe. Zur spätantiken Malerei in Neapel: JbAC 39 (1996) 225-262; F. Bisconti, Imprese musive paleocristiane negli edifici di culto dell'Italia meridionale: documenti e monumenti dell'area campana, in Atti del IV Colloquio dell'Associazione italiana per lo studio e la conservazione del mosaico (Palermo, 9-13 Dec 1996), Ravenna 1997, 637-643; L. De Maria, Coperture musive delle tombe pavimentali al S. Gennaro di Napoli, ibid., 637-644; F. Bisconti, L'evoluzione delle strutture iconografiche alle soglie del VI secolo in Occidente. Il ruolo delle decorazioni pittoriche e musive nelle catacombe romane e napoletane, in Radovi XIII. Medunarodnog kongresa za starokrščansku arheologiju. Acta XIII Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae (Split - Poreć 25.9.94–1.10.94), Split 1998, 2, 253-282; J. Desmulliez, Le dossier du groupe épiscopal de Naples. État actuel des recherches: Antiquité Tardive 6 (1998) 345-354; P. Novara, Sectilia parietali dalle catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte (Napoli): RivAC 74 (1998) 149-162; A. Bellucci, Le catacombe di Sant'Eufebio presso il convento cappuccino di Napoli, ed. F. Mastroianni (Quaderni storici dei Cappuccini di Napoli, 4), Naples 2001; F. Bisconti, Mosaici nel cimitero di S. Gaudioso: revisione iconografica ed approfondimenti iconologici, in Atti del VII Colloquio dell'Associazione Italiana per lo Studio e la Conservazione del Mosaico, Ravenna 2001, 87-98; D. De Francesco, Il battistero del vescovo Paolo II nella catacomba di S. Gennaro a Napoli: un caso di dualismo episcopale, in Atti dell'VIII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist. (Genoa-Sarzana-Albenga-Finale Ligure-Ventimiglia, 21-26 Sep 1998), Bordighera 2001, 1057-1076; C. Martorelli, L'architettura dei battisteri di Napoli, Capua e Marcellianum, ibid., 1041-1046; P. Arthur, Naples, from Roman Town to City-State: An Archaeological Perspective, Rome 2002; K. Gandolfi, Les mosaïques du baptistère de Naples: programme iconographique et liturgie, in Il Duomo di Napoli dal paleocristiano all'età angioina. Atti della I giornata di studio su Napoli (Losanna, Nov 2000), ed. di S. Romano - N. Bock, Naples 2002, 21-34; D. Giampaola et al.,

Napoli. Indagini archeologiche nel centro storico di Napoli: Bollettino di Archeologia 39-40 (1996, May-Aug), 2002, 84-124; N. Ciavolino, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana dal 1983 al 1993 in Campania, in 1983-1993: dieci anni di archeologia cristiana in Italia. Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeol. Crist. (Cassino, 20-24 Sep 1993), ed. E. Russo, Rome 2003, 615-666; M. Amodio, Mosaici paleocristiani dalla basilica di San Lorenzo Maggiore a Napoli: Napoli Nobilissima 5/5 (2004) 3-20; M. Amodio, Storia degli studi di archeologia cristiana a Napoli dal '600 ad oggi, in Roma, la Campania e l'Oriente cristiano antico. Giubileo 2000. Atti del Convegno di Studi (Napoli, 9-11 Oct 2000), ed. L. Cirillo - G. Rinaldi, Naples 2004, 229-253; F. Bisconti, Testimonianze archeologiche delle origini cristiane nel napoletano. Le Catacombe di S. Gennaro, ibid., 212-228; D. Giampaola, Dagli studi di Bartolommeo Capasso agli scavi della Metropolitana: ricerche sulle mura di Napoli e sull'evoluzione del paesaggio costiero: Napoli Nobilissima 5/5 (2004) 35-56.

L. Pani Ermini - M. Amodio - L. Spera

NARBONNE

I. Origins of Christianity - II. Visigoth (462–719) and Arab (719–759) eras.

Narbo Martius was the first Roman colony of *Gaul (118 BC), established by Domitius Ahenobarbus. In 46 BC veterans of the 10th legion Decumana (the favorite of Caesar) were brought here, under the direction of Tiberius Claudius Nero. Capital of the Narbonese province, which extended from the Alps to the Pyrenees, situated at the crossroads of the Aquitaine Road with the Via Domitia, which from the Rhone continued to *Spain, the city had an active port, from which commercial sea traffic left for the East, Sicily and *Rome; at Ostia the navicularii of Narbonne had their own free port. There is nothing preserved of the ancient monuments, other than a few inscriptions, but the city had a forum, a theater, a horreum, baths, an amphitheater and capitol, all mentioned by *Sidonius Apollinaris (Carme 23, vv. 39-44 and 145-146). In the 3rd c. the barbarian threat in the Rhone moved the political center of gravity, and in the 4th c. the administrative provincial center, toward the Rhone and the N, with the administrative reforms of the end of the century signaling the eclipse of Narbonne, reducing its provincial territory to Narbonese I, with Narbonne, Toulouse, Béziers, Nîmes and Lodève as its principal centers. Ecclesiastical organization was modeled on the civil administration.

I. Origins of Christianity. The hypothesis has been advanced that during his journey to Spain St. Paul stopped at Narbonne, but both this journey and stopover are suppositions and indeed equally without foundation.

The first known bishop was called Paul, and he seems actually to have been the first bishop. He was buried ad Albolas, on the Via Domitia, where a basilica was built in his name in the middle of the S necropolis. Prudentius (Perist. 4, 34), the Mart. hier. (22.3; Italian version) and *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 1, 30) all mention him. *Caesarius calls him a disciple of *Trophimus of Arles, and Gregory numbers him among the seven missionaries sent from Rome into Gaul in about 250. There is a Life (BHL 6589-90) which may date to the 8th c., the era in which the Franks reconquered Narbonne (759); from this work seems to derive the Passio SS. Dionysii, Rustici et Ekutherii. Ado of Vienna confuses the saint with Sergius Paulus of Acts (13:7-8).

We know nothing of the church of Narbonne in the 4th c. Its bishop was not present at the Council of *Arles in 314; we do not know for what reason. The history of the 5th c. is, however, well known, on account of the difficult relationship with Arles in the matter of metropolitan rights during the episcopate of Hilary (417–427). At the time of the *Visigoths, during the episcopate of *Rusticus (9 Oct 427–26 Oct 461), numerous church buildings were constructed, as inscriptions show: Rusticus was responsible, along with a priest called Othia, for the erection of the cathedral, the church of St. Felix, built at the N necropolis on the road which leads to Béziers, and the churches of the Minerva and that of nearby Ensérune. Rusticus, perhaps owing to his being from *Marseille, also played a role in the religious life of the province and of the West in general, in connection with the consecration of *Ravennius of Arles, the Council of *Chalcedon, ecclesiastical discipline, and the dispute between Fréjus and Lérins. His successor Hermes, who was first nominated bishop of Béziers but not accepted by the inhabitants of that diocese, was then elected bishop of Narbonne, contrary to the canons. Pope *Hilary (461–468) intervened, accepting his election to Narbonne, but removing for life his authority as metropolitan.

II. Visigoth (462–719) and Arab (719–759) eras. From the end of the 5th c. to the beginning of the 8th c., Narbonese I, with the name of Settimania, was a Visigoth province, under the religious influence of Spain, *Arian until 589, and Catholic subsequently. The archbishops of Narbonne took part (occasionally) in the Councils of *Toledo, used the Visigothic liturgy (the oldest Liber commicus, preserved in fragmentary form in the palimpsest Paris. bat. 2269, comes from St. Nazarius of Carcassonne, 8th–9th c.), and received from Spain the relics of martyrs (Vincent of Saragossa, Felix of Gerona, *Eulalia of Mérida, Justus and Pastor of Complutum); from Spain also, moreover, came patristic influence and canonical legislation. During this period missions in the countryside were continued and completed, through the creation of rural parishes.

The archbishops we know of are few: Caprarius, present at the Council of *Agde (506); Migetius, at the Councils of Toledo and Narbonne (589) and of Toledo (597); Sergius, whom we hear of ca. 610; Selva, present at the Councils of Toledo (633, 638); Argebad, mentioned by Julian of Toledo in 673; Sunifred, who was represented at the Councils of Toledo (683, 684) and present at that of 688, addressee of a letter of *Idalius of Barcelona, ca. 689; Daniel (788–789). Nebridius was the first of the bishops of the Carolingian era (799–822): he was in communication with Benedict of Aniane, the duke William of Gellone (Toulouse), and the king, then emperor, Louis the Pius. With him closes the history of the church of ancient Narbonne: the cathedral of Rusticus was destroyed and reconstructed.

DACL 12, 791-878; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, I, Paris 1907, 302-309; E. Griffe, Histoire religieuse des anciens pays de L'Aude, vol. 1, Paris 1933; A. Mundó, El commicus palimpsest Paris. Lat. 2269, Montserrat 1956, 151-275; H.I. Marrou, Le dossier épigraphique de l'évêque Rusticus de Narbonne: RivAC 46 (1970) 331-349; Province ecclésiastique de Narbonne (Narbonensis Prima), ed. P.-A. Février, Paris 1989, 15-23.

V. Saxer

NARCISSUS of Jerusalem (d. after 212). He succeeded Dolichianus in the see of *Jerusalem between 180 and 192, in the reign of *Commodus (176–192). According to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE V, 12, 1-2) Narcissus was the fifteenth bishop of Jerusalem since *Hadrian (117–138) and the thirtieth since the apostolic age. In 195 he presided (with *Theophilus, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine) over a Palestinian synod, gathered together on order of Pope *Victor (189–199) to debate the age-old problem of the celebration of *Easter. Narcissus agreed with Theophilus and the Alexandrian church on the appropriateness of celebrating Easter only on a Sunday, to the exclusion of every other day: this opposed that of the *Quartodecimans, who claimed to draw on apostolic tradition (HE V, 23, 3 and 25). Eusebius records many miracles of Narcissus and his great virtue (HE VI, 9). Attacked and defamed, Narcissus abandoned the episcopate and retired to the desert. In Jerusalem he was succeeded by Dius, Germanios and Gordius, after which he returned to the see, sharing the pastoral governance with Alexander of Cappadocia, owing to his now advanced age (HE VI, 10). He died sometime after 212. *Epiphanius (Pan. II, 2, 66, n. 20: PG 42, 61) dates his death later, to the reign of *Alexander Severus (222–235). Baronius (Roman Martyrology, 29 Oct) says that he died at the age of 116. According to tradition he was martyred. The first writer to have introduced him into the Roman Martyrology was Ado, the Frankish bishop of Vienne and hagiographical author, in the 9th c. His contemporary Usuard, the Paris Benedictine, followed this in inserting Narcissus into his own analogous publication.

Tillemont 3, 177-180; AASS, Oct. XII, 782-790; Synax. Constantinop. 873-874, l. 60; Comm. Martyr. Rom. 484, n. 5; Vies des Saints 10, 971-973; Eus. HE V, 12, 1-2; 22; 23, 3 and 25; VI, 8, 7; 9, 1-8; 10 and 11, 1-3; J. Dubois, Le martyrologe d'Usuard: Subsidia Hagiographica 40 (1965) 330; BS 9, 719-721; LTK[3] 7, 638-639 (Th. Baumeister).

M. Spinelli

NARCISSUS of Neronias (d. after 360). Bishop of Neronias (Irenopolis) in Cilicia. Supporter of *Arius from the first, and as such condemned, along with *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Theodotus of Laodicea, at the council held at *Antioch shortly before the Council of *Nicaea (325). At Nicaea he yielded, signing the anti-Arian formula, but immediately afterward he was among the protagonists of the anti-Nicene reaction. He participated in the Councils of Antioch (327) and *Tyre (335) which condemned respectively *Eustathius and *Athanasius. He was part of a Eusebian delegation which met *Constans in *Milan in 342. He participated in the Council of *Serdica and was condemned by the Westerns as Arian. It is not clear if he was present at the Council of *Sirmium of 351 against *Photinus. In 358–359 he contended with *Constantius against the *homoiousion party, in favor of a more moderate pro-Arian theological approach.

DCB 4, 3-4; Fliche-Martin III, passim; Simonetti 593; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, see index; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 197; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV^e siècle (328-373), Rome 1996, see index.

M. Simonetti

NARRATIO. In its broad sense, the Latin term narratio indicates the rei gestae expositio, the actus narrandi; in a special, technical sense used in rhetoric, it is the part of a work which follows the exordium and prepares the argumentation. Characteristic of the narratio are brevity, clarity and verisimilitude (see, e.g., Cic., Orat. 124), in other words, functionality.

Quintilian esp. considers it to be of fundamental importance (see Inst. Or. IV, 21). Three types of narratio may be identified: the first consists in setting out the facts that relate directly to the subject under discussion; the second in an account in the mode of digressio, made within the context of the oratio and connected to it (in these cases the narratio is one of the six parts making up the classical oratio acc. to the rules of the inventio; see, e.g., Rhetorica ad Herennium I, 3, 4; Cic., Part. orat. 31-32; De orat. II, 326-330); the third type of narratio, which has nothing to do with the causae civiles, embraces the whole mastery of literary culture: it is the pars in negotiis posita which in its turn is divided into fabula, historia, argumentum: these are stages necessary for the pupil who progresses from the outset under the guidance of the grammaticus and then under the rhetorician (see Rhetorica ad Herennium I, 8, 12; Cic., De invent. I, 19, 27). Christian writers often use the term and concept of narratio with the literary genre of historia in mind, included in the pars in negotiis posita: for them the content of narratio is sacred history, the historia salutis, which—acc. to *Augustine—extends from creation until the present period of the church (cf. De catechiz. rudibus 3, 5; 6, 10).

For the rhetorical concept, see K. Barwick, Die Gliederung der narratio in der rhetorischen Theorie und ihre Bedeutung für die Geschichte des antiken Romans: Hermes 63 (1928) 261-288; H. Lausberg, Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik. Eine Grundlegung der Literaturwissenschaft, I, Munich 1960, 147ff. and passim; R. Barthes, L'ancienne rhétorique, Paris 1970. Some remarks on the use of narratio by Christian authors in V. Grossi, Regula veritatis e narratio battesimale in Sant'Ireneo: Augustinianum 12 (1972) 437-463; P. Siniscalco, Christum narrare et dilectionem monere. Osservazioni sulla narratio del "De catechizandis rudibus" di S. Agostino: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 605-623; La narrativa cristiana antica. Codici narrativi, strutture formali e schemi retorici. Atti del XXIII Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità cristiana (Rome 5-7 Maggio 1994), Rome 1995: the whole volume is useful, but esp. S. Pricoco, La narrativa cristiana antica, 7-24 and P. Siniscalco, La "narratio historica" da Luca ad Eusebio, 25-38; J. Knape, in Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Ueding, VI, Darmstadt 2003, cols. 98-106, under Narratio.

P. Siniscalco

NARRATIO DE REBUS ARMENIAE (Διήγησις). History of the *Armenian church in its relations with the Byzantine, at the time of the Council of *Nicaea (325) up to the end of the 8th c., prepared in a pro-*Chalcedonian Armenian setting. The work, the original Armenian of which has been lost, exists only in a Greek version which dates from before the 13th c.

G. Garitte, La Narratio de rebus Armeniae. Édition critique et commentaire (CSCO 132/subs. 4), Louvain 1952; S.P. Cowe, The Significance of the Persian War (572–591) in the Narratio de rebus Armeniae: Muséon 104 (1991) 265-276; N. Garsoïan, L'Église arménienne et le grand schism d'Orient, CSCO 574/subs. 100, Louvain 1999.

S.J. Voicu

NARRATIO DE REBUS PERSICIS (Ἐξήγησις τῶν πραχθέντων ἐν Περσίδι). "A novel with a dogmatic and apologetic purpose" (Bardenhewer), in the form of a debate on the true religion held at the court of the *Sassanid king Arrinatus, to which Christians, pagans, Jews and even a Persian magician contribute. The central role in the debate is played by the official Aphroditianus, chief of the bodyguard, a pagan who is very well disposed toward Christianity. The author of the work presents himself as one of the Christians invited to the discussion. The principal part of the Narratio is the first, in which Christianity and Hellenism, or paganism, are discussed.

In this regard it is shown that the pagan gods have borne witness to Christ: among the arguments adduced to illustrate this thesis, Aphroditianus recounts the marvels which occurred at the temple of the goddess Hera, also called Source, in the Persian capital, at the moment of the birth of Christ, culminating in the appearance of a star and a shining diadem above the statue of the goddess. This would be the same star that guided the magi, sent by the king, to Jerusalem. When they found Mary and the child, they returned to Persia with a picture of both Virgin and child. Following this in the Narratio we read the accusations against Aphroditianus for his pro-Christian opinions, made by certain "archimandrites" of the king, who nevertheless vindicated Aphrotitianus. Then there is a proof of magic, in which the Persian Oricatus is beaten by the bishop Casteleus; then a dispute with the Jews, in which they are criticized for their incredulity.

The purpose of the whole work is not so much the triumph of Christianity over other religions, as much as proving the thesis that paganism has made a real contribution to the affirmation of Christianity, as shown by the centrality of the figure of Aphroditianus.

This composition, in origin Syrian or Asiatic, is later than the Christian history of *Philip of Side (434–439), frequently suggested as its source, and before the defeat of the Sassanids in the 1st half of the 7th c.: its editor, E. Bratke, places it in the 2nd half of the 5th c., but more commonly it is dated to the end of the 6th c. The attribution of the work to the patriarch *Anastasius I of Antioch or to *Anastasius the Sinaite, as attested in certain MSS, does not seem reliable. One may even doubt if the author was Christian, as he himself does affirm, given his poor knowledge of ecclesiastical institutions and organization: he may be a pagan who wrote in an era when adherents of paganism risked persecution and suppression in the Roman Empire.

CPG 6968; BHG 802-805 g; PG 10, 97-108 (the account of Aphroditianus only); E. Bratke, Das sogenannte Religionsgespräch am Hof der Sasaniden, TU 19, n.s. 4, 3, 1899; Bardenhewer 5, 151; U. Monneret de Villard, Le leggende orientali sui Magi evangelici, ST 163, Vatican City 1952, 107-111; E. Honigmann, Philippus of Side and His Christian History, in Patristic Studies (ST 173), Vatican City 1953, 82-91; Beck 381; Erbetta I, 1, 224.

F. Scorza Barcellona

NARRATIONES DE CAEDE MONACHORUM IN MONTE SINAI. Account of a barbarian incursion in Sinai, drawn up by an anonymous hermit, previously an official at the court of *Theodosius II, with a particular interest in the sacrifice of animals as practiced by the Arabs. Notwithstanding the title of the MS, the author cannot be *Nilus of Ancyra; even if he is a Sinaite monk of the 5th c., what he recounts cannot be considered reliable history.

CPG 6044 (with bibl.); CPG/S BHG 1301-1307; PG 79, 589-693; K. Heussi, Untersuchungen zu Nilus dem Asketen, TU 42/2, Leipzig 1917, 123-159; V. Christides, Once Again the "Narrationes" of Nilus Sinaiticus: Byzantion 43 (1973) 39-59; F. Conca, Per una edizione critica di [Nilo], "Narrationes" (PG 79, 589-694): Acme 31 (1978) 37-57; F. Conca, Nilus Ancyranus. Narratio (BT) Leipzig 1983.

J. Gribomont

NARRATIVES, CHRISTIAN. Christian narrative technique immediately assumed models deriving from ancient stories. There were various types of narrative Christian texts that acquired fictitious elements, esp. the apocryphal Acts and the martyrological literature. With respect to the *Life of Adam and Eve, only recently has it been discovered that this work is entirely Christian and that it was originally written in Greek at the beginning of the 2nd c. AD. It refashions the story of Genesis, embellishing it in a fictionalized sense and introducing the repentance of the progenitors after their death and their admission into *paradise (see J.R. Levison, Adam and Eve, Life of, in Anchor Bible Dictionary, I, New York 1992, 64-66; subsequent studies are listed in the bibl.). Among the so-called Apostolic Fathers, a narrative structure that can be juxtaposed to the story can be seen in the Shepherd of *Hermas, which originated in a Roman context at the beginning of the 2nd c., written in a simple and popular style. Within its framework, it contains five visions, twelve mandates (or precepts) and ten similitudes (or allegories). At the center is the personification of the church as a lady in white garments who appears to Hermas to invite him to repentance with the promise of forgiveness. At first she is a sick elderly woman, but she becomes young again. Hermas is presented as a slave—perhaps also as a metaphor of his conversion—who had a dreary marriage and wicked and apostate children, who drew up charges against their parents; acc. to the Muratorian *Canon, he was the brother of *Pius, bishop of Rome around the year 150, but in his second vision he is a contemporary of *Clement of Rome, toward the end of the 1st c. The work may be a combination of several works, some have thought of several authors. It has an adoptionist or angelic Christology, so as to suggest Jewish Christian tendencies; at times, however, it seems to reveal the preexistence of the Son of God; the dates offered by scholars go back to as far as AD 90 (see, e.g., J.S. Jeffers, Conflict at Rome, Minneapolis 1991, 106-120; P. Henne, L'unité du Pasteur d'Hermas, Paris 1992; J.C. Wilson, Five Problems in the Interpretation of the Shepherd of Hermas, Lewiston 1995; C. Osiek's introduction to her English tr., The Shepherd of Hermas, 1999, 1-10; The Apostolic Fathers, ed. J. Henderson, II, Cambridge 2003, 161ff.).

But the larger and more homogeneous group of "Christian stories" is without a doubt that of the apocryphal Acts of the apostles, as well as some gospels, esp. those containing the stories about *Jesus' childhood. The *Acts of Peter and the *Acts of Paul seem to have originated, probably within the mid-2nd c., in close connection with each another, and both pay special attention to the preaching of the two *apostles at *Rome. The Acts of Peter begin with Peter's arrival to Rome after his departure for *Spain; an important part is made up of the combat with *Simon Magus—acc. to *Irenaeus the founder of the *gnostic heresy, and acc. to *Eusebius of Caesarea all heresies—that culminates in an amazing scene in which Simon flies and Peter, by calling upon *Jesus, causes him to crash to the ground, where he is stoned to death by those standing nearby. The original Greek has survived only in a fragment; the most complete version derives from a reworking of the text in *Latin (Actus Vercellensis). The Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul end with the martyrdom of the two apostles. The story of *Thecla made up part of the Acts of Paul (Acts of Paul and Thecla). According to recent scholarship, the story of Thecla was detached from the Acts of Paul due to the positive and important image attributed to the feminine figure and for its *encratite notions. The story is situated during Paul's day at Iconium, where the little girl Thecla is convinced by his preaching of monotheism and chastity and refuses to marry her fiancé, who causes the apostle to be imprisoned. Thecla follows Paul and confronts a series of tests, from which she is saved by providence: when she is about to be burned, it rains; when she is exposed to a lioness, it does not hurt her. Those standing nearby invite her to perform miracles, esp. healings for their sick and dying children; last, Thecla devotes herself to preaching, following the footsteps of the apostle Paul by cutting her hair and dressing as a man and assuming in its entirety the apostolic mission (see R.R. Stoops, Peter, Acts of, in Anchor Bible Dict., V, 267-268; P. Sellew, Paul, Acts of, ibid., 202-203; V. Burrus, Chastity as Autonomy, Lewiston 1987; A. v.d. Hoek - J. Herrmann, Thecla the Beast Fighter: StudiaPhilAn 13 [2001] 212-249).

Concerning the Acts of Paul, in addition to the Acts of Paul and Thecla—which was used by *Manicheans and *Priscillianists, and which falls within the closest stream to the story models—we also have the apocryphal letter of Paul to the Corinthians and the Martyrdom of Paul, all writings for which we possess the Greek text. The story of Peter inserted into the ps.-Clementine Recognitiones is an ancient part included in a later framework, perhaps of the 4th c., which gives the title to the work inasmuch as it recounts, in ten books, a series of discoveries of the members of *Clement of Rome's family, who had been separated for a long time. Clement narrates his journey into Judea upon receiving notice that the Son of God had manifested himself; his meeting with Peter; his conversion through the work of Barnabas; and his ordination by Peter. This work, therefore, expresses the truths he heard by being present at the preaching of Peter, which constitutes the part of the story called the Homiliae, twenty in all, generally considered to have been derived from the Greek Kerygmata Petrou of the 2nd c. The battle between Peter and Simon Magnus makes up part of the story (which here seems to represent Paul, in an anti-Pauline function) and, among other things, at least a homily with Jewish Christian theology, bearing the *ebionite stamp, in which Christ is seen more as the greatest prophet than as God (see F.S. Jones, Clementines, Ps., in Anchor Bible Dict., I, 1061-1062; B. Pouderon, Flavius Clemens et le proto-Clément juif du roman ps.-clémentin: Apocrypha 7 [1996] 63-79; Dédoublement et création romanesque dans le roman ps.-clémentin, in Les personnages du roman grec, ed. Id., Lyon 2001, 269-283; L'énigme Flavius Clemens: Ktèma 26 [2001] 307-319; Id., Origène, le Ps.-Clément et la structure des Periodoi Petrou: Apocrypha 12 (2001) 29-51; Studi su Clemente Romano, ed. Ph. Luisier, Rome 2003).

From the Acts of John, which were probably composed in *Asia Minor toward the mid-2nd c., the most ancient layers are marked by *docetist and ascetic ideas (chs. 87-105): e.g., this work mentions that Jesus did not cast shadows and seemed to be one age at one time, and another at another time; the Last Supper is replaced by a hymn with dances. With respect to John, the following are narrated: his exemplary life and numerous miracles, which included brining about the obedience of bedbugs (see J. Bremmer, The Apocryphal Acts of John, Kampen 1995).

One of the most extensive apostolic stories is the Acts of Andrew, the brother of Peter: this work narrates his adventures near the Black Sea, *Scythia and *Thrace. Some scholars have suggested that this work imitates some of the events contained in the Odyssey: e.g., *Andrew saves Matthew from imprisonment by the carnivorous giants, an event which recalls the Cyclops (D.R. MacDonald, Christianizing Homer: "The Odyssey, " Plato, and the "Acts of Andrew," New York 1990). In the Acts of Philip, he is invited by Jesus to evangelize the lands of the Greeks, with his sister Miriam, who shares with him the apostolic commandment by Christ's wishes. Even here marvelous deeds occur, such as the conversion of a leopard and a kid, which acquire a human meekness and the ability to speak and become worthy of receiving the *Eucharist. The narrative texture is full of adventures; the important one is that in which Philip, incapable of responding to evil with good, curses the Greek idolaters and causes them to sink into an abyss, from which Jesus draws them out, giving them his cross as a ladder. The Acts conclude with the martyrdom of the apostle (see F. Amsler, Les Actes de Philippe, in Le mystère apocryphe, Geneva 1995, 125-140; Actes de l'apôtre Philippe, intr., notes, tr. F. Amsler - F. Bovon - B. Bouvier, Turnhout 1996; Actes de Philippe, Id., in Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, 1, Paris 1997, 1179-1320; Acta Philippi, ed. Id., Turnhout 1999, CC Apocr. 11).

The Acts of Thomas, which were composed at *Edessa during the Severian age, perhaps first in *Syriac and then in Greek, probably reveal the marks of the school of *Bardesanes (for documentation on this matter, see I. Ramelli, Bardesane e la sua scuola tra la cultura occidentale e quella orientale, in Pensiero e istituzioni del mondo classico nelle culture del Vicino Oriente, ed. R.B. Finazzi - A. Valvo, Alessandria 2001, 237-255). The Acts narrate the mission of the apostle *Thomas in India, where he was sent by Jesus, whose twin he was: hence his name "Didymus." There are many adventures narrated in the various areas of N and S India, where Thomas finally died as a martyr. Various authentically Indian elements and historical details such as that of King Gondopharre/Gundaphorus, have been detected in this certainly romanticized narration, which is also characterized by encratite echoes and very ancient liturgical forms; one section seems to be very close to the *Coptic version of the Book of Thomas contained in the *Nag Hammadi library. Some texts are striking on account of their antiquity and beauty such as The Hymn of the Pearl (crit. ed. with tr. and comm. by P.H. Poirier, Louvain-la-Neuve 1981). (For documentation, see I. Ramelli, Note sulle origini del Cristianesimo in India: SCO 47 [2000] 363-378 and Gli Apostoli in India, in collaboration with C. Dognini, Milan 2001; H.W. Attridge, Thomas, Acts of, in Anchor Bible Dict., VI, 531-534; J.D. Turner, Thomas the Contender, Book of, ibid., 529-530). The Gospel of the Childhood of Thomas, which narrates the life of *Jesus at Nazareth until he was twelve years old, with accounts centered on his miraculous powers, also has a clear romantic stamp (see P. Mirecki, Thomas, Infancy Gospel, in Anchor Bible Dict., 540-544).

The Gospel of James has also been fictionalized, a document written before the year 200 and ascribed to James the Less, the brother of Jesus and head of the Christian community of *Jerusalem until 62. It narrates the life of the Madonna and Jesus until the slaughter of the innocents and the death of King *Herod, with many marvelous deeds; it had an influence on the iconographic depictions and the representations of the legends pertaining to *Mary.

In the *Syriac area, we find the Doctrina Addai, from the 4th c. and its continuation, the Acta Maris, from the 5th–6th c. The Doctrina narrates the evangelization of Edessa through the work of Thaddeus-Addai, one of the 70, sent by Thomas, who was one of the Twelve, after the ascension of Jesus; the Acta Maris narrate the evangelization of Mesopotamia by *Mari the disciple of *Addai, who departed from Edessa (see the documentation in I. Ramelli, The First Evangelization of the Mesopotamian Regions in the Syriac Tradition: Antiguo Oriente 3 [2005] 11-54; Possible Historical Traces in the "Doctrina Addai"?: Hugoye 9, 1 [2006] §§ 1-24; La "Doctrina Addai" e gli "Acta Maris," published in AION 65 [2005]; Gli "Atti di Mari," intr., tr. and notes, Brescia 2007).

Even the martyrological literature, which makes up part of the hagiographical literature and began in the 2nd c., can be likened to the narrative-fictional genre, esp. in its most elaborate and late examples. There exist in fact the Acts of the martyrs and the ancient Passiones and established upon historical data in which the documentary component—even eyewitness accounts are copies of proceedings of the interrogations from the proconsular archives—is much stronger and the narrative development is less emphasized. The Acta are heavily focused on the interrogations although the Passiones narrate the tortures and the death of the martyrs. Even in this regard, there were not lacking pagan precedents, as in the exitus virorum illustrium, e.g., those who flourished through the deaths of the Roman *Stoics who were persecuted during the age of the emperor *Nero or *Domitian, or the Acts of the Alexandrian Martyrs, discovered on Egyptian *papyri of the 1st–2nd c. AD. The passion of Christ remained an exemplary model for Christians, alongside the martyrdom of *Stephen and that of the Maccabean brothers.

From the mid-2nd c. come the *Martyrdom of St. Polycarp, who had been condemned under *Antoninus Pius, as well as the epistolary document the Acts of the Martyrs of Lyons, who were put to death under the emperor *Marcus Aurelius. The A*cts of the Martyrdom of St. Justin was composed after the year 165, and the *Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs, written in Latin unlike the two preceding works, which were written in Greek, dates to after 180. In the 3rd c., the *Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Cyprian was written. He was put on trial for the first time in 257, then sent into exile and then put back on trial a year later, then sentenced to death. The report consists of four parts: the Acts of the first interrogation, a concise narrative section on the exile and the calling for the second trial, the sentencing to death, and the report of the martyrdom, at which many Christians were present. In these sober documents there are not many fictitious elements, and they are generally considered to be primarily historical. A certain rhetorical elaboration and structuring into topics in the questions of the magistrate and the responses of a martyr seems to make inroads into the Acts of the martyrs, deriving from some early and historically valuable sources such as those of *Fructuosus of Tarragona, *Marcellus and *Maximilian.

Very interesting are the Greek and Latin versions of the Acts of Carpus, Papilus and Agathonice, who were martyred at Pergamum under Marcus Aurelius. In the original Greek Acts, Agathonice turns herself in and is put on trial and sentenced to death immediately. In the Latin text the act of turning herself in is not mentioned, but from the beginning she behaves as if she has already been arrested and then sentenced along with the other two: a modification evidently intended to eliminate the self-oblation, of which the church had already disapproved in the letter that accompanied the *Martyrdom of Polycarp. Even the version that we possess of the Acts of the Martyr of Apollonius, a senator who was sentenced before the Senate presided over by the prefect of the Praetorian Tigidius Perennis, seems to have been reworked with respect to what was read by *Eusebius, and it is full of antipagan apologetic arguments.

The Greek text of the *Martyrdom of Pionius, a priest of *Smyrna who died under Marcus Aurelius or *Decius, is a broad reworking established upon a nucleus of an autobiographical document during his time in prison. The nucleus of the Latin *Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis is analogous, which has as its basis the written accounts of the same Vibia Perpetua and by one of her companions in martyrdom, Saturus, who was in prison: they are full of "stories in the account" because they also recount the visions of both martyrs. An editor, perhaps *Tertullian, united the whole account of the martyrdom within a succinct framework. (See I. Ramelli, La Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis come dossier storiografico: RIL 139 [2005]; P. Habermehl, Perpetua und der Ägypter, Berlin ²2004, 238-252 for the narrative technique of the Passio: Perpetua's diary is authentic [267-275], although the narration of the martyr's death is sensationalized [197-237]; further studies are listed in the bibl.)

Although here the historical basis is still strong and the narrative reworking seems limited, in subsequent Acts of the martyrs, from the post-Constantinian age, the romanticizing aspects increased as well as the taste for the marvelous and special effects: the magistrates become ever more ferocious and inventors of cruel punishments, while the martyrs become ever more heroic, the miracles more frequent and the rhetoric more evident. Sensationalized texts of this type have transmitted to us the Passiones of Sts. *Sebastian, *Lawrence, *Cosmas and Damian, *Lucia, *Agatha, *Agnes and *Cecilia, texts that truly set forth again elements of the Hellenistic adventure story.

R. Pervo, Profit with Delight: The Literary Genre of the Acts of the Apostles, Minneapolis 1987; Id., Early Christian Fiction, in Greek Fiction: The Greek Novel in Context, London-New York 1994, 239-254; Id., The Ancient Novel Becomes Christian, in The Novel in the Ancient World, ed. G. Schmeling, Leiden 1996, 685-711; B. Shaw, The Passion of Perpetua: Past and Present 139 (1993) 3-45; J. Perkins, The Suffering Self: Paul and Narrative Representation in the Early Christian Era, London-New York 1995; D. Konstan, Acts of Love: A Narrative Pattern in the Apocryphal Acts: JECS 6 (1994) 15-36; Ancient Fiction and Early Christian Narrative, ed. R. Hock, J. Perkins et al., Atlanta 1998, with various important contributions; J. Bremmer, The Novel and the Apocryphal Acts, in Groningen Colloquia on the Novel, IX, Groningen 1998; LACL 533-535; J. Pettorelli, Vie latine d'Adam et d'Ève: ALMA 57 (1999) 5-52; R. Hock, Recent Literature on the Greek Novel and Early Christian Literature: Petronian Society Newsletter 30, 1-2 (April 2000) 9-11; I. Ramelli, Caritone e la storiografia greca. Il romanzo di Calliroe come romanzo storico antico: ACME 53 (2000) 43-62; M. De Jonge, The Christian Origin of the "Life of Adam and Eve, " in Pseudepigrapha of the OT as Part of Christian Literature, Leiden 2003, 184-200; Id. - L.M. White, The Washing of Adam in the Acherusian Lake, in Early Christianity and Classical Culture, ed. J. Fitzgerald et al., Leiden 2003, 609-637; J. Bremmer, Perpetua and Her Diary, in Märtyrer und Märtyrerakten, ed. W. Ameling, Stuttgart 2002, 77-120; Id., The Vision of Saturus in the "Passio Perpetuae, " in Jerusalem, Alexandria, Rome, ed. F. García Martínez - G. Luttikhuizen, Leiden 2003, 55-73; Id., The Motivation of Martyrs: Perpetua and the Palestinians, in Religion im kulturellen Diskurs, ed. B. Lucchesi - K. von Stuckrad, Berlin 2004, 535-554; F. Graf, The Bridge and the Ladder: Narrow Passages in Late Antique Visions, in Heavenly Realms and Earthly Realities in Late Antique Religion, ed. R.S. Boustan - A.Y. Reed, Cambridge 2004, 19-33; K. Waldner, Zur narrativen Technik der Körperdarstellung im "Martyrium Polycarpi" und der "Passio Ss. Perpetuae et Felicitatis, " in Die Christen und der Körper, ed. B. Fichtinger - H. Seng, Munich 2004, 29-74; F. Bovon, Studies in Early Christianity, Tübingen 2005, c. 1: The Apostolic Memories in Ancient Christianity; H. Rhee, Early Christian Literature: Christ and Culture in the II and III Centuries, London 2005; R.D. Butler, The New Prophecy and "New Visions": Evidence of Montanism in the "Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas, " Washington, D.C. 2006.

I. Ramelli

NARSAI (Narses) (399–502). Narsai, called the "Leper," is the theologian par excellence of the *Nestorian church and the founder of the *school of *Nisibis. Born in 399 in a village NE of Mosul, he showed a marked intellectual precocity. Constrained to flee a persecution of the Zoroastrians and orphaned, he was brought up in a monastery of which his uncle was the *abbot. He went after this to the school of *Edessa, where he studied for ten years. His uncle tried more than once to keep him in the monastery, in order to make him his successor, but Narsai's love for teaching spurred him to return to Edessa, in ca. 435. At the death of Qiyore (Cyrus), director of the school, Narsai was unanimously elected his successor (437). He held this position for twenty years, during which he undertook to spread the doctrine of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, and became friends with *Ibas, bishop of Edessa. At the death of Ibas in 457 his successor, Nonnus, banished Narsai on account of his adherence to Nestorianism; suspected of having had interactions with the enemy (the Persians), he was condemned, again by Nonnus, to be burned alive. Narsai fled Edessa, and acceding to the pressure of *Barsauma, metropolitan of Nisibis, he founded the school of Nisibis, which he directed from 471, and which took the place of the school of Edessa, which closed in 489. He died in 502, at the age of 103.

Narsai's literary work falls into three categories: *exegesis, *preaching and *liturgy. The authenticity of the exegetical works has been cast into doubt as a result, above all, of the silence about them in exegetes from the following period, and of the lacunae of the MS tradition, which is not earlier than the 13th c. The same problem exists for the liturgical works, which are also attributed to other authors, such as *Ephrem and *Balai.

On the other hand, there are 82 (or 84) homilies in verse (mēmrē), certainly authentic, of which only half have been published. These homilies, written in verses of twelve syllables, are on subjects liturgical, theological, exegetical and moral. Narsai's theology is not original: it is that of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who was his true master. There is also the influence, albeit to a lesser degree, of *Theophilus of Antioch, which without doubt came through *Aphrahat, and in a lesser measure, that of Ephrem. The originality of Narsai consists in having "fixed, as a true exegete and theologian . . . a whole tradition in all its parts, which continue right up to the rebirth of Nestorian exegesis of the 9th or 10th c." (P. Gignoux, PO 34, 515).

It is not without value, following in the line of P. Gignoux, to remember the influence that Narsai was able to have on "an authentic representative of Nestorian exegesis, the famous traveler *Cosmas Indicopleustes" (ibid., 510). It is certain that Cosmas depended in the first place on Theodore of Mopsuestia, and on Mar *Aba, catholicos of Persia, but, considering that certain of his ideas are simplified versions of the complex theology of Theodore, we may ask ourselves if in this work of simplification Cosmas did not rely on certain passages of the works of Narsai. This could apply, e.g., to the analogies used to clarify the doctrine of the *Trinity, the mystery of the generation of the Son, the cosmic functions of the angels, etc. (see ibid., 511-513).

A. Mingana, Narsai Doctoris Syri Homiliae et Carmina, 2 vols., Mosul 1905; P. Gignoux, Homélies de Narsai sur la création, PO 34, 419-716 (with Fr. tr.); F.G. McLeod, Narsai's Metrical Homilies on the Nativity, Epiphany, Passion, Resurrection and Ascension: PO 40, 1-193 (with Eng. tr.); Ortiz de Urbina 115-118; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis: CSCO 266, Subsidia, 26, 57-65; DSp 11, 40-41; F.G. McLeod, Man as the Image of God: Its Meanings and Theological Significance in Narsai: ThS 42 (1981) 458-467; J. Frishman, The Ways and Means of the Divine Economy, An Edition, Translation and Study of 6 Homilies by Narsai, Leiden 1992; C. Molenberg, Narsai's Memra on the Reproof of Eve's Daughters and "Tricks and Devices" They Perform: Muséon 106 (1993) 65-87 (Eng. tr.).

R. Lavenant

NARSES (490–574). Byzantine general. Of Armenian extraction, a eunuch, he became grand chamberlain and minister of the treasury at the court of *Justinian, thanks to the intercession of the empress *Theodora. He participated actively in the repression of the Revolt of Nika (532); he was responsible for its failure. Justinian sent Narses to join Belisarius during the war in *Italy against the *Goths. In 552 he assumed command of the troops in *Belisarius's place, and guided the Byzantines to victory, defeating first *Totila at Gauldo Tadino (552) and then, definitively, Teias at Mons Lactarius (553). With the title of patricius he was of importance in the administrative reorganization of Italy, convulsed by the Greek-Gothic war, and for the whole of the following period most civil and military powers were vested in his hands. His presence was also felt in the ecclesiastical sphere, in which he often adapted his policies acc. to the will of the pope. In disagreement with the emperor *Justin II (565–578), Narses was probably removed from office, and passed the last years of his life in *Rome.

LMA 6, 1029; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Istituto Nazionale di Studi Romani, Storia di Rome IX, Bologna 1941, 182-224; Z.V. Udalcova, La campagne de Narsès et l'écrasement de Totila: CCAB 18 (1971) 557-564; F. Trisoglio, Procopio dinanzi a Belisario e a Narsete: Rivista di Studi Classici 27 (1979) 96-136; T.C. Lounghis, Narsetis memoria: JOEByz 32/2 (1982) 347-353; T.S. Brown, Gentlemen and Officers. Imperial Administration and Aristocratic Power in Byzantine Italy A.D. 554–800, London 1984; A. Guillou - F. Burgarella, L'Italia bizantina. Dall'esarcato di Ravenna al tema di Sicilia, Turin 1988; M. Padoan - F. Borella, Busta Gallorum: la battaglia tra Totila e Narsete del 552 d.C.: i cronisti, l'ambiente, la vicenda, 2 vols., Mestre-Venezia 2002.

G. Pilara

NATALIUS (2nd–3rd c.). We know him only from *Eusebius of Caesarea, who includes extracts of an anonymous work of the 3rd c. against the *adoptionists (HE 5, 28, 8-12). Persuaded by *Asclepiodotus and *Theodotus the banker, disciples of the adoptionist *Theodotus the tanner (in *Rome at the end of 2nd c.), Natalius, who was a confessor under persecution (perhaps in 202–203) and therefore enjoyed some prestige, accepted ordination as bishop at *Rome for the adoptionist community and receive a monthly stipend (the first case known of a cleric receiving a salary, something which happened also among the *Montanists). Subsequently repentant, he presented himself to the bishop of Rome *Zephyrinus (d. 217), who reaccepted him to ecclesial communion, but as a layman. The episode is very important for the question of penitential discipline, in that it indicates that even the sin of heresy was forgiven in the Roman church at the beginning of the 3rd c.

A. D'Alès, L'édit de Calliste, Paris 1914, 124-125; P. Galtier, Aux origines du sacrement de la pénitence, Rome 1951, 152-153; P. Lampe, Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003, 344-348; EPapi I, 234.

A. Di Berardino

NATIVITY (apocryphal accounts of). There are quite a large number of apocryphal works called "gospels of the Nativity." To this group belong those works regarding the birth and childhood of Mary, her marriage to Joseph, the birth of the Lord (journey to Bethlehem, birth, episode with the shepherds, meeting with the magi), the circumcision, Massacre of the Innocents, flight into Egypt, return to Nazareth and the infancy of the Lord.

The first group of apocryphal works refers to the parents of Mary, the miraculous conception of Anne, her sanctity, her visit to the temple, the wedding of Mary and Joseph, the annunciation, the perturbation of Joseph and the journey to Bethlehem. The first of these is the Protevangelium of James* (2nd c.), composed in Greek, the most ancient and important; the other texts, generally, depend on it directly or indirectly; these are the Latin texts, the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew and The Nativity of Mary, the Arabic and *Georgian gospels and many other Eastern texts. Works which speak of the annunciation are, among others, the Sibylline Oracles (bk. VIII), the Pistis Sophia (63, 3), the Epistula Apostolorum (14, 25), the Qur'an (3, 42) and the Islamic Gospel of Barnabas. From these apocryphal works derive the feasts of Joachim and Anne, the Birth of Mary, the Presentation in the Temple (21 Nov) and the Conception of Anne in the Greek Church.

All the apocryphal gospels speak of the events regarding the birth of Christ, but with different emphases. Only a few speak of the journey to Bethlehem, and some develop the episode of the midwife—brief in the Protevangelium, longer in the Latin Book on the Infancy* (Book of the Birth of the Savior, and of Mary, and of the Midwife). In the same work we find the episode of the shepherds; that of the magi is found in the *Syriac Story of the Magi, in the Georgian and Armenian gospels, and also in the Eastern legend reported in the Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum, a fragment in the Uyghur language, in the text of Longinus and in the Cave of Treasures (preserved in Syriac and Arabic). Marco Polo gave expression to this legend, as did certain Eastern geographers and historians. The Massacre of the Innocents is generally only mentioned, while some texts speak of the death of Zechariah (mentioned for the first time in the Protevangelium, then in the Pistis Sophia [7], Georgian gospel, Armenian gospel). In the Arabic gospel of John an expanded account of the purification of Mary is given: the author recounts the story of Simeon and Anna. The flight into Egypt is briefly mentioned in the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, an apocryphal work of the early Middle Ages (6th c.), while a long description is to be found in the Armenian and Arabic gospels, the source in the *Coptic world of many legends on the visit of the Holy Family to Egypt, giving rise to numerous Marian shrines in Egypt.

The infancy of Jesus and his peculiar miracles are recounted in the Infancy of the Lord (Paidika tou Kyriou, improperly called the Infancy Gospel of Thomas), probably of the 2nd–3rd c., very popular and translated into all the languages of Christian antiquity, inserted also into the Armenian gospel; various *gnostics made use of it; certain allusions to events in this gospel we find in *Justin Martyr and then in the Qur'an.

All these texts of infancy gospels have had a great influence on Christian culture, literature and particularly on Christian iconography.

For a list of the apocryphal texts on the Nativity see CANT 50-60; tr. of a selection of these texts may be found in all the series of tr. of the apocryphal works—Elliott, Santos Otero, Moraldi (vol. 1); Erbetta (vol. 1, 1-2); Craveri; Schneemelcher (vol. 1), Starowieyski (vol. 1, 1)—and in numerous separate publications, e.g., A. di Nola, Vangeli apocrifi. Natività e infanzia, Parma 1986.

M. Starowieyski

NATIVITY (iconography). In the earlierst depictions of the Nativity, the majesty of the newborn, rather than his poverty, is emphasized (Testini, Giuseppe, 313f.). In the 1st half of the 4th c., in the atmosphere of triumph created by the peace of the church, the oldest scenes illustrating OT prophecies in their relation to the Messiah's birth of the Virgin—scenes thus only indirectly alluding to the incarnation—gave way to realistic representations of the Nativity, glorifying the *incarnation of the Logos, underlining the reality of his earthly mission, and showing the announcement of his advent to the shepherds, i.e., to the Jewish people.

Developed very probably in the workshops of marble workers—the oldest example is found on a *sarcophagus of 343 (Ws II, 182-183, fig. 175-176)—the fixed elements of Nativity scenes, apart from the child in swaddling clothes in the manger, were the ox and the ass mentioned in the prophecy of Isaiah (1:3) and Habakkuk (3:2), and then by the fathers of the church (Ambr., In Lucam 2, 7: PL 15, 2649; Prud., Cathemerinon XI, 78: PL 59, 896). While the ox and the ass are present in almost all the paleo-Christian depictions of the Nativity, Mary and above all Joseph in fact appear less frequently. Sometimes they are both missing, e.g., in a fresco of the hypogeum of S. Maria in Stelle of Verona, of the end of the 4th c. (Testini, Giuseppe, 314) and on the cover of the sarcophagus of St. *Ambrose in Milan, from the same period (Ws, pl. 189, 2). On the other hand, the presence only of the ox and the ass at the feet of the Virgin on the sarcophagus of St. *Trophimus of Arles, of the mid-4th c., indicates a condensed depiction of the Nativity scene and its fusion with that of the adoration of the *magi (Ws, pl. 242, 1). More commonly, and particularly in sarcophagi of the 4th c., along with Mary and Joseph one or more shepherds appear, poorly clothed and with a baculus in hand or otherwise a work tool (Ws, pl. 243, 6), in the act of venerating the child or of pointing to the star. In old representations, Mary is seen sitting next to the manger (see, e.g., Ws, pls. 198, 1; 201, 5; 226, 1; 249, 11); from the 6th c. she is more commonly extended on a coach, a position perhaps intending to underline the fact that Christ has truly taken on our humanity, and to make the suffering of the Virgin more evident (see, e.g., Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, n. 169, pl. 54). In older compositions—i.e., from the 10th c.—Mary appears bent over the crib (see illumination in the Codex Egberti, of ca. 980: Knaus, Miniaturen, pl. 12). Joseph, on the other hand, who appears in the Nativity scenes only from the 1st half of the 5th c., is generally shown sitting (e.g., Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, nn. 118, 119, pls. 36, 37: only example with a saw in his hand), more rarely standing next to the child (e.g., in a panel of the cathedra of Maximian in Ravenna): Cecchelli, Cattedra, 160, pl. 25; and in an illumination of f. 4b of the *Syriac Evangeliary of Rabbula: Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 54ff.). For setting the scene, ancient Western depictions placed the crib under a shelter or canopy; in the Eastern, however, it usually appears in the open or in a grotto.

RBK 2, 637ff.; LCT 2, 86-120; F.X. Kraus, Die Miniaturen des Codex Egberti, Freiburg i.Br. 1884; M. Schmid, Die Darstellung der Geburt Christi in der bildenden Kunst, Stuttgart 1890; F. Noak, Die Geburt Christi in der bildenden Kunst bis zur Renaissance, Darmstadt 1894; E.B. Smith, Early Christian Iconography and a School of Ivory Carvers in Provence, Princeton, NJ 1918, 13ff.; H. Cornell, The Iconography of the Nativity of Christ, Uppsala 1924; C. Cecchelli, La cattedra di Massimiano ed altri avorii romano-orientali, Rome 1936; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten des Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952; L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, II, 2, Paris 1958, 752ff.; C. Cecchelli - G. Forlani - M. Salmi, The Rabbula Gospels, Olten-Lausanne 1959; G.A. Wellen, Theotokos. Eine ikonographische Abhandlung über das Gottesmutterbild in früchristlicher Zeit, Utrecht-Antwerpen 1961, 20ff., 49ff.; G. Ristow, Die Geburt Christi in der frühchristlichen und byzantinisch-ostkirchlichen Kunst, Recklinghausen 1963; P. Testini, Alle origini dell'iconografia di Giuseppe di Nazareth: RivAC 48 (1972) esp. 273-74, 313ff.; B. Bagatti, La "luce" nell'iconografia della Natività: SBF 30 (1980) 233-250; C. Conidi, L'arcosolio del presepe nel cimitero di San Sebastiano. A proposito di una pittura recentemente restaurata: RivAC 73 (1997) 85-93; U. Utro, Come fiore dal germoglio di Iesse. La prima iconografia del Natale: Ecclesia 20 (1998) 8-14; Marienlexikon 2, 598-602; C. Conidi: TIP 225-228.

M. Marinone

NATIVITY, Feast of the. Similarly to other comparable feasts (6 or 10 Jan, 18 Nov, 28 March), in *Rome the tradition developed of keeping the feast of Christmas on 25 Dec; this dates to ca. 336, though it is mentioned for the first time in the *Chronography of 354. The Roman calendar indicates for 25 Dec, day of the rebirth of the sun after the winter solstice, the birth of Mithras and public games in honor of the Sol Invictus, the cult of which the emperor *Aurelian had introduced at Rome in 257. This apologetic context—Christ as the true Sol iustitiae (Mal 3:20)—was behind the introduction of the feast of Christmas in the ecclesiastical Roman calendar. Further, chronological reasons relating to the other dates of the life of Christ (e.g., the Annunciation, 25 March) may have played a certain role. In 380 the feast was introduced in *Constantinople, in 432 in *Alexandria, and in 439 to *Jerusalem, where it did not become established, however, until the *Justinian era. There are numerous Christmas homilies in Latin and Greek, beginning with that of ps.-*Optatus of Milevis (CPL 245). The oldest liturgical formulas may be found in the Sacramentarium Veronese. From the time of *Gregory the Great we find the characteristic triplicate Christmas Masses (Hom. ev. 8), then celebrated in S. Maria Maggiore, St. Anastasia and St. Peter's (J.P. Kirsch, Die Stationskirchen des Missale Romanum, Freiburg 1926, 236-239).

CPG 5, 157-158 (sermons); LTK[3] 10, 1017-1023; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 2, Milan [3]1969, 48-120; H. Auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 1, Regensburg 1983, 165-176; S.K. Roll, Toward the Origins of Christmas, Kampen 1995; H. Förster, Die Feier der Geburt Christi in der Alten Kirche. Beiträge zur Erforschung der Anfänge des Epiphanie- und des Weihnachtsfests, Tübingen 2000; M. Wallraff, Christus Verus Sol, Münster 2001, 174-195.

S. Heid

NATIVITY of MARY (apocryphal accounts of). There exist three apocryphal works under this title: (1) a *gnostic gospel under the name of Genna Ma- rias (De generatione M.), of the 2nd c., cited by *Epiphanius (Haer. 26, 12, 1-4); (2) the Protevangelium of James*, the true title of which is Genesis Marias; (3) a medieval apocryphal work, Liber de nativitate Mariae, a brief Latin text in nine chapters, linked to the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew. The author speaks of the birth of Mary and of her life up to the birth of Jesus, reworking the material of the Protevangelium of James. The author is a theologian and a writer; his Latin is elegant. The book was composed in the 9th c. by Paschasius Radbertus, or in his circle, and was very popular in the Middle Ages, particularly amongst Dominicans; it figures in their lectionary. It influenced the Legenda Aurea and was translated in the 12th c. into Old French.

CANT 52; BHL 53-43; ed. R. Beyers, CCAp 10, 1997 (with Fr. tr.). Ital. tr. - Erbetta 1, 2, 71-77; Moraldi 1, 147-156; Craveri 215-226; Fr. EApC 143-161; Polish: Starowieyski 1, 331-341; L. Scheffczyk, Das Mariengeheimnis in Frömmigkeit und Lehre der Karolingenzeit, Leipzig 1959, 152-165; 250-251.

NAUCRATIUS (ca. 320–ca. 356). Eldest of *Basil of Caesarea's three younger brothers. Before Basil finished his studies in Athens, Naucratius retired to a family property, in Annisa, with his mother and sister, and sacrificed his worldly career to embrace the ascetic life (see *Gregory of Nyssa, Life of St. Macrina). We know that hunting and fishing played a notable role in this life, in the company of the domestic staff who had become his companions, from the fact that he died in an accident resulting from these activities.

M.M. Hauser - Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors von Nazianz, Bonn 1960, 125-126.

J. Gribomont

NAVIGIUS (4th c.). Brother of *Augustine of Hippo and son of *Patricius and *Monica, native of *Thagaste in Africa. He was of delicate health (Aug., De beata vita 2, 14). Present at the house of Verecundus at Cassiciacum, he was one of the interlocutors of the dialogues Contra Academicos (I, 2, 5-6), De beata vita (1, 6; 1, 7; 2, 14) and De ordine (I, 2, 5). He was present at the death of Monica at Ostia in 387 (Confess. IX, 11, 17). It seems certain that he had sisters who were consecrated religious (Possid., Vita Aug. 26, 1). We do not know if Patricius, cleric of the church of Hippo, and his brother, cleric of Bishop *Severus of Milevis, were his sons (Aug., Serm. 356, 3: PL 39, 1575).

W.H.C. Frend, The Family of Augustine: A Microcosm of Religious Change in North Africa, in Atti del Congresso Intern. su s. Agostino nel XVI centenario della conversione, Rome 1987, 1, 135-151.

A. Di Berardino

NAZARENES (Nazoreans). A Jewish-Christian sect mentioned for the first time by Epiphanius (Pan. 29). *Epiphanius of Salamis and *Jerome (De vir. ill. 3) agree that its members lived in Beroea. The first held that they were descended from the Christians of Jerusalem who had fled, after the fall of the city (AD 70), to Pella (Eus., HE III, 5, 2-3). They spoke Aramaic and possessed a gospel written originally in Aramaic which was presumably known to Jerome (Ep. 112, 13 and other passages). According to Epiphanius, the Nazarenes could be called orthodox, although he did not know if they accepted the virgin birth of Christ. It is obviously this group that was cursed three times a day by Jews (Pan. 29, 9, 2; often cited in early Christian literature: see Justin, Dialog with Trypho, ch. 16). Jerome perhaps was in contact with several members of the sect, but he gives no precise information of it.

P. Vielhauer, Judenchristliche Evangelien, in E. Hennecke - W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, I, Tübingen 1959, 75-108; A.F.J. Klijn, Jerome's Quotations from a Nazoraean Interpretation of Isaiah: RecSR 60 (1972) 241-255; A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish-Christian Sects: NovTSup 36 (1973) 44-52; H. Räisäsen, Nokolaiten: ANRW II/26 (1995) 1602-1644; S.C. Mimouni, Les nazoréens: recherche étymologique et historique: RBi 105 (1998) 208-262; Id., I nazorei a partire dalla notizia 29 del Panarion di Epifanio di Salamina, in Verus Israel: nuove prospettive sul giudeocristianesimo, ed. G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, Brescia 2001, 120-146; S.C. Mimouni, Les chrétiens d'origine juive dans l'antiquité, Paris 2004.

A.F.J. Klijn

NAZARENES (Nazoreans), Gospel of the. "Nazarene" is the appellation given to Jesus and his followers in Mk 1:24; Lk 4:34; Jn 19:19; Acts 3, 6-7; 4, 10. In Acts 24:5 Paul is called "chief of the hairesis of the Nazoreans, " and *Tertullian, Adv. Marc. IV, 8, testifies that the Christians of his era were called Nazarenes by the Jews. According to some, the title comes from Nazareth, to others from the Hebrew naṣar, whereby the Jewish-Christian Nazoreans/Nazarenes would be the perfectly observant, or finally from neṣer, "shoot, " referring to the shoot of Jesse of Is 11:1; 14:19; 60:21. (This association is found in the Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 43a, which mentions Christians in a derisory tone.) Schaeder considers Ναζαρηνός and Ναζωραῖος as Greek forms of the Aramaic nâṣrâyâ, indicating Nazareth as a place of origin; Jossa agrees; Brown also admits the relationship with nazîr, "nazirite"; Nazoreans or Nazarenes were Jewish Christians in the first age of Christianity, of whom *Epiphanius attests that they recognize Jesus as Messiah but maintain the prescriptions of the law (Pan. 29), with *Jerome noting that dum volunt et Iudaei esse et Christiani, nec Iudaei sunt nec Christiani (Ep. 112)—see R.A. Pritz, Nazarene Jewish Christianity, Jerusalem 1988, 122ff.; A. Pourkier, L'hérésiologie chez Épiphane, Paris 1992.

Among the various Jewish-Christian groups which were called Nazoreans or Nazirites were the Dosithean disciples of Ado (see J.M. Fiey, Naṣara, in Encyclopédie de l'Islam, VII, Leiden 1993, 970-974 and Mimouni, Nazoréens, on the term, also applied to the Mandeans: M. Lidzbarski, Ginza, Göttingen 1925, 327). The "heresy of the Dositheans, taught by the beggar Ado, " of *Adiabene, is mentioned at the beginning of the 7th or 8th c. by *Theodore Bar Koni in the Liber scholiorum, XI, on the basis of a list of heresies compiled in his times; since he was from Kashkar in Mesene, Theodore could have known them. The Dositheans were followers of one *Dositheus, a *Mandean leader of the same type as Ado. Dûṣtî, probably representing Dositheus and his followers, is in the *Syriac Acts of Mari healed, catechized and baptized in the name of Jesus of Nazareth (see C. and F. Jullien, Les Actes de Mâr-Mâri, Turnhout 2001, 43-46; Id., Aux Origines de l'Église de Perse, Louvain 2003, 31-33; it seems that the Dosteans of Theodore Bar Koni, Mandeans, should be distinguished from the Dositheans [from Dositheus] of the ps.-*Clementines, of *Origen, Epiphanius etc. who were Samaritans, even if both groups were Baptists). In the Acts of Mari Jesus is often called the Nazarene, and in the Acts of the Persian Martyrs the Zoroastrian persecutors call the Christians Nazarenes; the Christians of India, who are linked to the Jewish-Christian preaching of Bartholomew and Thomas, are called Nazrani mahâpilla, "great Nazarene sons": acc. to *Pantaenus, they were in possession of the gospel of *Matthew in the original Aramaic or Hebrew. We learn that *Papias, in the 1st or 2nd c., wrote that Matthew had compiled a summary of the λόγια of the Lord Ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ (Eus. HE 3, 39, 16); he had also used the Gospel of the Hebrews (ibid.) that Eusebius says existed in his own day, which differs from the Greek Matthew (Theoph. 155 Mai). *Hegesippus also speaks of a Gospel καθ' Ἑβραίους and one Συριακόν (Eus. HE 4, 22, 7). According to Eusebius (HE 3, 24, 6), Matthew, having preached to his followers in Aramaic, before leaving Palestine wrote a summary for them of his preaching in his "native tongue." Jerome in his De viris illustribus, in the chapter dedicated to Levi-Matthew, and in the preface to his gospel (21), affirms that Matthew, primus in Iudaea, published for his followers his gospel Hebraicis litteris, subsequently translated into Greek. The Nazarenes considered themselves guardians of the genuine Semitic Matthew, which acc. to Epiphanius (AH 29) they preserved with great care, indeed "perfectly" and "as it was at the beginning."

The Gospel of the Nazarenes, as far as well can tell from the fragments remaining to us, and which hardly shows itself to contain a "heretical" theology, seems to scholars to be an amplified Aramaic translation of Matthew, probably prepared in *Syria or *Alexandria in ca. 100–160. It is Jerome who tells us most about it, and who knows it well, although he probably mistakenly identifies it with the Gospel of the Hebrews—used particularly by the *Ebionites and cited already by *Clement and Origen, and then by Epiphanius—and with the Semitic original of Matthew. With the permission of the Nazarenes of Beroea, who gave him the describendi facultas of it, Jerome consulted and transcribed this gospel, which is also to be found in a codex preserved in the library of Caesarea collected by Eusebius. Elsewhere he also says he has translated or consulted this gospel or the Gospel of the Hebrews, also quoting variant texts, e.g., in Vir. ill. 2 and in the commentary on Mt 22:13; 13:13: in Evangelio quo utuntur Nazaraei, or in that on Ezek 18:7: in Evangelio, quod iuxta Hebraeos Nazaraei legere consueverunt, or again in ad Ies., prol. 18: iuxta Evangelium quod Hebraeorum lectitant Nazaraei. According to Jerome, Vir. ill. 16, *Ignatius of Antioch had drawn on this gospel in the early years of the 2nd c. in his letter to *Polycarp of Smyrna, which we still have. In his opinion, it had been written in Aramaic, but in the Hebrew alphabet, not in Syriac (adv. Pelag. III, 2).

A. Schmidtke, Neue Fragmente und Untersuchungen zu den judenchristlichen Evangelien, Leipzig 1911; B. Bagatti, L'église de la circoncision, Jerusalem 1964, ch. II; H. Schaeder, Nazarenos, in GLNT, VII, Brescia 1971, 843 (cf. TDNT 4, 874–879); L. Moraldi, Gli apocrifi del NT, I, Turin 1971, 355-361, 367-369; J. Daniélou, La teologia del giudeo-cristianesimo, intro. L. Cirillo, It. tr. Bologna 1974, 79; Erbetta I, 1, 111-116; F. Manns, Essais sur le judéo-christianisme, Jerusalem 1977; Id., Bibliographie du judéo-christianisme, ibid., 1979; R.E. Brown, La nascita del Messia secondo Matteo e Luca, Assisi 1981, 273-278, 286-295 (Eng. orig., The Birth of the Messiah. A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, New Haven [2]1999); The Other Gospels, ed. R. Cameron, Philadelphia 1982, 97-102; A. Klijn, Das Hebräer- und das Nazoräer-Evangelium, in ANRW, II 25, 5, Berlin-New York 1988, 3997-4033; New Testament Apocrypha: Gospels and Related Writings, ed. W. Schneemelcher, tr. R. McL. Wilson, Louisville, KY 1992, 154-165; S.C. Mimouni, Pour une définition nouvelle du judéo-christianisme ancien: NTS 38 (1992) 161-186; L. Cirillo, I Vangeli giudeo-cristiani, in La Bibbia nell'antichità cristiana, I, ed. E. Norelli, Bologna 1993, 275-318; C. Moreschini - E. Norelli, Storia della letteratura cristiana antica, I, Brescia 1995, 101-109; S.C. Mimouni, Les nazoréens: RBi 105/2 (1998) 208-262; Id., Le judéo-christianisme ancien, Paris 1998; Id., I nazorei a partire dalla notizia 29 del "Panarion" di Epifanio, in G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto (eds.), Verus Israel, Brescia 2001, 120-146; I. Ramelli, Tommaso, in Gli Apostoli in India, with C. Dognini, Milan 2001, 52ff.; Il titolo della croce di Gesù, Rome 2003, [2]2005, 51-97; C. & F. Jullien, Aux frontières de l'iranité: nâṣrâyê et krîstyonê des inscriptions du mobadi Kirdîr: Numen 49 (2002) 282-335; G. Jossa, Giudei o Cristiani?, Brescia 2004, 109 and 157-158; I. Ramelli, Gli Atti di Mar Mari, Brescia 2007; Id., Fonti note e meno note sulle origini dei vangeli: Aevum 81, 1 (2007) 171-185.

I. RAMELLI

NAZARETH. A small town of Galilee, mentioned in the NT as the place of residence of Mary the Mother of Jesus and of Jesus himself after the return from *Egypt. In the Byzantine period it was not a bishopric, because until the 7th c. Christians from Jewish stock were still living there. Excavations on the site of the Annunciation have revealed a first phase of construction, with devotional grottoes, a square baptistery and a martyrium; a second phase with a synagogue-style church oriented toward the venerated grottoes; finally, in the 5th c., an E-facing church with three aisles, the grottoes, still venerated, now on the N side at a lower level. In the Middle Ages a great basilica was erected, 70 meters in length. In the baptismal font, and also under the foundations of the Byzantine church, many graffiti were found, in different languages, which have recorded the visits of the faithful and, at the same time, Marian devotion with invocations to Mary before such devotion became popular after the Council of *Ephesus. Also in the traditional "house of Joseph" there is a similar history of construction.

V. Tzaferis, Nazareth: Identification and History, in E. Stern (ed.), New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 3, 1103; B. Bagatti, Nazareth: Excavations: NEAEHL 3, 1103-1105; B. Bagatti, Gli scavi di Nazaret I, Jerusalem 1967; Id., Scavo presso la chiesa di S. Giuseppe a Nazaret: SBF 21 (1971) 5-32; E. Testa, Nazaret Giudeo-cristiana, Jerusalem 1969; G. Krofi, Auf den Spuren Jesu, Innsbruck 1973, 110-123; G. Cornfeld, Archaeology of the Bible: Book by Book, New York-London 1976.

B. BAGATTI - C. PAPPALARDO

NAZARIUS and CELSUS, martyrs. *Ambrose of Milan, acc. to his biographer *Paulinus, after the death of *Theodosius (395) rediscovered the bodies of the saints Nazarius (10 May) and Celsus (28 July) and transferred the first to the basilica of the Apostles by the Porta Romana (Vita Ambr. 32-34), which later took the name of St. Nazarius (Major). The archbishop Landolphus (979–997) also placed the remains of Celsus there. Toward the mid-5th c. a Passio was composed, without historical value: it says that Nazarius preached the gospel in *Italy, *Gaul and *Trier. Many Latin and Greek recensions were made of it, which connect the life of the two saints with *Gervasius and Protasius. From the time of Ambrose onward their relics were scattered across the whole empire. The Synax. Eccl. CP remembers them with Gervasius and Protasius on 14 Oct, the Mart. hier. on 19 June, 28 Jul and 30 Oct; Florus and Usuard also on 12 June. The translation of the relics to Lorsch occurred in 765.

BHL 6039-6050; BHG 1323-1324; BS 9, 780-785; BBKL 6, 517-518; LCI 8, 32; E. Dassmann, Ambrosius und die Märtyrer: JbAC 18 (1975) 49-68; M. Mirabella Roberti, Milano Romana, Milan 1984, 125-129.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

NEBRIDIUS (d. before 391). Born near *Carthage, curialis with the obligation of the munera; he had a brother called Victor. Intimate and valued friend of *Augustine of Hippo, but younger than he and perhaps his disciple; both became *Manicheans. From Carthage they left together for *Rome, where they rejoined *Alypius (Aug., Conf. 6, 10, 17; 6, 2, 3). They were then together in *Milan, but Nebridius was not attracted by public life (Conf. 8, 6, 13); he was assistant to the grammaticus Verecundus. He was not present at the discussions at Cassiciacum, when Augustine converted with his friends. However, he contributed in convincing Augustine to reject divination, "for no art existed by which to foretell the future" (Conf. 7, 6, 8), and to abandon the doctrine of the Manicheans (Conf. 7, 2, 3). Nebridius, having returned to *Africa, converted shortly after Augustine in 388, with his relatives (Conf. 9, 3, 6); he led an ascetic life, retiring to his rural properties, but always in a *Neoplatonic and not a monastic spirit. He died before 391. In Africa he continued a close friendship with Augustine, above all through the exchange of letters. Three letters of Nebridius to Augustine remain extant (in the letters of Augustine: 5, 6, 8), but there must have been many more, and nine letters of Augustine to him. In the Confessions and in the letters Augustine presents him as a true friend, intellectually gifted, full of goodness and compassion, and moved by great inquisitiveness (Ep. 98, 8: diligentissimus et acerrimus inquisitor; Conf. 9, 4, 6: inquisitor ardentissimus veritatis), prudent, but sometimes importunate in asking questions. The letters of Nebridius are brief but full of questions, which required extensive answers, making Augustine exhort him not to raise fresh queries (nova quaerere; Ep. 11, 1).

DCB 4, 9-10; PLRE 1, 620 n. 4; PCBE 1, 774-776; J.J. Gavigan, St. Augustine's Friend Nebridius: CHR 32 (1946-47) 47-58; G. Folliet, La correspondance entre Augustin et Nébridius, in L'opera letteraria di Agostino tra Cassiciacum e Milano, Palermo 1987, 191-215; R. Piccolomini (ed.), Sant'Agostino, Verso la verità. Corrispondenza tra Agostino e Nebridio, Rome 1990; G. Catapano, Il concetto di filosofia nei primi scritti di Agostino. Analisi dei passi metafilosofici dal Contra Academicos al De vera religione, Rome 2001.

A. Di Berardino

NECTARIUS (d. 27 Sep 397). Saint, archbishop of *Constantinople (381–397). Originally from *Tarsus in Cilicia, senator and praetor, present in Constantinople in June 381, when unexpectedly the emperor *Theodosius I proposed him to the bishops gathered together in council (the second ecumenical council) as successor to the outgoing *Gregory of Nazianzus. Although he was still a catechumen, the imperial candidate obtained the support of the council. The formula of faith recited by the newly elected as a profession of baptismal faith became, it would seem, the symbol of Nicaea-Constantinople. The first Acts of Nectarius were linked to conciliar decrees (dogmatic definition, letter to the emperor [9 July 381] and synods of the years 382, 383, 384), and they modestly inaugurated, in virtue of can. 3 of the council, a new phase of the Constantinopolitan church toward the full development of the patriarchate. He died 27 Sep 397, the day on which the Byzantine Synaxarium keeps his memory, together with *Flavian of Antioch. In another liturgical commemoration (11 Oct), his name precedes that of four archbishops of Constantinople, among which is *Arsacius, his brother. Apart from some patriarchal acts of his which remain, there is an unpublished Eulogy of St. Stephen in an *Armenian version. The homily on the martyr St. *Theodore of Tyre (Amasea) transmitted under his name has been judged spurious.

CPG 4300-4301; PG 39, 1821-1840; Cath. 9, 93-94; BS 9, 831-832; J.N.D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom: Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop, London 1995, 104-129.

D. Stiernon

NEFALIUS. An Alexandrian monk of Nubian origin. He played a notable role in the religious life of the years between 482 and 507. He was initially a *monophysite of schismatic tendencies, as *Zacharias Rhetor (Hist. Eccl.; Vit. Sev.) and other sources testify. We should not regard as reliable the opinion of J. Lebon (Le monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1909, 33 n. 3; 43, n. 4), which on the basis of a poor interpretation of certain passages of *Evagrius and *Liberatus holds that he was always Chalcedonian. Nefalius participated in 482 in the revolt of the thirty-thousand monks who, led by Theodore of Antinoe, claimed an explicitly anti-Chalcedonian interpretation of the Henoticon of *Zeno, Nefalius being among the most intransigent and obstreperous (Fliche-Martin IV, 362-367). He then moved to *Palestine, where he found support from the patriarch *Elias, and there he was active against the monophysites, who were in the *Gaza area. His intolerance was more based on ecclesiastical politics than doctrinal extremism; thus in 507 we find him the leader of an equally violent campaign against the Severian monophysite monks. In Palestine, for this occasion, he gave a discourse in defense of the two natures and of the Council of Chalcedon: this apologia (Synēgoria) has been lost. Fragments of it are preserved in the two Orationes ad Nephalium (of the first we possess only the end; the second has come to us in full in a *Syriac version) composed, in response, by *Severus of Antioch: Nefalius, who uses patristic arguments, seems to be the source of the original theology of John Grammaticus and a precursor of *Neochalcedonianism, a *Christology aimed at conciliating, with the help of Aristotelian categories, the thought of *Cyril of Alexandria with the Chalcedonian formulations.

CPG 6825; CSCO 119, 1-69 (text); CSCO 120, 1-50 (Fr. tr.); J. Lebon, Le monophysisme sévérien, Louvain 1909, 118-175; W. Ensslin, Nephalios: PWK 16, 2489-2490; Ch. Moeller, Un représentant de la Christologie néochalcédonienne au début du sixième siècle en Orient: Nephalius d'Alexandrie: RHE 40 (1944-1945) 73-140; Beck 284-285; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus, Bonn 1962, 151-159; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 148-151, 234-240; Grillmeier, II/2, 49-54; Patrologia V, 356-357.

A. Labate

NEMESIANUS and COMPANIONS, martyrs. Nemesianus and his companions, bishops, priests, deacons and laity, were martyrs at the time of the *Valerian persecution. Among them we can distinguish a first group of Numidian martyrs (Cypr., Ep. 76-79), of which the marginal notes of the council of 256 identifies Iader of Midili and Litteus of Gemellae as confessors, and Lucius of Theveste (Tebessa, Algeria) a martyr and confessor. Mentioned also are Nemesianus of Thubunae (Tobnae, Tobna, Algeria), Felix of Bagai (Algeria), Felix of Bamacorra, Dativus of Badiae, Lucius of Castra Galbae, Polianus of Mile-vis and Victor of Octavu. The Mart. hier. puts Dativus on 14 March, and Lucius of Theveste on 18 Jan; the Calendarium Carthaginense puts Nemesianus 18–23 Dec (not fully legible). The same marginal notes of the council of 256 also name Clarus of Mascula as a confessor and Salvianus of Gazaufala as a martyr. A second group of martyrs was of the Proconsular: Successus of Abbir Germaniciana (Cypr., Ep. 80; Mart. hier. 18 Jan; council of 256: marginal notes), Faustus of Thimida Regia, Lucius of Membresa, Quietus of Uruk, Saturninus of Thugga, Therapius of Bulla, Ventantius of Thinissa and Victor of Assuras, all named as confessors in the same notes; Peter of Hippo Diarrhytus, Verulus of Rusiccade and Libosus of Vaga are named as martyrs. Paulus of Obba was inserted into the Mart. hier. (18 Jan).

BS 9, 798-800; Monceaux 3, 533; V. Saxer, Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, Vatican City 1979, 16-17, 104-116; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae 2, Rome 1982, 713.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

NEMESIUS of Emesa (4th–5th c.). Bishop of *Emesa in *Syria at the end of the 4th c., he composed (into 5th c.) the De natura hominis. (It now seems certain that the composition of this work dates to this period and not to the mid-5th c., as E. Zeller and E. Amann argued; see W. Vanhamel: DSp 11, 93.) Important more from a historical and cultural point of view than a theological or dogmatic one (even if the emphasis in ch. 3 on the complete absence of mingling between the divine and human natures in Christ, expressed in the term ἀσυγχύτως, anticipates the formulation of the Council of *Chalcedon; see A. Grillmeier, Vorbereitung der Formel von Chalkedon: CGG I, 158-159; S. Lilla: Augustinianum 22 [1982] 553-555; Id., Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite, Porphyre et Damascius, in Denys l'Aréopagite et sa postérité en Occident et en Orient, ed. Y. De Andia, Paris 1997, 133-134; W. Vanhamel: DSp 11, 95), the work of Nemesius, as the German Quellenforschung above all has shown (see bibl.), uses the most disparate philosophical sources, from those belonging to the *Aristotelian-peripatetic tradition to the *Stoics and *Neoplatonists, from Galen to the Commentary on Genesis of *Origen; the De natura hominis is important for our knowledge of the Symmikta Zetemata of *Porphyry and also, as W. Jaeger has highlighted, of various Posidonian doctrines. The work, the first complete tractate of Christian *anthropology, considers the various questions regarding the nature of the human soul; an account of its content may be found in DSp 11, 94-98.

Editions: CPG 3550; of the Greek text: Nemesius Emesenus De natura hominis, ed. C.F. Matthaei, Halae 1802 (= PG 40, 504-817); Nemesii Emeseni De natura hominis, ed. M. Morani, Leipzig 1987; of the Latin version of Nicola Alfano, arcbishop of Salerno, d. 1085: C.J. Burkhard, Leipzig 1917; of the Latin version of 1165, dedicated to the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, of Burgundio of Pisa: Nemésius d'Emèse, ed. G. Verbeke - J.R. Moncho, Leiden 1975 (Corpus Comm. in Aristotelem Graecorum Supp. 1); De natura hominis, ed. M. Morani, Leipzig 1987; It. tr. La natura dell'uomo, tr. M. Morani, Salerno 1982.

Studies: Bardenhewer IV, 275-280; PWK Suppl. 7, 562-566; DSp 11, 92-99; A. Gercke, Eine platonische Quelle des Neoplatonismus: RhM 41 (1886) 266-291; D. Bender, Untersuchungen zu Nemesios von Emesa, Leipzig 1898; B. Domański, Die Psychologie des Nemesius, Münster 1900; W. Jaeger, Nemesios von Emesa. Quellenforschungen zum Neuplatonismus und seinen Anfängen bei Poseidonios, Berlin 1914; H.A. Koch, Quellenforschungen zu Nemesios von Emesa, Berlin 1921; H. Schöne, Verschiedenes: RhM 73 (1920-1924) 154-156; E. Skard, Nemesiusstudien, I: SO 15/16 (1936) 23-43; II: SO 17 (1937) 9-25; III: SO 18 (1938) 31-41; E. Dobler, Nemesios von Emesa und die Psychologie des menschlichen Aktes bei Thomas von Aquin, Werthenstein 1950; A. Grillmeier, Vorbereitung der Formel von Chalkedon: CGG I, 158-159; H. Dörrie, Porphyrios' Symmikta Zetemata, Munich 1959; M. Morani, La versione armena del trattato Περὶ φύσεως ἀνθρώπου di Nemesio di Emesa: Memorie Ist. Lombardo di Sc. e Lett. 31/2 (1970) 105-193; Id., Il manoscritto Chigiano di Nemesio: RIL 105 (1971) 621-635; Id., Un commento armeno inedito al "De natura hominis" di Nemesio: RIL 106 (1972) 407-410; Id., Contributo per un'edizione critica della versione armena di Nemesio: MIL 33/3 (1973) 195-235; A. Siclari, L'antropologia di Nemesio di Emesa, Padua 1974; M. Morani, La tradizione manoscritta del "De natura hominis" di Nemesio, Milan 1981; Nemesius Emesenus, in Catalogus translationum et commentariorum. Medieval and Renaissance, VI, Washington 1986, 31-72; K. Samir, Les versions arabes de Némésius de Homs, in L'eredità classica nelle lingue orientali, ed. M. Pavan - U. Cozzoli, Rome 1986, 99-151; M. Zonta, Nemesiana Syriaca: New Fragments from the Missing Syriac Version of the "De natura hominis": Journal of Semitic Studies 36 (1991) 223-258; E. Dobler, Zwei syrische Quellen der theologischen Summa des Thomas von Aquin: Nemesios von Emesa und Johannes von Damaskus: ihr Einfluss auf die anthropologischen Grundlagen der Moraltheologie (S. Th. I-II, qq. 6-17; 22-48), Freiburg (CH) 2000; B. Motta, La mediazione estrema. L'antropologia di Nemesio di Emesa fra neoplatonismo e aristotelismo, Padua 2004; M. Streck, Das schönste Gut: der menschliche Wille bei Nemesius von Emesa und Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 2005.

S. Lilla

NEOCAESAREA (Pontus). The city of Neocaesarea (modern Niksar) is found on the W slopes of the Paryadres Mons, dominating the valley of the Lycus (Kelkit Çayi), tributary of the River Iris, ca. 50 km (31 mi) from Comana Pontica, and ca. 100 km (62 mi) from the coast of the Black Sea. The region, as a province, changed its borders during the Roman Empire. At first the district of the Pontus Polemoniacus, of which the metropolis was Neocaesarea, belonged to the province of *Galatia; in the time of *Trajan it became part of the province of *Cappadocia. With the reform of *Diocletian the Pontus Polemoniacus became a province and Neocaesarea became its capital. Its ancient name was Caberia, and under Pompey (d. 48 BC) it was called Diospolis. At the time of *Nero (AD 54–68) it took the name of Neocaesarea, to indicate a new foundation and beginning; it now boasted an emperor as its founder. In the 3rd c. it was a flourishing city, as coins show, bearing images of its buildings and symbols of games to honor the local divinities; in this period *Gregory Thaumaturgus became its bishop. The evangelization of the city and its territory is to be ascribed to him, even if there were Christians there before, as the first letter of Peter and *Lucian of Samosata (ca. 120–190) attest, the latter stating that "Pontus is full of atheists and Christians" (Alexander 25, 38). In the 3rd c. there were *Gothic invasions, and their deportations included Christians. In his *panegyric, *Gregory of Nyssa referred to the construction of the church begun by Gregory and concluded by his successor: it was still there in his time, well resistant to the earthquake. After 314 a council was held in the city at which 17 bishops participated. Other bishops of Neocaesarea are Longinus, Musonius and Dorotheus.

F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, II, 1906, 259-273; B. Rémy, L'évolution administrative de l'Anatolie aux trois premiers siècles de notre ère, Lyon 1986; S. Mitchel, Anatolia, Land, Men, and Gods in Asia Minor, II, The Rise of the Church, Oxford 1993 (see index); A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford 1971, 148ff.; R. Lane Fox, Pagani e cristiani, Bari-Rome 1991, 580-582; L. Padovese, La Turchia, i luoghi delle origini cristiane, Casale Monf. 1987, 225-226; ODB 2, 1453-1454; Fedalto I, 68.

A. Di Berardino

NEOCAESAREA, Council of. At Neocaesarea, city of Ponto Polemoniaco, between 314 and 319 a council was held, presided over by *Vitalis of Antioch in the presence of seventeen bishops, of which six came from Galatia. The council was held, in any case, before the death of Vitalis (319), but, as it did not consider the question of the lapsi, the period of persecution must have been some years in the past. The Greek text comes to us through John Scholasticus (V. Benesevič, Joannis Scholastici Synagoga L titulorum, Munich 1937), that of the *Latin from *Dionysius Exiguus (A. Strewe, Die Canonessammlung des Dionysius Exiguus, Berlin 1931). The council prohibited priests from marrying, the penalty being deposition (can. 1); norms were given with respect to sexual morals; liturgical laws were promulgated. Other canons regarded marriage, in particular subjecting to penance those who contracted second marriages. The instruction of catechumens was regulated. It was clarified that the baptism of a pregnant woman does not convey grace to the fetus. The canons of the Council of Neocaesarea entered into the legal collections of the Eastern church.

Mansi II, col. 539; J.G. Herbst, Die Synoden von Ancyra und Neucaesarea: ThQ 3 (1821) 399-447; C. Busioc, Sinodul local din Neacesarea, Bucharest 1915; Joannou I, 2, 74-83; Palazzini 3, 175-176; I canoni dei concili della Chiesa antica, I, I concili greci, ed. A. Di Berardino, Rome 2006, 281-287.

C. Nardi

NEOCHALCEDONIANISM. With this term modern scholars define the form of *Christology which integrated the Chalcedonian formula (two natures united in one hypostasis) with the Unus de Trinitate passus est of the Scythian monks and the twelve Cyrillian anathemas, so as to emphasize the unity of the two natures and thus dampen the hostility of the monophysites. This theological tendency gained popularity through the effect of the new doctrinal orientation promoted by the politics of Zeno's Henoticon, in the 1st half of the 6th c., and was actively favored by *Justinian. Its principal representatives were *Nefalius, *John of Scythopolis, *John of Caesarea, *John Maxentius, *Ephrem of Antioch, Justinian himself and *Leontius of Jerusalem.

M. Richard, Le Néo-chalcédonisme: MSR 3 (1946) 156-161; Ch. Moeller, Le chalcédonisme et le néochalcédonisme en Orient de 451 à la fin du VI[e] siècle: CGG 1, 637-720; S. Helmer, Der Neuchalkedonismus, Bonn 1962; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 224-285; K.-H. Uthemann, Der Neuchalkedonismus als Vorbereitung des Monothelismus, in J. Van Oort - J. Roldanus, Chalkedon: Geschichte und Aktualität, Leuven 1997, 373-413.

M. Simonetti

NEONA of Seleucia (of Isauria) (4th c.). An exponent of the *homoiousion party, he was deposed by the Council of *Constantinople of 360, which saw the victory of the moderate *Arians and the *Acacians. He was among the homoiousion bishops who in ca. 365 signed a letter to be sent to *Liberius of Rome to establish relations with him.

DCB 4, 175; Simonetti, 340, 395; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 197.

M. Simonetti

NEONICENISM. From the study of T. Zahn (Marcellus von Ancyra, published in 1867) onward, scholars, esp. Protestants, have characterized the interpretation of the Nicene faith as maintained by the Cappadocians and their friends and sanctioned by the Council of *Constantinople (381) as Neonicenism, speaking of "Jungnizäner, " "neue Orthodoxie, " "kappadokische Neugläubigkeit" etc. The novelty of this Neonicene position is supposed to have consisted in the fact that its proponents understood the ὁμοούσιος of *Nicaea as ὁμοιούσιος, unity of substance (unius substantiae, imposed at Nicaea by the Latins) as likeness of substance. This theory, however, was based on unsubstantiated premises (unsustainable interpretations of Nicaea, *Athanasius, of the Cappadocians etc.) and therefore is not admissible. It is legitimate, however, to speak of a reinterpretation of the Nicene faith in the sense that the Cappadocians and those who depended on them replaced ὁμοούσιος with the more complete formula μία οὐσία-τρεῖς ὑποστάσεις, opposing thereby not only *Arianism but also *Sabellianism, as their formula expressed. Scholars such as C. Markschies and others, who have investigated in depth the history of the Greek and Latin reception of the Nicene faith, have certainly sharpened and actually corrected the positions of the classical history of the dogmas. However, by using the rather ambiguous term of Neonicenism, they still risk giving too much importance to the ὁμοούσιος which is but a technical expression, secondary to the principal affirmation natus, non factus, and further give the impression of reducing the study of the baptismal faith, as presented in the patristic tradition, to those aspects discussed in the councils and synods of 4th and 5th c.

R. Arnou, Unité numérique et unité de nature chez les Pères après le concile de Nicée: Gregorianum 15 (1934) 242-254; A.M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen 1965, 270-293; C. Markschies, Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie, Tübingen 1995; B. Studer, Una valutazione critica del neonicenismo: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 29-48 (bibl.); B. Studer, Kritische Beobachtungen zum "Neunizänismus" der modernen deutschen Dogmengeschichte: Adamantius 8 (2002) 152-159.

B. STUDER

NEOPHYTE. The Greek term indicating a newly grown shoot, and therefore still fragile. It is used in the LXX and then by St. *Paul in 1 Tim 3:6 to indicate a "new convert, " "just baptized" (there is similar symbolism in Rom 6:5, σύμφυτοι, taken up by *Gregory the Great, Ep. V, 53: adhuc noviter plantatus. Transliterated into Latin, neophytus is used by *Tertullian to mean a convert (Praescr. 41, 6; Adv. Marc. 1, 20, 3). We do not find it frequently in the first centuries of Christianity: the Greeks prefer the expression "newly illuminated." The term became common above all in *Augustine of Hippo and in epigraphs (see Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, vol. VI) to designate the newly baptized.

After baptism, the neophytes participated for the first time in the prayer of the faithful (Hippolytus, Tr. Ap. 21), in the offering of the bread and wine (ibid., 21) and in eucharistic communion (see Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 65, 1). After baptism, through the catecheses they deepened their understanding of the sacraments, above all of baptism and the *Eucharist.

Particular ceremonies characterized the dies neophytorum, esp. from the 4th c. onward: the neophytes, who generally received baptism on the day of Easter, wore white garments, which they then took off the following Sunday, named in albis; in the East they girded their loins and put a crown on their heads, a sign of joy and dignity; their first entrance into the assembly took on a solemn and festal character (see Greg. Naz., Oratio, 40, 46 [in sanctum baptisma]); in the West, they covered their heads with a veil and washed their feet; in *Africa they were given milk and honey (as a sign of entrance into the Promised Land [see Ex 3:8, 17] and to symbolize that they were still babes in the faith [see 1 Pet 2:2]); in *Milan, they chanted psalms 42 and 22 as they approached the altar, to indicate their renewed youth (see Ambrose, Myst. 43 and Sacr. 4, 7); in 6th-c. Rome they were also given a mixture of milk and honey, placed in the chalice (see John the Deacon, Ep. ad Senarium 12).

The councils, following the norm of 1 Tim 3:6, prohibited neophytes from being elevated immediately to the priesthood or the episcopate (see Council of Nicaea, can. 2; Council of Serdica, can. 10 [13]; *Apostolic Canons 80 [79]). There were famous exceptions, such as Ambrose of Milan.

DACL 12, 1103-1110; J. Cantinat, La Chiesa della pentecoste, Turin 1972; Lampe 905; A.G. Martimort, La Chiesa in preghiera, Brescia 1984; A. Ferrua, see "Neofito, " in Grande dizionario enciclopedico UTET, vol. 14, Turin 1993, 403; E.J. Kilmartin, The Baptismal Cups: Revisited, in EULOGHMA. Studies R. Taft, S.J., ed. E. Carr et al., Rome 1993, 249-267.

M. MARITANO

NEOPLATONISM

I. General characteristics - II. Plotinus - III. Porphyry - IV. Neoplatonism of the 4th c.: Iamblichus and Julian the Apostate - V. The school of Athens and the exegesis of the Parmenides - VI. Proclus and Damascius - VII. Neoplatonism in the Latin West.

I. General characteristics. Neoplatonism is the philosophical current which dominates the thought of *Late Antiquity from 3rd c. AD onward, and which, in metaphysical and theological as well as in moral discourse, provided the framework for many of the Fathers, both Greek and Latin (see *Platonism and the Fathers). Commonly it is closely associated with the name of *Plotinus, its creator and most illustrious exponent. Without taking anything away from the greatness and originality of his thought, we should remember that Neoplatonism had many centuries of preparation behind it. Beginning with the ancient Academy immediately following Plato, including *Aristotle and his commentator Alexander of Aphrodisias, followed by *Stoicism (above all the Middle Stoicism of Posidonius), the Neo-Pythagoreanism of the first two centuries AD (esp. that of Moderatus, ps.-Brotinus and Numenius), the New Academy of Antiochus of Ascalon, *Middle Platonism, the Jewish-Hellenism represented by *Philo of Alexandria, we arrive at *Ammonius Saccas, the Alexandrian teacher of Plotinus. As two great modern scholars, W. Theiler (Plotinus und die antike Philosophie: MH [1944] 209-225 = Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 140-159) and E.R. Dodds (Tradition and Personal Achievement in the Philosophy of Plotinus: JRS 50 [1960] 2), have shown one of the most distinctive characteristics of Neoplatonism is a marked cultural syncretism, in which, to create a new and original philosophical system, not only Platonic doctrines are drawn upon, but also Academic, Aristotelian-peripatetic, Stoic, Neo-Pythagorean, and Middle Platonic doctrines, as well as those of Philo. (E.R. Dodds: CQ 22 [1928] 139-140 and 140 n. 1, justly excludes any direct influence of Philo on Plotinus; however, it is very probable that Plotinus was exposed to some of Philo's doctrines through Ammonius Saccas, who was of Christian origin and who, like all educated Alexandrian Christians, had certainly known Philo's writings; in this way we may explain certain surprising analogies between Philo and Plotinus, as, e.g., the doctrine of the double ethical phases metriopatheia-apatheia or that of the second hypostasis as the image of the first.) As do subsequent exponents of Neoplatonism, Plotinus sets out above all to be an exegete and systematizer of the philosophy of Plato: his principal intent is that of "explaining" and "ordering" into a coherent system the doctrines which the Athenian philosopher left scattered across his dialogues, doctrines also frequently covered by veils which need to be lifted (Enn. V, 1, 8; E.R. Dodds: JRS 50 [1960] 1). In order to reach this goal Plotinus does not disdain—rather he considers it necessary—to have recourse to almost the entire body of Greek thought which preceded him: *Porphyry (Vita Plot., ch. 14) gives us an idea of the vast range of authors who were read and discussed in his school. His example was to be followed by his successors.

II. Plotinus. While Ammonius Saccas, faithful to the thought of Aristotle and to the tendency dominant in Philo and in Middle Platonism, had discussed the problem of the nature of the supreme principle, considered as mind (nous) or as "One"—the first solution was adopted by *Origen the Neoplatonist and later, in the 5th c., by Hierocles—Plotinus showed himself decisively in favor of the second solution, which remained fundamental in all subsequent "orthodox" Neoplatonism: at the apex of his construction was not the nous, but the "One," conceived absolutely negatively, of the first hypostasis of the Platonic Parmenides, identified by him with the absolute good of Rep. VI, 509b (Enn. V, 1, 8). The adoption of the negative "One" as the first principle, the clear formulation of the doctrine of its superiority over mind (nous) and over being, and its identification with the good, have precedents in the history of Greek thought. First, as E.R. Dodds has observed in his key article (The Parmenides of Plato and the Origin of the Neoplatonic One: CQ 22 [1928] 129-142), the points of contact between the absolutely negative "One" of the first hypostasis of Parmenides and the Plotinian doctrine of the "One" (see Dodds, op. cit., 132-133; H.R. Schwyzer: PWK 21, 1, 553-554), presuppose the interpretation in a theological and metaphysical sense of the "One" in the first three hypostases held above all by the Neo-Pythagorean Moderatus, who acc. to Simplicius (In Phys. 230, 34-231, 2 Diels) had identified the One of the first hypostasis with the metaphysical One superior to being, that of the second with the intelligible and the ideas, and that of the third with the soul (this same interpretation is also found in Plotinus, Enn. V, 1, 8). Second, Plato (Rep. VI, 509b) had himself affirmed that that the good "is not being, but exceeds it in dignity and power" (this passage, along with the first hypostasis of Parmenides, represents the best "Platonic" authority on which the doctrine of the first hypostasis in all "orthodox" Neoplatonism is based. Third, as both Dodds (op. cit., 140) and Ph. Merlan (The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 30-32) have argued, already in the old Academy Speusippus had come to distinguish the One from mind and from being. Fourth, both Aristotle (On prayer, fr. 46 Rose) and two exponents of Neo-Pythagoreanism, ps.-Brotinus and ps.-Archytas, had affirmed the superiority of the One over mind (on ps.-Brotinus and ps.-Archytas see esp. J. Whittaker: VChr 23 [1969] 95 e 102-103; Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XIII). And fifth, the identification of the One and the good had been sustained in all probability by Plato himself in his lecture On the Good (see Aristoxenus, Harm. 30, 44, 11; Aristotle, Met. N 109lb 13-14; Numenius, fr. 19 Des Places 59, 12-13) and taken up by the Neo-Pythagorean ps.-Brotinus (see Syrianus, In Met. 183, 1-2; ps.-Alexander In Met. 821, 33-822, 1 and Whittaker, op. cit., 95).

The principal motifs that characterize the Plotinian doctrine of the first hypostasis (the One-Good) are the following: (1) the One is the first and supreme principle (V, 1, 1; V, 1, 7; V, 3, 11; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 10; VI, 9, 3); (2) it is absolutely simple (II, 9, 1;V, 1, 5; V, 1, 9; V, 3, 11; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 10); (3) it is absolutely pure, without quantity or quality (V, 1, 9; V, 5, 10; VI, 9, 3); (4) it is free from any mixture (V, 1, 9; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 10; V, 5, 13; VI, 7, 36); (5) it is anterior to everything and above everything (V, 3, 11; V, 3, 13; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 6; V, 5, 12; V, 5, 13); (6) it is different from everything else and cannot be identified with anything (V, 1, 7; V, 3, 11; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 6; V, 5, 13); (7) at the same time, however, it is everything, in that it contains everything in itself potentially, in an undifferentiated state (V, 2, 1; V, 3, 15); (8) it is entirely self-sufficient (II, 9, 1; V, 3, 12; V, 3, 13; V, 4, 1; VI, 9, 6); (9) it is superior to virtue inasmuch as it does not possess it (I 2, 3); (10) it is desired by all beings (I, 6, 7; V, 5, 12; V, 1, 6); (11) even generating the nous it remains immobile, in a state of absolute quiet, always identical with itself (V, 1, 6; V, 3, 12; V, 4, 2; V, 5, 5; V, 5, 12; on this idea is based the motif of the monē, which together with those of the proodos and the epistrophē underwent a further development in Proclus); (12) in the generation of the nous its power is not subjected to diminution, nor is it exhausted (VI, 7, 36; VI, 9, 5); (13) although remaining immobile in the generation of the nous, it may neither be said that it moves nor that it remains still, since it is above the states of quiet or of movement (V, 5, 10; VI, 9, 13); (14) it is not the nous, to which it is superior and anterior, generating it, being the cause of its existence and of the multiplicity which it includes (V, 1, 7; V, 3, 11; V, 3, 16; V, 1, 5; V, 1, 8; V, 3, 12; V, 3, 16; V, 4, 2); (15) it is superior to being (V, 1, 8; V, 1, 10; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 6; V, 3, 17; V, 4, 2); (16) it "towers above being" in that it is at the apex of the intelligible world, over which it reigns (I, 1, 8; V, 5, 3; V, 3, 12); (17) as it is not being, it is nonbeing (V, 2, 1; V, 5, 6; VI, 9, 3; VI, 9, 5); (18) on the one hand, it is identified with the absolute good; on the other, the good which it transmits remains below its own true nature (II, 9, 1; V, 1, 8; V, 5, 13; V, 3, 11; VI, 9, 6); (19) it is without form or figure (V, 1, 7; V, 5, 6; V, 5, 11; VI, 7, 32); (20) it is indivisible (V, 1, 7; VI, 9, 2); (21) from the point of view of physical size it is neither limited nor infinite (V, 5, 10); (22) it is, however, infinite in its inexhaustible, generative power (V, 5, 10; VI, 9, 6); (23) it radiates the light which constitutes the nous and which shines also in the mind of humanity, esp. if humans approach it (V, 1, 6; V, 3, 12; V, 3, 15; V, 3, 17; VI, 7, 36; VI, 9, 4; VI, 9, 7; VI, 9, 9); (24) it is to be found everywhere and at the same time is not in any place (V, 5, 9; VI, 8, 16; VI, 9, 3); (25) it is outside time (VI, 9, 3); (26) it is superior to the beautiful since it is its source (I, 6, 9; V, 5, 12); (27) it lacks any will or thought and does not even think of itself (V, 1, 6; V, 3, 11; V, 3, 13; VI, 7, 35; VI, 7, 40; VI, 9, 6); (28) however, its act is one with its will (VI, 8, 21); (29) it does not engage in any cognitive activity (V, 3, 12); (30) it is unknown, inasmuch as it is the object of thought or of knowledge (V, 3, 14; V, 4, 1; VI, 7, 35; VI, 9-4); (31) it is superior to words and therefore is without name and ineffable (V, 3, 13; V, 3, 14; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 6; V, 9, 4; V, 9, 5); (32) it eludes whoever seeks it (V, 5, 10); (33) the only means which the human mind possesses for approaching it is the via negativa, that process which consists in taking away all attributes and which reveals only what is not, not what is (V, 3, 14; V, 3, 17; V, 5, 4; V, 5, 6; V, 5, 13; VI, 8, 21).

The nous, the second hypostasis, is for its part distinguished by the following characteristics: (1) it is generated by the One ab aeterno following an overflowing of its superabundant power and an irradiation of its light (V, 1, 6; V, 2, 1; V, 3, 16; V, 4, 1; V, 5, 5; in connection with this last motif see no. 23 of the doctrine of the One); (2) it is nous inasmuch as, once generated by the One, it turns to it and contemplates it (V, 1, 6; V, 1, 7; V, 2, 1; V, 4, 2); (3) it is act, image and copy of the One, but remains inferior to it, even if it is superior to all other beings (V, 1, 6; V, 1, 7; V, 3, 15; V, 4, 2; V, 5, 5); (4) it is the multiple One that includes in itself an indistinct multiplicity, and in this sense corresponds to the One of the second hypostasis of Parmenides (V, 3, 15; V, 4, 1); (5) it includes in itself all intelligible beings or ideas which are the product of its noetic activity (III, 8, 11; V, 1, 4; V, 1, 7; V, 3, 5; V, 3, 11; V, 3, 15; V, 4, 2; V, 5, 2; V, 5, 3; V, 5, 6; V, 6, 6; V, 9, 5; V, 9, 6; V, 9, 8); (6) it is identical to intelligible beings or ideas (there exists a complete identity between being, the nous, the ideas or forms and the act of being) (III, 9, 1; V, 1, 4; V, 1, 8; V, 1, 10; V, 3, 5; V, 4, 2; V, 5, 6; V, 9, 3; V, 9, 5; V, 9, 6; V, 9, 8); (7) consequently, it is identical to the intelligible world, model of the sensible world, i.e., of the "living intelligible being" of Plato's Timaeus (III, 8, 11; V, 1, 4; V, 3, 16; V, 5, 4; V, 9, 9); (8) it is identical to absolute beauty (I, 6, 9); (9) it is identical to the "cause" of the Philebus and of the Timaeus and to the demiurge of the Timaeus (V, 1, 8; V, 9, 3); (10) in the first moment of its existence—i.e., before it turns toward the One and contemplates it (see above no. 2)—it is identical to the apeiria and to the "indeterminate dyad" (II, 4, 15; V, 1, 5; V, 4, 2; VI, 5, 11; VI, 5, 12); (11) again with reference to this first moment, before the formation of ideas, it is identical to the intelligible material without form, which is the model of sensible material, as the intelligible universe is the model of the sensible One (II, 4, 3; II, 4, 15); (12) before turning toward the One and receiving from it the impression of limit and of unity (see Enn. II, 4, 5) it is an indeterminate being (II, 4, 5), prior to mind true and proper (V, 2, 1; V, 9, 8) (on points 10-12 see J.M. Rist, The Indefinite Dyad and Intelligible Matter in Plotinus: CQ New Series 12 [1962] 99-107; A.H. Armstrong, Spiritual or Intelligible Matter in Plotinus and St. Augustine, Plotinian and Christian Studies, London 1979, 277-283; Proclus, E.R. Dodds (tr.), Stoicheiōsis theologikē: The Elements of Theology, Oxford 1933, 246-247; the motif of the anteriority of being in respect to intelligence—which in Plotinus represents two moments of the same hypostasis, distinguishable only logically—undergoes a development in subsequent Neoplatonism); (13) it contains in itself life (V, 6, 6); (14) it thinks itself (V, 3, 13; V, 9, 5); (15) the ideas considered in the singular, present within the nous, are intelligent like the nous (V, 1, 4; V, 9, 8).

The third hypostasis is represented by the anima mundi of which Plato had spoken in the Timaeus, the Philebus and in book X of the Laws. Of it, we may note: (1) it is born of the nous following the overflowing of its power, as the nous is born of the One (see nous, no. 1) (V, 2, 1); (2) it contemplates the nous as the nous contemplates the One, and from this contemplation it draws its capacity to act (see nous, no. 2) (VI, 3, 6; V, 1, 3; V, 1, 6; V, 2, 1); (3) it is the manifestation, the act and the image of the nous, as the nous is of the One (see nous, no. 3) (V, 1, 3; V, 1, 6; V, 2, 1); (4) indeterminate in the moment in which it is generated by the nous, it receives the limit and the form from its generative principle, analogously to what happens in the nous (see nous, no. 12) (V, 17); (5) it participates both in the intelligible world and in the sensible (IV, 8, 7; V, 1, 7; V, 3, 7); (6) it generates the sensible world (V, 1, 2; V, 1, 7; V, 2, 1); (7) it receives from the nous the rational principles (logoi) and then transmits them to the sensible world (IV, 3, 10; V, 9, 3); (8) it contains in itself all the logoi and is itself the universal logos and a multiple unity (II, 3, 16; IV, 3, 8; V, 3, 8; V, 2, 5); (9) it vivifies the universe and is cause of its life (V, 1, 2); (10) it supports, holds together and governs the sensible universe, every part of which is spanned by it, and thanks to it is a god (IV, 3, 9; IV, 8, 2; V, 1, 2); (11) it governs and adorns the universe, acc. to the logos which is its law (II, 3, 16; IV, 3, 10; IV, 3, 39); (12) it is infused into the sensible universe ab aeterno (IV, 3, 9).

Almost all the points listed above may be traced to earlier Greek thought. Without proceeding to a detailed investigation into the various sources, we limit ourselves here to recalling that, as regards the One, points 13, 17, 19, 24, 25, 30 and 31 go back to Plato's Parmenides; points 2, 3, 4 and 5 are of Aristotelian-peripatetic provenance; point 16 has a precedent in *Numenius. As far as the nous is concerned points 4 and 5 are traceable respectively to the second hypostasis of the Parmenides and to the Middle Platonic doctrine (found also in the ancient Academy, in Antiochus of Ascalon and in Philo) of the ideas identical to the thought contained in the mind of God; points 6, 13 and 14 are of Aristotelian origin; point 15 goes back to Plato (Sophist 248e-249a) and to Alexander of Aphrodisias (Mantissa 108, 15-18). And as regards the anima mundi points 2 and 9 have precedents in Numenius and in Alcinous, and points 7, 8, 10 and 11 are of Stoic derivation (see R.E. Witt, The Plotinian Logos and Its Stoic Basis: CQ 25 [1931] 103-111).

The Plotinian positions on the matter which is at the base of sensible bodies depends in part on the preceding Platonic-peripatetic tradition, which had identified the receptacle of the Platonic Timaeus with the primordial material, absolutely without form, figure, and quality, and ready to receive into itself the impressions of the form, which produce quality: as for Aristotle, Antiochus of Ascalon, Middle Platonism and Numenius, as for Plotinus sensible matter is the absolute negation of form (I, 8, 9), and free of quality, figure, and size (I, 8, 10; II, 4, 8; VI, 9, 7), and receives into itself the forms and the qualities (I, 8, 8; I, 8, 10; II, 4, 8; VI, 9, 7). Plotinus, however, goes beyond the classical position of Middle Platonism, in which matter, along with God and ideas, was one of the "three principles, " and approaches instead the positions of certain Neo-Pythagoreans: agreeing in substance with Numenius (fr. 50 Des Places) he affirms that there exists an incompatibility between being and matter, which is incapable of combining with being (III, 6, 13); that which enters into the material is not a true being, but only an image (III, 6, 13): and, in the same way as Moderatus in Simplicius (In Phys. 231, 4-5), he sustains that matter, being in itself without forms, which are identical with being, may be considered a nonbeing, without this implying a negation of its existence (I, 8, 5; II, 4, 10; II, 4, 16; II, 5, 4; III, 6, 7; III, 6, 13).

In respect of the origin of matter, Plotinus (IV, 8, 6) seems to take into consideration both hypotheses: either it exists ab aeterno (the classic thesis of Middle Platonism and of Numenius), or it derives from a superior principle, which has granted it existence as a grace: this is the thesis of Eudorus, Ammonius Saccas and certain Neo-Pythagoreans (see Calcidius, In Tim. 235; Diogenes Laertius, VIII, 25; and Simplicius, In Phys. 181, 18-19).

To the problem of the origin and the nature of evil, Plotinus, in the eighth tractate of the first Ennead, gives two answers. On the one hand, evil consists in the total absence, privation and want of good; it is not to be found in beings—which, as they are products of the good, participate in it—and it is a form of nonbeing (I, 8, 1; I, 8, 3; I, 8, 5): this thesis will be taken up by Proclus and, among the Fathers, by *Origen, St. *Basil the Great, *Gregory of Nyssa, St. *Augustine and ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite. On the other hand, its essence—supposing that one may talk of an "essence" of evil—should be identified with matter (I, 8, 3): this thesis would be rejected by Proclus, and, following him, by ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite. In souls, evil consists above all in the lack of measure, a salient characteristic of matter (I, 8, 4). The two solutions are for Plotinus perfectly compatible with each other, in that they are derived from his theory about matter: evil, the total absence of good and nonbeing, is identical with matter insofar as this last, which of itself in no way participates in being, is completely lacking in it, and is a nonbeing (I, 8, 5). All intelligible beings and all sensible objects originally contained in the One in an undifferentiated state (see point 7 of the doctrine of the One) issue from it in virtue of a process of emanation (proodos) which is the result of the overflowing of its inexhaustible power. The One does not remain in this way only in itself; yet, notwithstanding the generation of beings, it remains always in the same state (see points 11 and 12 of the doctrine of the One). For their part, the beings generated by the One imitate their principle, generating in their turn the inferior beings. These are the ideas espoused in IV, 8, 6 (II, 242, 1–244, 18 Henry-Schwyzer). Although these themes were to undergo further accentuation in later Neoplatonism, and above all in Proclus and ps.-Dionysius, we find them already here clearly formulated (the term proodos appears in 242, 5, while that of menontos [243, 10] is the exact equivalent of Proclus's monē).

Notwithstanding the presence of matter, the sensible universe is most beautiful, for it imitates intelligible nature, of which excellence it is the revelation (IV, 8, 6 [244, 23-28]). Plotinus decisively rejects the *gnostic disdain for creation, of which he exalts the beauty, symmetry and order, thus conforming to all preceding Greek thought (II, 9, 16) (see also *cosmos). The sensible universe is characterized by the "sympathy" of the various beings among themselves (their great variety is governed by the One and multiform universal logos, and each part collaborates with the universal soul and with the other parts of the life of the whole, from which it cannot be separated [IV, 3, 8; IV, 4, 35; IV, 4, 40; IV, 7, 3]) and by the harmony which reigns there supreme (IV, 4, 35). We are here in the presence of Stoic, and in particular Posidonian, motifs, as has been demonstrated by R.E. Witt (Plotinus and Posidonius: CQ 24 [1930] 198-207; see esp. 202-203).

Plotinus dedicates two tractates to ethical problems, that On the Virtues and that On Happiness, respectively the second and the fourth of the first Ennead. If the evil of the soul consists in the lack of measure (see above), the function of the first class of virtues—the political virtues—is that of moderating and regulating the passions, imposing a measure on them (I, 2, 2): the preliminary ethical stadium is therefore represented by the metriopatheia which Plato had already mentioned in the Republic (IV, 423e, 431c, X, 619a) and which had become the ethical norm par excellence in the ancient Academy, in the peripatetic school, in Middle Stoicism and Middle Platonism (see the references in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 99-103). The highest end of humanity, which Plato in the famous passage of the Theaetetus 176b had made to consist in the "resemblance to God insofar as possible" and in the flight from this world toward the ideal world, cannot be realized for Plotinus by the simple moderation of the passions through the political virtues, but by their total destruction or apatheia, produced by the superior class of virtues, the cathartic virtues, and practically identical to that catharsis or detachment of the soul from the body on which Plato had so insisted in the Phaedo (I, 2, 3). When completely purified, the soul is ready to turn toward the mind, the second hypostasis, and to contemplate it, realizing thus in itself the third and highest class of virtues, those proper to contemplation (I, 2, 4; I, 2, 6). Whoever reaches this third stage is a true and proper god (I, 2, 6); his or her mind returns to humanity's state of perfection found at the moment of the descent from the ideal world (I, 2, 6). (This motif will be at the base of the doctrine of the "image" of Gregory of Nyssa; see *nous; *Platonism and the Fathers.) The perfect person is absolutely imperturbable; Plotinus makes his own both the ideal of the apatheia characteristic of ancient Stoicism, and the attributes which the ancient Stoics had held to be typical of wise people, spelled out in the fourth tractate of the first Ennead. In adopting the double ethical phase of the metriopatheia-apatheia, Plotinus has a clear precursor in Philo of Alexandria; and since the identical scheme may be found also in Clement, this motif can be considered one of the most salient characteristics of the Alexandrian cultural milieu from which Neoplatonism emerged (for more detail see S. Lilla, op. cit., 103-105, 227-228). There exists, however, an even more advanced state of contemplation of the intelligible: that condition is reached when human intellect arrives at the vision of the source of the intelligible, the One-Good, and, transported by a loving impulse, aspires to "be mingled" with it (I, 6, 7). It is then that the union between human mind and the One is realized, which becomes one reality (VI, 7, 34). And since the One is above mind and does not think (see points 14, 27 and 29 of the doctrine of the One), human intellect too, which is identical with it, sees the end of its noetic activity (VI, 7, 35). This idea of union with the first principle as characterized by the extinguishing of every thought becomes a constant of Neoplatonism, receiving particular emphasis in ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite (see S. Lilla, Augustinianum 22 [1982] 564-565; ch. Dionigi in La mistica, I, Rome 1984, 389-391).

III. Porphyry. A syncretistic line was continued by the greatest disciple of Plotinus: following the example of Ammonius, who had shown the points of agreement between Plato and Aristotle and united their approaches into a single system (see Photius, Bibl., cod. 214, 172a; cod. 251, 461a), Porphyry also wrote a work On the Identity Between the School of Plato and That of Aristotle (n. 20 in the list of Beutler: PWK 22/1, 285). The syncretism of Porphyry was, however, broader than that of Plotinus, since it also included the oracles, above all the Chaldean ones (the fragments of which have been edited by G. Kroll, De oraculis chaldaicis, Vratislaviae 1894, and more recently by E. Des Places, Oracles chaldaïques, Paris 1971), and an interest in the practices of *magic and *theurgy: this is revealed by his youthful works De philosophia ex oraculis haurienda (n. 44 in the list of Beutler: PWK 22/1, 295) and by the Commentary on the Chaldean Oracles, composed probably after the death of Plotinus (nn. 48 and 48a in Beutler: PWK 22/1, 296-297; on these two works and questions surrounding them, see the article of P. Hadot, REAug 6 [1969] 205-247). In fact, it was contact with the Chaldean Oracles that brought about certain changes in the theological and metaphysical vision of Porphyry from his "Plotinian" phase, which was typified by a greater adherence to the thought of his master: these changes regard principally the nature of the first hypostasis and its relations with the following hypostases, and the "triadic" structure of Porphyrian metaphysics. Porphyry establishes the basis of a metaphysical system which may be found, in its principal features, and with certain corrections, in later Neoplatonism, and above all in *Iamblichus and in Proclus.

The History of Philosophy and the Sententiae ad intelligibilia ducentes, probably dating from the "Plotinian" phase, reproduce the general scheme of the three hypostases fixed by Plotinus, as they do certain Plotinian doctrines relating to each. The three hypostases are the good, the demiurge and the anima mundi (Hist. philos. fr. 16 Nauck, Sent. 31). The first hypostasis generates the second in virtue of a process of emanation which does not fall within time (Hist. philos. fr. 18) and which is due to the superabundance of the power of the first principle (Macrobius, Comm. in Somn. Scip. I, 14, 5; cf. Beutler: PWK 22/1, 303 and point 1 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous); analogously, the nous generates the anima mundi (Macrobius, ibid., see point 1 of the Plotinian doctrine of the anima mundi). The first hypostasis is the first and supreme principle of everything (Macrobius, ibid., see point 1 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); it is the One-Good, absolutely simple, self-sufficient, without parts; it is neither the object of names nor of knowledge, and may not be defined by any term, which always remain below it (Hist. philos. fr. 18, see points 18, 2, 8, 20, 30, 31, 33 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); it is above mind and being and is a nonbeing (Sent. 25 [15, 1-2 Lamberz], 26 [15, 9. 12], see points 14, 15, 17 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); it cannot be compared to any other being, and no being is found at its level (Hist. philos. fr. 18, see points 5 and 6 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); it is found everywhere but in no place (Sent. 31, see point 24 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); it can be contemplated only through reaching the absence of every noetic activity superior to thought itself (Sent. 25 [15, 1-2], see what has been said in respect of the motif of the "union" of the One in Plotinus). For its part, the second hypostasis is mind, in that it contemplates the first (Macrobius, ibid., see point 2 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous); it is similar to the first (Macrobius, ibid., see points 3 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous); it is identical to the totality of beings and to their essence (Hist. philos. fr. 18, see points 5, 6, 7 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous); it is also identical to absolute beauty (Hist. philos. fr. 18, see point 8 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous). Prior to becoming acquainted with the teaching of Plotinus, Porphyry, who still held to the positions of his previous master Longinus, had criticized the doctrine of the presence of intelligible ideas in the divine nous, a doctrine maintained by Plotinus in the fifth book of the fifth Ennead, and had written a tract on the subject; only after two refutations of his thesis on the part of Amelius did he change his mind, and he then embraced Plotinus's doctrine, to which he was then always faithful (see Vita Plot. 18, 8-22). In Porphyry too, therefore, we find the Middle Platonic and Plotinian doctrine of ideas contained in the divine mind (see Macrobius, Comm. in Somn. Scip. I, 2, 14).

Although in the "Plotinian" phase, the first hypostasis of Porphyry seems to be identical to the One of Plotinus, the influence of the theology of the Chaldean Oracles leads Porphyry to identify this principle with the "Father" named in these oracles (see, e.g., fr. 3, 7, 22, 79 Des Places) and with the first member (identical to the Father) of the intelligible triad which they praise (see, e.g., fr. 31 Des Places). Reference to this identification made by Porphyry, together with the adoption of positions contrary to it, is made by Proclus (In Parm. 1070, 15 Cousin) (see W. Theiler, Die chaldäischen Orakel und die Hymnen des Synesios, in Forschungen zum Neuplat., Berlin 1966, 260-261, and P. Hadot, La métaphysique de Porphyre, in EntAC XII [1966] 132) and Damascius (Dub. et sol. 43 [I, 86, 8-10 Ruelle], see Hadot, ibid.). From this evidence, we can see distinctly that the first principle of Porphyry does not clearly transcend the intelligible triad, but rather is part of it, even if it is its "Father"; it is thus substantially different both from the Plotinian One and from the first hypostasis, as is seen in the History of Philosophy and the Sententiae. As P. Hadot has shown (op. cit., in EntAC XII, 127-157), the way to a better understanding of the thought of Porphyry in this respect, which also shows an albeit partial connection with the History of Philosophy and the Sententiae, is an anonymous comment on Parmenides attributed by Hadot to Porphyry himself (REG 74 [1961] 410-438), and which he includes in the second volume of his Porphyre et Victorinus (64-112). In this comment, the first principle—identified with the One of the first hypothesis of Parmenides—is, like the One of Plotinus and of Porphyry's History of Philosophy and the Sententiae, the negative One, which is beyond plurality, act, thought, simplicity and the very same One itself (I, 31-35; II, 10, 12; on this last point, see Plato, Parm. 141e), beyond diversity, identity, resemblance, dissimilarity (III, 33-34), approachable only through a process of negatives, which best corresponds to its nature (II, 4-5; II, 15-16; IV, 17-18; VI, 23-28; IX, 27-28; X, 9-11; X, 23-25; XIII, 16-23), superior to all beings and not comparable with them (I, 4-5; I, 18-19; III, 7-8; III, 11; III, 35; IV, 1; IV, 11; IV, 28-30; VI, 20), simple (I, 8), without parts (VI, 17-18), different from the nous (II, 1-3), superior to word and thought and knowable only through ignorance (II, 15-17; IX, 24-26), ineffable and without names (I, 3-5; II, 20; II, 24), superessential (II, 11; XII, 23-24), anterior to essence (X, 25), without essence (XII, 5), outside time (VIII, 8-9), superior and anterior to knowledge and to ignorance (V, 10-11; V, 15; V, 28-30; VI, 10-11), and possessing infinite power, thanks to which it is the cause and principle of everything (I, 25-27; see also Macrobius, Comm. in Somn. Scip. I, 14, 6 about Porphyry, and point 22 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One). On the other hand, notwithstanding its radical difference to all beings, this One is not quite to be identified with the nonbeing One of Sent. 25 and 26 and of Plotinus (see point 17 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); neither is it without the attribute of existence, as is the One of the first hypothesis of Parmenides (see 141e). On the contrary, as J.M. Rist has rightly highlighted (Hermes 92 [1964] 220-225), Porphyry holds that the attribute par excellence of the first One is precisely existence: it is inseparable from the existence with which it is identified (IV, 7-8; XII, 26; XIV, 6-7; XIV, 22-23; XIV, 25-26) and is a real being compared with the beings which follow it (IV, 27-28; to be noted in XIV, 6-7, 22-23, 25-26 the application of the term hyparxis to the first principle; see also Rist, op. cit.). In virtue of its infinite and overflowing power, the first One possesses an activity proper to it, energeia (XIV, 6; XIV, 21-26), which leads it to emanate a second One (XI, 19-23): here we have the One of the second hypostasis of Parmenides, distinct from the first even though it derives from it (XI, 23-28; XI, 33-XII, 4), the One-Being (XI, 30-31; XII, 5-10), unity of all beings (XII, 4), the One which possesses being at a lower level in that it participates in the existence of the first One (XII, 27-29). (There exist, therefore, for Porphyry two planes of existence: that anterior to true and proper being, definable as "the idea of being, " that is of the first One, and then that of the second One, which participates in the first [XII, 29-35].)

The infinite power emanating from the first One and expression of the activity (energeia) of its existence, is life, which is therefore also infinite (XIV, 17-21; XIV, 25-26). The turning of this power—destined to become the second One—toward the original principle, the first One, and the act in which it contemplates that principle in the attempt to return to it

(it sees, in the first principle, itself and an intelligible being, noēton) (XIV, 16-21, 23-25) produce mind (see point 2 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous). Thus a clearly drawn profile of the three members of the highest triad emerges. The first member—the father of the Chaldean Oracles—on the one hand almost completely identical with the negative One of the first hypothesis of Parmenides, but on the other—and in this it diverges from the One of Plotinus and the later Neoplatonists—it is identified with absolute existence (hyparxis), and therefore is being par excellence. The second member—produced by the emanation of the infinite power of the original source—is represented by life. The third member—identical to the patrikos nous of the Chaldean Oracles (see fr. 37, 1; 39, 1 Des Places) and called such also by Porphyry (De regr. an. fr. 8 Bidez) (= Aug., Civ. Dei X, 23)—is mind destined to form, as in Plotinus, the composed unity or the One-Being of the second hypostasis of Parmenides. The characteristics of each member of the triad—the first characterized by simple existence (hyparxis) which remains in itself, the second by the energeia which bursts out from the hyparxis, the third by the turning of the emanation toward its source (XIV, 5-8, 21-26)—clearly suggest the three moments of the monē, the proodos and the epistrophē, which, as we saw, were already present in Plotinus (see point 11 of the doctrine of the One and points 1 and 2 of the doctrine of the nous) and which would become even more marked in later Neoplatonism. Even if conceptually they are distinguishable from each other, the three members of the triad form a superior unity (IV, 3-4; even the first member, in the moment in which it produces the emanation destined to turn toward its source, may be called nous and vita [XIV, 16-21]). We can see then how to this unity the opposing conclusions—negative or positive—of the first two hypotheses of Parmenides may be contemporaneously applied (XIV, 26-34). (Under this aspect Porphyry points forward to the theology of ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite: see Div. Names V, 10: PG 3, 825B; VII, 3: PG 3, 872A.)

It should be remembered that the nature and function of the intermediate member of the triad, life, seem obscure to Augustine, who hesitates to identify it with the anima mundi, which in the Plotinian scheme and also in the History of Philosophy of Porphyry occupies not the second but the third place (Civ. Dei X, 23) (= De regr. an. fr. 8 Bidez); in effect, the Porphyrian "life" is to be identified not with the Plotinian anima mundi but rather with the apeiria, or infinite energy, which for Plotinus emanates from the One. According to John the Lydian (De mens. IV, 122 [159, 5-8 Wuensch]), the summit of Porphyry's metaphysical system has a henadic structure: in other words, acc. to Porphyry, basing himself on his own interpretation of the Chaldean Oracles, it is formed not by One but by three intelligible triads. This means that the inexhaustible power of the first principle does not limit itself to produce the first triad but, by an analogous process, makes a second triad to emerge from the first, and a third from the second. The reconstruction of Hadot (in EntAC XII, 138-140) is more than satisfactory, in which the second and third triads are thought to be composed by members analogous to those of the first, i.e., being, life or power, and intelligence; while in the first triad the dominant character is given by the first member—i.e., being or Father—in the second it is given by the second, life or power, and in the third by the third, intelligence. Being, life and intelligence do not enter only into each triad as constitutive members, but dominate respectively the first, second and third triads (see Hadot, 138). Already clearly delineated in the Porphyrian schema is the hierarchical system of later Neoplatonism, above all that of Iamblichus and Proclus (even if these clearly separate the first principle from the first member of the first triad).

Two other important aspects of Porphyrian metaphysics, which will be taken up above all in the Elements of Theology by Proclus, are expressed in the two following laws: (1) The production (or "generation") of inferior by superior beings (on this idea see Plotinus, Enn. IV, 8, 6) necessarily implies a subdivision or multiplication of the original unity, and also a diminution of its power descending down the scale of beings; the generated being is therefore inferior to that which produces it (see Sent. 11 and 13; W. Theiler, Porph. u. Augustin, in Forschungen zum Neuplat., 174; R. Beutler: PWK 22/1, 305). (2) Each being occupies its place in the scale of beings acc. to its dignity (axia); the ordered disposition (taxis) of the beings depends on their relation of superiority to the inferior beings and of subordination to those superior, and produces a harmony (syntaxis) which is an image of the original unity (see Theiler, ibid., 172, 180-184: PWK 22/1, 305).

For Porphyry too, as for Plotinus, matter is without form, it is veritable nonbeing and an absence of being (Sent. 20, 3; 20, 10); but while, as we have seen, in Enn. IV, 8, 6 Plotinus had considered the origin of matter from the first principle as simply a hypothesis, Porphyry, making his own the positions of Ammonius Saccas and of the Chaldean Oracles (see fr. 34 Des Places and 129, nn. 1-2), makes the hypothesis of his master into certitude: acc. to *Aeneas of Gaza (Theophr. 45, 4-9 [ed.] Colonna), in his Commentary on the Chaldean Oracles and in his exegesis of Enn. I, 8, Porphyry had sustained that matter could be considered "atemporal" (achronos) but not ingenerate, and rejected as impious the Middle Platonic doctrine that held matter to be one of the three principles; this passage of Aeneas of Gaza is echoed by John the Lydian (De mens. IV, 159 [175, 5-9]), where it is affirmed that matter, "atemporal" but not "without principle, " had received its existence by the will of the Father (see Theiler, op. cit., 179-180). Proclus (In Tim. I, 396, 5-7, 21-26; see Theiler, 177), who presents the thought of Porphyry, says that the demiurge "with one single thought" gave reality to the sensible world, without having need of matter and producing everything from itself (the passage of John the Lydian and these two passages of Proclus emphasizing the self-sufficiency of the will and thought of God in creation are close to two parallel passages of Photius, Bibl., cod. 214.172a, 251.461b which reflect the views of Hierocles and of Ammonius Saccas; see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 224). Porphyry shares the Plotinian theory of evil as nonbeing; from Sent. 26 it is clear that this nonbeing is to be contrasted absolutely with the nonbeing of the first principle. The estrangement of humanity from the first principle provokes their separation from real being, and generates in them this "false passion" which is nonbeing, an extreme degradation of being.

Porphyrian ethics does not diverge substantially from those of Plotinus: para. 32 of the Sententiae closely follows what Plotinus had said in the treatise On the Virtues (Enn. I, 2). LIke Plotinus, Porphyry distinguishes the preliminary ethical stage of the metriopatheia, realized through the political virtues, from apatheia, identified with the homoiōsis theō and realized altogether by the third class of human virtues, the theoretical virtues (Sent. 32: 25, 6-9; 28, 3-4). The only difference in comparison with Plotinus consists in the fact that while Plotinus (Enn. I, 2, 6 [57, 14-17]) had simply spoken of the presence in the divine nous of the "paradigms" of the highest human virtues—these are "paradigms" superior to any virtue and not in fact definable as "virtues"—Porphyry (Sent. 32 [28, 6–29, 7]) calls these models "paradigmatic virtues, " thus postulating the existence of a fourth and highest class of virtues, those present in the divine nous. For Porphyry too, the separation of the soul from the body, or "catharsis, " is the indispensable premise for the contemplation of the intelligible and for the return of human intellect to God; he insists on this point not only in Sent. 32, where, as with Plotinus, he considers the cathartic virtues the second class of virtues, but also in the lost work De regressu animae (see, e.g., fr. 11, 2; 11, 5 Bidez) and in the work De abstinentia. In De regressu animae (see esp. fr. 2 Bidez = Aug., Civ. Dei X, 9), along with a firm censure of the lower magical practices, one may observe a partial reevaluation of theurgy, for which Porphyry certainly does not show the admiration found in his youthful work De philosophia ex oraculis haurienda (see E. Des Places, Oracles chaldaïques, Paris 1971, 18-19; 23-24): theurgy may be useful to the purification of the inferior (or "spiritual") part of the human soul, with which sensible objects are perceived, but has no effect on its intellectual part, the conversion of which to God is accomplished without it.

Finally, it should be noted that, for Porphyry too, the highest knowledge of the supreme principle presupposes the cessation—which is superior to thought—of every noetic activity (anoēsia) (Sent. 25 [15, 2]). To this anoēsia is combined absolute ignorance (agnōsia) of the first unknowable principle (Comm. in Parm. IX, 24-26). This complete identity between ignorance and knowledge of God foreshadows the analogous formulations of ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite (see S. Lilla, Augustinianum 22 [1982] 563-564; Dionigi, in La mistica, I, Rome 1984, 381-386). On the determinant influence of Porphyry on authors such as *Ambrose of Milan, *Marius Victorinus and Augustine, see *Platonism and the Fathers.

IV. Neoplatonism of the 4th c.: Iamblichus and Julian the Apostate. In Iamblichus—who may be considered the author of the final phase of Neoplatonism, since in his system that of Proclus is largely anticipated—the syncretistic tendency, which was notable already in Porphyry, undergoes a further development: from a philosophical point of view, it embraces Aristotelianism and the Neo-Pythagorean tradition of the 1st and 2nd c. AD (one of Iamblichus's more important works in ten volumes—of which five remain under various titles: On the Pythagorean Life, Exhortation to Philosophy, On the General Science of Mathematics, The Nicomachean Arithmetic, Theological Principles of Arithmetic—are called Collection of Pythagorean Doctrines; see W. Kroll: PWK 9/1, 646-647); from a religious point of view, in the Chaldean Oracles and theurgy, Iamblichus offers a reevaluation of Porphyry (see Dalsgaard Larsen, in EntAC XXI (1975) 1-4; E. Des Places, ibid., 69-94; J.M. Dillon, Iamblichi Chalcidensis in Platonis dialogos commentariorum fragmenta, Leiden 1973, 26-29). Iamblichus also inaugurates the systematic exegesis of Platonic dialogues, which became characteristic of later Neoplatonism: they were interpreted from ethical, physical, mathematical and metaphysical standpoints (see esp. K. Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Gesch. der Philos, I, Berlin 1926, 615-616). J. Dillon (op. cit., 27) has observed in this respect: "Plato is made to agree not only with Aristotle and Pythagoras but also with *Homer, Hesiod, Orpheus and the Chaldean oracles. . . . Each dialogue, in its entirety, is imbued with a higher significance. . . . To each dialogue a purpose is assigned, to which even the introductory and apparently accessory parts must be conformed."

Although he inherited from Porphyry both the triadic scheme and the components of each triad (being, life, intelligence), Iamblichus does not hesitate to repeatedly take positions contrary to his predecessor, whom he accuses of not being sufficiently "Platonic" or "Plotinian" (see, e.g., Comm. in Tim. fr. 16, 34, 70 Dillon, and Dillon, Iamblichi Chalcidensis, 28). In fact, one great difference is instantly apparent: while Porphyry had identified the first principle with the first member of the intelligible triad and with the "Father" of the Chaldean Oracles, Iamblichus places above the first intelligible triad (1) the two principles destined to make up both the first and following triads, i.e., the peras and the apeiria (see Plato, Philebus 23c, 24a); (2) the One anterior to these two principles, which is simple, not coordinated with the first triad, identical to the monad, anterior to the essence (proousios), father of the essence (ousiopatōr), principle of the intelligible (noētarchēs), preexistent being (proontōs ōn), good, first god and first king: this One occupies an intermediate position between the peras and the apeiria, on the one hand, and the first absolute principle, on the other; (3) the first absolute principle (prōtistos), completely ineffable, anterior to the first god and the first king, immobile, solitary, free from any contact with the intelligible, model (paradeigma) of the first god, which is born from it thanks to a process of irradiation (see above all De myst. VIII, 2; Damascius, Dub. et sol. 43, 50, 51, and the schema in Dillon, op. cit., 32). Even if the second One of Iamblichus (see 2 above) is not coordinated with the first triad (see Damascius, Dub. et sol. 43), while the first principle of Porphyry is an integral part of the first intelligible triad, these two principles nevertheless show some close similarities: both, in fact, are "anterior to the essence, " "principle of the essence, " "father, " "preexistent being, " "principle of the intelligible" (see De Myst. VIII, 2; Porphyry, Comm. in Parm. IV, 27-28; X, 24-25; XII, 26-27; XII, 29-30; and Damascius, Dub. et sol. 43). Given Iamblichus's openness to the Neo-Pythagoreanism of the 2nd c. AD, we should not be surprised if his second One has a strong affinity with the first god of Numenius, defined as "good," anterior to the ousia, its cause, its principle and absolute being (see fr. 16 and 17 Des Places).

From the conjunction between the peras and the apeiria the One-Being originates (see Dillon, 32), the third member of the first intelligible triad, formed by the peras, the apeiria, and by the One-Being (hen ōn) which characterizes it. This One-Being or Absolute Being is identified by Iamblichus with the Eternal Being (to ōn aei) of Plato's Tim. 27d, with the One of the second hypostasis of Parmenides (142b), with the One-Being (hen ōn) mentioned several times in the Sophist 244d, 245 a-e (In Tim. fr. 29 Dillon, 132), with eternity (aiōn) (In Tim. fr. 64) and with the model (paradeigma) of Tim. 28a (In Tim. fr. 35; cf. Dillon, 33-36). Since Plato (Sophist 248e) strictly associates absolute being with life and intelligence (see also Dillon, 36), this absolute being is also identical to life and to intelligence in their highest form; intelligence in this context is the katharos or patrikos nous which contains in itself the "monads" of the forms at an undifferentiated stage and which is characterized by symmetry, truth and beauty, but above all symmetry (In Phil. fr. 4 and 7; Proclus, Theol. plat. III, 13; cf. Dillon, 37, 260, 262-263). The third member of the first intelligible triad of Iamblichus corresponds fully to the third member of the first intelligible triad of Porphyry, represented itself by the patrikos nous and by One-Being (see above), and also reflects the Plotinian doctrine of the presence of being, life and intelligence in the second hypostasis.

We learn from Proclus (In Tim. I, 308, 20-21 and Theol. plat. III, 13) that Iamblichus, as had Porphyry, supposed the existence of two further intelligible triads after the first: in the latter passage Proclus traces to Iamblichus the doctrine of the three mixed beings—the three intelligible triads—characterized respectively by symmetry, truth and beauty. As before in Porphyry, and as later for Proclus, for Iamblichus the second intelligible triad was characterized most of all by life (noētē zōē), identical to the zōon of Tim. 37d, 39e, the third by intelligence (noētos nous); this latter intelligence—which should not be confused with the katharos or patrikos nous of the first triad, identical to being (see In Phil. fr. 7)—produces the forms true and proper (In Phil. fr. 4; cf. Dillon, 37 and 260). But Iamblichus goes beyond Porphyry, anticipating the scheme of Proclus: from this last intelligible triad originate three triads of "intelligible and intelligent" beings (Proclus, In Tim. I, 380, 21 = fr. 230 Dalsgaard Larsen; Festugière in his translation rightly integrates noēton tē kai before noeron; cf. Dalsgaard Larsen, in EntAC XXI, 16, and also Dillon, 308, n. 1); from the last triad of "intelligible and intelligent" beings a series of seven intelligent beings originates (noera hebdomas), corresponding in all probability to those of the Chaldean Oracles (see Dillon, 308-309, and the list in Dalsgaard Larsen, in EntAC XXI, 17) and in which the demiurge of Timaeus occupies the third place (Proclus, In Tim. 1, 308, 22-23 = fr. 230 Dalsgaard Larsen). The affirmation of Proclus (In Tim. 1, 307, 17-18 = In Tim. fr. 34 Dillon), therefore, is not strictly correct, acc. to which Iamblichus had identified the demiurge with the entire intelligible universe, placed, as has been seen, above intelligent beings; in any case, the demiurge of Iamblichus, to make the sensible world, "welcomes into himself" and controls the intelligible models present in the noēton (Proclus In Tim. I, 307, 20-25 = In Tim. fr. 34 Dillon; see also Dillon, p. 38): thus Iamblichus must have interpreted the passage of Tim. 39e about the contemplation of ideas on the part of the demiurgic nous.

In the system of Iamblichus, then, the idea again emerges at various levels of the doctrine of the presence of the ideas or models in the divine mind, an idea formulated by the ancient Academy and taken up by Antiochus of Ascalon, Philo, Middle Platonism, Plotinus and Porphyry. Descending further down the scale, acc. to Iamblichus it is necessary to distinguish the nonparticipatory or separate intellect from the intellect that is the object for participation in the hypercosmic soul and the anima mundi and which is inseparable from them (In Tim. fr. 56; see Dillon, p. 39); and the hypercosmic soul, transcendent, absolute, nonparticipatory and monadic—with which the Porphyry of the post-Plotinian phase had identified the demiurge (see Proclus, In Tim. I, 306, 32-307, 2) and to which the soul mentioned in Tim. 34b refers (In Tim. fr. 50, 19-27)—from the anima mundi true and proper, object of participation within the sensible world (In Tim. fr. 54, 9-10). Both the anima mundi and individual souls are produced by the hypercosmic soul (ibid.; see Dillon, 39). In Iamblichus, as in Porphyry and Plotinus, the law of the three moments is to be found—i.e., the monē, the proodos and the epistrophē—as is clear from Proclus (In Tim. II, 215, 5-15 = text 252 Dalsgaard Larsen, In Tim. fr. 53 Dillon; see also Dalsgaard Larsen, in EntAC XXI, 19). In this passage, containing an allegorical interpretation of the first four numbers, the monē is related to the number one, the proodos to two, the epistrophē to three; moreover, we may observe here the close association between henōsis and tautotēs, on the one hand (identical to the monē), and between proodos and diakrisis (= multiplication), on the other, which will be characteristic of Proclus and of ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite.

Like Plotinus, Iamblichus makes his own the Posidonian idea of "sympathy" and "communion" between the various parts and elements of the sensible universe, as shown by De myst. I, 5, 17. As in Porphyry before him and later in Proclus, he holds the origin of matter to be from the superior principle (see Proclus, In Tim. I, 386, 10-16). The principal characteristic of matter is otherness, traceable to the dyad (apeiria) which is found after the second One (In Tim. fr. 7; see Dillon, 47-48).

In Iamblichus too we find the Plotinian and Porphyrian scheme of the various classes of virtues (political, cathartic, theoretical, paradigmatic), as testified by Ammonius (In Categ. 135, 12-32). To these virtues Iamblichus adds the "hieratic virtues, " also called "unitary" in that they realize the union with the first principle (see Olympiodorus, In Phaed. II, 138 ff; Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Gesch. der Philos., I, 617).

Strictly dependent on Iamblichus (see on this point R.E. Witt, Iamblichus as a Forerunner of Julian, in EntAC XXI, 35-63) is Julian the Apostate. In his Oration upon the Sovereign Sun (ed. Ch. Lacombrade, L'empereur Julien, II, 2, Paris 1964) in which he makes substantial use of a writing of Iamblichus now lost (see W. Kroll: PWK 9/1, 646), he adopts the distinction, characteristic of Iamblichus, between "intelligible" (noēton) and "intelligent" (noeron): above the sensible sun (the third sun), there is the sun of the intelligent beings (the second sun) and the sun of the intelligible world (the first sun). While the first sun is the principle and cause of everything, above and beyond mind, and practically identified with the One-Good of Plotinus (In Reg. sol. II, 2), the second sun (noeros) is born from the first, receives from it its knowledge and acts as an intermediary between the intelligible and sensible worlds. This work of Julian constitutes an attempt to reconcile Neoplatonism with solar religion, popular particularly in the 3rd and 4th c. AD.

V. The school of Athens and the exegesis of the Parmenides. We have already had cause to note (1) that the correspondence established by Plotinus in Enn. V, 1, 8 (26, 23-27) between his three hypostases and the first three hypostases of Plato's Parmenides presupposes the theological and metaphysical interpretation of Parmenides given in Neo-Pythagoreanism, esp. by the Neo-Pythagorean Moderatus; and (2) that the teaching of Porphyry must be traced back to a Commentary on Parmenides which explains the agreement between the post-Plotinian phase of Porphyrian metaphysics and the theology of the Chaldean Oracles (see above). In later Neoplatonism too, the Parmenides continued to be an object of exegesis: in the eyes of the Neoplatonists, it was a dialogue in which what they regarded as the true Platonic philosophy was set out, based on the hierarchical system of different beings which, from the One superessential and absolutely transcendent One, arrived finally at matter. As H.D. Saffrey and L.G. Westerink have shown in the preface to the first volume of their edition of Platonic Philosophy (Proclus. Théologie platonicienne, I, Paris 1968; cf. esp. LXXV–LXXXIX), Proclus, in the sixth book of his Commentary on Parmenides (1051, 34–1064, 12 Cousin), gives a detailed review of the interpretations of Parmenides given in Neoplatonism after Plotinus: he expounds, criticizing them, the interpretations of Amelius and Porphyry (the mutilated text edited by Hadot represents only the beginning of the commentary on the latter), that of Iamblichus and that of the "philosopher of Rhodes, " not further identified; and arrives finally at his two immediate predecessors in the school of Athens, Plutarch of Athens and Syrianus. It is not possible to proceed here with a detailed examination of the interpretations of Amelius, Porphyry, Iamblichus and the "philosopher of Rhodes" and of Proclus's critique of them, which in any case has been done by Saffrey and Westerink; here we limit ourselves to observing that the interpretations of Plutarch of Athens (see Proclus, In Parm. 1058, 21–1061, 20) and of Syrianus in large measure coincide: acc. to Proclus, Plutarch of Athens had identified the first hypostasis of Parmenides with the first principle, the second with mind, the third with the soul, the fourth with the forms united to matter, and the fifth with matter; Syrianus, for his part, had made the first hypostasis to correspond with the absolutely transcendent One, the second with all the classes of the gods (intelligible, intelligible-intelligent, intelligent, hypercosmic, encosmic), the third with the souls deriving from the divine soul, the fourth with the forms united to matter, and the fifth with matter. Again acc. to Proclus, the interpretation of Syrianus, while not substantially different from that of Plutarch of Athens, shows progress in respect to it, in that it includes in the second hypostases all the hierarchies of the gods, introduces in the second hypostasis the concept of henads, and limits the third hypostasis to the souls which participate in the divine soul (see Saffrey-Westerink, op. cit., LXXXIV–LXXXVIII).

Syrianus's interpretation of Parmenides coincides with that of Proclus, and is thus fundamental in understanding the whole Proclean system.

VI. Proclus and Damascius. Proclus, as in the case of his master Syrianus, makes the first hypostasis of the Parmenides correspond to the absolutely transcendent One, the second to all the classes of beings (or gods) including the lower ones, the third to particular souls, the fourth to the forms united to matter and the fifth to matter (see Theol. plat. I, 12). In the Proclean system, the process of "hierarchization" of beings is pushed to the limit. The relationships between the varied classes of beings arranged acc. to this rigid hierarchical criterion appear regulated by laws which, derived in large part from earlier Neoplatonism, receive their systematic codification in the Elements of Theology. Another work of importance, the Theology of Plato, of which six books remain, represents the summa of the whole Proclean system, setting out to be a detailed study both of the first principle and of the successive classes of gods. In the commentaries on the Platonic dialogues (On the Parmenides, On the Republic, On the Timaeus, On the Cratylus), Proclus, acc. to the example of Iamblichus and of his masters in the school of Athens, interprets Plato acc. to his own philosophical scheme; he aims at demonstrating that already in Plato's philosophy his own system is prefigured (see, e.g., Theol. plat. I, 2, 9, 16-18 Saffrey-Westerink). Here we can consider briefly the following points: (1) the most important laws that regulate Proclus's hierarchical model; (2) the first principle; (3) the henads; (4) the various classes of beings or gods; (5) the origin of matter and the characteristics of the universe; (6) the nature of evil; (7) ethics and union with the supreme principle.

1. Of the laws which regulate the relations between the different classes of beings, arranged hierarchically, the most important are the following: (a) the three moments of the monē, proodos and epistrophē (El. Theol. 29-35): this is a law already present in Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus and Syrianus (In met. 127, 9-10); (b) the likeness of the being produced to the producing principle (El. theol. 28.29.32; cf. Syrianus, In Met. 106, 26-29); (c) the inferiority of the produced being in respect of the producing principle (El. theol. 28.36); (d) the unchangeableness of the producing principle notwithstanding the production of the inferior being (El. theol. 27: see points 11 and 12 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); (e) the production due to the superabundance and overflowing of the power of the producing principle (El. theol. 27: see point 1 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous); (f) the strict connection between the production of the inferior beings and the division (or multiplication) of the unity and the power of the superior being (El. theol. 27.35.64.95: see above, with respect to Porphyry); (g) the greater or lesser participation of the being in perfection and in the original unity acc. to the higher or lower point which it occupies in the hierarchical scale (El. theol. 36.62.86: cf. Plotinus I, 2, 2); (h) the strict connection between the place occupied by a being in a hierarchical scale, its dignity (axia) and its aptitude to receive illumination from the superior being (El. theol. 122.142: see above, with respect to Porphyry); (i) the presence in the superior beings of all the properties of the inferior beings, and the absence in the inferior beings of some of the properties of the superior beings (El. theol. 18.97.150: cf. Plotinus I, 2, 7); (j) the relation of the superior to the inferior beings, constituted by "transmission" (metadosis) (El. theol. 18), and that of the inferior to the superior, constituted by "participation" (methexis, metochē, metousia) and "conversion" (epistrophē) (El. theol. 1.2.3.12.148); (k) the function of the central member of a series, which extends to both the superior and inferior members, joining them together (El. theol. 148). Some of these "laws" are adopted in the Celestial Hierarchy of ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite (see S. Lilla, Augustianum 22 [1982] 554-557).

2. Different from Iamblichus, who had put two "ones" above the absolute being or One-Being, Proclus, like Theodorus of Asine, Plutarch of Athens and Syrianus, returns to the Plotinian conception of the single "One, " superior to being, to the intelligible and intelligent, and identical to the negative One of the first hypostasis of the Parmenides. The points which characterize the Proclean conception of the first principle are the following: (a) The many participate in some way in the transcendent One (Theol. plat. II, 1; El. theol. 1); (b) the One transcends the many (Theol. plat. II, 1; El. theol. 5); (c) the One is cause of the many (Theol. plat. II, 2); (d) the One is unique (Theol. plat. II, 2); (e) the One is above being (Theol. plat. II, 2); (f) the One is a nonbeing (Theol. plat. II, 2; II, 5) (see point 17 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); (g) the One is the cause of everything that exists (Theol. plat. II, 3); (h) the One is above mind (Theol. plat. II, 4; El. theol. 20); (i) the One is identical to absolute good (Theol. plat. II, 6; El. theol. 20); (j) although identified with absolute good, the One is superior to the idea of the good (Theol. plat. II, 7); (k) the One is above knowledge and word, i.e., absolutely unknown and without names (Theol. plat. II, 7); (l) the One generates all the divine orders (Theol. plat. II, 7); (m) the One is the source of goodness which fills the whole universe with itself (Theol. plat. II, 7); (n) the unity of the One is fecund, but its generative activity implies neither division, nor movements, nor multiplications (Theol. plat. II, 7) (see point 11 of the Plotinian doctrine of the One); (o) the One is desired by all beings (El. theol. 12); (p) the via negativa, characteristic of the first hypostasis of Parmenides, is that which is most fitting for the One (Theol. plat. II, 10).

3. As Saffrey and Westerink have shown in the introduction to the first volume of their edition of the Theology of Plato (LXIII), the Proclean system, from the One to the lower divinities, is composed of nine classes of divinity, which are treated in the various books of the Theology of Plato in the following order: (a) the One (book II); (b) the henads (book III); (c) the intelligible gods (book III); (d) the intelligible-intelligent gods (book IV); (e) the intelligent gods (book V); (f) the hypercosmic gods (book VI); (g) the encosmic gods; (h) the universal souls; (i) the angels, demons and heroes (classes 7-9 of gods were treated in the books of the Theology of Plato subsequent to the sixth, which have been lost).

The absolutely transcendent One, most important, produces a multitude of henads, similar although not identical to it (Theol. plat. III, 2-3). Of these henads, we should note (a) their generation occurs in a way which is appropriate to the One, i.e., in a unitary way (Theol. plat. III, 3); (b) the henads, as in the case of the One, are superessential, i.e., superior to all other beings (Theol. plat. III, 3); (c) different from the One, the henads are objects of the participation of the inferior beings (Theol. plat. III, 4); (d) the henads function as intermediaries between the One and the beings, linking these latter to the One and making them turn to each other and toward the One (Theol. plat. III, 3; III, 4); (e) the henads are ordered hierarchically: those nearer to the One are participated in by the higher beings, those further from the One by those beings of lower rank (Theol. plat. III, 5).

4. Proclus inherits from Iamblichus the division of beings or gods into the three great classes of gods, the intelligible (noētoi), the intelligible-intelligent (noētoi tē kai noeroi) and the intelligent (noeroi); the triadic scheme which is found in the two classes of the intelligible and the intelligible-intelligent gods and which is characterized by the presence, at different levels, of being, life and intelligence; the modality of the generation of the various classes. (The highest class originates from the One, while each of the following classes is originated from the immediately superior class.) From this point of view Iamblichus may be considered the most important influence on Proclus, who in his writings frequently calls him "divine."

For Proclus, as for Porphyry and Iamblichus, being, life and intelligence form three descending grades (El. theol. 101; Theol. plat. III, 6; IV, 1); and while being characterizes the class of the intelligible gods, life characterizes that of the intelligible-intelligent gods and intelligence that of the intelligent gods (Theol. plat. IV, 1; IV, 3). As before in Iamblichus, so too in Proclus the triad being-life-intelligence is not, however, limited to determining the difference between these three great classes of gods, but is found within the class of the intelligible gods and that of the intelligible-intelligent gods, in that it characterizes the three triads which make up each of these two classes.

Proclus, like Iamblichus, postulates the existence of two constitutive principles of the various triads, of which Plato had spoken in the Philebus, i.e., the prōton peras (or second One, derived directly from the first principle) and the prōtē apeiria which is its infinite generative power, which occupies an intermediate position between the prōton peras and the absolute being, and which propagates itself, producing the other beings in virtue of a process of multiplication (Theol. plat. III, 8; El. theol. 89.90). While the prōton peras corresponds to the monē, the prōtē apeiria expresses the moment of the divine proodos (Theol. plat. III, 8). The peras and the apeiria, combining themselves together, generate a product which, itself participating in both, is mixed, mikton (see Philebus 27b): this is the being absolute in excellence (autoon), which together with its two constitutive elements, the peras and the apeiron, forms the first and highest triad of the intelligible gods, thus distinct from being. As it participates in the peras, this absolute being is a unity (hen ōn); as it participates in the apeiria, it contains in itself, in a hidden and indistinct way, the multiplicity of beings destined to assume an even clearer and sharper profile in the following classes (Theol. plat. III, 9). The peras and the apeiron also produce the two following triads: the second triad of the intelligible gods is formed by the peras, the apeiron and the intelligible intelligence (Theol. plat. III, 12; III, 14); the second and the third triads, also deriving from the peras-apeiron combination, proceed respectively from the first and second triads (Theol. plat. III, 12; III, 13). With respect to the three intelligible triads it should be noted that (a) the first triad is distinguished by the peras, the second by the apeiria and the third by the mixture (Theol. plat. III, 13); (b) the first triad reflects the moment of the monē, the second that of the proodos and the third that of the epistrophē (Theol. plat. III, 14); (c) the third triad participates chiefly in symmetry, the second in truth and the third in beauty (Theol. plat. III, 13); (d) proceeding from the first to the third intelligible triad One witnesses a progressive process of unfolding and revelation of beings (Theol. plat. III, 13; III, 14).

From the class of intelligible gods originates the second great class, that of the intelligible-intelligent gods, which fall within the stratum of life (Theol. plat. IV, 1; IV, 3), as the class of intelligible gods fall within the stratum of intelligence. Their main characteristics are the following: (a) the intelligible-intelligent gods act as an intermediate link and as a point of union between the superior class (the intelligible gods) and the inferior class (the intelligent gods) (Theol. plat. IV, 1; IV, 2; IV, 3); (b) in them there is a progressive multiplication and revelation of the dynameis which in the superior class still appear united (Theol. plat. IV, 1; IV, 2; IV, 3); (c) as in the case of the intelligible gods, these are divided into three triads, each of which is formed by being, life and intelligence. In the superior triads the intelligible component dominates, in the intermediate there is an equilibrium between the intellible and intelligent elements, and in the third it is the intelligent element which dominates (Theol. plat. IV, 3).

Classes 5-7 of divinities (the intelligent gods, the hypercosmic gods and the encosmic gods) are based on allegorical interpretations of certain divinities of Greek mythology and of the Chaldean Oracles of which Proclus, like Iamblichus, was a great admirer: a detailed examination of them, which cannot be undertaken here, may be found in the introduction of Saffrey and Westerink (Proclus. Théologie platonicienne, I, LXVI–LXXV). In his treatment of these inferior classes, Iamblichus must have been the principal source for Proclus (for certain doctrines of Iamblichus taken over by Proclus, see J.M. Dillon, Iamblichi Chalcidensis in Platonis dialogos commentariorum fragmenta, Leiden 1973, 52-53).

5. Like Porphyry and Iamblichus, Proclus holds that matter originates from the divine principle: carrying to its extreme consequences the Plotinian identification between apeiria and intelligible material (see points 10 and 11 of the Plotinian doctrine of the nous), Proclus identifies sensible material with the apeiria of the sensible world deriving from the prōtē apeiria (In Tim. I, 385, 7-8). The supreme god, as it is the cause of the apeiria, also originates matter which is its extreme degradation (In Tim. I, 384, 30-385, 2); and as it generates all beings, so also it generates matter (In Tim. II, 102, 6-11). The demiurge, which occupies a rather low rank in the scale of the gods, since it belongs to the class of the intelligent gods (In Tim. I, 394, 8-9), does not himself produce matter, but finds it already formed by the superior principle and is limited to imposing order upon it (In Tim. I, 300, 6-8; I, 384, 16-24). The imposition of order on matter by the demiurge occurs, however, ab aeterno, since the demiurge is by nature good, and there has never been a moment in which it has not manifested his goodness (In Tim. I, 394, 23-25); the "evil and disordered" movement of corporeal nature (see In Tim. 30a) is therefore not real or anterior to the intervention of the demiurge, and even less due to the existence of an evil anima mundi, as Plutarch of Chaeronea had supposed (In Tim. I, 394, 9-11), but solely hypothetical: this would have occurred only if the demiurge had not intervened (In Tim. I, 394, 27-31). Also in Proclus, as in Plotinus and in Iamblichus, the Posidonian doctrine recurs of the close communion of the beings among themselves (El. theol. 148 [130, 10-11]).

6. Proclus inherits from Plotinus the doctrine of evil as absence of good, which he considers at length in the writing De malorum subsistentia, found in the Latin translation of William of Mörbeka, archbishop of Corinth in 1280 (ed. H. Boese, Procli Diadochi opuscula De providentia, libertate, malo, Berlin 1960). There are four points which distinguish the Proclean theory of evil: (a) absolute evil cannot be numbered among the beings, since all beings, by their nature, aspire to the good (ch. 2, 24-7, 29-32); (b) while absolute evil cannot exist, relative evil must—in order to exist—participate in some way in the good, as with every being (ch. 9, 5-18); (c) evil can be considered only as a relative and not a total absence of good (ch. 10, 12-13); (d) evil is not found in matter (ch. 32, 1-4; 35, 12-14): on this last point Proclus differs markedly from Plotinus (see above). On the use of this work of Proclus by ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite in ch. IV of the Divine Names, see S. Lilla, Augustinianum 22 (1982) 557-558, and the bibl. to be found there.

7. In his Life of Proclus, Marinus paints an idealized portrait not only of Proclus the teacher but also of his way of life; in the description of him in chs. 21-26 we find a confluence of motifs: Platonic (above all from the Phaedo and the Phaedrus), Plotinian, Porphyrian and Iamblichan. In ch. 21 we find the idea of the total separation of the soul from the body and of its retirement into itself, already formulated in the Phaedo, then taken up by Plotinus in the treatise On the Virtues and by Porphyry, above all in the De regressu animae; in ch. 21, following Plotinus and Porphyry, the difference is highlighted between metriopatheia and apatheia, identified with the absolute independence of the soul from the body and with the "cathartic virtues." Ch. 22 celebrates the progress of the master beyond the cathartic virtues to the vision of the ideas—the description of which, through Plotinus and Porphyry, may be traced ultimately to the Phaedrus—and to the attainment of the "paradigmatic virtues" present in the divine nous (this last is a Porphyrian motif). Ch. 25, following Plotinus and Porphyry, underlines the differences between the inferior life of the "good man" realized through the political virtues and the superior One of the gods attained by Proclus, and the identity between apatheia and homoiōsis theō. Ch. 26 names Iamblichus explicitly in celebrating the ascent of Proclus to the highest class of virtues, those which Iamblichus had called "theurgic." Most probably it is the "hieratic" virtues that are in view (see above, with reference to Iamblichus).

Proclus, like Plotinus, holds to an idea of union with the supreme principle, a union characterized by the cessation and surmounting of every noetic activity (see, e.g., Exc. chald. IV; Theol. plat. I, 3; I, 25: this last passage is considered by ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite in Div. Names I, 1: PG 3, 585B-592A; see S. Lilla, Augustinianum 22 [1982] 565 n. 189).

Of *Damascius, pupil of Proclus and the final scholarch of the school of Athens when *Justinian decreed its closure (529), the following works have come down to us: Dubitationes et solutiones de primis principiis, Dubitationes et solutiones in Platonis Parmenidem (corrupted at the beginning and edited together with the former by C.E. Ruelle, Paris 1889; new edition of the two works: Damascius, Traité des premiers principes. Crit. text L.G. Westerink, tr. J. Combès, I. Paris 1986, II. Paris 1989, III. Paris 1991 [Les belles Lettres]; Damascius, Commentaire du Parménide de Platon. Crit. text, L.G. Westerink, intro. tr. and notes, J. Combès - A.Ph. Segonds, I. Paris 1997, II. Paris 1997, III. Paris 2002, IV. J. Combès - C. Luna, Paris 2002 [Les belles Lettres]), the Lectures on the Philebus, ed. L.G. Westerink, Amsterdam 1959; and the Life of Isidore (Vitae Isidori reliquiae, ed. C. Zinten, Hildesheim 1967).

The work of Damascius is characterized by a minute examination of the numerous questions which emerge from Neoplatonic thought and from the interpretation of the Parmenides and the Philebus; all the possible implications and conclusions are meticulously discussed. In general, Damascius tends to exclude every possible relationship between the beings and the highest apex of the metaphysical system, for whom strictly speaking the term principle is inappropriate, which in a series always presupposes a relationship between the first and the following terms. He therefore accepts the Iamblichan theory which postulates a "something" above the One: this "something" is that which can be called "ineffable, " expressing the most absolute negativity which excludes from it even those properties which earlier Neoplatonism had usually assigned to the One (for references see S. Lilla, Helikon 31-32 [1991-1992] 3-33). Immediately below this "ineffable" there is the One, corresponding in substance to the One of Plotinus and of Proclus and to the second One of Iamblichus; compared to earlier Neoplatonism, Damascius accentuates its property of containing all within its own unity, albeit in a yet indistinct state (see Lilla, op. cit., 34, n. 975). Below this One (or One-All) there is the multiplicity (or All-One) represented by the infinite power emanating from the same One and corresponding to the "paternal power" of the Chaldean Oracles (see the references and the discussion in Lilla, op. cit., 46-47, n. 1055 and p. 53). While the One (or the One-All) has as its symbol the limit (peras), the multiplicity (or the All-One) has as its symbol the infinite (apeiron, apeiria, see Lilla, op. cit., 56). From the combination of the One-All and the All-One the One-Being takes its origin (hen ōn), otherwise called the "unified being" (henomenon, see Lilla, op. cit. 47, n. 1055). The One-All, the All-One and the One-Being (or "unified being") together form a triad characterized by a substantial unity; but in reality these three principles can be called neither monads nor triads, which are only concepts on which the weak mind rests (see Lilla, Denys l'Aréopagite, Porphyre et Damascius, cited infra in bibl.). There is a close correspondence between the theological and mystical doctrines of Damascius and those of ps.-Dionysius (see Lilla, Denys l'Aréopagite . . . , op. cit. in bibl.).

VII. Neoplatonism in the Latin West. Thorough research on the influence of Neoplatonism in Western Latin culture has been the work above all of P. Henry and P. Courcelle (see bibl.): while the first has shown the presence of Neoplatonic motifs in *Firmicus Maternus (25-43), Macrobius (146-192), Servius, Ammianus Marcellinus and *Sidonius Apollinaris (192-202), the second has focused on Macrobius (16-34), Martianus Capella (198-205), *Claudianus Mamertus (223-235) and Sidonius Apollinaris (235-246). On the question of the dependence on Neoplatonism of various patristic writers of the Latin language, such as *Hilary of Poitiers, *Marius Victorinus, St. Ambrose of Milan, St. Augustine of Hippo and *Boethius, see *Platonism and the Fathers, with its bibl. On Calcidius, the studies of J.C.M. Winden and J.H. Waszink are still important today (see bibl.).

Studies: I. Prehistory and history of Neoplatonism: E.R. Dodds, The Parmenides of Plato and the Origin of the Neoplatonic One: CQ 22 (1928) 129-142; W. Theiler, Die Vorbereitung des Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1930; C.J. De Vogel, À la recherche des étapes précises entre Platon et le Néoplatonisme: Mnemosyne, ser. IV, 7 (1957) 111-122; Ph. Merlan, From Platonism to Neoplatonism, The Hague 1960; Id., Greek Philosophy from Plato to Plotinus, in The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 14-132; H.J. Krämer, Der Ursprung der Geistmetaphysik, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Neuplatonismus zwischen Platon und Plotin, Amsterdam 1964; J. Trouillard, Le Néoplatonisme, in Histoire de la philosophie I (various authors) [Encyclopédie de la Pléiade] Paris 1969; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 16-36.

II. On Plotinus and his sources: H.R. Schwyzer: PWK 21/1, 471-592; W.R. Inge, The Philosophy of Plotinus, London-New York 1918; R.E. Witt, The Plotinian Logos and Its Stoic Basis: CQ 25 (1931) 103-111; Id., Plotinus and Posidonius: CQ 24 (1930) 198-207; E. Bréhier, Le Parménide de Platon et la Théologie négative de Plotin: Sophia 6 (1938) 33-38; P. Henry, Les états du texte de Plotin, Paris 1938; Id., Les manuscrits des Ennéades, Paris 1941; A.H. Armstrong, The Architecture of the Intelligible Universe in the Philosophy of Plotinus, Cambridge 1940 (repr. Amsterdam 1967); Id., Plotinus, in The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 195-268; Id., Plotinian and Christian Studies, London 1979 (repr. of various important previously published articles); W. Theiler, Plotinus und die antike Philosophie: MH (1944) 209-225 (repr. in Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 140-159); Id., Plotin zwischen Platon und Stoa, in Les sources de Plotin, EntAC V (1960) 65-86 (repr. in Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, 124-139); J. Trouillard, La procession plotinienne, Paris 1955; Id., La purification plotinienne, Paris 1955; L. Sweeney, Infinity in Plotinus: Gregorianum 38 (1957) 515-535, 713-732; W.N. Clarke, Infinity in Plotinus: A Reply: Gregorianum 40 (1959) 75-98; P. Hadot, Être, vie, pensée chez Plotin et avant Plotin, in EntAC V, 107-141; E.R. Dodds, Tradition and Personal Achievement in the Philosophy of Plotinus: JRS 50 (1960) 1-7; J.M. Rist, The Indefinite Dyad and Intelligible Matter in Plotinus: CQ n.s. 12 (1962) 99-107; Id., The Neoplatonic One and Plato's Parmenides: TPAPA 93 (1962) 389-401; Id., Eros and Psyche, in Studies in Plato, Plotinus and Origen, Toronto 1964 (It. tr. by E. Perolio, Milan 1995); Id., Plotinus: The Road to Reality, Cambridge 1967; Ph. Merlan, Monopsychism, Mysticism, Metaconsciousness, The Hague 1963; R. Arnou, Le désir de Dieu dans la philosophie de Plotin, Rome 1967 (It. tr. by A. Trotta, Milan 1997); W. Beierwaltes, Plotin über Ewigkeit und Zeit, Frankfurt a.M. 1967; A. Graeser, Plotinus and the Stoics, Leiden 1972; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 37-93; V. Schubert, Plotin, Munich 1973; W. Beierwaltes, Denken des Einen, Frankfurt a.M. 1985 (It. tr. by M.L. Gatti, Pensare l'uno. Studi sulla filosofia neoplatonica e sulla storia dei suoi influssi, Milan 1991); Id., Selbst-erkenntnis und Erfahrung der Einheit, Frankfurt a.M. 1991. See also the numerous contributions in the following three volumes: Les sources de Plotin, in EntAC V (1960), Le Néoplatonisme. Royaumont 9-13 juin 1969, Paris 1971 and Plotino e il Neoplatonismo in Oriente e in Occidente, Accademia Naz. dei Lincei, Rome 1974; Th. A. Szlezák, Platon und Aristoteles in der Nuslehre Plotins, Basel 1979 (It. tr. by A. Trotta, Platone e Aristotele nella dottrina del Nous di Plotino, Milan 1997); M. Isnardi Parente, Introduzione a Plotino, Rome-Bari 1984 (with full bibl., 191-206); S. Lilla, La teologia negativa dal pensiero greco classico a quello patristico e bizantino: Helikon 28 (1988) 207-260; L.P. Gerson, Plotinus, London 1994 (with full bibl., 295-316); M.L. Gatti, Plotino e la metafisica della contemplazione, Milan ^{2}1996; M. Andolfo, L'ipostasi della "Psyche" in Plotino. Struttura e fondamenti, Milan 1996; A. Trotta, Il problema del tempo in Plotino, intr. by W. Beierwaltes, Milan 1997; M. Andolfo, Plotino. Struttura e fondamenti dall'ipostasi del "Nous," Milan 2002.

IIIa. On Porphry: R. Beutler: PWK 22/1, 275-313; H. Dörrie, Porphyrios' Symmikta Zetemata, Zetemata 20, Munich 1959; Id., Das fünffach gestufte Mysterium: der Austieg der Seele bei Porphyrios und Ambrosius, in Mullus, Festschr. Th. Clauser, Münster 1964, 79-92; Id., Die Schultradition im Mittelplatonismus und Porphyrios, in EntAC XII (1966) 3-32; Id., Die Lehre von der Seele, ibid., 165-187; P. Hadot, La métaphysique de Porphyre, in EntAC XII, 87-123; J.M. Rist, Mysticism and Trascendence in Later Neoplatonism: Hermes 92 (1964) 220-225; A.R. Sodano, Porfirio commentatore di Platone, in EntAC XII, 195-228; J.H. Waszink, Porphyrios und Numerios, ibid., 35-83; A.C. Lloyd, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 272-295; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 94-137; J. Whittaker, Neopythagoreanism and the Transcendent Absolute: SO 48 (1973) 81-82 (= Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XI); A. Smith, Porphyry's Place in the Neoplatonic Tradition: A Study in Postplotinian Neoplatonism, The Hague 1974; W. Deuse, Der Demiurg bei Porphyrios und Jamblich, in Die Philos. des Neuplatonismus, ed. C. Zintzen, Darmstadt 1977, 238-278; F. Romano, Porfirio di Tiro. Filosofia e cultura nel III secolo d.C., Catania 1979; H.D. Saffrey, Connaissance et inconnaissance de Dieu: Porphyre et la Théosophie de Tübingen, in Gonimos. Neoplatonic and Byzantine Studies Presented to Leendert G. Westerink at 75, ed. J. Duffy - J. Peradotto, Buffalo, NY 1988, 3-20 (= Recherches sur le Néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris 1990, 1-20); S. Lilla, La teologia negativa dal pensiero greco classico a quello patristico e bizantino: Helikon 28 (1988) 260-279; M.J. Edwards, Porphyry and the Intelligible Triad: JHS 110 (1990) 14-24; P.F. Beatrice, Le traité de Porphyre contre les chrétiens: l'état de la question: Kernos 4 (1991) 119-138; G. Girgenti, Porfirio negli ultimi cinquant'anni: bibliografia sistematica e ragionata della letteratura primaria e secondaria riguardante il pensiero porfiriano e i suoi influssi storici, Milan 1994; Id., Il pensiero forte di Porfirio, Milan 1996; Id., Introduzione a Porfirio, Rome-Bari 1997 (with full bibl., 161-174).

IIIb. On the anonymous Commentary on Parmenides attributed to Porphyry: P. Hadot, Fragments d'un commentaire de Porphyre sur le Parménide: REG 74 (1961) 410-438; Id., Porphyre et Victorinus, II, Paris 1968 (It. tr. by G. Girgenti, with bibl., Milan 1993); J. Whittaker, Neopythagoreanism and the Transcendent Absolute: SO 48 (1973) 81-82 (= Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XI); A. Linguiti, Per una rilettura dell'anonimo commento al Parmenide di Torino, in Esegesi, parafrasi e compilazione in età tardo antica. Atti del terzo convegno dell'Associazione di studi tardo antichi, ed. C. Moreschini, Naples 1995, 229-236.

IV. On theurgy and Iamblichus: W. Kroll: PWK 9/1, 645-651; J. Bidez, Le philosophe Jamblique et son école: REG 32 (1919) 29-40; E. Eitrem, La théurgie chez les Néoplatoniciens et dans les papyrus magiques: SO 22 (1942) 49-79; E.R. Dodds, Theurgy and Its Relationship to Neoplatonism: JRS 37 (1947) 55-69; H. Lewy, Chaldean Oracles and Theurgy, Le Caire 1956, Paris [2]1978; B. Dalsgaard Larsen, Jamblique de Chalcis exégète et philosophe, Aarhus 1972; Id., La place de Jamblique dans la philosophie antique tardive, in EntAC XXI (1975) 1-26; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 118-137; H. Dillon, Iamblichi Chalcidensis in Platonis dialogos commentariorum fragmenta, Leiden 1973; E. Des Places, La religion de Jamblique, in EntAC XXI, 69-94; R.E. Witt, Iamblichus as a Forerunner of Julian, ibid., 35-64; H.D. Saffrey, in Id., Recherches sur le Néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris 1990, 33-123.

V. On the school of Athens: H.D. Saffrey - L.G. Westerink, Proclus. Théologie platonicienne, I, Paris 1968, XXVI–XLVIII, LXXV–LXXXIX; H.D. Saffrey, École platonicienne d'Athènes, in Encyclopedia Universalis, II, Paris 1968, 723-724 (= Recherches sur le Néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris 1990, 127-129); R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 138ff.

VI. On Proclus: R. Beutler: PWK 23/1, 186-247; E.R. Dodds, Proclus: The Elements of Theology, Oxford 1933; W. Beierwaites, Proklos. Grundzüge seiner Metaphysik, Frankfurt a.M. 1965 (It. tr. by N. Scotti, Milan 1988); A.C. Lloyd, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 302-314; H.D. Saffrey - L.G. Westerink, Proclus. Théologie platonicienne, I-IV, Paris 1968-1981 (intros. to the individual volumes); P. Bastid, Proclus et le crépuscule de la pensée greque, Paris 1969; J. Trouillard, L'un et l'âme selon Proclus, Paris 1972; Id., La mistagogie de Proclus, Paris 1982; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, London 1972, 138-158; S.E. Gersh, Kínesis Akínetos, Leiden 1973; G. Martano, Proclo di Atene, Naples 1974; H. Dumery, Proclus et la puissance de produire, in Néoplatonisme Melanges offerts à Jean Trouillard, Fontenay aux Roses 1981, 159-190; M. Di Pasquale Barbanti, Proclo tra filosofia e teurgia, Catania 1983; G. Reale, Introduzione a Proclo, Rome-Bari 1989 (with full bibl., 125-163); S. Lilla, La teologia negativa dal pensiero greco classico a quello patristico e bizantino: Helikon 29-30 (1989-1990) 137-186; H.D. Saffrey, Recherches sur le Néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris 1990, 141-248 (collection of previous studies); var. aus., Proclus et la théologie platonicienne. Actes du Colloque international de Louvain (13-16 mai 1998) en l'honneur de H.D. Saffrey et L.G. Westerink, ed. A.Ph. Segonds - C. Steel, Leuven-Paris 2000; Marinus Vita Procli, ed. H.D. Saffrey - A.-L. Segonds, Paris 2001.

VII. On Damascius: J. Combès (the eight studies cited in Linguiti, L'ultimo platonismo Greco . . . [see below], 108); M.J. Galpérine, Damascius et la théologie négative, in Le Néoplatonisme, Royaumont 9-13 juin 1969, Paris 1971, 261-262; L.G. Westerink, Damascius, Commentateur de Platon, in Le Néoplatonisme, op. cit., 253-260; R.T. Wallis, Neoplatonism, op. cit., 158-159; R. von Haeling, Damascius und die heidnische Opposition im 5. Jahrhundert nach Christus: JbAC 23 (1980) 82-95; A. Linguiti, Giamblico, Proclo e Damascio sul principio anteriore all'uno: Elenchos 9 (1988) 95-106; Id., L'ultimo platonismo greco. Principi e conoscenze [Accademia Toscana di Scienze e Lettere "La Colombaria" Studi 112], Florence 1990; L.G. Westerink - J. Combès - A.-Ph. Segonds - C. Luna, intro. and notes to the crit. ed. of the De primis principiis and In Platonis Parmenidem, publ. in the series "Les belles Lettres" (see above in the section of Damascius); S. Lilla, La teologia negative dal pensiero greco classico a quello patristico e bizantino: Helikon 31-32 (1991-1992) 3-72; Id., Denys l'Aréopagite, Porphyre et Damascius, in Denys l'Aréopagite et sa postérité en Orient et en Occident, Actes du Colloque International, Paris 21-24 septembre 1994 [Coll. des Étud. August. Série antiquité 151], Paris 1997, 135-152; C.M. Mazzucchi, Damascio, autore del Corpus Dionysiacum: Aevum 80 (2006) 299-334.

VIII. On Neoplatonism in the Latin West: P. Henry, Plotin et l'Occident. Firmicus Maternus, Marius Victorinus, Saint Augustin et Macrobe, Louvain 1934; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident. De Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris 1948; J.C.M. van Winden, Calcidius on Matter. His Doctrine and Sources, Leiden 1959; J.H. Waszink, Timaeus a Calcidio translatus commentarioque instructus, London-Leiden [2]1975; C. Moreschini, Boezio e la tradizione del neoplatonismo latino, in Atti Congr. Int. di Studi boeziani, Rome 1981, 297-310.

S. Lilla

NEPOS. (First?) bishop of Arsinoe (Medinet el Fayyum), in about 240. Millenarian, fervent defender of the Apocalypse, wrote against *Origen in a Refutation of the Allegorists which has been lost; Eusebius (HE 7, 24, 1-3) seems to know it through *Dionysius of Alexandria, his adversary. It is nonetheless an important part of the Egyptian tradition which has not been sufficiently emphasized, and which influenced the story of *Origenism. Nepos also wrote liturgical poetry (in Greek?).

Quasten I, 371.

J. Gribomont

NEPOTIANUS (d. 96). Nephew of *Heliodorus, bishop of Altinum, and friend of *Jerome, who lived in the 2nd half of the 4th c. After having initially embraced the military life, he consecrated himself to God; at first he intended to take up the ascetic life in the East or on a Dalmatian island, but affection for Heliodorus made him stay in his home country. He became a priest and coadjutor of his uncle; he died in 396. Jerome dedicated to him Ep. 52, on the life of clerics and monks, and wrote a funeral oration for him in Ep. 60 to Heliodorus, in which the virtues and qualities of Neopotianus become a portrait of the ideal priest.

F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme. Sa vie et son oeuvre, Louvain-Paris 1922, vol. I, 182-184; PCBE 2, 1535-1536.

S. Zincone

NEREUS and ACHILLEUS. Roman martyrs. The oldest evidence of their cult is from the 4th c.: the poem of Pope *Damasus (A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 101-104) and the pillar of the ciborium which covered the primitive altar of the cemeterial basilica. According to these sources, the martyrs were two soldiers who, having deserted for religious reasons, were condemned to death. The bodies were buried in the cemetery of *Domitilla, and Damasus (366–384) erected a chapel over their tomb. Then in 390 Pope *Siricius erected an underground basilica over it. In the Mart. hier. their feast is 12 May. The Gelasian Sacramentary contains a Mass in honor of the saints. The itineraries of the 7th c. mention the tomb of the saints in the catacomb of Domitilla (CCL 175, 299.308.316.327.331); on account of the proximity of the tomb of *Petronilla (daughter of Peter) the legend says that the saints were brothers baptized by Peter. The cathedra of stone, from which Pope *Gregory the Great gave the Hom. in Ev. 28 (CCL 141, 239-243), was transferred by Baronius from the cemeterial basilica into his titulus of Sts. Nereus and Achilles, near to the Baths of Caracalla. The cemeterial basilica was destroyed by an earthquake in 817. G.B. de Rossi unearthed it in 1873–1874.

BHL 6058-6067; BHG 1327; LCI 8, 34-35; BS 9, 813-820; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, I SS. Nereo ed Achilleo nell'epigramma damasiano: Studi e Testi 22, Rome 1909, 43-55; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926 (repr. Rome 2000), 388-389; U. Fasola, La basilica dei SS. Nereo e Achilleo e la catacomba di Domitilla, Rome [2]1967; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae 3, Vatican City 1971, 136-153; W. Buchowiecki, Handbuch der Kirchen Roms 3, Vienna 1974, 350-367; Ph. Pergola, Nereus et Achilleus martyres. L'intervention de Damase à Domitille, in Saecularia Damasiana, Vatican City 1986, 205-224; Ph. Pergola, Sanctuaires locaux et sanctuaires internationaux à Rome. Les cas des basiliques de Domitille et de Generosa: Akten des XII. Internationalen Kongresses für Christliche Archäologie, Vatican City-Münster 1995, 1097-1100.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

NERO (37–68). Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, Roman emperor from 54–68 with the name of Nero, was placed in the succession by Claudius before Britannicus, under pressure from Aggripina and moderate circles. A complex and controversial personality, Nero reigned until 62 with moderation, and then was influenced by extreme monarchist elements (Tigellinus) who incited him to ferocious purges of the opponents of absolute power: in 65–66, Seneca, Lucan and Petronius, among others, were killed under the pretext of the Pisonian conspiracy. In 68, faced with the rebellion of the Senate and the soldiers of many W provinces, Nero committed suicide. Galba succeeded him, acclaimed by the praetorian guard.

With respect to the Christians, the ferocious persecution of 64, which included among its victims *Peter and *Paul, was acc. to *Tacitus (Annal. XV, 44) caused by the popular outcry over the burning of *Rome perhaps brought about intentionally by the emperor himself. It was not owing to a specific Neronian law, but, acc. to *Tertullian, to the application of a senatus consultum from the Tiberian era. According to Tertullian (Apol. V, 1ff.), Nero instigated the institutum of the persecutions. On the other hand, acc. to *Suetonius (Nero 16, 38, 39), the Christians were condemned for superstitio illicita, and not for responsibility for the fire. According to M. Sordi, the change of Nero's policy in an anti-Christian direction, even before 64, is attested to in 1 Peter, written in Rome before that date (Sordi, Il cristianesimo, 85). Scholars have long debated the existence of a institutum Neronianum, i.e., of a specifically persecutory law, in the context of research on the legal basis of persecutions against the Christians.

L. Dieu, La persécution au IIe siècle. Une loi fantôme: RHE 38 (1942) 5ff.; M.A. Levi, Nerone e i suoi tempi, Milan 1949; J. Zeiller, Institutum Neronianum: RHE 50 (1955) 393-399; V. Monachino, Il fondamento giuridico delle persecuzioni nei primi due secoli, Rome 1955; J. Beaujeu, L'incendie de Rome en 64 et les chrétiens: Latomus 19 (1960) 65-80; 291-311; E. Demongeot, À propos de la persécution de 64 contre les chrétiens et de l'Institutum Neronianum: Recueil de mémoires et travaux de la Soc. d'hist. du droit écrit de Montpellier 7 (1970) 145-155; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 21990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; M.A. Levi, Nerone e i suoi tempi, Milan 1995; J. Malitz, Nero, Munich 1999; A. Ziolkowski, Storia di Roma, It. tr., Milan 2000; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

NERSES (Narsetes or Narsai or Nersetes). Name of various Armenian *catholicoi.

Nerses I (catholicos 353/355–372): *Faustus of Byzantium speaks of him, giving many semilegendary details. He spent some years as chamberlain at the court of King Arshak. Consecrated bishop, he showed himself full of energy, concerned above all to reorganize the charitable work and canonical rules of the *Armenian church. As catholicos he would continue to pursue political missions for the king.

J. Markwart, Die Entstehung der armenischen Bistümer, Rom 1932, 223 [87]-233 [97]; BS 9, 742-746.

Nerses II Astarakec'i (catholicos 548–557): convened the Council of Dwin (554–555) against the *Nestorians (or the *Manicheans?). Some canonical responses have been attributed to him.

EC 8, 1768.

S.J. Voicu

NESTORIUS – NESTORIANISM. In April 428 Nestorius was consecrated bishop of *Constantinople. Born ca. 381 (although the date is uncertain) in Germanicia (*Syria), of Antiochene education, perhaps a pupil of *Theodore of Mopsuestia, he was a monk and then priest in the Syrian metropolis. His election as patriarch was supported by court circles who had learned of his virtues and eloquence. Within the context of a series of initiatives aimed at reestablishing purity of faith in Constantinople, Nestorius publically disapproved of the use, by then widespread, of naming Mary the mother of God (Theotokos): Antiochene *Christology distinguished between the divine and human properties in Christ with the greatest precision, so that Mary stricto sensu should be considered only mother of the man Jesus. Nestorius, however, preferred the more inclusive title Christotokos. Nestorius's position gave rise immediately to discontent and protests, inducing *Cyril of Alexandria to intervene. In his involvement we find political and doctrinal motives intermingled: in fact, with the traditional rivalry between *Alexandria and *Antioch, Cyril regarded the presence of a prestigious Antiochene as patriarch of the episcopal see of Constantinople—by this time the principal see of the East—unfavorably, evoking the specter of Chrysostom; and Cyril's typically Alexandrian Christology, which emphasized to the maximum the subordination of the humanity of Christ to his divinity, accommodating their unity better, made him suspicious of an overly sharp distinction between the human and divine properties. The second letter of Cyril to Nestorius (the first was only a generic request for information) and the response of Nestorius (430), both of a doctrinal character, clarified the divergences between the Alexandrian and Antiochene Christologies.

In the context of their respective propaganda, both Cyril and Nestorius had informed Pope *Celestine in *Rome of the disagreement: the pope, without looking deeply into the question, decided in favor of Cyril and, following a council held in Rome in August 430, invited Nestorius to recant of his errors, and commissioned Cyril to transmit to him the Roman decision. Only in November did Cyril convey this to Nestorius, along with a series of 12 anathemas, which presented Alexandrian Christology in the most radical form: they spoke, e.g., of the unity of nature (henōsis physikē) of the human and divine in Christ. No Antiochene would have been able to submit to them. The council which began in Ephesus on 22 June 431 took a very irregular form on the initiative of Cyril: his supporters condemned and deposed Nestorius, then some days afterward supporters of Nestorius condemned and deposed Cyril. Faced with this irregularity, *Theodosius approved both the censures and depositions; but that against Cyril, who had returned to Egypt, did not actually take effect, while Nestorius spontaneously chose not to defend himself and retired to a monastery in Antioch. In his place Maximian was elected in Constantinople. Negotiations which followed between Cyril and *John of Antioch led to reconciliation in April of 433: the Antiochenes renounced Nestorius, the censures of whom they approved; Cyril set aside his 12 anathemas. The formula of faith (act of union) approved by both parties affirmed that in the One Christ Son and Lord there had occurred the union of the two natures, human and divine, without confusion, so that he is consubstantial with the Father in divinity and consubstantial with us in humanity, and Mary is called the mother of God. Nestorius was exiled from Antioch, first to Petra and then to the Great Oasis, in the Libyan desert. He long survived his misfortune, up to the Council of Chalcedon (451), and in his late apology, the Book (or Bazaar) of Heraclides, he affirms the congruence of his doctrine with that of the Tomus ad Flavianum* of Pope *Leo I.

Nestorius was accused of dividing Christ, of affirming two Christs and two Sons—i.e., man and God—of renewing the adoptionism of *Paul of Samosata, conceiving only as exterior the union in Christ of God and man. Nestorius always denied the legitimacy of these accusations and accused Cyril of being an *Apollinarian. It is not easy to describe all the details of his doctrine on the basis of the evidence we have: a few letters and homilies, and fragments, particularly of homilies, quoted by his enemies, assembled at the beginning of the controversy, and then the late Book of Heraclides, which has come to us in *Syriac, the ideas of which cannot be said to correspond in toto with those expressed many years earlier. On this question modern scholars do not yet agree: some speak of the tragedy of Nestorius, accused of errors which he had not committed, while others affirm the validity of the accusations. We will synthesize here the principal points of his doctrine.

The preoccupation of Nestorius, as a good Antiochene, was to protect, against both the Apollinarians and the *Arians, the integrity of the human nature of Christ, understood as a complete personality, capable of free initiative, where the Alexandrians reduced it to a mere passive instrument of the Logos. He therefore with great care keeps the properties of the two natures distinct, as well as the appellations which refer to them: this is why he prefers to give Mary the appellation of Christotokos (= mother of Jesus in his union with the Logos) over that of Theotokos. But notwithstanding the distinction, he refuses the accusation of preaching two Christs, constantly repeating the indivisibility and the unity of Christ, the incarnate Logos. To indicate the union of the two natures, he speaks of ineffable unity (henōsis), but prefers synapheia ("conjunction"), so that the union does not become a mixture. He adopts the traditional terminology of Antioch, and speaks of the humanity assumed by the Logos, of the temple in which the Logos has taken up dwelling, i.e., a terminology which highlights the distinction in Christ between the human and the divine. Given this fundamental concern, Nestorius cannot accept the Cyrillian formula of union of nature, of union of *hypostasis in Christ: for him in fact a nature has no subsistence, concrete reality, if it is not a hypostasis, so that the union of natures and hypostases seems to him a confusion of the two natures and of the two hypostases in the manner of Apollinaris. He prefers to speak of union kat' eudokian (= of complaisance, condescension), which his opponents denounced as *adoptionism, but which should be understood as the voluntary union of the Logos with humanity. To render this concept more concrete Nestorius repeatedly spoke of a sole prosōpon in which the two natures unite, but it is not easy to understand the precise meaning of this concept, given the generic character of prosōpon, which corresponds to the Latin person, but which always has the connotation of appearance, the external aspect. The expression had already been used by Theodore of Mopsuestia, but Cyril rejected it as insufficient from the outset of the controversy: it was thought that it could mean the psychological or moral personality in which the clearly distinct properties of the two natures come together, each nature with its own hypostasis and its own prosōpon (the mode of being of each real entity). In the Book of Heraclides, Nestorius speaks even of an exchange of prosōpa in Christ, in the sense that One of the two natures makes use of the prosōpon of the other as if it were its own, making him open to a late acceptance of the communicatio idiomatum (= exchange of the predicates of humanity and divinity in Christ on account of the union), refused years before in the response to the second letter of Cyril.

We can conclude that Nestorius, as did Theodore, intuited the danger of compromising the unity of Christ, inherent in the divisionist Christology of the Antiochenes, and sought to obviate it, though without making this good intention concrete in a theologically impeccable system. This deficiency was magnified by the confluence of a series of adverse circumstances of disparate character (political, personal etc.) which, assisted also by Nestorius's lack of prudence and malleability, brought about a chain of events which crushed Nestorius without mercy, and made of a good monk the impious divider of Christ. In Antiochene circles, however, his condemnation was not accepted by all. His supporters won to the Nestorian faith (two natures, two hypostases, one prosōpon of Christ) the Christian church of Persia which, despite its difficulties and trials, was destined to survive into the modern era.

CPG III, 5665-5766; Quasten II, 518-523; F. Loofs, Nestoriana, Halle 1905; DTC 11, 76-187; L. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di

Efeso, Milan 1974 (bibl.); W. de Vries, Die syrisch-nestorianische Haltung zu Chalkedon: CCG 1, 603-635; M. Redies, Kyrill und Nestorius: eine Neuinterpretation des Theotokos-Streits: Klio 80 (1998) 195-208; S. Wessel, Cyril of Alexandria and the Nestorian Controversy, New York 2000; D. Fairbairn, Grace and Christology in the Early Church, Oxford 2003; S.J. Voicu, Nestorio e la "Oratio de epiphania" (CPG 4882) attribuita a Giovanni Crisostomo: Augustinianum 43 (2003) 495-499.

M. Simonetti

NESTORIUS of Bet Nuhadra (8th c.). Monk of the monastery of Mar Yozadaq, where *John of Dalyatha took the habit, and author of a biography of *Joseph Hazzaya which was included by *Isho'dnah of Basra in his Liber castitatis. Before being consecrated bishop of Bet Nuhadra in ca. 790/791 he had to defend himself against the accusation of being a *Messalian before *Timothy I, who had already had the above-mentioned Joseph and John condemned in a synod of 786/787.

Baumstark, 226; O. Braun, Zwei Synoden des Katholikos Timotheos I: OC 2 (1902) 283-311 (302-311: letter of Nestorius which contains his confession of faith); R. Beulay - R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne 1987, 217-223 (on an unpublished letter); Išō'dnaḥ di Basrā, Liber Castitatis, ch. 126.

K. den Biesen

NICAEA
I. City - II. Council of 325.

I. City. City of *Bithynia (today Iznik) and, acc. to legend, founded by Dionysius. It came under Roman control in AD 72, at the conclusion of the Mithridatic War (App., Bell. civ. V, 139, 1). At the time of Claudius, Nicaea competed with *Nicomedia for the seat of the provincial governor. Ruined by an earthquake in AD 112, the city was restored under *Hadrian, who visited it in 123 and who also promoted the construction of the city wall, finished at the time of Claudius the Goth. Damaged by the Goths in 258, it was repaired several times: again in the 5th c. it was rebuilt. An ancient Christian city, a series of martyrs are recorded there (see E. Josi, Nicea: EC 8, 1827). Bishops: *Theognis (*Arian, exiled in 325, bishop again in 328, d. 344), Chrestus (325-328), Eugenius (Arian, d. 370), Hypatius (Arian, 379), Dorotheus (381), Anastasius (at *Chalcedon), Peter, Appius, Anstasius II, Stephen, Theophilus, Photios, George, Anastasius III.

PWK 17, 226-243; DACL 12, 1179-1211; EC 8, 1827-28; EAA 5, 452-453; J. Sölch, Bitinische Städte im Altertum: Klio 19 (1925) 140ff.; for the bishops cf. M. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, I, Paris 1740, 640-662; P.B. Gams, Series Episc., Graz 1957 (repr.), 443.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Council of 325. After his victory over *Licinius, emperor of the East, in Sept 324, *Constantine made every attempt to settle the disputes among the Eastern bishops, as he had tried to do in the West with respect to the *Donatist schism, initiating the synods of *Rome (311) and *Arles (314). From the autumn of 324, therefore, he called the bishops to a synod, similar to the comitia of the civil organization of the empire, first to *Ancyra and then, for reasons of convenience, to Nicaea, near to the imperial residence at *Nicomedia. The cursus publicus was placed at the disposition of the conciliar fathers. The essential purpose of the synod was twofold: to settle the *Arian question and the matter of *Easter. A first approach of *Ossius of Cordoba, the principal agent of the political-religious policy of Constantine, to *Alexander of Alexandria in order to reconcile him with Arius, completely failed. On the contrary, a synod, held in Antioch during the winter of 324/325, confirmed the Alexandrian bishop's censure of the initial group of Arians issued by the local synod, which had brought together about a hundred bishops of Egypt and Libya. Constantine inaugurated his council on 20 May 325, on the day after the celebrations for his victory over Licinius, held at Nicomedia. The synodal fathers had been present already for some days at Nicaea. After a welcoming discourse by the emperor, spoken in Latin, the sympathizers of Arius spoke first, proposing a formula of the faith read by *Eusebius of Nicomedia, which, however, was rejected. *Eusebius of Caesarea then presented a formula of faith, on his own account, to deliver himself from suspicion of heresy, which had been attached to him for some months owing to a censure by the Synod of Antioch, but also to help the conciliar fathers find a formula acceptable to all. As *Athanasius of Alexandria would recount 25 years later in the letter De decretis, the discussions of the Council of Nicaea were long and laborious. With successive additions the traditional formulas of the symbol were determined in an anti-Arian sense, up to inserting the attribute homoousios, "consubstantial, " to qualify the unity of essence of the Father and the Son. We do not know who took the initiative to propose this insertion, which became the touchstone of Nicene orthodoxy. At the conclusion of the debates, only Arius and two bishops, Theonas of Marmarica and Secundus of Ptolemais, refused to subscribe. They were each excommunicated, the two bishops deposed, and all three exiled to Illyria.

Just three months after the council, Eusebius of Nicomedia was also exiled.

The controversial originality of the "faith of Nicaea" is to be found in these words: "from the substance of the Father" and "true God from true God, begotten, not made, consubstantial with the Father." This way of defining the divinity of Christ was particularly near to the position of *Alexander of Alexandria, without, however, reproducing to the letter the propositions of his theology. Neither Alexander, nor after him Athanasius, seem by themselves to have used the word homoousios, which for the great majority of the Eastern bishops had become a source of doctrinal difficulty, even though they condemned Arius. The political developments of the so-called Arian crisis brought about opposition to Nicaea among these bishops, which lasted publicly up to the beginning of reign of *Theodosius I and the first Council of *Constantinople (381).

Among the disciplinary decrees of Nicaea, the most important regarded the date of the celebration of Easter, acc. to the Roman use and the Alexandrian use, i.e., on the Sunday immediately following the first full moon after the spring equinox. The necessary work of astronomical calculation was entrusted to the see of Alexandria. The canons of Nicaea, twenty in number, speak of the structure of the church (can. 4-7, 15, 16); the clergy (can. 1-3, 9, 10, 17); public penitence (can. 11-14); readmission of *schismatics and *heretics (can. 19); and finally gave *liturgical norms (can. 18 and 20).

The emperor closed the council, the honorary presidency of which he had assumed during the principal sessions, with a banquet and gifts offered to the fathers; this without doubt occurred in the context of the celebrations organized from 25 Jul 325 on the occasion of his vicennalia (he became Caesar at the age of about 36, 25 Jul 306).

The full ecclesial significance of this first ecumenical council become progressively yet gradually clear in the minds of the principal leaders of the church in the course of the 4th c. The faith of Nicaea remained the dogmatic rule invoked by all other councils of the ancient church.

Sources: CPG IV, 8511-8527; G.L. Dossetti, Il simbolo di Nicea e di Costantinopoli, critical ed., Rome 1967.

Recent studies: I. Ortiz de Urbina, Nicée et Constantinople, Hist. des Conciles oecum., 1, Paris 1963; M. Aubineau, Les 318 serviteurs d'Abraham et le nombre des Pères au concile de Nicée (325): RHE 61 (1966) 5-43; H. Chadwick, Les 318 Pères de Nicée: ibid., 808-811; H.J. Sieben, Zur Entwicklung der Konzilsidee, I-II: TheolPhilos 45 (1970) 353-389; 46 (1971) 40-70; D.L. Holland, Die Synode von Antiochien (324/25) und ihre Bedeutung für Eusebius von Cäsarea und das Konzil von Nizäa: ZKG 81 (1970) 163-181; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975; R. Lorenz, Das Problem der Nachsynode von Nizäa (327): ZKG 90 (1979) 22-40; J.N.D. Kelly, The Nicene Creed: A Turning Point: Scottish Journal Theol. 36 (1983) 29-39; TRE 24, 429-441; C. Luibhéid, The Alleged Second Session of the Council of Nicaea: Journal of Eccl. History 34 (1983) 165-174; D. Spada, Le confessioni di fede da Nicea a Costantinopoli, Rome 1988; L.D. Davis, The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325-787), Collegeville, MN 1990, 33-80 (It. tr. Storia e cronaca dei sette concili che definirono la dottrina cristiana, Casale Monf. 1998); L. Perrone, in Storia dei concili ecumenici, ed. G. Alberigo, Bologna 1990, 11-56; Conciliorum Oecumenicorum decreta, ed. G. Alberigo, Bologna 1991, 1-19; R. Staats, Das Glaubensbekenntnis von Nizäa-Konstantinopel: historische und theologische Grundlagen, Darmstadt 1996; P. L'Huillier, The Church of the Ancient Councils, Crestwood, NY 1996, 17-100; L. Ayres, Nicaea and Its Legacy, New York-Oxford 2004.

Ch. Kannengiesser

NICETA of Remesiana (4th–5th c.). After having been confused, up to the end of 19th c., with a bishop of the same name from *Aquileia and with *Nicetius of Trier we may now, after the studies of Morin and Burn, almost certainly identify him with the Niceta mentioned by *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 22), the guest of *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. 17; 27; Ep. 29, 14), the author of a book on the faith recommended by *Cassiodorus (Inst. 16), and the recipient of a letter of 414 of Pope *Innocent I (Ep. 17), who also names him in another of his letters (Ep. 16) of ca. 409. Niceta, therefore, was bishop of Remesiana, modern Bela Palanka, in Serbia, in the 2nd half of the 4th c. He came to *Italy at least twice in 398 and 402, and was guest of the bishop of Nola who, at his departure, dedicated to him the Propempticon: from this poem (17) it seems reasonable to conclude that Niceta also exercised his ministry in areas outside the boundaries of his episcopal territory, situated in the Dacia Mediterranea, politically united to the East by *Theodosius in 379, but ecclesiastically dependent on the patriarchate of *Rome. If the work of Paulinus helps to reconstruct the figure of Niceta (besides Carm. 17 also see Carm. 27, composed on the occasion of the visit of Niceta to Nola for the Feast of St. *Felix in 402), that of Gennadius constitutes the source for the knowledge of his writings. These are the Instructio ad competentes, which have come to us fragmentarily in six books, dedicated to the catechumens and written with a pastoral rather than a theoretical aim. We have fragments of the first and second books which consider, respectively, the conduct expected of the candidates for baptism, and the errors of the pagans. Two treatises in our possession must be part of the third book, which against the *Arians affirm the divinity and consubstantiality of the Son, and against the *Macedonians the divinity of the *Holy Spirit. The fourth book, however, on the practice of horoscopes, has been completely lost. Book V, which we possess in full, is an Explanatio symboli which shows significant affinity with the catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem: in it is found, for the first time in the West, the formula "the communion of saints." It is not certain if book VI, on the paschal victim, may be identified with the *De ratione Paschae variously attributed to *Athanasius (PG 28, 1605) and to *Martin of Braga (PL 72, 49). Also mentioned by Gennadius is the Libellus ad lapsam virginem, recently identified by Gamer with the brief recension of the ps.-Ambrosian De lapsu virginis (PL 16, 383-400). Among the apocryphal letters of *Jerome but attributed to Niceta is the De vigiliis servorum Dei (PL 30, 240-246), while under the name of *Nicetius of Trier is found the De psalmodiae bono (PL 68, 371-376), a sermon which advocates the singing of hymns and psalms and attributes the Magnificat to Elizabeth (Lk 1:46) acc. some Latin MSS. Finally, the De diversis appellationibus (PL 52, 863-866), a writing perhaps from Niceta's youth, considers the various christological titles. Uncertain and disputed is the attribution of the Te Deum to Niceta.

PL 52, 837-876; PLS III, 189-202; CPL 646-652; A.E. Burn, Niceta of Remesiana, His Life and Works, Cambridge 1905; K. Gamber, Textus patristici et liturgici, 1, 2, 5, 7: Regensburg 1964, 1965, 1966, 1969; M.G. Mara, Niceta di Remesiana: Patrologia III, 180-183; C. Riggi, La figura di Niceta di Remesiana secondo la biografia di Gennadio: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 189-200; Id. (ed.), Niceta di Remesiana. Catechesi preparatorie al battesimo, Rome 1985; PCBE II, 1539; BBKL 6, 827-829.

M.G. Mara

NICETIUS of Trier (d. 569?). The principal sources on his life are the biographical accounts of *Gregory of Tours (De vita 17; Gl. conf. 92). To these may be added two letters written by him, and five received (MGH, Epp. 3, 116-122, 126-127, 133-134, 137-138), as well as two poems by *Venantius Fortunatus (MGH, Auct. ant. 4/1, 63-65). Originally from Limousin, where he took up the monastic life, he was named bishop of Trier in 525–526 by *Theodoric I of Austrasia. He had great influence on his contemporaries (he urged Aredius to enter the monastic life), including kings. He brought Italian workers to his city to restore the cathedral of St. John, the church of St. Peter of Neumagen and the abbey of St. Maximinus. No one better than this Roman could bring this ancient capital of the Roman Empire back to life, establishing there the the Roman character of his native Aquitaine. One may call the 6th c. of Trier "the century of Nicetius." He died perhaps in 569 and was buried in the basilica of St. Maximinus. His local cult seems to have started immediately (Greg. Tours, Gl. conf. 92), but the liturgical books of the city give evidence of it only from the 10th c. (AB 69, 285). His feast was placed on 5 Dec by Ado of Vienne, on the same day or on 3 Oct by the calendars of Trier of the 13th c., and on 1 Oct by an addition to the Corbeiensis (11th c.) of the Mart. hier.

BHL 6090-6092; CPL 1063-1064; BS 9, 900-902; LCI 8, 37; BBKL 6, 656-657; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle, Paris 1980, 169-207.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

NICHOLAS of Ancyra (5th/6th c.?). Priest of Ancyra. Nothing certain is known of him or when he lived: perhaps in the 5th or 6th c. Useful clues to this may be drawn from the dating of the MSS of the catenae which preserve fragments of works attributed to him, calling him Nicholas, Nicholas the priest, Nicholas priest of Ancyra, or Nicholas monk and priest.

He may perhaps be identified with the ascetic of Ancyra to whom the hermit Mark wrote his Pros Nikolaon (CPG 6095; PG 65, 1027-1050) and from whom he received in response a letter of thanks (PG 65, 1051-1054). From some references in scholia of catenae on the Acts of the Apostles it seems that he was probably author of commentaries on biblical books: In prophetam Ioel and In prophetam Amos. Perhaps we may also attribute to him a commentary In Psalmos and one In Ionam of which we possess two fragments with interpretations of the literal type.

CPG 6104; J.A. Cramer, Catenae graecorum patrum in N.T., vol. 3, Oxford 1838, 35, 37, 38, 124; G. Karo - I. Lietzmann, Catenarum graecarum catalogus, Göttingen 1902, 35; K. Staab, Die Pauluskatenen nach den handschriftlichen Quellen untersucht, Rome 1926, 16-17; Y.M. Duval, Le livre de Jonas dans la littérature chrétienne grecque et latine, Paris 1973, 454-456, 663-665; Bardenhewer IV, 181; R. Devreesse, Chaînes exégétiques grecques: DBS 1, 1146-1147, 1209; W. Ensslin, Nikolaos: PWK 17, 361; Patrologia V, 164 and 631, 650.

A. Labate

NICHOLAS of Myra (d. 343). Among the signatories of the Council of Nicaea (325), as bishop of Myra in Lycia (*Asia Minor). We know almost nothing of his life. He was perhaps born in Patara. He died 6 Dec 343. He was buried outside the city, toward the sea, where his mortal remains stayed until their transferral to Bari, 9 May 1087, when the Saracens invaded. The mausoleum has the form of a 4th-c. chapel, with his *sarcophagus in marble, decorated with pastoral scenes, under an arcosolium. It seems to have been inserted into a basilica of the ad corpus type on a square-cross plan, above which are vaults and cupolas (6th c.), the last restoration of which dates to the second quarter of the 11th c. His popular cult was vast and universal, and was given new impetus by the translation to Bari toward the end of 11th c. However, the legend about Nicholas (BHG 1347-1364; BHO 10; BHL 6104-6121, Suppl. 235-237) is of no historical value. His feast is kept 6 Dec and 9 May.

BS 9, 923-948; Vies des SS. 12, 200-213; G. Anrich, Hagios Nikolaos, 2 vols. (TU 2), Leipzig 1913-1917; F. Darsy, Il sepolcro di S. Nicola di Mira, in Mél. Tisserant, (ST 232), Vatican City 1964, 29-40; M. Ebon, Saint Nicholas. Life and Legend, New York 1975; An Anonymous Greek Account of the Transfer of the Body of Saint Nicholas from Myra in Lycia to Bari in Italy, tr. by J. McGinley - H. Mursurillo: Bollettino di S. Nicola 10 (October 1980) 3-17; Ch.W. Jones, S. Nicola. Biografia di una leggenda, Bari 1983; BBKL 6, 915-920 (bibl.); LTK[3] 7, 859-860.

V. Saxer

NICOLAITANS. The evidence of Rev 2:6, 14, 16, 20 does not allow us to identify the sect, nor to establish its origins even in approximate terms. Probably it was a movement of doctrinal and ethical character. If they are to be recognized in the "false apostles" (Rev 2:2) they would correspond to those itinerant preachers who passed themselves off as prophets and apostles without really being such (see 1 Th 5:20-21; 1 Jn 4:1), who left their mark also at the beginning of the 2nd c. (Ign., Eph. 9, 1; Did. 11, 8-10). Their doctrine may be traced through an examination of their conduct. The Nicolaitans did not scruple to participate in the sacred banquets of the pagans (Rev 2:14-15), which were often accompanied by immoral practices. Archetypes of this conduct were Balaam (Num 31:16ff.) (who, acc. to rabbinic exegesis, had advised King Balak of Moab to offer Moabite women to the Israelites to make them deviate from monotheism and convert them to idolatry, making them eat the meat of unclean animals) and Jezebel (a name which certainly answers symbolically to a real person, linked to the Phoenician queen of Israel of the same name, who induced her husband Ahab, followed by a good part of the people, to practice idolatrous cults [1 Kgs 16:31; 2 Kgs 9:22]). This woman, passing herself off as a prophet, gathered a large group of faithful around her whom she misled with prophecies and seductions (Rev 2:20-23). The references in the Apocalypse lead us to identify a sort of pregnosticism, which in the name of a "superior knowledge" (Rev 2:24) professed and practiced a certain theoretical and practical laxism, pushing the teachings of *Paul the Apostle on Christian liberty to the extreme (1 Cor 8; Rom 14). The consequences would thus have been participation in the sacred banquets of the pagans, on the grounds that the idol is nothing, and a certain complaisance toward the imperial cult, the cultic act deemed adoration not of the person of the emperor but of his protecting genius. The symbolic language of the Apocalypse (food sacrificed to idols, fornication) seems to conceal this doctrine. Apart from the identity of the name, there exists no proof to hold the founder of the movement to be the proselyte of Antioch, the deacon Nicolaus (Acts 6:5). The patristic tradition is divided: *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 1, 26, 3; 3, 11, 1), *Hippolytus (Refut. 7, 36) and *Epiphanius (Pan. 25) repeat and amplify the evidence of the Apocalypse. Their reliability is doubtful in respect of the deacon Nicolaus. *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. II, 20; III, 4), followed by *Eusebius (HE 3, 29) and *Theodoret (Haer. fab. 3, 1), rejects the identification with the deacon of Acts 6:5 and explains that wicked men distorted the true meaning of his words "it is necessary to disregard the flesh," making it a principle of licentiousness.

In the Middle Ages the title of Nicolaitans was used to include all those who opposed ecclesiastical celibacy.

DB 4, 1616-1619; DTC 11, 499-506; EC 8, 1859; LTK[2] 7, 976; M. Goguel, Les Nicolaïtes: RHR 115 (1937) 5-36; EB 5, 129-131; A. Pourkier, L'hérésie chez Épiphane de Salamine, Paris 1992, 291-334; P.D. Gooch, Dangerous Food. 1 Corinthians 8-10 in Its Context, Waterloo 1993; Anchor Bible Dictionary 4, 1106; P. Bordreuil, Qui étaient les Nicolaïtes de l'"Apocalypse de Jean"?: Semitica 47 (1997) 105-109.

E. Peretto

NICOMEDIA
I. City and Christianity - II. Martyrs of Nicomedia.

I. City and Christianity. Nicomedia, civil and religious capital of *Bithynia, today Izmit (Turkey), at the end of the gulf of the same name of the Sea of Marmara (ancient Propontis). The name derives from Nicomedes IV of Bithynia. The city was founded in 264 BC. Described along with *Rome, *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Athens as one of the largest cities of the Greco-Roman world, it was the residence of the prefect (perhaps it was from here that *Pliny the Younger wrote his letter on the Christians to *Trajan) and that of *Diocletian, who, in 303, unleashed a terrible persecutions of which the principal victim was the Christian community (flourishing already at the time of *Dionysius of Corinth in ca. 175), which then constituted half the population. The martyrology of Nicomedia is thus one of the most abundant, with individual commemorations (above all of St. *Anthimus and *Lucian of Antioch) and collective memoriae: 18 March (ten thousand), 22 June, 23 Dec (twenty), 25 Dec, etc.

With his solemn entrance into Nicomedia in 324, *Constantine signaled the final victory over his rivals, and the establishment of the religious peace. Even after the foundation of *Constantinople (330), Nicomedia remained the preferred residence of the monarch, who in the suburban villa of Achyron received baptism in articulo mortis (May 337) from Bishop *Eusebius, linked to the cause of *Arius, as were also the successors at Constantinople, *Eudoxius and *Demophilus. In 358 *Constantius established a new diocese, with Nicomedia as its capital, called Pietas in honor of his wife Eusebia. Weakened, to the advantage of its rival *Nicaea, by the pro-Arian policy of Bishop Himerius at the Council of *Ephesus (in Sept 431 *Theodosius II called a synod at Nicaea to mediate an agreement between *Cyril of Alexandria and *John of Antioch), the precedence of Nicomedia in Bithynia was reestablished at the 4th council (451) within the limits allowed by can. 28 of *Chalcedon on the primacy of Constantinople. On the metropolises, see *Bithynia and Pontus.

Invaded by the *Goths, shaken by earthquakes (24 Aug 358, Oct 359, Nov–Dec 362, 368, 15 Aug 554, 26 Oct 740, the last date commemorated liturgically), the city was several times reconstructed, in particular the great martyrion of St. Anthimus which *Justinian chose to adorn in marble and gold, the ideal setting to receive Pope Constantine I, in 711, under Justinian II.

The passage of the Persians and other invaders eradicated the ancient beauty of the city, still borne witness to by the city walls.

PWK 17, 468-492; CE 9, 70-71; EC 8, 1864; EAA 5, 455-457; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'empire byzantin, V, 1, Paris 1963, 268-281; Beck 164-165; R. Janin, Les Églises et les monastères des grands centres byzantins, Paris 1975; J. Darrouzès, Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae byzantinae, Paris 1981, 208, nn. 171-179; 221, nn. 191-201; P. Boulhol, L'apport de l'hagiographie à la connaissance de la Nicomédie paléochrétienne (Toponomie et monuments): MEFRA 106 (1994) 921-992; D. Woods, Where Did Constantine I Die?: JTS 48 (1997) 531-535.

D. Stiernon

II. Martyrs of Nicomedia. During the persecution of *Diocletian, Nicomedia, as the imperial residence, counted a very high number of victims among its inhabitants, and numerous groups of the faithful were killed in that city and mentioned in the Mart. Rom. A Greek passio (BHG 1219) speaks of 1,003 martyrs—men, women and children, free and slaves—slaughtered on the same day, after having spontaneously given themselves up to the emperor, spurred on by the example of four bodyguards of Diocletian, to whom they were linked by bonds of family or patronage: the four protectores had confessed themselves Christians from the very first days of the persecution and had courageously met their martyrdom. There have been various but unconvincing attempts to identify the four guards with better-known martyrs of Nicomedia.

Neither *Eusebius of Caesarea, who gives much information about the great persecution, nor the Mart. hier. or the Mart. Syr. mention this group of martyrs, their story being known only through the already cited Greek passio, which has a legendary flavor, and the Byzantine synaxaria. The dating of their martyrdom is problematic: the passio places it on 13 mechir of the Egyptian calendar (7 Feb), while the synaxaria give it five days later, 12 Feb, perhaps owing to an error of transcription. In both cases, however, given that the start of the Diocletian persecution is fixed on 24 Feb, it would be necessary to place the dies natalis (see *birthday [dies natalis]) of 1,003 Christians to the second year of the same persecution (304).

Their cult is absolutely unknown in the Latin West, while it seems probable that it was kept in *Egypt, as one can deduce from the fact that the dating in the passio follows the Egyptian usage.

AASS, Feb. II, 18-19; BHG 1219-b; BS 9, 982-985; Synax. Const. 459, 1.

V. Novembri

NILUS of Ancyra (d. 430?). Ascetical writer, disciple of *John Chrysostom. As he does not make any mention of the christological disputes, he must be placed at the beginning of 5th c.; the evidence confirms this hypothesis. More than twenty people with the name of Nilus have been enumerated by J.A. Fabricius - G.C. Harles (Bibliotheca Graeca, X, Hamburg 1807, 1-40: see index, Leipzig 1838, 70), and the works transmitted under this name (CPG 6043-6084; PG 79) raise thorny problems of authenticity. The links of Nilus with the emperor *Theodosius II and with *Sinai are based only on the Narrationes de caede monachorum in monte Sinai, a legendary account which it seems must be attributed to a different author. No ancient *Latin translations exist, and few Eastern versions.

K. Heussi has begun the study of the corpus of letters; establishing the order of the MSS, roughly dealt with by the editors, eliminates a certain number of false problems. Even if, as A. Cameron has demonstrated, the recipients may have been modified, and certain passages have been interpolated—e.g., the pleading with the emperor on behalf of John Chrysostom—these letters nonetheless remain a document of value about a monk of *Ancyra. To the letters are connected the Logos askētikos (= De monastica exercitatione), a vigorous appeal for the return of monks to poverty, which is the basis of their "philosophy, " with ample use of the OT interpreted *allegorically (though not at all in an *Origenist way). Nilus uses *Philo, the Vita Antonii, *Basil and not the apophthegms. There exists a *Syriac version of this work. The same themes are to be found in a work addressed to Magna, a deaconess of Ancyra at the beginning of 5th c., On Voluntary Poverty, which makes explicit allusion to the preceding work; however, it also opposes the contrary vice, refusal to work (chs. 21-27), naming in regard to this Adelphios, one of the *Messalians of Mesopotamia, and *Alexander the Acoemete, "recently arrived in Constantinople" (PG 79, 997A), an event which brings us to about 427.

The De monachorum praestantia, a defense of a life far from the cities passed in recollection, has points of contact with the previous treatises, even if the critique of monasticism is less striking, owing to new concerns. Perhaps it is necessary to add the Panegyric of Albianus, as this monk, who was at the school of Leontius of Ancyra (who became bishop in 400), then pilgrim in *Jerusalem and hermit in the desert of Nitria, is similar to our author; however, the literary genre is completely different.

The commentaries on Ecclesiastes and the *Song of Songs are only known through the catenae. H. Ringshausen thinks that the author is the same as that of the Peristeria, an Alexandrian work, the author of which is generally considered to be difficult to identify. Ringshausen identifies him with the author of the Sinaitic Narrationes; he also believes, and he is very likely right, that Nilus was the author of the tract On Voluntary Poverty; his argument, in my opinion, rightly leads us to identify him with the monk we have been describing above. Ringshausen has great (excessive!) confidence in the letters and does not refer in the least to the Logos askētikos. It is difficult to judge the reasons which lead him to choose a yet unpublished commentary as his point of departure, but he may, at least in part, be right. In that case one would have two different authors, both with the name of Nilus.

There exist, furthermore, collections of sentences under the same name (there is a Syriac version): they are antitheses (on the theme corruptible-incorruptible), lacking great profundity. Numerous works of *Evagrius were circulated under the name of Nilus, without doubt at the time of the Council of *Constantinople of 553 and the censures of Origenism: De oratione, De octo spiritibus malitiae, Ad Eulogium. The De octo vitiosis cogitationibus is a compilation made by Cassian the Greek. The Enchiridion adapts Epictetus. A search in the MSS and *florilegia would be necessary to untangle this complicated history.

CPG 6043-6084; CPG/S 6043-6072. P. Bettiolo, Gli scritti siriaci di Nilo il Solitario, intro., ed. and tr., Louvain-La-Neuve 1983; DIP 6, 296-298; DSp 11, 345-354; H. Ringshausen, Zur Verfasserschaft und Chronologie der dem Nilus Ancyranus zugeschriebene Werke, Frankfurt a.M. 1967; J. Gribomont, La tradition manuscrite de s. Nil: StudMon 11 (1969) 231-267; A. Cameron, The Authenticity of the Letters of St. Nilus: Greek, Roman and Byz. Studies 17 (1976) 181-196; P. Bettiolo, Le Sententiae di Nilo: Cristianesimo nella Storia 1 (1980) 155-184; M.-G. Guérard, Nil d'Ancyre. Commentaire sur le Cantique der Cantiques. Édition princeps. Tome 1, SC 403, Paris 1994; D. Folger Caner, Nilus of Ancyra and the Promotion of a Monastic Élite: Arethusa 33 (2000) 401-410; L. Bossina, Per un'edizione della "Catena dei Tre Padri" sul "Cantico": Cirillo di Alessandria o Nilo "Ancirano"?: MEG 1 (2001) 29-51; H.-U. Rosenbaum, Nilus von Ancyra, Schriften I, Kommentar zum Hohenlied, Göttingen 2004.

J. Gribomont

NIMBUS – HALO (iconography). A luminous disk set around the head of a divinity, divinized person or allegorical figure. Particularly common in a Greco-Roman and Eastern context as an attribute of the gods, emperors and of symbolic personifications (J. Strzygowski, Calenderbilder, pls. IXXIII-XIV), it was assumed by Christian art, indicating continuity in the translation of an idea into an image, in a symbolic and cultic evocation. In the vault of the mausoleum of the Julii, in the necropolis under St. Peter's in the Vatican, Christ-Helios is represented with a radiating nimbus (O. Perler, Die Mosaiken der Juliergruft). In the frescoes of the catacombs it was initially given to ornamental and symbolic figures, and to the sun (Wp 2, 1-2), acc. to classical tradition. The seasons in the catacomb of St. Marcellinus and Peter have the nimbus, as do the Phoenix in the Greek catacomb at Priscilla (P. Testini, Catacombe e ant. cimiteri, fig. 115) and the representation of Tellus, also thought to be Cleopatra, in the hypogeum of the Via Latina (A. Ferrua, Via Latina, pl. 102). From the middle of the 4th c. it is attributed to Christ, both to his real figure and the symbol of the Agnus Dei (Wp 252), as well as to the dove. However, it is not used uniformly: its absence does not have the same value as a chronological indicator as does its presence.

In the frescoes of the catacomb of *Domitilla (Wp 115, 2; 225, 1; 181, 1), *Callistus (Wp 243, 1), Mark and Marcellinus (Wp 153, 1) and St. Cyriac (Wp 205; 206, 1), Christ among the *apostles and *saints is the only one with a nimbus. Only later do *Peter and *Paul (Commodilla, Traditio Clavium, WMM, 148-149; U. Fasola, La cat. di S. Gennaro, pl. VI, fig. 71) and the numerous figures of saints who fill the catacombs receive the nimbus (Wp 255, 1-2; 256; 259, 1; 260; 261; 264, 2; M. Marinone, Cat. di Albano, fig. 16). That of Christ from the 5th c. often has a cross marked by a monogram, with or without apocalyptic letters (e.g., Marcellinus and Peter, Wp 252, *sarcophagi of *Arles, *Tarragona, *Ravenna). It is more rarely found, but is nonetheless found, on sarcophagi, where often it had to be painted. The form does not vary much, and the color on the frescoes varies from brown to blue, to a dark green, to yellow. Very common from the 2nd half of the 4th c. on mosaics, which allowed better preservation of the colors and on which gilded, translucent and bejeweled nimbi soon became popular. At St. Vitale in Ravenna the classical tradition of the nimbus as an honorific emblem is still found: *Justinian and *Theodora, among their court, are haloed. From the 6th c. onward, the nimbus is always given to Mary, to the angels and saints, and to the symbols of the evangelists.

The tabula circa verticem, the square or rectangular nimbus or "pseudo-nimbus, " considered by Paul the Deacon, in the life of *Gregory the Great, as a signum viventis, is placed around the heads of living persons in frescoes, mosaics and illuminations. Certainly manifesting a special dignity, or, acc. to some, a particular role (e.g., that of founder), intended to give the impression of a portrait true and proper, they assumed considerable importance in medieval portraiture.

DACL 12, 1272-1312; EC 8, 1884-1887; EAA 5, 493-497; LCI 3, 324-332; G. Ladner, The So-Called Square Nimbus: Medieval Studies 3 (1941) 15-45; M. Collinet Guérin, Histoire du nimbe des origines aux temps modernes, Paris 1961 (with bibl.); J. Strzygowski, Die Calenderbilder der Chronographen vom Jahre 354: JDAI, Berlin 1888, Suppl. 1; O. Perler, Die Mosaiken der Juliergruft in Vatikan, Freiburg (CH) 1953; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966; M. Marinone, La decorazione pittorica della catacomba di Albano: RIA 19/20 (1972-1973) 103-138; U.M. Fasola, La catacomba di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; B. Brenk, Aureola: EAM 2, 720-722; G.B. Ladner, God, Cosmos, and Human Kind: The World of Early Christian Symbolism, Berkeley, CA 1995; TIP 230-1.

A.M. Giuntella

NÎMES, Council of. In 394 or 396, about twenty bishops, all followers of *Felix of Trier, came together at Nîmes (*Gaul), to settle the doctrinal conflicts linked to *Priscillianism and the quarrels that had arisen between the bishops of Aix and *Arles and those of *Marseille and *Vienne. The absence of the opposing parties impeded the resolution of these problems, but, by way of compensation, the council issued many disciplinary canons, esp. against the ordination of women to the diaconal ministry (can. 2) and against itinerant clerics (can. 1).

CCL 148, 49-51; SC 241, 124-131; Hfl-Lecl II, 79-81; Palazzini 3, 198-199.

Ch. Munier

NINIAN, saint. The most ancient evidence of this Scottish saint is given to us by *Bede (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. 3, 4), in two poems from the end of the 8th c. (Miracula and Hymnus Nynie ep.), and by a Life of a later era, by Aelred of Rievaulx (12th c.). According to these traditions Ninian was a priest educated in *Rome (ordained by Pope *Siricius?), then missionary and bishop for the Picts of the region of Galloway in *Scotland; he had founded a church of stone ("Candida Casa") dedicated to St. Martin, which was the episcopal see and place of burial of Ninian, today to be located at Whithorn or Withern. Ninian died as a hermit; Whithorn passed through the cradle of rigid Celtic monasticism. The feast of Ninian is celebrated in Scotland on 16 Sept.

BHL 6239-6241; BS 9, 1012-1014; LCI 8, 66; BBKL 6, 946-948; P. Grosjean, Les Pictes apostats dans l'épître de s. Patrice: AB 76 (1958) 354-378; J. MacQueen, St Nynia, Edinburgh 1990.

S. Heid - V. Saxer

NINO. *Rufinus (HE 10, 11, based on the lost ecclesiastical history of *Gelasius of Caesarea), recounts the story of an anonymous slave of the kings of *Georgia (*Armenia), who had converted her masters to Christianity. In this same form the story is given by the Byzantine synaxaria (Synax. Eccl. CP, 27 Oct). In the 8th c., ps.-*Moses of Khorene (Story of Armenia, 8th–9th c.) gives to this anonymous person the name of Nounè; the slave of Rufinus becomes a virgin ("nonna" in the sense of nun!) (see R.W. Thomson, Moses Khorenats'i. History of the Armenians, Cambridge, MA-London 1978, 238-240). The Georgian collection Conversion of Kartli (10th c.) gives two independent recensions, which are hagiographical in character but not without historical elements, on the life of Nino; they reflect the relations between *Jerusalem and Georgia as established by pilgrims (e.g., the cross of gold on the Mount of Olives and the mountain of the cross at Mtskheta; S. Heid, Kreuz - Jerusalem - Kosmos, Münster 2001, 156). Bodi, the place of burial of Nino, may be identified with the E Georgian town of Bodbe. The Georgian synaxaria keep the feast of Nino on 14 Jan, the Armenian on 29 Oct. In the West, Baronius inserted in the Mart. Rom. on 15 Dec the mention of the "Christian prisoner," "the holy Christian handmaid" who had converted Georgia.

BHO 811; BS 9, 1018-1021; RAC 17, 45-50; BBKL 14, 1322-1324; P. Peeters, Les débuts du christianisme en Géorgie d'après les sources hagiographiques: AB 50 (1932) 5-58; G. Pätsch, Das Leben Kartlis. Eine Chronik aus Georgien 300-1200, Leipzig 1985; G. Shurgaia (ed.), Santa Nino e la Georgia, Atti del I Conv. Int. di Studi Georgiani, Rome 2000; J. Pahlitzsch, Die Bedeutung Jerusalems für Königtum und Kirche in Georgen zur Zeit der Kreuzzüge im Vergleich zu Armenien, in W. Brandmüller (ed.), L'idea di Gerusalemme nella spiritualità cristiana del medioevo, Vatican City 2003, 104-131.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

NISIBIS
I. The city and Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. The city and Christianity. Nisibis (today Nusaybin, in Turkey) was a point of transit for caravans between the East and the West; Nisibis therefore found itself on the path of numerous invaders who, at different times, took possession of it. Populated by Greek colonies by Seleucus I, at the beginning of the Christian era it became the object of a bitter dispute between the Persians and the Romans. It fell into the hands of the latter from 297. If we say that it enters into Christian history from that date, we should recognize that its evangelization was much earlier, in that the presence of Mari, disciple of *Addai, apostle of *Edessa, is attested further to the S, at Ctesiphon, between 79 and 116. The first historical evidence of Christianity at Nisibis remains the epitaph of *Abercius of Hierapolis. Additionally, the memorials of the martyrs of Nisibis in the old Breviarium Syriacum show the antiquity of the evangelization of Nisibis.

The first bishop of the city was *Jacob of Nisibis, celebrated by *Ephrem in his Carmina Nisibena. His episcopate lasted about thirty years (ca. 308/309–338). He participated in the Council of *Nicaea (325). Jacob is also said to have founded the *school of Nisibis, calling Ephrem "interpreter" or commentator on the Scriptures. However, it is only with *Narsai (399–502) that the true school of Nisibis begins, after the closure of the school of the Persians at Edessa in 489. During the life of Jacob, Nisibis saw a period of peace. Shortly before his death in 338, however, the Persians returned to lay siege to Nisibis, then again in 346 and 350. After the death of Vologases II, the successor of Jacob, the emperor *Jovian negotiated in 363 with *Shapur II the transfer of Nisibis to the Persians. After the exodus of the Hellenic population, Shapur II had 12,000 Persians moved there to replace the inhabitants who had left with the Roman troops. Thus, having been Greek for six centuries, Nisibis became Persian. This change would have a considerable influence on the direction of theological controversies in the following centuries. Along with Nisibis, the five provinces beyond the Tigris also came under Persian dominion, becoming the five dioceses dependent on Nisibis. Among the Syro-Eastern metropolises, Nisibis occupied the second place, after Elam or Beth Lapat-Gundeshapor, royal summer residence of the *Sassanids.

The most famous metropolitan of Nisibis in the 5th c. was *Barsauma, who secured the triumph of *Nestorianism in Persia. One of his decisive actions in this respect was to attract to Nisibis the great doctor Narsai, who had been compelled to flee Edessa in 457 or 471. After coming to Nisibis he founded, at the request of Barsauma, the school of Nisibis, a breeding ground of bishops and missionaries, the intellectual and spiritual center of Nestorianism. Barsauma also founded a hospital in which the doctors of Nisibis were trained, who subsequently had great influence at the court of the king of Persia, a tradition which continued up to the court of the caliphs of Baghdad (9th c.).

At the beginning of 6th c. the first *monophysites appeared in Nisibis. Nonetheless, the city remained the stronghold of Nestorianism, its influence making itself felt as far as Roman Syria. The contacts and exchange of ideas with the Byzantines were not interrupted, however. The metropolitan *Paul of Nisibis was one of the theologians sent by *Chosroes I to *Justinian for a disputation on theological matters. It was, however, at the school of Nisibis itself, in about 567, that a theological dispute broke out with *Henana of Adiabene, who, since he taught theses contrary to the doctrine of the Interpreter (*Theodore of Mopsuestia, d. 428), was expelled from the school.

From 565 onward, with the emperor *Justin II, a new period began in the relations between the Persians and the Byzantines. The latter laid claim to Nisibis, and hostilities started again in 572. The Persians, however, retained the city. At the death of the metropolitan Paul in 573, Henana returned as director of the school of Nisibis and resumed teaching his errors. The new metropolitan, Gregory, was impotent against the rebels, because Chosroes, manipulated by the doctors and Henana, in 601 sent Gregory into exile, where he died in 611/612.

The conflict between the Persians and the Byzantines resumed in 602. Nisibis rose up against Chosroes, and the king seized control and sacked the city. Neither was the church in peace, disturbed by doctrinal controversies. Cyriacus, metropolitan of Nisibis, reached an agreement with numerous other metropolitans to elect *Babai the Great as the general supervisor of the convents, to the end of combating the *Messalians, and the followers of Henana and *Joseph Hazzaya. For more than ten years Babai worked to consolidate the Nestorian faith, until his death a little after the year 628. In the meantime the battle between the Persians and the Byzantines continued, extending itself even more under *Heraclius, who repelled the Persians and advanced toward the cities of royal residence, which he conquered in 629. Nisibis was then in the hands of the Byzantines. In the same period (631) we read of a Syro-Western bishop in the city, Abraham by name. We do not know if he had successors. During the Byzantine occupation, Nisibis was hit by a terrible famine. In 639 Heraclius had to abandon the city, and it was surrendered to Arab Muslims, thereby beginning a new era for the city. At this time the Nestorian church was engaged mainly in the fight against the monophysites, who sought to establish themselves within the city: in 707 this project was brought to an end. In that very year a monk of Qartamin, Simon of Zayté, had a large church built for the orthodox, and a hospice for foreigners. The uninterrupted series of Syro-Western bishops of Nisibis, however, began only in the 9th c. The school of the city, even if the doctrinal innovations of Henana had brought it into discredit, continued to exist until 832, when it was replaced by the school of Baghdad.

DTC 11, 157-323; CE 10, 473-474; Labourt, passim; Ortiz de Urbina, 15-17; 120-122; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis, CSCO 266, Subs. 26, Louvain 1965; J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, Subs. 36, Louvain 1970; Id., Nisibe, métropole syriaque orientale et ses suffragants, des origines à nos jours, CSCO 388, Subs. 54, Louvain 1977; D. Bundy, Jacob of Nisibis as a Model for the Episcopacy: LM 104 (1991) 235-249; E. Kettenhofen, Die Eroberung von Nisibis und Karrhai durch die Sasaniden in der Zeit Kaiser Maximins (235/236 n. Chr.): Iranica Antiqua 30 (1995) 159-177.

R. LAVENANT

II. Archaeology. The church of Mar Yaqub, constructed above the crypt, is believed to have been inhabited by the saint. It was built in 359 and transformed in the 8th and 9th c.: it is a building on a square plan, with an apse at the E and facing atrium.

J. Strzygowski, L'ancien art chrétien de Syrie, Paris 1936, 9 and 147; U. Monneret de Villard, Le chiese della Mesopotamia, Rome 1940.

B. BAGATTI

NISIBIS, School of. After the surrender of Nisibis to the *Sassanid Empire in 363, the exegetical-theological division of the school of Nisibis was transferred to *Edessa which thanks to the influence of *Ephrem continued to attract many students from Persian lands and was as a result called "the School of the Persians." *Narsai, who was first a student and then in 437–457 became the rector of the school, had to leave Edessa after 457 because of his *dyophysite *Christology. Ceding to the pressures of the metropolitan *Barsauma, who also was once a student at Edessa, Narsai in 471 at Nisibis established the true and proper school of Nisibis, which undoubtedly took on teachers and students from the school of Edessa when it was closed by the emperor *Zeno in 489. In 494, the first rules of the school were drafted, which immediately became the spiritual and intellectual center of the church of Persia and the primary architect of its adoption of dyophysite Christology.

After the death of Narsai in 502, the school was directed for a very long and uninterrupted period from 510 to 569–570 by *Abraham of Beth Rabban, who ordered the construction of a large complex of buildings to host the ever-increasing activity of the school. From 569 to 571, the future catholicos *Isho'yahb I was rector of the school. His successor *Henana of Adiabene, one of the great Syro-Western theologians and the enfant terrible of the church of Persia, led the school from 572–610. From 572 onward Henana was a protagonist of exegetical and theological debate, inciting bitter controversies because of his exegetical and christological innovations. For this reason, in 596–597, nearly 300 teachers and students—among whom was *Ishai, the future catholicos *Isho'yahb II and *Michael Badoqa—left the school of Nisibis, and many of them then went on to other schools. The most famous teacher of the school of Nisibis was without a doubt Mar *Aba, who toward the end of the years 530–540 established the school of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon.

In the literary field, the school of Nisibis was best known for a type of theological explanation of "reasons" for certain celebrations, liturgical or otherwise, which seems to have been developed by Narsai and became a widespread literary genre in the schools and in the monasteries of the church of the East. Among the authors from whom such Explanations have survived we find Ishai, *Thomas of Edessa,

*Cyrus of Edessa, Henana and *Barhadbeshabba ʿArbāyā. This last author wrote, between the years 558 and 596, the speech On the Formation of the Schools, which is one of the most important sources for our understanding of the history of the school of Nisibis.

Patrologia V, 473-476; A. Scher, Mar Barhadbeshabba ʿArbaya, évêque de Halwan (VIe siècle), Cause de la fondation des écoles (PO 4/4), Paris 1908; A. Vööbus, The Statutes of the School of Nisibis, Stockholm 1961; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 226), Louvain 1965; N. El-Khoury, Auswirkungen der Schule von Nisibis: OC 59 (1975) 121-129; R. Macina, L'homme à l'école de Dieu. D'Antioche à Nisibe: profile herméneutique, théologique et kérygmatique du mouvement scoliaste nestorien. Monographie programmatique: POC 32 (1982) 86-124, 263-301 and 33 (1983) 39-103; Mar Abraham Mattam, The School of Nisibis-Edessa: First Theological University in Christendom: Christian Orient 6 (1985) 30-39.

K. den Biesen

NITRIA. This monastic complex was found in the W part of the Nile Delta, at the boundary of the cultivated area, where in about 315 Amun (*Ammon, d. ca. 337), a contemporary of *Anthony, retired. The name comes from the Greek nitron (Lat. nitrium, owing to the existence of saltpeter caves); literary sources speak of the mountain of Nitria, as it is higher than the Nile Valley (Palladius, Historia Laus. 7, 1,). Having married, Amun decided to live in chastity with his wife who, after 18 years of marriage, suggested that he embrace the ascetic life. He then retired, as an anchorite, into the desert of Nitria (Palladius, ibid., ch. 8), perhaps to be located in the present-day village of el-Barnudj, 14 km (8.7 mi) to the S of the city of Damanhour (the ancient Hermopolis Parva). Other anchorites joined him. Rufinus, in the Historia monachorum in Aegypto (chs. 21-22), writes that he went to Nitria, where there were *monks under the guide of one sole father, some living alone, others in larger or smaller groups. Thus the eremetic and *cenobitic life were established in the same place. *Palladius also, author of the Historia Lausiaca (ch. 7), went to Nitria in 390, remaining there one year; he puts the number of people there at five thousand. There was a common church and next door a house for pilgrims, who could remain as long as they wished, although they had to contribute by working. The monks produced wine, bread and fabrics, which they sold for their maintenance. They came together for common prayer on Saturday and Sunday; there were eight priests, but the eldest celebrated and preached. Among the illustrious visitors, beyond the two already mentioned, were *Jerome and *Paula in about 385, and *Evagrius of Pontus, who remained there ten years. In the 7th c. the vast monastery faded away. Deriving from this monastic center was that of Kellia (the cells), some 10 km (6.2 mi) to the SW, founded in about 337, of which numerous ruins remain in an area of ca. 100 square km (ca. 40 square mi). Much farther to the S, some 60 km (37.3 mi), the monastic complex of Scete at Wadi-Natrum is to be found; it was founded at that same time, and is still in existence.

DIP 6, 303-306; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1794-1796; W. Harmless, Desert Christians: An Introduction to the Literature of Early Monasticism, New York 2004, 279-281 (see index).

A. Di Berardino

NOAH.
I. In the Fathers - II. Ark of Noah (iconography).

I. In the Fathers. Noah, whose name etymologically means "consoled, " is the patriarch of the age of the flood of which both Genesis and some Babylonian texts speak. In the biblical text, Noah is a farmer, inventor of the cultivation of vines and makes Ham serve Shem (Gen 9:18-27); Noah, however, is principally connected with the flood (Gen 6:5-9 and 17), known as a the righteous man who is saved along with his family and cooperating in the salvation of humanity. After the sin of the first couple, it is with Noah that God makes a new covenant, with the promise that there will not be another flood, and with the symbol of the rainbow as sign of this promise. Noah is mentioned also in other books of the OT (Is 54:9; Ezek 14:12-23; Sir 44:17) and of the NT, from the gospels to the letters. In fact, in Mt 24:37 the unexpected second coming of the Son of Man is compared by Jesus to the arrival of the flood, which surprised people while they ate, drank and married, up to the moment that Noah entered the ark: "And they knew nothing until the flood came and swept them all away." In Hebrews, Noah—together with Abel, Enoch and obviously Abraham—is a symbol of that faith defined in 11:1—"the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen": "By faith Noah, warned by God about events as yet unseen, respected the warning and built an ark to save his household; by this he condemned the world and became an heir to the righteousness that is in accordance with faith" (Heb 11:7). A typological interpretation of the Noachic episode as a prefiguration of baptism is found already in 1 Pet 3:20, where the eight persons saved by Noah "by means of water" are a "figure of baptism, which saves you now." In 2 Pet 2:5 Noah is the righteous man who announces justice: if God "did not spare the ancient world, he nonetheless saved Noah, a herald of righteousness, with seven others, when he brought a flood on a world of the ungodly." These typological meanings with which Noah is invested in the NT were taken up and developed in the Fathers, while side-by-side with this, in the rabbinic literature, Noah has the role of intercessor before God in favor of the just. In this way he remains a figure who contributes to the work of salvation.

In the Fathers in general, Noah, a subject of Christian iconography from ancient times, inspiring in poetry also a hymn of *Romanus Melodus, is seen as an example of morality and faith, as in *Gregory of Nazianzus, Or. 43, 70, and as a preacher of penitence already in 1 Clement 7, 6, and then in *Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autol. 3, 19. Above all, however, the person of Noah has frequently and from the earliest times been an object of typological *exegesis, principally as a type of Christ and antitype of Adam.

In fact, acc. to *Justin Martyr, who provides an extended typological reflection on the wood and the water as symbols respectively of the cross and of baptism which admit to salvation, frequently in Dial. 86 associating the wood and the water in order to connect the cross and baptism, the just man Noah prefigures Christ, and the eight persons who are saved with him in the ark represent the *Ogdoad which Christ accomplished, saving us through the wood of the cross, as Noah brings the righteous to salvation through the wood of the ark (Dial. 138, 1-2): "In the times of the flood the μυστήριον of human salvation appeared. For the just Noah, along with the others at the flood, i.e., with his own wife, his three sons and their wives, being eight in number, were a symbol of the eighth day, in which Christ appeared when he rose from the dead, the day which always has the prerogative of being the first, " i.e., Sunday, the day of the Lord. In patristic exegesis the episode of the ark is often considered a figure of baptism, following 1 Pet 3:20-21, which as we saw interprets the salvation of the ark precisely as a τύπος of baptism (see H. Rahner, L'ecclesiologia dei Padri. Simboli della Chiesa, It. tr. Rome 1971, 865-938; Id., Miti greci nell'interpretazione cristiana, It. tr. Bologna 1971, 63-86: Il mistero della croce; 87-106: Il mistero del battesimo). Justin also insists, alongside the way of the flood and of baptism, on the importance of the wood, that of the ark, which prefigures that of the cross of Christ, which "became the origin of another race regenerated by himself through water, and faith, and wood, possessing the mystery of the cross [μυστήριον τοῦ σταυροῦ]; even as Noah was saved by wood when he rode over the waters with his household. Accordingly, when the prophet [Is 54:8-9] says, 'I saved you in the times of Noah,' he addresses at the same time the people who truly have faith in God, and possess these signs, " that is those of baptism and of the cross, "as was shown in advance by all the symbols [σύμβολα] of the flood; i.e., those who are prepared by water, faith, and wood and who repent of their sins shall escape from the impending judgment of God" (Dial. 138, 2-3). The typology of the sons of Noah and their descendants is traced by Justin to the presence of a great μυστήριον, accomplished in Christ ("There is another mystery prophesied at the times of Noah, and which has been accomplished, " Dial. 139, 1), linked to the universality of salvation of Christ. Justin's line was followed by *Clement and *Origen, who show continuity with him in their interpretation of Noah: in Hom. in Gen. 2 both a typological exegesis and an *allegorical exegesis of the Noah story are provided: in the first, Noah represents Christ, the flood the end of the world and the ark the church; in the second, the three and two floors of the ark are seen as a symbol of the three senses of Scripture, which are sometimes only two because, acc. to Origen, in certain biblical passages the literal sense is absent, and we are faced with the ἄλογα or the ἀδύνατα.

The ark also becomes a symbol of the church in the controversy between *Hippolytus and Pope *Callistus, on the question of whether the ark-church symbolizes a Christian community, including both the just and sinners, or refers only to the instrument of salvation of the first. *Cyril of Jerusalem also considers the typology of the dove which, sent by Noah out of the ark, returns with an olive branch: this prefigures the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, when the Holy Spirit descended on him in the form of a dove (Cat. 17, 7). According to *Asterius the Sophist, Noah, closed up in the ark during the flood, prefigures Christ buried in the tomb (Hom. in Ps. 6).

A type of Christ, Noah is also an antitype of Adam, in that, acc. to St. *Athanasius of Alexandria, Noah is he who renews the human race corrupted by sin (Oratio c. Arian. 2, 51), who has saved, in himself, the image of God and domination over the inferior creatures, as note *Basil of Seleucia, Or. 5, 2; *Cosmas Indicopleustes, Topogr. Chr. 5; and *John Chrysostom Hom. in Gen. 25, 5. The name of Noah, acc. to Origen, means "justice, " δικαιοσύνη (Hom. in Gen. 2, 3): in effect, already for his master Clement, as earlier for Justin, Noah is a symbol of the just: thus Origen in Princ. I praef. 4 can include Noah among the just of God who, in an anti-*Marcionite sense, is called "God of all the just, from the foundation of the world: Adam, Abel, Seth, Enosh, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob . . . Jesus Christ, the apostles." Even the episode of Noah's drunkenness is interpreted by Origen in an allegorical sense: the wine, produced by Noah undressed and drunk, is assimilated to the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, in that the wine too may become an occasion of sin; the sin of Noah, however, was due only to ignorance (Hom. in Gen. 9, 20). The figure of Noah therefore finds in the Fathers numerous typological and allegorical interpretations.

RGG^4, 1501-1502; DB 4, 1661-1667; BS 9, 1027-1028; J. Daniélou, Sacramentum Futuri, Paris 1950, 60ff.; Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon II, 1613-1615; J.P. Lewis, A Study of the Interpretation of Noah and the Flood in the Jewish and Christian Literature, Leiden 1968; P. van Sichem, L'hymne sur N. de Romanos le Mélode: EHBS 36 (1968) 27-36; Origen, I Principî, ed. M. Simonetti, Turin 1968; E. Testa, La figura di N. secondo i SS. Padri (Contributo alla storia della esegesi): SBF 20 (1970) 138-165; H. Buschhausen, Die Deutung des Archemosaiks in der justinianischen Kirche von Mopsuestia: JOEByz 21 (1972) 57-71; R. Stichel, Naturwissenschaftliche Kenntnis des Romanos im Noe-Hymnus: Hermes 100 (1972) 249-251; P. Franke, Bemerkungen zur frühchristlichen Noe-Ikonographie: RivAC 49 (1973) 171-182; J. Schlosser, Les jours de Noe et de Lot. À propos de Luc XVII, 26-30: RBi 80 (1973) 13-36; E. Lucchesi, Note sur un lieu de Cassiodore faisant allusion aux sept livres d'Ambroise sur les patriarches: VChr 30 (1976) 307-309; J. Gutmann, Noah's Raven in Early Christian and Byzantine Art: CArch 26 (1977) 63-71; R. Pillinger, Noe zwischen zwei Tauben: RivAC 54 (1978) 97-102; A. Quacquarelli, L'unità dei due Testamenti nell'iconografia del II e III secolo: VetChr 18 (1981) 253-274; D. Ramos-Lissón, Tipologías sacrificiales-eucarísticas del Antiguo Testamento en la epístola 63 de san Cipriano: Augustinianum 63 (1982) 187-197; J.A. Maritz, Noah's Ark and the Animals of Early Christian Art: Akroterion 28 (1983) 102-108; M. Fédou, La vision de la Croix dans l'oeuvre de saint Justin, "philosophe et martyr": RecAug 19 (1984) 29-210; M. Harl, Le nom de l'arche de Noe dans la Septante. Les choix lexicaux des traducteurs alexandrins, indices d'interprétation théologique?, in Alexandrina. Hellénisme, judaïsme et christianisme à Alexandrie. Mélanges C. Mondésert, Paris 1987; T. Kaczmarek, Tipologia eucaristica di Noè nella Lettera 63 di S. Cipriano: SP 21 (1989) 260-263; G. Gounaris, The Early Christian Paintings of Tomb no. 18 at the University Campus of Thessaloniki: Egnatia 2 (1990) 245-262; N.R.C. Cohn, Noah's Flood, New Haven, CT 1996; P. Gray, Covering the Nakedness of Noah: ByzF 24 (1997) 193-205; D. Diedrich, Noach: LThK^2 7, 886-887; R. Patai, The Children of Noah, Princeton, NJ 1998; M. Dulaey, Noè, in Id., "Des forêts de symbols." L'initation chrétienne et la Bible (I^{er}-VI^e siècle), Paris 2001, 191-212; C. Carletti, L'arca di Noè: ovvero La Chiesa di Callisto e l'uniformità della "morte scritta": AntTard 9 (2001) 97-102; M. Edwards, Origen on Christ, Tropology, and Exegesis, in Metaphor, Allegory, and the Classical Tradition, ed. G.R. Boys-Stones, Oxford 2003, 235-256; J.D. Pleins, When the Great Abyss Opened: Classic and Contemporary Readings of Noah's Flood, Oxford 2003; M.P. Ciccarese, Origene e l'arca di Noè: l'expositio historica, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Lenza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 96-113; I. Ramelli, San Giustino Martire: il multiforme uso di mustørion e il lessico dell'esegesi tipologica delle Scritture, in Il volto del Mistero, II, ed. A.M. Mazzanti, Castel Bolognese 2006, 35-66; Id., Origen and the Stoic Allegorical Tradition: Continuity and Innovation, in Invigilata Lucernis 28 (2006) 195-226; Id., Christian Soteriology and Christian Platonism. Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, and the Biblical and Philosophical Basis of the Doctrine of Apokatastasis, VChr 61 (2007) 313-356.

I. RAMELLI

II. Ark of Noah (iconography). The ark of Noah is at the center of a sphere of symbolism of great importance (Wp 316): in fact, the ark is an allegory of the church which saves the righteous and outside which no one can be saved. St. Peter views it in relation to baptism. According to the biblical text (Gen 6:3-22), God gives to Noah precise instructions for the construction of the ark which results in a rectangular structure with three floors: a sort of enormous chest. It is in this way that the ark appears in ancient Christian depictions. Probably this iconography derives from classical repertory, in particular from the mythical episode of Deucalion and Pyrrha, who were thrown into the sea inside a chest. It is thought that the oldest representation of the ark is the picture in the hypogeum of the Flavi in the catacomb of *Domitilla, dating from the first twenty years of the 3rd c. The Roman catacombs contain about fifty depictions of the subject. The scene is also common in sculpture. The oldest examples are the so-called Jonah sarcophagus (Ws 9, 3 = Rep. 35) and the ex-Lateran sarcophagus 236 (Ws 57 = Rep. 46), both from the end of 3rd c. In this last the deceased appears, praying in the ark in place of Noah because in sepulchral symbolism the figure of Noah was assimilated to the idea of the salvation of the soul, just as the dove, when it appears, normally refers to the saving intervention of the Lord. An arcosolium painted in the catacomb of Pamphilus in Rome, dating from the mid-4th c., shows the variant of the closed ark (normally it is open), without Noah; to the left the dove appears, in flight, while to the right it returns with the olive branch. In the 5th c., at el-Bagawat in Egypt, the ark is portrayed as a gondola (a unique case). In mosaic, there is a damaged portrayal of the ark of Noah in the cupola of the mausoleum of Centcelles in Spain, from the middle of the 4th c. In the floor mosaic of the basilica of Mopsuestia (1st half of the 5th c.) in Cilicia, the ark, set on feet, stands surrounded in a circle by the animals; it bears the inscription ΝΩΕ. Finally, in Palestine, there is a mosaic floor, dating to ca. 530, in the synagogue discovered under the church of Sts. *Cosmas and Damian at Gerasa, showing Noah leaving the ark after the flood.

In sculpture, Noah is shown in a fragment of an illustrated baptismal font in the Bardo Museum, originating from Sufetula (Sbeitla); he is turned toward the dove with the olive and the raven. In a sarcophagus of the Museum of Velletri (Rep. 4, 3), of the end of the 4th c., the ark appears on feet. Noah is always alone in the ark, with the exception of the sarcophagus of Trier, the dating of which is much disputed (4th–5th c.), where he appears with his whole family.

We find the same variant in the Pentateuch of Tours, from the beginning of the 7th c., which also shows the ark during the flood. Other illuminations that should be mentioned are the Cotton Codex and the Genesis of Vienna (of the *Justinian era), where the ark is depicted with more floors. In the sumptuary arts, a series of scenes about Noah are attested to in gold-glass and on clay lamps. A window of the Constantinian era on display in Cologne shows Noah in the ark, together with other OT episodes. On the reverse side of some coins from Apamea, from the era of *Septimius Severus, Macrinus and Philip, the ark appears with two male figures. On the ark is written ΝΩΕ.

DACL 12, 1397-1400; EC 8, 1909-1910; LCI 3, 611-620; R. Garrucci, Storia dell'arte cristiana, III, Prato 1873-80, pls. 169-202; W. von Hartel - S. Wichkoff, Die Wiener Genesis, Vienna 1895, pl. 4; W. De Bock, Matériaux pour servir l'archéologie chrétienne de l'Égypte, Pietroburgo 1901, 22, pl. 12; M.A. Merlin, Catalogue des Musées et Collections Archéologiques de l'Algérie et de la Tunisie. Musée Aloui, III, Paris 1921, col. 1444, 73; E. Josi, Il cimitero di Panfilo: RivAC 3 (1926) 191, fig. 76; F.M. Biebel, Mosaics in Gerasa City of Decapolis, New Haven, CT 1938, 297-351; J. Daniélou, Les figures du Christ dans l'Ancien Testament, Paris 1950, 55; R.P.J. Hooyman, Die Noe Darstellungen in der frühchristliche Kunst: VChr 12 (1958) 113-135; A. Grabar, L'età d'oro di Giustiniano, Milan 1966, 202; H. Laag, Der Trierer Noe-Sarkophage: Festschrift A. Thomas, Trier 1967, 233-238; J. Porcher, in J. Porcher - J. Hubert - W.F. Volbach, L'Europa delle invasioni barbariche, Milan 1968, 128; L. Budde, Antike Mosaiken in Kilikien, Recklinghausen 1969, pls. 26-44; L. Pani Ermini, L'ipogeo detto dei Flavi a Domitilla, osservazioni sulla sua origine e sul carattere della decorazione: RivAC 45 (1969) 138, fig. 9, 173; J. Fink, Bemerkungen zur frühchristlichen Noe-Ikonographie: RivAC 49 (1973) 171; G. Gutmann, Noah's Raven in Early Christian and Byzantine Art: CArch 26 (1977) 63-75; H. Schlunk - Th. Hauschild, Die Denkmäler der frühchristlichen und westgotischen Zeit, Mainz a.R. 1978, 25-27, pls. 12-19; R. Pillinger, Noe zwischen zwei Tauben: RivAC 54 (1978) 97-102; TIP 231; C. Carletti, L'arca di Noè: ovvero la Chiesa di Callisto e l'uniformità della "morte scritta": AntTard 9 (2001) 97-102

A.M. Di Nino

NOETUS of Smyrna (2nd half of the 2nd c.). He was the first to spread *patripassian doctrines, toward the end of the 2nd c., and for this was condemned by the presbyters of *Smyrna. *Hippolytus (Noët. 1) states that Noetus affirmed that he was *Moses and that his brother was *Aaron.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentum, Leipzig 1884, 616-618; BBKL VI, 984-985; M. Simonetti, Ippolito contro Noeto, Bologna 2000.

M. Simonetti

NOLA-CIMITILE. The sanctuary of St. *Felix at Cimitile was one of the great places of pilgrimage of Late Antiquity, particularly between 4th–5th c. Its center was the burial place of the martyr Felix, perhaps dating from the end of the 3rd c., in a cemeterial area near the city of Nola, then an episcopal see. Between the end of the 2nd c. and the beginning of the 3rd c. a necropolis grew up in the N suburb of Nola, constituted by mausoleums, of which at least ten have been identified on a N-S alignment, and an overground funerary area: it was here that the tomb of the priest Felix was located, resulting, from the 1st half of the 4th c., in the birth of a magnificent martyrial sanctuary. From the original use of the area, the sanctuary itself, and then the built-up zone which over time grew up around it, assumed the name of Cimiterium, attested to with certainty toward the middle of the 9th c., a term which became corrupted over the centuries into Cimitile.

As the complex was only 1.5 km (ca. 1 mi) from the center of Nola, it was natural that the development of the shrine should have influenced the urban evolution of the city; in this respect the positioning of the cathedral should be noted, as it seems to have been moved, although many doubts remain over the question. The medieval cathedral built at Nola on the remains of the temple of Jupiter may have copied the siting of the ancient cathedral, or it may have replaced a paleo-Christian cathedral erected at Cimitile, and even the episcopal residence may have returned in the medieval period to its original location at Nola, having been moved for some centuries to the shrine. Unquestioned, however, are the close links between the two places: the center of civil authority at Nola and the religious one at Cimitile, around the tomb of the saint.

The establishment of the shrine began in the very first years of the 4th c., when a small mausoleum was constructed over the tombs of Felix and the first contemporary bishops, Quintus and Maximus: this was soon expanded with the addition of two other mausoleums, built as privileged places of burial near to the local martyr. Demolished shortly afterward (still in the Constantinian era), they were replaced by a great apsed church with a single aisle, the basilica ad corpus, from which the remains of mural decorations indicate NT scenes described by *Paulinus in his writings. To the E of this there already existed a basilica intended for liturgical use, with three aisles divided by pillars and terminating in an apse flanked by pastophoria, bounded outside by a rectilinear wall; at its S side, it was set against a chapel dedicated to St. Calionius. The whole monumental complex was completed by a large apsed building to the W, which archaeological remains have connected with the celebration of funeral rites, in particular the refrigerium*.

The building with three aisles was called the basilica vetus by Paulinus, and he renovated it at the beginning of the 5th c., to distinguish it from the basilica nova, which he actually built. This celebrated figure, of noble origin, who had also held the post of governor of Campania, retired with his wife to live near the martyrial shrine at the end of 4th c., becoming bishop of Nola in 412; he played a very great part in the growth of Felix's cult and in the expansion of the shrine centered on his tomb, and Paulinus's testimony about this in his works is very important. Even if the development of the sanctuary around the tomb, constituted by a monumental shrine supported by columns and capitals and decorated with mosaics, long attributed to the work of Paulinus, would seem in fact to date to the 6th c. (Korol), without doubt it is to Paulinus that the triforium which allowed passage to the basilica nova should be ascribed, which was built after the removal—to make room for the new church—of the old basilica ad corpus. The triforium perhaps took the place of the apse of basilica ad corpus (Lehmann). The basilica nova had three aisles divided by columns and a presbytery with a trichoral frame; its interior, as Paulinus himself records, was richly decorated with marble, both floor and walls, its decorative scheme depicting OT and NT scenes and crowned with a sumptuous mosaic in the central apse that displayed a central jeweled cross in a starry sky, with twelve doves, and the Agnus Dei on the celestial mountain, to which were turned twelve lambs in two ranks; completing the embellishment of the new construction was a series of marble screens, bearing engraved phrases of biblical inspiration on their cornices.

To the two basilicas other structures were added, essential for a place of pilgrimage: Paulinus built an aqueduct, necessary to satisfy the needs of the complex, the expansion of a monastic zone, which probably existed before him, and the creation of a hospice for pilgrims. The written sources, however, unfortunately provide limited evidence of the existence of a baptistery, something certainly appropriate for the sanctuary of a martyr of this importance. Finally, a new fresco containing OT scenes was undertaken in one of the old remaining mausoleums (n. 14). From Paulinus's description, moreover, the complex must have been surrounded by a wall, of which only clues can be said to exist, rather than actual archaeological evidence.

At the beginning of the 6th c. the shrine suffered grave damage following a flood which struck the area and from which traces of a thick layer of silt have been discovered, the presence of which—as well as its relation to the various monuments of the complex—help to identify the successive historical building phases; already before that date, in fact, the construction of the basilica dedicated to St. Stephen had occurred, while the funerary basilica of St. Thomas was built only later, on the residue left from the catastrophe. The flood naturally must have damaged the basilica nova, which was later in part restored, with the building of the church dedicated to Sts. John the Baptist and John the Evangelist in the zone of the trichoral presbytery and of the first part of the central aisle, which was used for funerary purposes in the 6th and 7th c. The vitality of the center of pilgrimage, focused on the tomb of the martyr, did not in any case abate: in particular, at the end of 9th c. and the start of the 10th, there were important works commissioned by local bishops, esp. Lupinus, to whom we may attribute some of the marble in the liturgical fittings of the sanctuary, and *Leo III, thanks to whom the oratory of St. Calionius was reconstructed, set against the S side of the basilica vetus, while a small basilica, dedicated to the holy martyrs, was built in the area of one of the ancient mausoleums of the necropolis (n. 13). There was decorative work undertaken on this last building, and on the restored oratory of St. Calionius, in the mid-10th c., the 11th c. and the 12th c.

In the 14th c, after the reconstructions of the cathedral of Nola, the shrine of Cimitile underwent further adaptation, with restoration of the church of St. John and the construction of a new chapel of St. Mary of the Angels at a location of paleo-Christian origins.

H. Belting, Cimitile. Le pitture medioevali e la pittura meridionale Alto Medievo, in A. Prandi, L'art dans l'Italie méridionale. Aggiornamento dell'opera di E. Bertaux IV, Parigi-Rome 1978, 177-182; D. Korol, Die frühchristlichen Wandmalereien aus den Grabbauten in Cimitile/Nola, Münster 1987; L. Pani Ermini et al., Recenti indagini nel complesso martiriale di S. Felice a Cimitile: RivAC 69 (1993) 223-313; G. Luongo (ed.), Anchora Vitae. Atti del II convegno paoliniano nel XVI centenario del ritiro di Paolino a Nola (Nola-Cimitile 18-20 maggio 1995), Naples-Rome 1998; L. Pani Ermini, Cimitile: EAM IV, 790-794; C. Ebanista, La Basilica Nova di Cimitile/Nola: gli scavi del 1931-1936: RivAC 76 (2000) 477-539; H. Brandenburg - L. Pani Ermini, Cimitile e Paolino di Nola. La tomba di S. Felice e il centro di pellegrinaggio—Trent'anni di ricerche, Atti della giornata tematica dei Seminari di Archeologia Cristiana, Vatican City 2003; C. Ebanista, "Et manet in mediis quasi gemma intersita tectis." La basilica di S. Felice a Cimitile, Naples 2003; M.K. Kiely, The Interior Courtyard: The Heart of Cimitile-Nola: JECS 12 (2004) 443-479; T. Lehmann, Paulinus Nolanus und die Basilica Nova in Cimitile/Nola. Untersuchungen zu einem zentralen Denkmal der spätantik-frühchristlichen Architektur, Wiesbaden 2004.

A. Milella

NOMINA SACRA. Ludwig Traube designated a certain number of terms in this way that were connected to the three persons of the *Trinity, to biblical figures, or relating to aspects of worship and reverence, as well as to ranks of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, which appear abbreviated by contraction in Latin and Greek biblical MSS from the 4th c. onward. Many of these abbreviations are found frequently, even in paleo-Christian inscriptions, but today the appellation nomina sacra is no longer used in critical epigraphy.

The hypothesis proposed was that the first nomina sacra were transcribed in an abbreviated form in order to accentuate their sacred character; it was equally thought that the overlining was also connected with this symbolism, but these theories have not proved convincing. Apart from any other consideration, abbreviated letters and numerals with overlining appear ordinarily in *epigraphy, with a purely distinguishing value.

Among the nomina sacra most commonly used in Greek *palaeography, we should note at least $\overline{\text{KC}}$ (Κύριος), $\overline{\text{IC}}$ $\overline{\text{XC}}$ (Ἰησοῦς Χριστός), $\overline{\text{YC}}$ (Υἱός), $\overline{\text{MP}}$ (Μήτηρ), $\overline{\text{CHP}}$ (Σωτήρ), $\overline{\Delta\text{A}\Delta}$ (Δαυίδ); in Latin, $\overline{\text{DS}}$ (Deus), $\overline{\text{IHS}}$ (Jesus), $\overline{\text{XPS}}$ (Christus), and later $\overline{\text{EPS}}$ (episcopus), $\overline{\text{PBR}}$ (presbyter), $\overline{\text{REVS}}$ (reverendissimus). Abbreviations by contraction were also widely used from the 6th c. in pagan texts.

DACL 12, 1478-1481; EC 8, 1926-1927; L. Traube, Nomina sacra: Quellen und Untersuchungen zur lateinischen Philologie des Mittelalters, 2, Munich 1907; C.H. Turner, The Nomina Sacra in Early Latin Christian Manuscripts: Miscellanea F. Ehrle, IV, Rome 1924, 62-74; C.H. Roberts, Manuscript, Society and Belief in Early Christian Egypt, Oxford 1979; I. Kajanto, Sopravvivenza dei nomi teoforici nell'età cristiana: Acta Archaeologica Academiae Scientiarum Hungarica 41 (1989) 159-168.

D. Mazzoleni

NONNA (d. ca. 374). Mother of *Gregory of Nazianzus, born of an old Christian family. Discourse 18 of Gregory describes her virtues and how she converted her husband.

F.J. Dölger, Nonna. Ein Kapitel über christliche Volksfrömmigkeit des IV. Jhrh.: AC 5 (1936) 44-75; M.M. Hauser-Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors von Nazianz, Bonn 1960, 134-135; BBKL 21, 1067-1068.

J. Gribomont

NONNUS of Panopolis (5th c.). Originally from Panopolis in Upper Egypt (today Akhmim), our knowledge of Nonnus is imprecise in regard both to biography and religious background. Livrea has proposed to identify him with a Pachomian monk who subsequently became a bishop of *Edessa, who lived between ca. AD 400 and 470. The arguments advanced are interesting, but in need of further investigation and corroboration to be convincing, in the context of a global reappraisal of the question.

Under the name of Nonnus we possess an epic poem, in 48 books, the longest of its type which has come to from Antiquity, titled Dionysiaca. In it are described the adventurous journeys and warlike and amorous deeds of Dionysius in India and in the cities of the Near East and Greece, until his final apotheosis. The poem is in character absolutely pagan, rich in mythological, topographical and antiquarian detail, and highly ornate in its language. It is an erudite work which, apart from its explicit reference to the Homeric model, represents the fruit of a long and complex tradition of the Greek epic in the imperial era. We should note that the hexameter of the text is characterized by the predominance of the dactyl, and the particular attention paid to the intensive nature of the accent.

Under the name of Nonnus, a hexametric paraphrase (Metabolē) of the gospel of John has come down to us, in 21 cantos, which reveals clear affinities, stylistic, linguistic and metrical, with the Dionysiaca. For this reason it is frequently attributed to the same author. There is no shortage of authoritative dissenting voices, however, such as that recently of Sherry.

It is fair to say that the question of authorship has not yet reached an adequate solution. On the one hand, the Paraphrase is clearly the work of an author who has had more than superficial contacts with the circle and theology of Cyril of Alexandria (strongly suggestive in this sense, among other things, is the use of the Marian appellation Theotokos in 2, 9; 2, 66; 19, 135); but still remaining to be explained is the surprising and mysterious attribution of the Paraphrase to a not-better-identified Ammonius, philosopher and rhetorician, a name indicated by the important Marcianus MSS of Planudes Z 481 (ca. 1300). On the other hand, if, with the majority of scholars, we wish to trace both poems to the same author, the purpose of their composition and the nature of their mutual relation are no easier to explain either from the point of view of content or from their relative dating.

It is not strictly necessary to suppose that the poem about Dionysius was composed by a Nonnus obstinately pagan and that therefore his Paraphrase should be dated after his conversion to Christianity. Neither should it be assumed that the mythological poem should be read as a great ironic demolition and parody of the pagan religion, humorous and elegant in character, written by a committed Christian, since the irony and humor may very well simply indicate the detachment of the writer from his material. Entirely misleading, moreover, is the theory that the writing of the Dionysian poem along with the Paraphrase is a theological attempt to demonstrate the typological presence of the savior God already in the pre-Christian world. Nor in this respect can we search for support in the Theosophy (as Livrea would have it), since its anonymous author is not open to pagan mythology as such, but values only those things evidenced by the oracles and the pagan sages deemed to be inspired by God, and only in the measure in which these are in harmony with the Scriptures (for an evaluation of the theological stance of the *theosophist, see P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia, Leiden 2001, intro.).

The twofold composition of Nonnus seems rather to find a plausible explanation in a particular historical context, one of transition, in which Christian authors—sometimes even bishops—with a strong classical formation continued to take pleasure in the composition of literary works (poems, novels, prayers etc.) which were "secular" in character, without any properly "religious" implication, demonstrating in this way a complete ideological indifference to the material in view (Chuvin, Liebeschuetz). It would be simple to give more examples of this "neutral" use, i.e., not anti-Christian, of the classical cultural heritage: one may mention, e.g., the names of Ausonius, *Claudian, *Sidonius Apollinaris, Ennodius of Pavia, *Fulgentius of Ruspe, Dracontius, *Synesius of Cyrene, Heliodorus of Tricca, Coricius of Gaza, Agathias and Dioscurus of Aphrodito. From this point of view, nothing prevents us from thinking that the same Christian author of the Paraphrase also wrote the poem on Dionysius, in which he does not give expression to his own pagan ideas but rather to his extensive Hellenistic education, and that the Dionysiaca could have been composed contemporaneously with the Metabolē or even after it.

This interest in mythology on the part of a Christian author such as Nonnus of Panopolis, far from causing us surprise, finds a remarkable parallel in the famous four orations (4, 5, 39, 43) of *Gregory of Nazianzus, which also come to us also under the name of Nonnus. It is true that from the time of Bentley (end of the 17th c.), most scholars have argued for a distinction between the two figures, designating the second with the conventional distinction of ps.-*Nonnus (see, finally, the ed., tr. and comm. by J. Nimmo Smith). Yet if it is possible to demonstrate the identity of the two homonymous authors, a picture emerges of a remarkable ecclesiastical and literary figure, who both paraphrased the gospel of John and, at the same time, continued unaffectedly to pursue his erudite interests in the sphere of Hellenic mythology, composing both the Dionysian poem and the mythological scholia on the orations of Nazianzus. In any case, it is actually to the example of Nazianzus, the poetic work of whom Nonnus seems to have been an attentive reader, that the literary effort and cultural inspiration of Nonnus should be traced: he intended to demonstrate that Christians have the right to appropriate the instruments of the Hellenic literary tradition, emptying them of any pagan religious significance and, when necessary, adapting them to the requirements of Christian teaching.

Editions: PG 3, 5641-5642; PG 43, 665-1284; A. Scheindler, Nonni Panopolitani Paraphrasis S. Evangelii Ioannei (Bibliotheca Teubneriana), Leipzig 1881; R. Keydell, Nonni Panopolitani Dionysiaca, 2 vols., Berlin 1959; ed. of the Dionysiaca, with Fr. tr. and comm., ed. F. Vian, Nonnos de Panopolis. Les Dionysiaques, C.U.F., Paris 1976; E. Livrea, Nonno di Panopoli. Parafrasi del Vangelo di S. Giovanni. Canto XVIII, Naples 1989; Nonno di Panopoli, Parafrasi del Vangelo di San Giovanni. Canto V, intro., critical ed., tr. and comm. ed. G. Agosti, Florence 2003.

Studies: R. Janssen, Das Johannesevangelium nach der Paraphrase des Nonnos (TU 8/4), Leipzig 1903; J. Golega, Studien über die Evangeliendichtung des Nonnos von Panopolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Bibeldichtung im Altertum (Breslauer Studien zur historischen Theologie 15), Breslau 1930; G. D'Ippolito, Studi nonniani. L'epillio nelle "Dionisiache," Palermo 1964; J. Golega, Zum Text der Johannesmetabole des Nonnos: ByzZ 59 (1966) 9-36; Quasten II, 116-118; W. Peek, Kritische und erklärende Beiträge zu den Dionysiakà des Nonnos, Berlin 1969; Id., Lexikon zu den Dionysiaka des Nonnos, 4 Lief., Berlin-Hildesheim 1968-1975; P. Volpe Cacciatore, Osservazioni sulla Parafrasi del Vangelo di Giovanni di Nonno di Panopoli: Annali Fac. Lett. Napoli 32 (1979-1980) 41-50; W. Fauth, Eidos poikilon. Zur Thematik der Metamorphose und zum Prinzip der Wandlung aus dem Gegensatz in den Dionysiakà des Nonnos von Panopolis (Hypomnemata 66), Göttingen 1981; E. Livrea, Il poeta ed il vescovo. La questione nonniana e la storia: Prometheus 13 (1987) 97-123; P. Chuvin, Mythologie et géographie dionysiaques. Recherches sur l'oeuvre de Nonnos de Panopolis, Clermont-Ferrand 1991; A. Hilhorst, The Cleansing of the Tem- ple (John 2, 13-25) in Juvencus and Nonnus, in J. Den Boeft - A. Hilhorst (eds.), Early Christian Poetry: A Collection of Essays (VChr Supplement 22), Leiden-New York-Cologne 1993, 61-76; N. Hopkinson (ed.), Studies in the "Dionysiaca" of Nonnus, Cambridge 1994 (bibl.); B. Coulie - L.F. Sherry et CETEDOC, Thesaurus Pseudo-Nonni quondam Panopolitani. Paraphrasis Evangelii S. Ioannis (Corpus Christianorum, Thesaurus Patrum Graecorum), Turnhout 1995; W. Liebeschuetz, Pagan Mythology in the Christian Empire: International Journal of the Classical Tradition 2 (1995/1996) 193-208; D. Accorinti, Nonno di Panopoli. Parafrasi del Vangelo di S. Giovanni. Canto XX, Pisa 1996; W. Liebeschuetz, The Use of Pagan Mythology in the Christian Empire with Particular Reference to the "Dionysiaca" of Nonnus, in P. Allen - E. Jeffreys (eds.), The Sixth Century: End or Beginning? (Byzantina Australiensia 10), Brisbane 1996, 75-91; L.F. Sherry, The Paraphrase of St. John Attributed to Nonnus: Byzantion 66 (1996) 409-430; F. Tissoni, Nonno di Panopoli. I canti di Penteo (Dionisiache 44-46). Commento, Florence 1998; E. Livrea, Nonno di Panopoli. Parafrasi del Vangelo di S. Giovanni. Canto B (BP 36), Bologna 2000; A. Cameron, The Poet, the Bishop, and the Harlot: GRBS 41/2 (2000) 175-188; J. Nimmo Smith, A Christian's Guide to Greek Culture: The Pseudo-Nonnus Commentaries on Sermons 4, 5, 39 and 43 by Gregory of Nazianzus, Liverpool 2001; R. Shorrock, The Challenge of Epic: Allusive Engagement in the "Dionysiaca" of Nonnus (Mnemosyne Suppl. 210), Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2001; E.D. Floyd, Homeric and Other Ancient Patterns in Nonnos, "Paraphrase of John," in Atti dell'XI Congr. Int. di Studi Classici, vol. 2, Atene 2002 (Praktika XI Diethnous Synedriou Klassikon Spoudon, Tomos B', Athenai 2002), 396-409; D.A. Welsby, The Medieval Kingdoms of Nubia: Pagans, Christians and Muslims Along the Middle Nile, London 2002; J. van der Vliet, Gleanings from Christian Northern Nubia: JJP 32 (2002) 175-192; F. Vian, L'épopée posthomérique. Recueil d'études, ed. D. Accorinti, Alessandria 2005, 379-608.

P.F. Beatrice

NONNUS of Panopolis (pseudo). The oldest (6th c.) of the scholiasts of *Gregory of Nazianzus, various of whose discourses he commented upon, his greatest interest being in the mythical allusions (see *Nonnus of Panopolis). The work was widely disseminated: 139 MSS have been counted. It was used by numerous other scholiasts and Byzantine philologists, and even translated into *Syriac (the version we have dates to 624), *Armenian and *Georgian. Under the title Collectio et expositio historiarum his comments on Or. 4 and 5 have been published in PG 36, 985-1072, along with extracts relating to Or. 39 and 43.

CPG 3011; CPG/S bibl.; K. Weitzmann, Greek Mythology in Byzantine Art, Princeton, NJ 1951; F. Letherz, Studien zu Gregor von Nazianz, Bonn 1958; J. Declerck, Les commentaires mythologiques du Ps. Nonnos sur l'hom. XLIII de Grégoire de Nazianze: Byzantion 47 (1977) 92-112; J. Nimmo Smith, Pseudo-Nonniani in IV orationes Gregorii Nazianzeni commentarii, collationibus versionum syriacarum a Sebastian Brock versionisque armeniacae a Bernard Coulie additis (CCSG 27, Corpus Nazianzenum 2), Turnhout 1992.

J. Gribomont

NORICUM
I. Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. Christianity. Noricum was a Roman province, corresponding, in our period, to a large part of modern Austria (Vienna and the left bank of the Danube excluded). To the S it bordered the Carnic Alps, to the W the River Inn, to the N the Danube and to the E Pannonia, conforming to an imaginary line which joined the Danube, Sava and Drava Rivers, and included the cities of Celeia (Celje in Slovenia) and Flavia Solva (near Leibnitz: see ANRW II, 6, 415). In the tetrarchic period Noricum was divided into two parts: Noricum Ripense (between the Danune and the Tauern mountains) and Noricum Mediterraneum (between the Tauerns and the Carnic Alps), under the government of a praeses.

Evidence of the initial evangelization of the area is both scarce and uncertain. A probable way in which Christianity was introduced, apart from colonists and military presence, may have been commercial relations with *Aquileia. There was also significant influence from important centers such as *Milan and *Sirmium. We may regard the Passio of Florianus of Lauriacum (Lorch) with his 40 companions, which has come to us in two recensions (ASS, Mai 1, 466-472), as an early record on the expansion of Christianity in Noricum at the time of *Diocletian; its historicity, at least with respect to its essential nucleus, is supported by the Mart. hier. (IV Non. Mai). Other evidence is provided by *Athanasius, who, without specifying names, origin or number, speaks of the presence of representatives of Noricum at the Synod of *Serdica (343), where they supported the cause of orthodoxy (Apol. sec. 1. 36: PG 25, 312A; H. Ar. 28: PG 25, 725B). At the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c., it is probable that the province saw a more extended growth of Christianity, if it is true that certain castella (fortified refuges built on high ground at the time of the barbarian incursions) almost always possessed, as archaeological investigations suggest, churches and baptisteries at the center or highest part of the complex.

The document of greatest importance for the life and organization of the church of Noricum, however, in a particularly difficult period (453–486) for this province placed as it was at the very boundary of Romanitas, is the Vita sancti Severini of *Eugippius. Among other things, we know for that period of two episcopal sees, Lauriacum and Tiburnia or Teurnia (St. Peter im Holz). Other important Christian centers mentioned by the Vita are Asturis (Klosterneuburg), Boiotrum (Innstadt), Comagenis (Tulln), Favianis (Mautern?), Ioviacum (Shlögen) and Iuvavum (Salzburg).

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain, Paris 1918 (repr. Rome 1967); R. Noll, Frühes Christentum im Österreich von den Anfängen bis zum 600 n. Chr., Vienna 1954; K. Gamber, Die Severins-Vita als Quelle für das gottesdienstliche Leben in Norikum während des 5. Jh.: RQA 65 (1970) 145-157; M. Pavan, Stato romano e comunità cristiane nel Norico: Clio 9 (1973) 453-496; V. Pavan, Note sul monachesimo di s. Severino e sulla cura pastorale nel Norico: VetChr 15 (1978) 347-360; G. Winkler, Noricum und Rom: ANRW II, 6 (1977) 183-262; H. Vetters, Virunum: ANRW II, 6, 349-354; Id., Lauriacum: ANRW II, 6, 355-379; H. Grassl, Die ethnischen und sozialökonomischen Bedingungen für die Romanisierung des Ostalpenraumes in der Spätantike: Grazer Beiträge 11 (1984) 251-267; H. Steinhauer, Das christliche Leben in Noricum nach der "Vita sancti Severini": Hippolytus N.F. 7 (1984) 42-53; F. Glaser, Frühes Christentum im Alpenraum. Eine archäologische Entdeckungsreise, Regensburg-Graz 1997; V. Bierbrauer, Arianische Kirchen in Noricum Mediterraneum und Raetia II?: Bayerische Vorgeschichtsblätter 63 (1998) 205-226; Mitteilungen zur Christlichen Archäologie, XII, Vienna 2006.

V. Pavan

II. Archaeology. The old province of Noricum was divided in 293 into Noricum Ripense and Noricum Mediterraneum. Among the buildings dedicated to Christian worship so far found in Noricum, most numerous are basilicas of the type characteristic of the Upper Adriatic, consisting in a longitudinal church, in the E part of which, the elevated presbytery, semicircular seating is found for the clergy, accessible from either side. Churches of this type are found at Lauriacum, Aguntum, Lavant, Grazerkogel and church no. 1 at Hemmaberg. Of these, the most interesting is that of the Lavant, constructed on a hill and fortified at the beginning the 5th c.: it is composed of two similar large chambers, arranged E-W, both with seating for the clergy and cathedra. The presence, in the E chamber, of a baptismal piscina, indicates that this is an episcopal basilica. There are also other basilicas and in total about twenty church buildings.

The second type of church found in Noricum follows a plan which includes a semicircular apse and seating for the clergy in the same shape. Church no. 2 of Hemmaberg is of this type, with annexed chambers along the longitudinal walls (as in the case of Duel) but also pastophoria off the apse, as in Hoischügel. At Celeia the church was decorated with mosaic pavements of notable quality. At Ulrichsberg the church seems have had external pilasters, while the paved section, around the subsellia in semicircular form for the clergy, was decorated with mosaics. These churches sometimes have a narthex.

Elsewhere there are different and more developed designs. At Teurnia (St. Peter im Holz), the building follows a cruciform plan with more narrow transversing arms. The E arm contains semicircular seating for the clergy; the W is flanked with absidal chambers. The first has an apse with pilasters, the other a mosaic floor with depictions of animals amid decorative motifs. All these rooms are connected by a door onto the transversal arm and another to the E arm. The plan of the basilica of Teurnia probably derives from churches of a similar type in N *Italy. The church of Säben seems to be a simpler variant of that of the Teurnia. A complex of religious buildings constructed on a fortified hill at Vranje near Sevnica holds particular interest: one in basilica style situated on the upper terrace, and two others on the lower (one of the two has a square apse), without doubt for baptismal purposes. The presence of the cathedra between the seats for the clergy indicates that this is an episcopal complex. The complex of Rifnik in Slovenia was also built on a fortified hill. At Iuvavum (Salzburg), above the cemetery of St. Peter, ritual chambers have been cut out of the steep rock with arcosolia similar to those of the Roman catacombs. From the form of the arcosolia and acc. to the old tradition, the establishment of these chapels may probably be attributed to hermitic monks of the first centuries of Christianity.

Among small objects discovered we should mention a fragment of a sarcophagus bearing a portrayal of a shepherd with a lamb on his shoulders. Also to be noted are inscriptions, jewels, lamps and fragments of a pluteus at Teurnia, etc.

R. Egger, Frühchristliche Kirchenbauten im südlichen Noricum, Vienna 1916; R. Noll, Frühes Christentum in Österreich von den Anfängen bis um 600 nach Chr., Vienna 1954; K. Gamber, Domus Ecclesiae. Die ältesten Kirchenbauten Aquileias sowie im Alpen- und Donaugebiet bis zum Beginn des 5. Jh. liturgiegeschichtlich untersucht, Regensburg 1968; G. Alföldi, Noricum, London 1974; P. Petru - Th. Ulbert, Vranje bei Sevnica. Frühchristliche Kirchenanlagen auf dem Ajdovski Gradec, Ljubljana 1975; Probleme des Südostalpenraumes in der Spätantike—Arbeitsgemeinschaft Alpe - Adria, Vienna-Graz-Cologne 1985; S. Ciglenecki, Hohen-befestigungen aus der Zeit vom 3. bis 6. Jh. im Ostalpenraum, Dela Slovenske akademije znanosti in umetnosti 31, Ljubljana 1987; A. Poulter, The Use and Abuse of Urbanism in the Danubian Provinces During the Later Roman Empire, in The City in Late Antiquity, ed. J. Rich, London-New York 1996 (¹1992), 103ff.; R. Bratoz, Christianisierung des Nordadria- und Westbalkanraumes im 4. Jahrhundert: Situla 34 (1996) 299ff.; R. Pillinger, Das frühe Christentum im Limesbereich, in Der römische Limes in Österreich, ed. H. Friesinger - F. Krinzinger, Vienna 1997, 128ff.; F. Glaser, Frühes Christentum im Alpenraum. Eine Archäologische Entdeckungsreise, Regensburg-Graz-Vienna-Cologne 1997; R. Pillinger, Zur Genesis der Christlichen Archäologie in Österreich: Mitteilungen zur Christlichen Archäologie 5 (1999) 74ff.; R. Bratoz, Il cristianesimo aquileiese prima di Costantino fra Aquileia e Poetovio, Udine 1999; Mitteilungen zur Christlichen Archäologie, XII, Vienna 2006.

N. Cambi

NOTAE DE TEXTU EVANGELIORUM. The MSS St. Gall 1935 (Lowe, Codices Latini Antiquiores, 984), a palimpsest of which numerous pages bear gospel texts acc. to the Vulgate, and so old that it could have been written while *Jerome was still alive. The margins contain firsthand glosses, which specify, e.g., the case of a noun or the tense of a verb which has an ambiguous form; often they transcribe the Greek term translated and its various equivalents. These glosses are found in certain later MSS, traceable to the school of *Reims of the 9th c. Jerome is their most likely author.

CPL 590a; B. Bischoff, Zur Rekonstruktion der Sangallensis (Σ) und der Vorlage seiner Marginalien: Biblica 29 (1941) 153-158.

J. Gribomont

NOTARIUS. The noun derives from nota, notare, and indicates one who makes notes with the help of marks of abbreviation, designating the tachygraph. The sign written is more a mark than a letter. There were schools of notarii (also called exceptores), where stenography was learned. The notarii were used for public affairs, lectures and legal processes. They took notes of speeches, and depositions in legal matters, as seen from the Acts of martyrs, esp. the Scillitan and of *Cyprian. Notarii worked at the conference of 411 in *Carthage. Their Acts were faithfully kept in the archives, as Cyprian (Ep. 68, 6) and *Augustine (Contra Cresc. III, 70) attest. Esp. from the 4th c. the church also had her own notarii, who compiled Acts carrying official importance: e.g., the release of a slave, a document of donation etc. The notarii also took down the improvised discourses of preachers, who then, even if not always, reread the transcribed text; or a text dictated by the author. Normally they were clerics. In Rome, the regional notarii were persons of importance.

DACL 12, 1623-1640; A. Mentz, Antike Stenographie, Berlin 1944; H. Hagendahl, Die Bedeutung der Stenographie für die spätlatein. christ. Literatur: JbAC 14 (1971) 24-38; H.C. Teitler, Notarii and Exceptores. An Inquiry into Role and Significance of Shorthand Writers in the Imperial and Ecclesiastical Bureaucracy of the Roman Empire (from the Early Principate to c. 450 A.D.), Amsterdam 1985; Tironische Noten, ed. P. Ganz, Wiesbaden 1990; Oxford Classical Dictionary, Oxford 1996, 1468-69.

A. Hamman

NOTITIA DIGNITATUM. Official document of the imperial chancellery, to be dated not earlier than 395 and the entire title of which must have been Notitia omnium dignitatum et administrationum tam civilium quam militarium. In its present state, it takes the form of a sort of yearbook with fairly clear chronological "stratifications." The copy in our possession was that of the Western primicerius. The text is divided into two parts, relating to the two partes of the Roman Empire, of which it enumerates the officials and formal titles, territorial competence, staffs or dependent troops, and the composition of the officium. The discussion about the genesis of the work, i.e., if it derives directly from an official document or if, from a brief original nucleus, it reached its present form through interpolations and additions of private compilers, remains open. Various proposals have been made with respect to its date, from the end of the 4th c. (L.A. Constans and F.S. Salisbury) to the 4th decade of the 5th c. (O. Seeck, Th. Mommsen, J.B. Bury). Recently G. Clemente has demonstrated that the document was "the product of a tested bureaucratic tradition, with the purpose of providing information, maintained constantly up to date, and thus usable for a long period of time." The textual anomalies and the history of development of the document are linked to the discontinuity of the imperial chancelleries. C. Zuckerman dates the "Eastern" part to 401.

E. Böcking (ed.), Notitia Dignitatum, Bonn 1839–1853, still useful for its extended commentary; O. Seeck (ed.), Notitia Dignitatum, Berlin 1876 = Frankfurt a.M. 1962. Studies: E. Polaschek: PWK 17, 1, 1077ff.; A. Lippold: KIP 4, 166-167; P. Lot, La "Notitia Dignitatum Utriusque Imperii." Ses tares, sa date de composition, sa valeur: REA 38 (1936) 285-338; G. Clemente, La "Notitia Dignitatum, " Cagliari 1968; D. Hoffmann, Das spätrömische Bewegungsheer und die Notitia Dignitatum, 2 vols., Düsseldorf 1969-1970; J.H. Ward, The British Section of the Notitia Dignitatum: Britannia 4 (1973) 253-263; E. Demougeot, La Notitia Dignitatum et l'histoire de l'Empire d'Occident au début du Ve siècle: Latomus 34 (1975) 1079-1134; R. Goodburn - P. Bartholomew (eds.), Aspects of the Notitia Dignitatum, Oxford 1976, with the essays contained there; P.C. Berger, The Insignia of the Notitia Dignitatum, New York-London 1981; M. Zahariade, Moesia Secunda, Scythia şi Notitia Dignitatum, Bucureşti 1988; C. Zuckerman, Comtes et ducs en Égypte autour de l'an 400 et la date de la "Notitia Dignitatum Orientis": AntTard 6 (1998) 137-147; P. Brennan, The User's Guide to the Notitia Dignitatum: Antichthon 32 (1998) 34-49; W.E. Kulikowski, The Notitia Dignitatum as a Historical Source: Historia 49 (2000) 358-377; J. Barlow - P. Brennan, Tribuni Scholarum Palatinarum c. A.D. 353–364: Ammianus Marcellinus and the Notitia Dignitatum: CQ 51 (2001) 237-254.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

NOTITIA GALLIARUM. In origin a document of the Roman administration, and then used by the Gallican Church, prepared between the end of the 4th c. and the 1st decades of the 5th. c. with additions in the Frankish era. Its full title is Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Galliarum. It offers the list of the 17 provinces—a list which corresponds to that of the Notitia dignitatum—and of the 115 civitates of *Gaul, of the castra and of the ports. It is very useful for our knowledge of the structure of ecclesiastical organization in Gaul in the 5th c., in that it practically gives a list of the ecclesiastical provinces and of the principal city sees of the metropolitans and other episcopal city sees.

CPL 2342; MGH, Auct. ant. IX, Chron. Minora I, 552-612 (text: 584-612); CCL 175, 381-406; DACL 11, 1716-1727; Schanz IV, 2, 128-130; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, II, Paris [2]1966, 111-125; P.-M. Duval, La Gaule jusqu'au milieu du V[e] siècle, Paris 1971, 681-682; A.L.F. Rivet, The Notitia Galliarum: Some Questions, in R. Goodburn - P. Bartholomew (eds.), Aspects of the Notitia Dignitatum, Oxford 1976, 119-142; J. Harries, Church and State in the "Notitia Galliarum": JRS 68 (1978) 26-48; LMA 6, 1287; A.L.F. Rivet, Gallia Narbonensis, London 1988, 98-100; J.W. Ermatinger, Three Late Roman Notitiae: Manuscripta 39 (1995) 110-119.

A. Di Berardino

NOTITIA PROVINCIARUM ET CIVITATUM AFRICAE. The document enumerates, acc. to the provinces, the African bishops and their sees convoked in 484 at Carthage by the Vandal king *Huneric, who hoped to see from the gathering a settlement between *Arians and *Catholics. But the firmness of resolution of the Catholics, who drew up an orthodox profession of faith, caused the project to fail. In reprisal, Catholic churches were closed and their goods confiscated; 46 bishops were sent into exile in *Corsica, and 302 sent to internment in *Africa: there were a martyr, a confessor, apostates and many dead (the gloss prbt = peribat, better than apostasy). Beyond the information it contains on the persecution of Huneric, the Notitia reflects the situation of the African church at the end of the 5th c.: Proconsular, 54 bishops; Numidia, 125; Byzacena, 115; Mauretania Caesariensis, 120 and 3 vacant sees; Mauretania Sitifensis, 42; Tripolitana, 5; Insulae Sardiniae, 8; in total 469 bishops and 472 bishoprics. In the reckoning, Mauretania Tingitana, dependent on *Spain, does not figure.

MGH.AA 3, 1, 63-71; CSEL 7, 117-134; R. Haensch, Capita provinciarum, Mainz 1997; S. Lancel, Victor de Vita, Paris 2002, 222-272.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

NOTITIA URBIS CONSTANTINOPOLITANAE. Anonymous description of the city of *Constantinople, written in Latin at the time of *Theodosius II (408–450). It provides an inventory of the principal buildings in each of the fourteen districts of the city, into which it was subdivided: the imperial palatia (5), including the palatium magnum, those of the empresses (6), the houses of the nobles; the names of the officials (curatores), the night guards (vicomagistri), fire fighters (collegiati), police (vernaculi, [public slaves]), the churches (14 churches), the public (8) and private (153) baths, the forums (4), theaters (2), a circus, 4, 388 domus, etc. It serves as an important source for the topography of the city in the 5th c. and its administration. Because it affirms that it refers to buildings both completed and decorated, and it mentions the double wall constructed by the prefect Cyrus under Theodosius (Invicti principis), its composition must date to after 440.

O. Seeck, Notitia Dignitatum accedunt Notitia urbis Constantinopolitanae et Latercula prouinciarum, Berlin 1876 (repr. Frankfurt a.M. 1962), 261-274; F. Unterkircher, Notitiae regionum urbis Romae et urbis Constantinopolitanae, Amsterdam 1960; R. Janin, Constantinople byzantine. Développement urbain et répertoire topographique, Paris 1950; H. Fuchs, Die Vorrede zur Notitia urbis Constantinopolitanae: Museum Helveticum 26 (1969) 56-60; G. Dagron, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 330 à 451, Paris 1974; A. Corsini, La praefatio della Notitia urbis Constantinopolitanae, in Prefazioni, prologhi, proemi di opere tecnico-scientifiche latine, ed. N. Scivoletto, II, Rome 1992, 963-968; A. Berger, Regionen und Strassen im frühen Konstantinopel: MDAI(I) 47 (1997) 349-414.

A. Di Berardino

NOUS

I. In Greek philosophy - II. In patristics - III. In gnosticism.

I. In Greek philosophy. To Anaxagoras is owed the first elaboration of the doctrine of the metaphysical nous, which later Greek thought could not set aside: already for this pre-Socratic philosopher, the nous is the ordering principle and the cause of everything (texts 42, 47, fr. 12 Diels, Die Fragm. der Vors. II [6]1952; cf. Plato, Cratylus 400a 8-10); it is simple, devoid of mixture, pure (texts 55, 56 and 61, fr. 12 and 13), free of passions (text 56), identical to the One (text 61), infinite (fr. 12) and at the same time superior to infinity (see Clem. Alex., Protr. 66, 1: GCS I, 50, 15-17), principle of movement (texts 42, 55, 56, fr. 13), immobile (text 46) and at the same time given to run through everything (text 55). For Plato the demiurge, maker of the anima mundi and of the sensible universe acc. to the model of the ideas, is himself a nous (Tim. 39e) and also infuses the nous into the soul of the universe (Tim. 30b); this latter, therefore, is a being endowed with soul and intelligence (Tim. 30b; also see *cos-mos). In Philebus 28c-d, the nous is presented as the supreme governor of the universe; in 28e its ordering function is underlined (cf. also Phaed. 97d = Anax. text 47; Cratylus 413c = Anax. text 55e; Cratylus 400a 8-10, another passage in which Anaxagoras is named); and in 30c it is identified with the cause and the supreme wisdom, superior to the limit and to infinity. In the Laws X, 897b, the nous is the divine principle which, infusing itself into the soul of the world (see Tim. 30b, Philebus 30d), makes it ready to rule, resolutely and happily, the whole universe. Of different movements, the circular is that which gets closest to the movement of the nous (Laws X, 898a; on the Platonic conception of the nous as a transcendent metaphysical principle, see still today the important article of R. Hackforth, Plato's Theism: CQ 30 [1936] 4-9). Human intelligence, the divine element destined to govern humanity, is "sown" in him directly by the demiurge (Tim. 41c). Only it, the pilot of the soul, is able to contemplate the essence free of color, form and untouchable, represented by the ideas as a whole (Phaed. 247c); but only the thought of the philosopher is equipped with wings which carry him or her on high, beyond the heavenly vault, and initiate him or her into a superior vision and knowledge (249c, 250c).

In the ancient Academy, Xenocrates (fr. 15 Heinze) considers the first god a nous identical to the monad (it is very probable that Xenocrates had already formulated the doctrine—which would then become characteristic of *Middle Platonism, *Neoplatonism, *Philo and some of the Fathers—of the ideas identical to the thoughts contained in the divine mind: having identified the nous with the monad and the ideas with the numbers (fr. 15 and 34 Heinze; he cannot have found it difficult to make the ideas derive from the nous, as the numbers derive from the monad; on this question and studies on it, see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 202-203, n. 3 and 246). In another exponent of the ancient Academy, Speusippus (fr. 38 Lang, 89 Isnardi-Parente = Aetius in Stobaeus, Ecl. I, 29, vol. I, 35, 3-4 Wachsmuth), we find already formulated a doctrine which will become basic in orthodox Neoplatonism, that of the distinction of the intelligence from the One and from the good (see E.R. Dodds: CQ 22 [1928] 140 and Ph. Merlan, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 32). Both in relation to the metaphysical nous and to the human nous *Aristotle elaborates a theory which, taken in part from Anaxagoras, left a profound mark on subsequent thought.

In On Prayer fr. 46 Rose (Bekker V, 1483a 27-28), Aristotle, coming near to Speusippus and also himself anticipating orthodox Neoplatonism, seems to take into consideration the hypothesis of the transcendence of the supreme divinity also with respect to the intelligence; but in ch. 7 of book Lambda of the Metaphysics (1072a-1073a) he does not abandon the identification of the first principle with the intelligence. The first principle (1072b 11, 13-14) is the nous which always thinks itself and which is therefore in constant activity, totally identical to the object of its thought (1072b 18-23); it is identical to life, since it is its activity and life (1072b 26-28); it has no size or parts and is indivisible (1073a 5-6); it is absolutely free of passions and unchangeable (1073a 11); it is eternal, completely separated from sensible things (1073a 4); it is immobile (1073a 4), and remaining immobile and unchanging it moves the first heaven (1072a 24-25, b7-8), and since it is absolute beauty, it is an object of desire, thought and love (1072a 26, 27-28, b3); it is a simple being par excellence (1072a 32); it is endowed with an infinite power, in that it moves for an infinite time (1073a 8-9; see W.D. Ross, Aristotle's Metaphysics, II, Oxford 1948, pp. 372-374).

The human nous is a divine principle infused from the outside (De gen. an. B 736b 28), and it is the most divine part of humanity, cause of perfect happiness (Et. Nic. X, 1177a 13-17), since this activity, the highest activity of humanity, is all one with the theoria* (Et. Nic. X, 1177a 19-22); in the *soul, nothing is superior to it (De an. I, 410b 13-14). But it is above all in chs. 4-5 of the third book of De anima (429a-430a) that Aristotle develops his theory of the human nous: the nous in activity (see De an. III, 430a 17), distinct from that which is passive or in potentiality (De an. III, cap. 5, 430a 10-14), is free of passions (429a 15, b 23, 430a 18, a 34), devoid of any mixture (429a 18-19, b 23-24—in these two passages Anaxagoras is named—430a 18), simple (429b 23), not confused with the body, but rather separated from it (429a 24-25, b 5, 430a 17, to 22-23); it is the seat of the ideas (429a 27-28). Precisely because it performs its noetic activity, it is identical to the intelligible objects of which it thinks (429b 30-31; 430a 3-4) and is intelligible as they are (430a 2-3); it is immortal and eternal (430a 23).

The idea of the metaphysical nous which thinks itself and is identical to the object of its own thought is taken up by the Aristotelian commentator of the 2nd c. AD *Alexander of Aphrodisias (Mantissa 108, 7-8; 109, 4-7; De an. 87, 89-88, 2; 88, 5-6), to whom, as R. Walzer has shown (Plotino ed il Neoplatonismo in Oriente e in Occidente, Rome 1974, 430), we owe the full elaboration of the doctrine of the nous poiētikos, which consists of the application to the metaphysical nous described by Aristotle—ch. 7 of book Lambda of the Metaphysics—of the various properties of the "active" human intelligence illustrated in ch. 5 of book III of the Aristotelian De anima (see esp. Alexander, De an. 88, 17-89, 12). The theory of the metaphysical nous elaborated by Aristotle and Alexander would be accepted in its entirety in the *Plotinan conception of the nous.

For the *Stoics, the metaphysical nous is identified with the rational principle immanent in the universe, which it spans, permeates with itself, governs and rules: it also takes the form of logos, spirit, soul, fire, Zeus, law, ether, nature, fate and providence (SVF I, 102, 154, 160, 162, 172, 176, 530, 534; II, 580, 634, 937, 1026-1027, 1151) and contains in itself all the rational and spermatic principles which, combining with the passive element, the primordial matter, originate the various elements and all the sensible beings (SVF I, 98, 1202; II, 1027). As regards the nature of humanity, unlike Plato, who had always underlined a clear distinction between the rational part of the soul and the two irrational parts, Stoicism affirmed the substantial unity of the human soul: the seven faculties of the soul, apparently different from the rational faculty or hēgemonikon (the five senses, the reproductive and vocal faculties), are in reality emanations of the hēgemonikon, which have their seat in the heart, more than the head (SVF II, 826, 827, 836-838, 839, 910); there exists, therefore, a strict interdependence between irrational and rational faculties, between sensations and thought: rather than faculties different by nature, it would be more correct to speak of a single power which, acc. to the occasion, fulfills different functions (SVF II, 849).

On the strict parallelism established by the Stoics between humanity governed by reason and the universe ruled by the logos, see *macrocosm and microcosm. The syncretistic but fundamentally Stoic character of the thought of Antiochus of Ascalon—who although professing to be "Academic" and follower of the antiqui, i.e., of the ancient Academy and of the peripatetic school, is in reality a Platonizing Stoic—is clearly shown in his conception of the metaphysical nous and the human nous. The passage of Cicero (Academ. post. I, 29): quam vim animum esse dicunt mundi, eandemque esse mentem sapientiamque perfectam, quam deum appellant . . . quam interdum necessitatem appellant denotes a mixture of Platonic and Stoic elements: the term vim is both Platonic and Stoic (see Sophist 265b; SVF I, 176; II, 1025, 1151); the animum mundi is found both in Plato (see, e.g., Tim. 30b; Laws X, 897b) and in the Stoics (see, e.g., SVF I, 495, 530; II, 1026); the words mentem sapientiamque go back to Philebus 28d-e, 30c and to the Stoics (cf. SVF I, 102, 112); and the identification of the intelligent divine principle with the necessitas is of Stoic origin (cf. e.g., SVF I, 160, 176; II, 580). As J. Dillon has justly noted (The Middle Platonists, London 1977, 83 and 95), this passage of Cicero, reproducing the point of view of Antiochus, presupposes an identification between the nous-demiurge, the anima mundi of the Timaeus and the Stoic logos. W. Theiler (Die Vorbereitung des Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1930, 18-19 and 39-40) and J. Dillon (op. cit., 93-96), in examining the passages dependent on Antiochus in Cicero (Orator 8-10) and *Augustine (Civ. Dei VII, 28 with respect to the *allegorical interpretation, given by Varro, of Jupiter, Minerva and Juno: Jupiter would be the mind of God, Minerva his daughter would be his thoughts, and Juno matter), arrive at the conclusion that Antiochus too advocates the doctrine of the ideas, as thoughts, contained in the mind of God; however, as Dillon observes (op. cit., p. 96), we must recall that Antiochus, precisely because he identifies the Platonic nous-demiurge with the Stoic logos, is brought to identify the Platonic ideas contained in the nous-demiurge with the logoi or spermatic principles contained in the universal logos of the Stoics. The doctrine of Antiochus with respect to the human nous (Cicero, Academ. Pr. II, 30: mens enim ipsa quae sensuum fons est atque ipse sensus est, naturalem vim habet quam intendit ad ea, quibus movetur) is nothing other than a reproduction of the Stoic doctrine (see SVF II, 826, 827, 836).

In the conception of the metaphysical nous, proper to Philo, elements of the Platonic, peripatetic and Stoic traditions all come together. The relationship which he establishes between the nous and the first principle coincides with that found in Aristotle (On Prayer fr. 46 Rose): on the one hand, as J. Whittaker has noted (VChr 23 [1969] 102), in Leg. Alleg. II, 46 Aristotle places God above the nous; on the other—and this is the dominant tendency of his work—he is brought to identify God with the nous of the universe (De migr. Abr. 192 [II, 306, 3-4], De gig. 41 [II, 50, 5], De opif. m. 8 [I, 2, 19]). In De opif. m. 8, this nous is, on the one hand, identified with the second active principle acc. to the teaching of the Stoics (see SVF I, 85); on the other, it receives the attributes εἱλικρινέστατος and ἀκραιφνέστατος which bring it close to the Anaxagorean-Aristotelian conception (on εἱλικρινής, however, see also Plato, Sympos. 211e), and is presented, in conformity with the peripatetic tradition, as "superior to virtue" (see Magna mor. B 1200 b 14) and "superior to science" (see Et. Eud. H 1248a 28). It directs the universe as a pilot of a ship and a charioteer (De ebr. 86 [II, 186, 14], De conf. ling. 98 [II, 247, 22-23], De aet. m. 83 [VI, 98, 20]), an image found also in the ps.-Aristotelian De mundo, 400b 6-7 and which may be traced ultimately to Plato (Phaedo 246a-b, 247c, 253c, 253e), where, however, it is applied not to the metaphysical but to the human nous. As with the metaphysical nous of Aristotle, the God of Philo moves while remaining immobile (De post. C. 28 [II, 7, 14]). Of Platonic-Aristotelian derivation (Philebus 20d, *Et. Nic.*I, 1097b 7-8, Et. Eud. H 1244b 8, 1249b 16, Met. N 1091b 16-17) is the doctrine of his absolute self-sufficiency (De Cher. 44 [I, 181, 4], 46 [I, 181, 12], 123 [I, 199, 16], De vita Mos. 111 [IV, 145, 15], De spec. leg. II, 38 [V, 95, 1]).

Also in Philo we find the doctrine of the ideas identical to the thoughts contained in the mind of God. In De opif. m. 17-20 the comparison is made—similar to that present in Cicero (Orator. 8-10) and going back to Antiochus—between the architect who plans a city in his mind and God who, before giving origin to the sensible universe, thinks it in his mind; and in De Cher. 49 (I, 182, 3) God is called "incorporeal seat of the incorporeal ideas," a passage closely parallel to De opif. m. 20 (I, 6, 9-10). Both passages represent an application to the divine nous of what Aristotle (De an. III, 429a 27-28) had said about the thinking human nous. Another application of the divine nous of the Aristotelian doctrine of the human nous is the total absence of passions in God: the divine nous of Philo is entirely impassible (Quod D. sit imm. 52 [II, 68, 10-12]), just as the active human nous is in Aristotle (De an. III, 430a 18, but see also Met. Lambda 1073a 11). For Philo the human nous is a "divine fragment" "breathed" from on high (De somm. I, 34 [III, 212, 7], Quis rer. div. her. 64 [III, 15, 19-20]), since it is "an image of the image, " i.e., an image of the divine logos (thus Philo interprets the "second image" of Gen 1:26-27; see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 21). Philo also makes his own the Stoic doctrine (see SVF I, 826, 827, 836) of the nous as source of sensations (Leg. alleg. I, 28 [I, 68, 11-12], De post. C. 126 [II, 27, 24-26]). The term πηγή present in these two passages should be compared with the term fons of Cicero (Academ pr. II, 30; see above).

For Plutarch of Chaeronea the supreme god is identical to the intelligence and to the good anima mundi of book X of the Laws of Plato (De Is. et Os. 371A [II, 523, 12-13 Bernardakis], 370F [II, 522, 16-20]), to the good (e Is. et Os. 372F [II, 527, 20-21]), to the One and to true being (De E apud Delphos 392E [III, 22, 9-11], 393AB [III, 23, 6-13], 393B [III, 23, 15-19], De def. or. 428F [III, 117, 3]), to the intelligible (De Is. et Os. 373A [II, 528, 9-10], 382D [II, 552, 21-22]), to the beautiful (De Is. et Os. 383A [II, 554, 5-6]), to the ideas and the demiurge (De Is. et Os. 373F [II, 590, 9-10]). The identification of the first principle, the absolute being and the intelligible derive not only from the application to God of the Platonic doctrine of the immutability of the ideas but also from Aristotle (Met. Lambda 1072b 10, 1072a 26); the identification of the first principle with the intelligence is based on Timaeus 39e, Philebus 30c and on book Lambda of the Metaphysics; the strict connection between the nous and the anima mundi goes back to the Philebus, Laws X, 897b; the identification of the idea-model (see Tim. 28a, 28c, 30c, 31a, 39e) with the patēr or demiurge-nous (see Tim. 28c, 39e) is explained by the fact that Plutarch interpreted in an Aristotelian-peripatetic sense the passage of Tim. 28c, 39e, in which the demiurge-nous contemplates the ideas present in the living intelligible being. (According to this interpretation of the passage the intelligence contemplates itself, i.e., its own thoughts.) This proves that Plutarch also, in the line of the ancient Academy and of Antiochus, considered the Platonic ideas-model as the thoughts contained in the mind of God; this hypothesis finds a clear confirmation in De plac. philos. 882D (V, 287, 5-7).

In the doctrine of the nous of Alcinous (that this, and not Albinus, is the actual orthography of the author of the Didaskalikos has been demonstrated by J. Whittaker: Phoenix 28 [1974] 450-456), the presence of Aristotelian motifs is even clearer. In the same way as Aristotle (De an. III, cap. 5, 430a 10-14), Alcinous (Did. 164, 16-20) distinguishes the nous in potentiality from the nous in act, applying to the heavenly nous (the second nous which governs the anima mundi) the distinction which Aristotle had reserved to the human nous. The new distinction, present in this passage, between the heavenly nous and the nous which is its cause, identified with the first god, is based on Laws X, 897b and on Timaeus 30b—where the demiurge-nous (see Timaeus 39e) infuses the nous into the anima mundi and this last into the sensible body of the universe. Of peripatetic derivation (see Magna Mor. B 1200a 14) is the idea—present, as we have seen, also in Philo—of the superiority of the first nous over virtue (Did. 181, 36-37). Similarly to the nous of Aristotle and Alexander of Aphrodisias, the nous of Alcinous thinks itself (Did. 164, 24-27), and remains immobile and at the same time is an object of desire and also active in that it moves the intelligence of the heavens (Did. 164, 20-24). For Alcinous, too, the ideas are an integral part of the mind of God, in that they are his thoughts and his activity (Did. 163, 12-13, 27-30; 164, 26-27). The identification of the ideas with the thoughts of God is present also in Atticus (fr. 9 Des Places [69, 40-41]).

In Neo-Pythagoreanism we may observe two tendencies with respect to the nous, considered at times to be the supreme principle, at others subordinated to the One. (This latter tendency, which is related to Speusippus and Aristotle [On Prayer, fr. 46 Rose], is that which would be held to in orthodox Neoplatonism.) Parallel to Alcinous, *Numenius of Apamea affirms the existence of two intelligences, which are for him the first and the second gods: the "first god" is the supreme intelligence (fr. 16 Des Places), the good and absolute being (fr. 16 and 17), the living intelligent being of the Timaeus (fr. 22), superior and anterior to the ousia as its cause and principle (fr. 2 and 16) and at the same time connate to it; the "second god, " identical to the Platonic demiurge (fr. 16 and 21), is the second intelligence (fr. 17 and 22), directs the heavens (fr. 12) and is the cause of the harmony of matter (fr. 18). As H.J. Krämer (Theologie und Philosophie 44 [1969] 486) has illustrated, Numenius's fr. 22 Des Places (= text 25 Leemans), in which the first nous is identified with the intelligible living being of Tim. 39e, proves that Numenius too considers the ideas present in the mind of God. (In fr. 16 the first nous is considered the principle and the cause of the ideas because these are the result of his noetic activity, and "connate" to them because they, once produced, are contained in the nous.) On the other hand both ps.-Brotinus (Syrianus, In Met. 166, 5-6) and ps.-Archytas (Stobeus, Anth. I, 41, vol. I, 280, 15-17) place the nous below the One (see Anth. I, 41, vol. I, 280, 15-17).

In Neoplatonism, as in Neo-Pythagoreanism, there are two different directions taken with respect to the nous. On the one hand, *Ammonius Saccas, his faithful disciple *Origen the Neoplatonist and, later, in the 5th c., Hierocles continue to consider the nous-demiurge as the supreme principle (on Ammonius Saccas, see K.O. Weber, Origenes der Neuplatoniker, Zetemata 27, Munich 1962, 160; W. Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 10 and 41; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 223-224; on Origen the Neoplatonist see Proclus, Theol. plat. II, 4 = fr. 7 Weber 5-6; on Hierocles, see Photius, Bibl., cod. 214, 172a; cod. 251, 461b, where the will appears as one of the attributes of God and In aureum Carmen 125, 6-7 Mullach, with respect to the presence of the ideas in the mind of God). On the other hand, the so-called orthodox Neoplatonism, inaugurated by *Plotinus and concluded by Proclus and *Damascius, considers the nous not as the first principle but as a following *hypostasis, since the first principle is the absolutely transcendent and negative One of Plato's Parmenides. For a detailed examination of the doctrine of the nous proper to the "orthodox" Neoplatonists, see *Neoplatonism. Here it suffices to mention that also in the cases of Plotinus, *Porphyry, *Iamblichus, Proclus and Damascius the nous, independent of its hierarchical rank compared to the first principle (for Plotinus it is the second hypostasis, while for Porphyry, Iamblichus, Proclus and Damascius it is the third member of the triad formed by being, life and intelligence), is the seat of the ideas-models and is in general identified with the demiurge; and that the Plotinan doctrine of the nous, as with that of Philo, Plutarch and Alcinous, incorporates important Aristotelian motifs.

II. In patristics. Patristic thought inevitably felt the effects of the speculations on the relation between the nous and the first principle (oscillating, as we have seen, between total identity and subordination) characteristic of *Platonism and of contemporary Neo-Pythagoreanism. For *Athenagoras God is an eternal intelligence (Legat. 10) who can be understood only by the mind (Legat. 4). *Clement of Alexandria makes his own Philo's conception of God as nous, seat of the ideas: the passage of Strom. IV, 155, 2 (II, 317, 11) ("the intelligence is the seat of the ideas, the intelligence is God") refers back to Philo De Cher. 49 (I, 182, 9; "God . . . is the incorporeal seat of the incorporeal ideas"). That Clement considered God as a nous is clear from the emphasis he places on his will (fr. 48 Stählin [III, 224]), a conception he has in common with his master *Pantaenus and with Ammonius Saccas (see also S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 222-224). As for Philo, so also for Clement the human mind is a divine element (Strom. I, 94 [II, 60, 24-25]) and a most pure essence (breathed) into humanity at the moment of creation (Strom. V, 87, 4 [II, 383, 20-384, 3]), since it is "the image of the image," i.e., of the logos (Strom. V, 94, 4-5 [II, 388, 13-16]). *Origen, who one the one hand (De princ. I, 1, 6 [21, 13]) considers God an intelligence (C. Cels. VII, 38 [II, 188, 11]), on the other openly affirms that God can be conceived both as nous and as something superior to the nous, agreeing with Aristotle (On Prayer fr. 46 Rose) and showing himself fully aware of the debate occurring within contemporary Neoplatonism (see J. Whittaker: VChr 23 [1969] 92-93). Certain aspects of his conception of God (God thinks himself and is completely self-sufficient) reflect the Aristotelian-peripatetic doctrine of the metaphysical nous (see *Aristotelianism, subpoints 3-4 in the discussion of Origen). For the most part, his understanding of the logos as having its origin from God and of the relation between them coincides substantially with the Plotinan conception of the relationship between the nous and the one (see *Platonism and the Fathers with respect to the logos of Origen, nn. 1-9). We may observe motifs of Aristotelian provenance in the Origenian conception of the human nous (see *Aristotelianism, under Origen, nn. 6-10).

*Gregory of Nyssa, in full accord with Plotinus, affirms that God is superior to the nous (In cant. cantic. hom. V, 157, 15) and reserves to his wisdom or logos—the equivalent of the nous of Plotinus—the presence of the thoughts, anterior to the creation of the sensible universe (it is same idea found in Origen and Philo; see *Platonism and the Fathers, under Gregory of Nyssa). Gregory sees the human nous as it was created by God as the expression of the original purity, beauty and perfection of humanity (it is thus that he interprets the phrase "according to the image and likeness" of Gen 1:26); darkened and disfigured by a predilection for matter, this beauty can be restored by distancing the nous from the body to the highest possible degree (on the agreement, also on this point, between Gregory and Plotinus, which Merki emphasizes, see *Platonism and the Fathers, under Gregory of Nyssa). Very frequent in Gregory is the idea of the noble intelligence which, free from every tie with matter, flies toward the divine (see, e.g., De virg. 294, 8-10 and Plato, Phaedo 246 d). Gregory welcomes the *Stoic doctrine—present as we saw also in Antiochus of Ascalon and Philo—of the strict dependence of the sensations on the intelligence (De an. et res: PG 46, 29B 2-4, 32A 8-11, 60B 4-6; cf. also De hom. opif.: PG 46, 140A 1-9). For *Eusebius, *Cyril of Alexandria, St. *Augustine and *Theodoret the second person of the *Trinity (the Johannine logos) corresponds to the nous of Plotinus and of *Porphyry (see *Platonism and the Fathers). For ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, the nous, as in the case of the other "divine names, " does not designate the first principle considered in its monē, superior to the nous and to the ousia, but refers only to its proodos, and also in this sense it is superior to any nous (see Div. Names I, 5: PG 3, 583A 7-8, C 9; VII, 1: PG 3, 868A 5; VII, 2: PG 3, 868C 14; 869A 7); in the divine nous considered in this sense all the ideas-models are present in a superior unity (see Div. Names V, 8: PG 3, 824C 7-8). The angelic creatures are from the nous commonly called "intelligences" (noes).

III. In gnosticism. Also in the *Corpus Hermeticum we may note the oscillation between identifying the nous with God and the tendency to consider him subordinate to the first principle: in Poimandres 6 (I, 8, 16-18), the highest god is the nous generator of the logos; and also in Corp. Herm. V, 11 (I, 65, 4), the supreme god is presented as nous; but as J. Whittaker has noted (VChr 23 [1969] 95), in Corp. Herm. XII, 1 (I, 174, 3) the nous is presented as the product of the essence of God. In the system of *Basilides the nous is born from the Father (see Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 24, 3 [SC 264, 324, 40-326, 43]: Basilides autem . . . ostendens Nun primo ab innato natum Patre [see also J. Whittaker, op. cit., 103]). The *Valentinian school distinguishes the Ennoia (also called Charis or Sigē)—which together with the Bythos or Propatōr forms the first syzygy of aeons—from the nous, which is the Monogenēs born together with the Alētheia from the first syzygy: it is the principle of everything, and it alone is able to fully know the Father (Iren., Adv. haer. I, 1, 1: SC 264, 28, 74-30, 90). In the Apocryphon of John (ed. W. Till, TU 60, Berlin 1955), the Ennoia is identical to *Barbelo and to the Pronoia, the first image of God (27, 5-18 p. 95 Till), while the nous is produced subsequently to the Monogenēs, generated by Barbelo and identical to Christ (30-31, 9 101-103 Till).

DSp 11, 459-469; A.H. Armstrong, The Background of the Doctrine "That the Intelligibles Are Not Outside the Intellect, " Les sources de Plotin, in EntAC V (1960) 393-425; P. Hadot, Être, vie, et pensée chez Plotin et avant Plotin, ibid., 107-157; H.J. Krämer, Der Ursprung der Geistmetaphysik, Amsterdam 1967; Id., Grundfragen der aristotelischen Theologie, II: Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969) 486-496; J. Whittaker, Ἐπέκεινα νοῦ καὶ οὐσίας: VChr 23 (1969) 91-104 (= Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, XIII); R. Walzer, Aristotle's Active Intellect νοῦς ποιητικός in Greek and Early Islamic Philosophy, in Plotino e il Neoplatonismo in Oriente e in Occidente, Acc. Naz. dei Lincei, Quaderno 198, Rome 1974, 423-446; A.H. Armstrong, The Negative Theology of Nous in Later Platonism: JbAC Erg. 10 (1983) 31-37; L. Rizzerio, Le problème des parties de l'âme et de l'animation chez Clément d'Alexandrie: NRTh 111 (1989) 389-416; T.A. Szlezák, Platon und Aristoteles in der Nuslehre Plotins, Basel 1979 (= Platone e Aristotele nella dottrina del Nous di Plotino, It. tr. by A. Trotta, Milan 1997); S.R.C. Lilla, Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den "Homilien über die Seligpreisungen" Gregors von Nyssa, Leiden 2004.

S. Lilla

NOVATIAN (d. after 251). Probably Roman by birth, proud of his belonging to the community of *Rome (see Cypr, Ep. 30, 32), he did not receive all the degrees of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (Cornelius to Fabius, in Eus., VI, 43, 13). His priestly ordination at the hands of Pope *Fabian of Rome met with the opposition of both the clergy and the community, perhaps because he had received baptism when he was gravely ill. Pope Fabian, predecessor of *Cornelius, had been very impressed by the very great intellectual gifts of Novatian. He was not mistaken, because Latin theology did not have, at least up to the 4th c., any work which could be compared to his Trin. The letters written by Novatian, found in the corpus of *Cyprian of Carthage (30 and 36), stand by no small distance above other Roman letters, and not only stylistically. For this, Cornelius himself, Cyprian (Ep. 55, 24) and the anonymous author of the Ad Novatianum show a certain esteem for Novatian. A passage in Trin. 29, 169 seems to reveal that he had been healed from a grave illness, and had begun, immediately after an emergency baptism, the preparation of the work. For this work, and for ascetical reasons, he seems to have lived as a hermit until the time of the *Decian persecution; only in the summer of 250 did he place himself completely at the disposition of the community, immediately occupying a leading role, and exercising his authority also in the pastoral application of *penance. While the first Roman letter envisages reconciliation, in the case of illness, for those who had fallen short in the persecution (the lapsi), letter 30, 8 permits "prudent assistance" only when there is no human hope of a cure. Further, Cyprian, whose flight was much criticized in letter 8, is now called gloriosissimus and placed therefore on the same level as the confessors; Novatian now clearly saw in Cyprian, whose rigid attitude in penitential practice had in the meantime become well known in Rome, a natural ally.

When in 251 at Rome Cornelius was elected pope and not the eminent Novatian, the latter had himself ordained by three Italian bishops and sought to attract to his side bishops of other cities, or to install alongside them other bishops favorable to him, so that a truly new church was constituted. Novatian can therefore be regarded as the first antipope for whom that appellation is fully appropriate. His community did not grant forgiveness at all for grave sins, and did not direct people to penance, as *Tertullian had done even when he had become a *Montanist. The *schism of Novatian arose out of a desire for a church which was holy and pure. This image of the church did not, however, derive from a genuinely primitive Christian heritage, but is rather the expression of the reception of a Stoic rigorism in the Christian life (Cypr., Ep. 55, 16 Hartel).

Late sources maintain that Novatian became a martyr under *Valerian. In 1932 an inscription was found in a small catacomb near St. Lawrence Outside the Walls: Novatiano beatissimo martyri Gaudentius diaconus fecit, but the identification of this martyr with the founder of the sect is not demonstrable.

The chief and classic work of Novatian, Trin., was not conceived as a treatise on the *Trinity. The author does not use the word trinitas, even though it had been used forty years earlier by Tertullian (De pud. 21). Novatian does not call the *Holy Spirit either God or person, nor does he include him in the discussion on the unity of God. The Spirit is in fact for Novatian something divine and the third, next to the Father and the Son (not only the fidei auctoritas, i.e., the authority of the baptismal confession, but also the order of reason requires faith in the Spirit). In fact, Novatian's theology of the Holy Spirit is much behind that of Tertullian. Since the clearest assertions of the latter are connected in more than an accidental way with the defense of Montanism and the new prophecy of the Holy Spirit (Adv. Praxeam combats the opponents of Montanism), it may be that the reticence of Novatian has its basis in an ongoing rejection of Montanism.

Novatian introduced into Latin Christianity the expressions incarnari (Trin. 138) and praedestinatio (Trin. 94). This second term also appears in a *christological context. Christology is the basic question for Novatian, even if in the first place he clarifies the concept of God (accepting his immutability: Trin. 23) and assumes the defense of the God of the Bible against those who accused him of being envious (Trin. 7, 28). Christ came to earth in a true body (Trin. 56); he is not only man but also God (ibid.). This is shown by the fact that he is universally invoked (Trin. 74) and is the concordia utriusque substantiae (Trin. 140). As God, he is not to be identified with the Father, in that he is the second person next to him (Trin. 146). He is only able to save us because he has come in our flesh (Trin. 53). Actually, nowhere does his account concern the liberation from sin. Further, no expiatory efficacy is attributed to the death of Christ; this proves only the true human nature of Christ. The word of God (deus, sermo) takes on a body in the incarnation, which he lays down at death, as a tunic, and takes up again forever in the *resurrection (Trin. 124). With this, what was begun by means of the incarnation is made definitive. Truly because the Son of God has become Son of Man, and the Son of Man, the Son of God, the human race may be led to eternal salvation (Trin. 134). This Christ works as master, whose word confers on those who believe immortality and divinity (Trin. 84). Faith, however, seems to be identified with morals; the fault of the Jews consisted in the fact that they rejected the law, while the merit of Christians who have come from paganism lies in their having attained to the law of the gospel, becoming worthy of the help of the Holy Spirit (Trin. 164). The weight of humanity's sin consists for Novatian above all in mortality, in being subject to the passions and in the weakness of the flesh. Salvation is obtained through faith and austerity of life. Morals and doctrine are given the first place; sacramentality and grace are placed second.

Novatian wrote a work, completely *allegorical in character, De cibis iudaicis, before the persecution of Decian; he did this for one of the partial communities which was being formed in the 3rd c. to which he had been assigned. He also composed treatises, lost to us, in which he had clarified the true significance of the *sabbath and of circumcision (Cib. 1, 6). In the De cibis he shows how unclean animals, prohibited in Scripture, signify evil human actions (Cib. 3, 12); e.g., to eat birds of prey would not be prohibited, but rather theft (Cib. 3, 20). His De spectaculis is against those who tried to justify the legitimacy of the theater and their participation in public *entertainments with arguments from Scripture, adducing the episode of David, who danced (Spect. 3, 2), or those who wished to reconcile Christianity and theatrical culture, the Roman state and the church. We can think of the period which preceded the Decian persecution under the emperor *Philip the Arab, who was quite favorable to the Christians. Novatian tried to call attention to the immoral content of the pagan spectacles. For the Christians only the texts of Scripture are proper (Spect. 10, 1).

The De bono pudicitiae is a composition of Novatian subsequent to his episcopal ordination; in it he intimates that he preached almost every day on the gospel (Pud. 1, 1). The fundamental reason for the practice of chastity is the church itself, which is both virgin and bride (Pud. 2, 2), beyond the desire to spare oneself from the shame of fault and paenitentia, which is nothing other than an "ashamed testimony of the sin committed" (Pud. 13, 4). The church of Novatian, virgin and mother, is not concerned with sins, and does not direct to penance, but is watchful that its members remain "the temple of the Lord, member of Christ, dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, chosen for hope, consecrated in the faith, destined for sanctity, sons of God, brothers of Christ, spouses of the Holy Spirit" (Pud. 2, 1).

CPL 68-76; PL 3, 911-1000 and part of PL 4, among the works of Cyprian; CCL 4; H. Koch, Zum novatianischen Schrifttum: ZKG 38 (1920) 86-95; M. Simonetti, Alcune osservazioni sul De Trinitate di Novaziano, Studi in onore di A. Monteverdi, Modena 1959; H. Weyer, Novatianus. De Trinitate. Über den dreieinigen Gott. Text, Übersetzung, Einleitung, Kommentar (Testimonia II), Düsseldorf 1962; M. Simonetti, Ilario e Novaziano: RCCM 7 (1965) 1034-1047; H.J. Vogt, Coetus Sanctorum. Der Kirchenbe-griff des Novatian und die Geschichte seiner Sonderkirche (Theophaneia 20), Bonn 1968; G.F. Diercks, Note sur le traité De Trinitate de Novaziano: SE 19 (1969/70) 27-31; R.J. de Simone, Christ the True God and True Man by Novatian "De Trinitate": Augustinianum 10 (1970) 42-117; Id., The Treatise of Novatian the Roman Presbyter on the Trinity (SEA 4), Rome 1970; G.F. Diercks, Some Critical Notes on Novatian's De bono pudicitiae and the Anonymus Ad Novatianum: VChr 25 (1971) 121-130; V. Loi, La latinità cristiana nel De Trinitate di Novaziano: RCCM 13 (1971) 136-177; Id., Vetus Latina, "testo occidentale" dei Vangeli, Diatessaron nelle testimonianze di Novaziano: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 201-221; H. Gülzow, Cyprian und Novatian. Der Briefwechsel zwischen den Gemeinden Rom und Kartago zur Zeit der Verfolgung des Kaisers Decius (Beiträge zur historischen Theologie 48), Tübingen 1975; P. Petitmengin, Une nouvelle édition et un ancien manuscrit de Novatien: REA 21 (1975) 256-272; C. Curti, Lo scisma di Novaziano nell'interpretazione dello storico Socrate, in La storiografia ecclesiastica nella tarda antichità, Atti del Convegno tenuto in Erice (3-8 dicembre 1978), ed. S. Calderone, Messina 1980, 313-333; R.-Th. Klein, Novatian: BBKL 6, 1047-1049; C. Granado, Teología del Espiritu Santo en Novaciano: Communio 14 (1981) 187-204; E. Lupieri, Contributo per un'analisi delle citazioni veterotestamentarie nel De Trinitate di Novaziano: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 211-227; S. Prete, L'Antico Testamento in Novaziano De spectaculis 10: Augustinianum 24 (1982) 229-237; F. Bisconti, Un nuovo coperchio di sarcofago dal cimitero di Novaziano: RivAC 59 (1983) 61-85; P. Grattarola, Gli scismi di Felicissimo e di Novaziano: RSCI 38 (1984) 367-390; J. Polland, Un passage difficile de Novatien sur I. Cor. 15, 27-28: Gregorianum 66 (1985) 25-52; R. Giordani, "Novatiano beatissimo marturi Gaudentius diaconus fecit": contributo all'identificazione del martire Novaziano della catacomba anonima sulla via Tiburtina: RivAC 68 (1992) 233-258; E. Zaffagno, Sul capitolo introduttivo del De cibis iudaicis di Novaziano: GIF 44 (1992) 59-65; H.J. Vogt, Novatian: LTK 7, 938-939; P. Mattei, Deux notes sur mariage (divorce) et virginité dans Novatien: RSLR 29 (1993) 357-366; Id., Recherches sur la Bible à Rome vers le milieu du III^e siècle: RBen 105 (1995) 255-279; M. Wallraff, Geschichte des Novatianismus seit dem vierten Jahrhunderten im Osten: ZAC 1 (1997) 251-279; P. Mattei, La figure de Novatien chez Pacien de Barcelone. Sources et valeur documentaire des Lettres à Simpronianus sur le sujet: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 355-370; Id., Un tombeau pour Novatien? Retour sur une quaestio vexata: elenchus bibliographique, état des lieux, essai de mise au point, in Autour de Lactance (Mélanges Monat), Besançon 2003, 123-137; Novaziano, Gli spettacoli, [critical text, tr. and comm.] ed. A. Saggioro, Bologna 2001.

H.J. Vogt

NOVATIANUM, Ad. This treatise on the readmission of the lapsi*, composed in the wake of the African legislation prepared by the Council of *Carthage at which *Cyprian presided, after *Easter of 251, embraced its theses. The author criticizes Novatian for denying the misericordiam patris, respuendo paenitentiam fratris (ch. 1). Attempts to identify the author have not been successful. Pope *Cornelius has been suggested; Harnack proposed Pope *Sixtus II (Harnack, Texte und Untersuchungen zur altchrist. Literatur, 13, XX), followed by numerous scholars, therefore of Roman origin; others, however, think that it should be attributed to an unknown African bishop. In the 4th c. *Pacian of Barcelona used the treatise. The text is in PL 3, 1205ff., CSEL 3, 56ff., CCL 4, 137ff.

CPL 76; CPPM IIA, 549; EC 8, 1980; A. d'Alès, Novatien, Paris 1925, 25-30; Bardenhewer, 2, 495-496; H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen, Bonn 1926, 358-420; Quasten, Patrologia, II, Turin 1967, 598; G.F. Diercks, Some Critical Notes on Novation's De bono pudicitiae and the Anonymus Ad Novatianum: VChr 25 (1971) 121-130.

V. Saxer

NOVATIANISTS

I. Preamble. Novatian - II. The Novatian church.

Novatianists (Nouatian[o]i or Nauatianoi, in the greater number of ancient sources, from the error in naming the founder: "Novatus/tos" or "Nauatos," more frequent than "Nouatianus/nos." Novatianenses we find in Cyprian, Ep. 73, 2, 1 Hartel). The history of the Novatian church begins with the schism of spring 251; it continued until the 7th c. The more important sources are *Cyprian, Letters; *Eusebius, HE 6-7 (passages from one of more letters of *Cornelius to Phabios [*Fabius] of Antioch; letters of *Dionysius of Alexandria); *Pacian of Barcelona, three letters to the Novatianist *Sympronianus; *Socrates (who demonstrates sympathy for the Novatianist movement, its moral rigor and dogmatic orthodoxy; he uses a Novatianist informer, the priest Auxanon; *Sozomen in general depends on him); *Eulogius, Chalcedonian patriarch of *Alexandria (580[581]-607 [608]); six books, lost but commented upon by *Photius (Bibl., codd. 182.208.280), on the schismatic doctrine; and finally, against the Acts of the Martyrs of Novatian.

I. Preamble. Novatian. 1. The schism. This is not the place to trace its birth, scandalously foolish, acc. to Cornelius (Eus., HE 6, 43, 5f.), nor the commotion which it aroused in Rome itself, owing above all to the actions of Novatus, a dissolute Carthaginian deacon, and of some of the confessors, who had gathered themselves around Cornelius. The split should be attributed not so much to psychological questions as to theological ones, which, to justify a rigidity toward the lapsi, found their roots in the *anthropology, *soteriology and *ecclesiology of Novatian. He was not a rebaptizer (in conformity with the Roman tradition), he rejected absolution and any form of *penance, for adulterers no less than for the lapsi, and he administered "confirmation."

2. The fate of Novatian. His martyrdom is plausible, to judge from the account of Socrates (HE 4, 28, 15) and from the Acts read by Eulogius (cf. also Pacian Ep. 2, 7, 5-6), as long as we understand them properly: dead, without doubt, in exile where the bishop would have been sent in virtue of a previous edict of *Valerian (promulgated between Aug 257 and Aug 258). It is probable that the tomb of the dissident was recovered in 1932 in Rome, in the catacomb which, from that time, has borne his name.

II. The Novatian church. 1. Beginnings outside Rome. After his election, Novatian sent to Carthage the priest Maximus, the deacon Augendo, and the laymen Machseus and Longinus, and via letters tried to win to his cause the African episcopate, which at first hesitated; later, Evaristus, an ex-Italian bishop, auctor schismatis acc. to Cornelius (inter Ep. Cypr., 50, 1, 2: a hypothetical text, which in any case does not necessarily mean that Evaristus was one of the consecrators of Novatian), the deacon Nicostratus, Novatus (already cited), Dennis and Primus set up a Novatian church in Carthage, the bishop of which was Maximus (already cited; Cyprian, Ep. 44, 1, 1; 52; 59, 9, 2). In the rest of the West the schism attracted adherents: in 254–255, Cyprian, his attention recalled to the case of Marcianus of Arles by Faustinus of Lyons, asks Stephen of Rome to arrange his dismissal (Ep. 66). The episcopate was at first hesitant in the East as well: At Antioch Fabius supported Novatian, and at Alexandria, Dionysius, responding to a message in which the Roman sought to justify his works, attempted a call to return to unity. In the years that passed, the rebellion welled up again both in East (Dionysius to Stephen, in Eus., HE 7, 4-5, 1) and West—without disappearing.

2. 4th and 1st half of 5th c. The presence of Novatianists is attested in various parts of the empire, although in very different ways. In the West, these attestations are rare. There is relative silence in *Gaul, Illyria, and *Africa itself (*Augustine does not say much [cf. Ep. 265], and the links that certain modern writers profess to find between the Novatianists and the *Donatists are disputable). In N *Italy *Ambrose (De paenitentia) suggests the existence of dissidents, and in *Spain *Pacian contended with them, but without giving the impression that they are a clearly defined group. In Rome, toward the middle of the century, the deacon Gaudentius decorated the tomb of Novatian (see the inscription in situ); a bishop, Leontius, is mentioned under Theodosian, who esteemed him. (He interceded with success in favor of a pagan, Symmachus, compromised during the usurpation of Maximus: Socr., HE 5, 14, 3-9.) In *Egypt and in *Syria, the polemics of *Athanasius and of *Eusebius of Emesa would not have had any meaning if there had not existed groups of Novatianists. But it is at *Constantinople (and the nearby regions *Asia Minor, *Thrace) that information abounds, thanks to Socrates and Sozomen (see GCS 50 and NF 1, 1, "Name Index," s.v. "Ναυατιάνοι").

Thanks to them we know the succession of Novatian bishops in the imperial capital: (1) Acesius, under *Constantine and *Constantius (the Novatian church was destroyed by bishop Macedonius, but three churches were built or rebuilt under *Julian); (2) Agelius, until 384 (exiled by *Valens, who closed the churches, then granted an amnesty owing to the intervention of the schismatic priest Marcianus, tutor to his daughters; at the time of Agelius, but in his absence, the synod of Pazos, in Phyrgia, considered the difficulties created by Sabbatius and by his partisans, *quartodecimans; in 383, in a council convoked by *Theodosius I, of various trinitarian parties, Agelius, on the advice of the lector Sisinnius, a refined and educated man, proposed, along with a Catholic bishop Nettarius, an orthodox profession of faith); (3) Marcianus (already mentioned; a Bithynian synod of 391 left complete freedom on the question of *Easter); (4) Sissinius (already mentioned; after 395); (5) Chrysanthus (after 407 or 408), charitable and active; (6) Paul (419–438), worker of miracles; (7) another Marcianus. Epigraphy indicates the "churches of the pure" ("καθάροι": a title already common in Eus., HE 6, 43, 1, and in the fathers of *Nicaea) in certain cities of Phrygia; there, the Novatianists were united to other rigorist groups (*Montanists): whence their subsequent history—and some confusions among the *heresiologists and ancient historians.

Novatian discipline in the course of the 4th c. (and in following centuries) shows both novelty and local variation. Already from the 3rd c. the Mauretanian Novatians practiced rebaptism (see Cypr., Ep. 73, 2, 1). Certain communities saw their way to establish a penitential discipline, but without absolution (even on the deathbed). In *Asia at least, the list of grave sins included, under Montanist influence, second marriages, and confirmation had fallen into disuse (Theodoret, Haer. 3, 5). According to Eulogius, the Novatianists of *Alexandria rejected the cult of relics.

Despite the attacks from the Catholics (following stereotypical themes: rebukes addressed to "Novatian" for pride and rigidity), the church and the state in the 4th c. maintained rather sympathetic relations. This is shown by synodal legislation: the so-named canons of *Elvira demonstrate that the schism could have influence in an attitude of moral severity, and the Council of Nicaea (can. 8) accepts the baptism and ordination of the Novatianists, under the condition of an imposition of hands, with penitential meaning. (They impose also accepting the communion of the δίγαμοι—i.e., those divorced and remarried.) At Constantinople, the authorities showed themselves indulgent when Nicene adherents persecuted pro-*Arians: the Novatianists, who accepted Nicaea, were not touched by the anti-Nicene measures of *Constantine and *Theodosius (a contrary decision, attributed to Constantine by Eusebius [?], Vit. Const. 3, 64, and, after him, by Sozomen, HE 8, 24, 1-2, is apocryphal); as for the bishops, if Macedonius, supporter of the *homoiousios, accused them of Nicenism (as did Eleusius, he too homoiousion, at Cyzicus), the *homoousians (except *John Chrysostom) welcomed them—esp. since, faced with the "Arians, " the group which had remained Catholic received help on occasion from them.

A change occurred in the 1st half of the 5th c., in Rome, when Pope *Innocent I and—after a period of tranquility under Pope *Zozimus and *Boniface I—*Celestine I closed the churches of the Novatianists: they must have disappeared from the city, and "Rusiculas" (?) is the last bishop of which we know (Socr., HE 7, 9, 2.11, 1-5). The emperors, in 423, included them among the heretics (CTh. 16, 5, 59), but changed this in 428 (ibid., 16, 5, 65). In Alexandria *Cyril persecuted them, as also *Nestorius in Constantinople (Socr., HE 7, 7, 5.29, 11-12); Cyril, however, did not succeed in eliminating them, and in the capital in fact, after Marcianus II, we have no more information about the Novatianists simply because the continuers of Socrates tell us nothing. In the 6th c. *Leontius of Constantinople mentions the Novatianists again (PG 62, 759-764), but perhaps this is an archaism, while a Constantinopolitan homily of ps.-Chrysostom shows debate with them at a date which remains unknown (De poenitentia: PG 59, 765-766; 6th c.).

Later evidence. One notices a disparity between West and East. In the West, almost nothing after the middle of the 5th c.: Pope *Leo I indicates in Mauretania the arrival in the catholic church of a bishop, Donatus, with his faithful (Ep. 12, 6). In the East, the evidence is hardly less scarce (up to *John of Damascus; we recall Eulogius, to whom we may add some later statements, somewhat bookish in character; the latest Asian Novatianists seem to have had relations with the *Paulicians). Novatian rigorism was maintained for a long time in the East, since its deeper roots esp. in Asia allowed it, in those countries, to embody a protest against the establishment of the state church.

E. Amann, DTC 11, 815-849; R. Janin, Les Novatiens orientaux: Échos d'Orient (1929) 385-397; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford 1952, passim; H.J. Vogt, Coetus Sanctorum. Der Kirchenbegriff des Novatian und die Geschichte seiner Sonderkirche, Bonn 1968; C. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome

1976, passim; G. Cereti, Divorzio, nuove nozze e penitenza nella chiesa primitiva, Bologna 1977, 265-361; M. Wallraff, Geschichte des Novatianismus seit dem vierten Jahrhunderten im Osten: ZAC 1 (1997) 251-279; P. Mattei, La figure de Novatien chez Pacien de Barcelone. Sources et valeur documentaire des Lettres à Simpronianus sur le sujet: Augustinianum 38 (1998) 355-370; Id., Le témoignage d'Euloge, patriarche d'Alexandrie, sur Novatien (d'après Photius, Bibl., codd. 182, 208, 280), in Curiosité historique et intérêts philologiques (Mélanges Lancel), Grenoble 1998, 151-166; Id., Un tombeau pour Novatien? Retour sur une quaestio vexata: elenchus bibliographique, état des lieux, essai de mise au point, in Autour de Lactance (Mélanges Monat), Besançon 2003, 123-137.

P. Mattei

NOVATUS (d. 440). Bishop of Sitifis (today Sétif, in Algeria) for 37 years, as his epitaph tells us (Diehl 1101; CIL 8, 8634). He was ordained in 403. He seems to be the same bishop Novatus to whom letter 84 of *Augustine was addressed, whose brother Lucillus was deacon with Augustine in *Hippo (Ep. 84, 1), and who then became bishop of Castellum Sinitense. In fact we find him not only to be a friend of Augustine but also someone who made his works known to Count Darius (Aug., Ep. 229,1 and 230,1-2); a letter of his addressed to Augustine is not extant (Aug., Ep. 229, 1). In 416 he was present at the Council of Milevis (Aug., Ep. 176, intest.), of which he was the twelfth signatory; in 418 at the Council of *Carthage (cf. CCL 149, 158, 54-56); and also at the council of 419, still more important as it had to consider the matter of *Apiarius, as one of the legates of the Mauretania Sitifensis (CCL 149, 92 and 151). In that year *Galla Placidia invited Novatus, perhaps then primate of Mauretania Sitifensis, to attend a council to be held in Spoleto—a council which never actually met—to deal with the dispute between *Boniface, bishop of Rome, and his rival *Eulalius (Coll. Avel., ep. 28: CSEL 35, 93). The invitation of Galla Placidia is a sign that Novatus was also known and appreciated at the imperial court of *Ravenna. Before 422 he interceded for a widow who had taken a vow of continence and had been abducted by the catechumen Celticius in order to marry her (Aug., De octo Dulcitii quaest. 7, 3). In 437 Novatus was expelled from his see by the *Vandal *Genseric, who had confiscated his churches (Prosp. Aq., Chron. ad an. 437: MGH, Auct. ant. IX, 475). He died in 440 (CIL 8, 8634).

S.A. Morcelli, Africa christiana, I, Brescia 1816, 283-284; PWK 3 A, 393-394; J.-L. Maier, L'épiscopat de l'Afrique romaine, vandale et byzantine, Rome 1973, 369; PCBE I, 783-784; S. Lancel, Actes de la Conférence de Carthage en 411, SC 373, Paris 1991 (see index).

A. Di Berardino

NOVATUS of Carthage (mid-3rd c.). Priest of *Carthage of the mid-3rd c. Together with *Fortunatus and Gordius he opposed the election of *Cyprian (Ep. 24, 4). Novatus, a follower of *Felicissimus, avaricious, malicious and always searching out novelties (Ep. 50, 52, 2), separated from the church (Ep. 47, 52, 1) on account of this perversity. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE VI, 43, 1-2.21; VI, 45.46, 1.3; VII, 4, 8) and, with him, all Greek writers who followed him, confuse Novatus with *Novatian.

F. Villegas, Les sentences pour les moines de Novat le Catholique: RBen 86 (1976) 49-74 (see 65); G.W. Clarke, The Letters of Cyprian of Carthage, New York 1984, I, 266-268.

E. Romero Pose

NOVATUS the Catholic (d. before 530). Italian author of the sermon Sententia de humilitate et oboedentia et de calcando superbia, whom the MS tradition calls catholicus to distinguish him from certain heterodox figures of the same name. Novatus, a priest or bishop, addressed a religious community in which there were strained relations with the abbot. He defended the importance, in the common life, of the three virtues of humility, obedience and fraternal charity. Since *Eugippius draws on it in his rule, written between 530 and 535, it must date from before then.

CPL 639 and 1154; PL 18, 67-70; PLS 1, 672 and 1751; DSp 11, 477-478; DIP 6, 441-442; F. Villegas, Les sentences pour les moines de Novat le Catholique: RBen 86 (1976) 49-74.

A. Di Berardino

NOVELLAE. Imperial constitutions enacted by the emperors after the promulgation of the codices of *Theodosius II and of *Justinian (534). They are of two types: (1) Novellae Constitutiones posttheodosianae (ed. Mommsen 1905) of the period from 438 to 468. They were valid in the part of the empire of the respective emperor, and in the other part only if accepted: only one case is known, that of Theodosius II, who in 447 sent a collection of 35 novellae to his son-in-law *Valentinian III. In about 460 the first collection was compiled, which contained 35 novellae of Theodosius II, 35 of Valentinian III and apparently 12 of Majorian (d. 461). To this collection others were added, among which were five Eastern Novellae of *Marcian (450–457). No other Eastern novellae have been preserved, because they were incorporated into the CI and also because Justinian prohibited recourse to laws anterior to his codification (CI, Const. Summa 3 of 529). (2) Novellae Con- stitutiones, those issued by Justinian after the second edition of the CI (534), almost all drawn up in Greek. For those of Justinian there was no official collection, but only a series of different private collections. Important are the Epitome Iuliani of 556/557, i.e., the Latin summary of 124 novellae (there are two duplicates); the Authenticam of 557–558, then enlarged up to 563, containing 134, all translated into *Latin (in the West from the 12th c. it replaced the Epitome); Collectio graeca composed of 168, of which 158 of Justinian (two repetitions), up to Tiberius II (578–582) (ed. Schöll-Kroll). Many of these deal with ecclesiastical questions (see DDC 4, 657-661): persons (3, 5, 56, 57, 76, 81, 123), ordinations (6, 16), hierarchy (11 and 35), depositions (42), church property (7, 46, 55, 120), places of worship (67), worship (58), funerals (59), ecclesiastical jurisdiction (79, 83, 85), heretics (45, 131) etc. 131 is interesting because it refers to the sources of ecclesiastical law, the organization of the churches and contains the statement that "the pope of ancient *Rome is the first of all the sacerdotes, " while the bishop of *Constantinople is the second.

CPL 1795; 1799; Noailles, Les collections des Novelles de l'empereur Justinien, Paris 1912; Id., La collection grecque de 168 Novelles, Paris 1914; G.G. Archi, Giustiniano legislatore, Bologna 1970 (cf. Dovere: SDHI 47 [1981] 31-36); C. Capizzi, Giustiniano I tra politica e religione, Soveria Mannelli 1994; G. Lanata, Società e diritto nel mondo tardo antico: sei saggi sulle Novelle giustinianee, Turin 1994; N. van der Wal, Manuale Novellarum Justiniani: aperçu systematique du contenu des Novelles de Justinien, Groningue [2]1998; O. Mazal, Iustininian I und seine Zeit, Cologne 2001.

A. Di Berardino

NOVIODUNUM. The ruins are to be found 2 km (1.2 mi) to the E of Isaccea, in the area of Tulcea, Romania, on the right bank of the Danube, by the last ford before the river goes into the sea. Its name of Celtic origin, this Roman and later Byzantine port in N Dobruja was rebuilt at the beginning of the 4th c. and again under *Justinian (527–565). In the vicinity there were various necropolises. The Danube now marks the boundary between Romania and the Ukraine, but then it was the boundary between the Roman (and Byzantine) Empire and the barbarian world. It was a commercial and cosmopolitan city; a military base (Legio I Iovia Scythica) and a naval one (Classis Flavia Moesica). The archaeological work undertaken for reasons of preservation in 1955–1956 identified a part of the walls and buildings from the NE side of the city, destroyed for the most part by the waters of the Danube. Ruins of a Christian basilica were discovered, with a large apse facing NE, set against the city walls, with three aisles and a simple narthex. A cemeterial basilica was identified in the large necropolis in the S part of the city. Being a commercial city, Christianity arrived there by means of merchants. Hagiographical texts (Breviarium Syriacum, Sinassario Costantinopolitano and Martirologio Gerominiano) locate numerous martyrs at Noviodunum.

The most important paleo-Christian structure found in the area of the city is ca. 10 km (6.2 mi) to the SE, in the center of the village of Niculitel: a crypt with the tombs of martyrs (martyrium), found in 1971, over which a Christian church was built. The martyrium, integrally preserved, is square in design, with sides of ca. 3.5 m (11.5 ft), 2.25–2.3 m (7.5 ft) in height, with a brick cupola of 3 m (9.8 ft) diameter, and with a small entrance (0.7 x 0.69 m [2.26 x 2.30 ft]) on the W, which was discovered blocked in with a slab of limestone. On the upper part of the N and S walls, each under their respective monogrammatic cross, the following epigraphs are etched in raw plaster, and subsequently colored red: Μάρτυρες Χριστοῦ (on the N wall) and Μάρτυρες Ζώτικος, Ἄτταλος, Καμάσις, Φίλιππος (on the S wall). The names of four martyrs Zotikos, Attalos, Kamasi(o)s and Philippos, together with "another 25" are recorded by the Mart. hier. on the date of 4 June. The continuation of the excavations under this crypt in 1973 and 1975 brought to light two small rooms on the entrance of which this epigraph was found: Ὧδε καὶ ὧδε ἰχὼρ μαρτύρων ("Here and there [is found] the blood of martyrs"). Inside, two ceramic jars were found with a great quantity of calcined human bones belonging to the two martyrs. It is supposed that the six martyrs died during the great persecution of *Diocletian of 303–304. Placed at first, or otherwise subsequently, in a martyrium structure, traces of the foundations of which have been identified to the W of the preserved martyrium, the relics of the six martyrs were probably transferred to the latter location in the 5th or 6th c., when a basilica was erected over it, the foundations of which have been partly unearthed.

I. Barnea, Dinogetia et Noviodunum, deux villes byzantines du Bas-Danube: RESE 9 (1971) 343-362; V.H. Baumann, La basilique découverte à Niculitel: Dacia n.s. 16 (1972) 189-202; P.S. Nasturel, Quatre martyrs de Noviodunum (Scythie Mineure): AB 91 (1973) 5-8; Em. Popescu, Inscriptiile grecesti si latine din secolele IV-XIII descoperite in România, Bucharest 1976; I. Barnea, Les monuments paleochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; Id., Christian Art in Romania, I, Bucharest 1979; Id. - A.L. Barnea, Sapaturile de salvare de la Noviodunum: Pauce 9 (1984) 97-105, 503-518; A. Rădulescu - V. Lungu, Le christianisme en Scythie mineure à la lumière des dernières découvertes archéologiques, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2561-2615, esp. 2614-2615; Roman limes on the Middle and Lower Danube, Archaeological Institute, Belgrade 1996; A. Barnea, Une province chrétienne sous Justinien: La Scythie mineure, in Acta XIII Congressus Intern. Arch. christianae, II, Vatican City 1998, 807-822, esp. 816; V.H. Baumann, La città romana e bizantina di Noviodunum. Reperti archeologici, in Italia e Romania, ed. S. Santelia, Bari 2004, 113-132.

I. Barnea

NUBIA
I. Christianity - II. Old Nubian.

I. Christianity. Nubia is a region situated between N Sudan and S *Egypt along the course of the Nile, more or less from the confluence between the White Nile and the Blue Nile (Khartoum) N to the first cataract (Aswan). Christianity probably penetrated the area, in a sporadic form, as early as the 3rd c. The first archaeological evidence of Christianity dates to ca. 400. According to the History of *John of Ephesus, the evangelization of the country was due to rival missions, sent by *Justinian and by *Theodora in about 540, which succeeded in converting the three kingdoms of the region: Nodabia (capital: Faras/Pakhoras), Makuria (capital: Old Dongola) and Alodia (capital: Soba). Relations with *Byzantium were broken off in about 640, when Egypt was conquered by the Arabs, with whom a permanent state of war was established, which finished, in 1323, with the invasion of the kingdom of Dongola (already ca. 700 united to Nobadia). The kingdom of Alodia was destroyed at the end of the 15th c. by the Funj, a desert population.

Regardless of the presence or absence of missionaries of *Chalcedonian convictions during the 6th c., from an ecclesiastical point of view Nubia emerged as an anti-Chalcedonian region, organized around the episcopal sees of Faras (then transferred to Qasr Ibrim/Primis) and of Gebel Adda/Daw. Archaeological research has revealed a Christian culture with its own specific features, which flourished in 9th–11th c. both architecturally (churches following a distinctive design, sometimes frescoed) and in literary terms, with epigraphs and evidence of literary work in Greek, Sahidic, Nubian and Arabic.

U. Monneret de Villard, Storia della Nubia cristiana, OCA 118, Rome 1938; Id., La Nubia medioevale. I-IV, Le Caire 1935-57; E. Dinkler (ed.), Kunst und Geschichte Nubiens in christlicher Zeit. Ergebnisse und Probleme auf Grund der jüngsten Ausgrabungen, Recklinghausen 1970; C.J. Gardberg, Late Nubian Sites: Churches and Settlements, Scandinavian Joint Expedition to Sudanese Nubia 7, Stockholm 1970; S. Jakobielski, A History of the Bishopric of Pachoras on the Basis of Coptic Inscriptions, Faras 3, Warszawa 1972; K. Michalowski (ed.), Nubia. Récentes recherches . . . , Varsovie 1975; J.M. Plumley, The Scrolls of Bishop Timotheus . . . , London 1975; W.H.C. Frend - I.A. Muirhead, The Greek Manuscripts from the Cathedral of Q'asr Ibrim: Muséon 89 (1976) 43-49; Nubia christiana. I, Warsaw 1982; J. Cuoq, Islamisation de la Nubie chrétienne, VII^e-XVI^e siècle, Bibliothèque d'études islamiques 9, Paris 1986; Faras: die Kathedrale aus dem Wüstensand . . . , W. Seipel (ed.), Vienna 2002; S.G. Richter, Studien zur Christianisierung Nubiens, Wiesbaden 2002; D.A. Welsby, The Medieval Kingdoms of Nubia: Pagans, Christians and Muslims Along the Middle Nile, London 2002.

II. Old Nubian. Language of the Nile-Chadic family, in which, using an alphabet derived from that of Old *Coptic, some works were either written or translated in the Middle Ages which are of Christian importance: parts of the Bible have been preserved (above all a lectionary for the Christmas period), a collection of miracles of St. Menas, the canons of *Nicaea, a ps.-Chrysostomic homily on the cross, as well as numerous minor texts and fragments, some still unidentified.

B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament, Their Origin, Transmission and Limitations, Oxford 1977, 268-274; E.A.W. Budge, Texts Relating to Saint Mena of Egypt and Canons of Nicaea in a Nubian Dialect, London 1909; J. Barns, A Text of the Benedicite in Greek and Old Nubian from Kasr El-Wizz: JEA 60 (1974) 206-211; G.M. Browne, Chrysostomus Nubianus: An Old Nubian Version of Ps.-Chrysostom, In Venerabilem Crucem Sermo, Papyrologica Castroctaviana 10, Rome-Barcelona 1984; J.M. Plumley - G.M. Browne, Old Nubian Texts from Qaṣr Ibrīm. I, Texts from Excavations. 9th Memoir, London 1988; G.M. Browne, Ad Chrysostomum Nubianum 18.5-7: Orientalia 57 (1988) 210-211; G.M. Browne, Literary Texts in Old Nubian, Beiträge zur Sudanforschung 5, Vienna-Mödling 1989; G.M. Browne, Introduction to Old Nubian, Meroitica 11, Berlin 1989; G.M. Browne, Bibliorum sacrorum versio Palaeonubiana, CSCO 547/Subs. 87, Lovanii 1994; S. Emmel, Preliminary Reedition and Translation of the Gospel of the Savior: New Light on the Strasbourg Coptic Gospel and the Stauros-Text from Nubia: Apocrypha 14 (2003) 9-53.

S.J. Voicu

NUDITY, BAPTISMAL. Ancient art contained many images of nude persons, expressive of a "heroic body" (a heroic nudity). In paleo-Christian art we find depictions of nude babies (putti), but also biblical persons (*Adam, Eve, *Daniel, *Jonah). Pagan statues were condemned by the Christians not because they were nude but because they portrayed divinities. Nudity was particularly practiced in athletic games to indicate complete control of both mind and body; the athlete had to be perfectly naked to be able to do the exercises; it was necessary to free oneself from things both external and internal (Porphyry, De abstin. 1, 31). Baths, in the imperial period, were large and complex structures. Vitruvius (De archit. 5, 10, 1) writes: "Care must be taken that the warm baths of the women and the men [caldaria muliebra et virilia] adjoin" so that they could use the same heating. They became very popular and were frequented also by women. Everyone bathed nude; but it is not really known to what extent the sexes mixed. Baths were not only for bathing but also for physical exercises undertaken in the gymnasium, as well as for conversation, social activities and for pursuing economic and political contacts. From the 1st c. AD, because many women bathed with men and scandals occurred, the emperor *Hadrian was said to have prohibited mixed bathing (Cassius Dio, Hist. 69, 8, 2; Hist. Augusta 18, 10); in reality it seems that only from the 4th c. were there distinct sections in the baths. Attendance could be at different times; but everything depended on the particular sensibility of persons and on the region of the Roman Empire; also, the "atmosphere" of the individual bath complexes varied: some baths were more disreputable, or more open and reserved, others less.

Christians attended public baths (Eus., HE 5, 1, 5; 5, 4, 2; Iren., Adv. haer. 3, 3, 4; Tertull., Apolog. 42, 2; 42, 4; De spect. 8, 9; De virg. vel. 12, 4), as did Jews (L.M. Epstein, Sex Laws and Customs in Judaism, New York 1967, 29-30). Some Christian authors warned women, out of modesty, against mixed baths and frequent use of them (Clem. Alex., Paed. 3, 5); *Cyprian of Carthage reproved the virgines who frequented the promiscuae balneae, in that they were contrary to modesty and exposed one to licentious glances (De habitu 19), but recommended bathing together with other women (De habitu 21). The Didascalia (3, 19), a work of the 3rd c., criticizes mixed bathing and recommends that women, in the absence of separate baths, attend them at a later hour. The Apostolic Constitutions*, from the 4th c., which draw on the Didascalia, do not, however, allow any exceptions (1, 9). The Council of *Laodicea prescribes: "No consecrated ministers or clerics or ascetics, nor any Christian layman, shall wash in a bath with women; for this is the first reproach among the pagans" (can. 30). The use of baths and of common times is admitted by the monk Jovinian at *Rome at the end of the 4th c. (Jerome, Adv. Iov. 2, 36). *Jerome criticized the virgines who bathed, nude, with eunuchs and married women (Ep. 107, 11). Still in the 7th c. in the East we find cases of mixed bathings, condemned by the Council in Trullo* (can. 77). It may be said that that in those centuries nudity, in shared baths, did not have ethical significance. Decency and modesty were linked to the social status of persons and to the social context, acc. to values which were both accepted and shared. To strip someone publicly was a great humiliation and considered a great crime, as *Ammianus recounts in the case of Flavian, accused of adultery; for this act the executioner was burned alive (Hist. 28, 1, 28). At *Carthage, "the crowd was horrified that the women were stripped naked in the arena" (Passio Perpetuae 20, 1). Slowly, however, in a Christian context, the exhortation to modesty, both for women and men, was intensified in all settings. Reserve became the norm.

How was the rite of the administration of solemn baptism conducted? There was a fast evolution in the first centuries, from the early ceremonies, brief and containing what was essential (see Acts 2:41; 8:36-40) to a progressive enrichment of forms and modalities. With respect to the 4th c. the development of the complexity of baptisteries is a witness to the rich and extended ceremony of the paschal vigil, during which baptism by triple immersion and emersion was administered in a bath of water. The ancient sources say that before the central act of the rite the catechumens took off their clothes, remaining nude, both men and women. This stripping, an essential element, and the reclothing were acts rich in profound theological and spiritual symbolism. Nudity—required also for unction—was ritual in character, rather than ascetical, and took its place within an absorbing and dramatic ceremony. Those to be baptized were in the 4th c. normally adults and not children. The term nudus (Greek: gymnos) did not always indicate complete nudity; its exact significance one determines from the context. Leclercq (DACL 12, 1804) affirms that those to be baptized were nude on the grounds not only of a sketch on stone at Aquileia—where the candidate seems to be a baby girl (DACL 26)—but also on the grounds of extensive and diverse literary evidence. It is not possible that this usage was introduced later; that would be unthinkable. This is the common opinion. In the Abbey of Pomposa a nude couple is depicted with babies in their arms, but only the upper part of the picture has been preserved. In the 3rd-c. Apostolic Tradition* (ch. 21) there is evidence of it; the De singularitate clericorum writes that "one should not be ashamed on account of nudity in that same baptism where one renews the infancy of Adam and Eve and where, more than taking off, one receives the tunic" (PL 4, 847). *John of Jerusalem affirms: "You stripped yourselves of your tunics . . . you were nude, imitating also in this Christ nude on the cross. . . . You were nude in the sight of everyone, and you were not ashamed" (Catech. myst. 3, 2). Among others we may cite *John Chrysostom (Catech. 3, 8) and Proclus (in ST 247, 193). From the 5th c. there is evidence of various expedients employed on account of a certain reservedness in the baptismal chamber, into which few persons were able to enter. In the East, for some rites, e.g., the unction of those to be baptized, deaconesses were used (see Martimort, Les diaconesses, 34ff.; 49ff.). *John Moschus mentions the curious incident of the priest Conon, who found difficulty in anointing women in baptism (Prato spir. 3: PG 87, 2852-2856). Some texts (the De singularitate, the Didascalia, the Apostolic Constitutions etc.) reflect embarrassment in the communities. Ritual nudity was not sexual promiscuity, because modesty was preserved in various ways: temporal separation of baptism, architectural techniques, veils (cf. V. Ferrua, 212; Saxer, 655); Augustine distinguishes in the baptistery "the part of the women" (Civ. Dei 22, 8, 4). Filoramo delicately contextualizes baptismal nudity in the "same ritual dynamic, more precisely in its capacity of practical control and of symbolic sublimation" (34). Spiritual formation generated a new vision of the body. After the long, arduous and tiring preparation, in the fast, in the atmosphere of collective prayer and spiritual rebirth, "the ritual process itself offered the means opportunely to articulate, control, and sublimate personal emotions and passions" (op. cit., 39) in a place "where all is innocence, all is piety, all is grace, all is sanctification" (Ambrose, Sacram. 1, 10).

Recently, Laurie Guy, contrary to the received opinion, has argued that, baptism being administered by a male clergy, the sense of modesty of both the Jewish tradition—which was contrary to feminine nudity in public—and the Christian would not have permitted female nudity to be exposed to the gaze of men, even if holy persons. Since the administration of baptism by women was prohibited—the prohibition indicates that this sometimes happened—without denying that in some cases during immersion the persons being baptized were nude, Guy argues that normally they wore some clothing. The few pictorial depictions which show nude women are only stylizations or of adolescents; more frequently we find the depiction of men, "of a small naked figure immersed in water, while a larger male figure lays hands on his head" (*baptism, p. 323). In fact, acc. to Chrysostom, shortly before the central act of the rite those to be baptized were "nude, " yet still wearing some garment; it is supposed that they had worn it still during the act of immersion (Catech. 1, 2); this interpretation is confirmed by *Theodore of Mopsuestia (Catech. 2, 4; 2, 2 and 3). A respectable person is "nude" when he or she does not wear the clothes which are socially appropriate, as Peter, in the boat, is called nude, while in reality he is wearing something (Jn 21:7). The language of nudity used by the Fathers expresses rather a total stripping off of the old person in order to be reborn in Christ, with the realization of a radical change in one's mode of being and living, expressed with the putting on of the white garment. In baptism, a new birth is realized, as in the nudity of natural birth.

DACL 2, 72-177 (bains); 12, 1801-1805; cf. also 12, 1782-1801 and 1806-1808; DPAC 2, 3411-3412; J. Heckenbach, De nuditate sacra sacrisque vinculis, Giessen 1911; S. Giet, Un témoignage possible sur l'administration du baptême dans les premières années du II^e siècle et sur le rôle ministerial d'Hermas, Atti VI Congr. Int. Archeol. Cristiana, Rome 1965, 191-197; M. Harl, La prise de conscience de la nudité d'Adam. Une interprétation de Genèse 3, 7 chez les Pères grecs: SP 7 (1966) 486-495; J.A. Arieti, Nudity in Greek Athletics: Classical World 67 (1975) 431-436; J.Z. Smith, Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religions, Leiden 1978; V. Messana, La nudité d'Adam et d'Ève chez Diadoque: SP 17, 1 (1982) 325-332; A.G. Martimort, Les diaconesses: essai historique, Rome 1982; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II^e au VI^e siècle, Spoleto 1988; P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988; R.M. Miles, Carnal Knowing: Female Nakedness and Religious Meaning in the Christian West, Boston 1989; L. Bonfante, The Naked Greek: Archaeology 43 (1990) 28-35; H.P. Duerr, Nudità e vergogna. Il mito del processo di civilizzazione, Venezia 1991; R. Bowen Ward, Women in Roman Baths: HTR 85 (1992) 125-147; G. Schöllgen, Balnea mixta. Entwicklungen der spätantiken Bademoral im Spiegel der Textüberlieferung der Syrischen Didascalie: JbAC, Ergb. 22 (1995) 182-194; V. Ferrua, "Nudus nudum Christum sequi." Sulla nudità battesimale, in Super fundamentum Apostolorum, Studi in onore di J. Ortas, ed. A. Amato - G. Maffei, Rome 1997, 205-216; Naked Truths: Women, Sexuality and Gender in Classical Art and Archaeology, A.K. Ostrov - C.L. Lyons (eds.), London-New York 1997; M.L. Satlow, Jewish Construction of Nakedness in Late Antiquity: JBL 116 (1997) 429-454; G. Filoramo, Il controllo dell'eros: la nudità rituale, in L'Eros difficile. Amore e sessualità nell'antico cristianesimo, ed. S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 1998, 67-88 (now in Id., Veggenti profeti gnostici, Brescia 2005, 29-45); G. Garrett Fagan, The Bathing in Public in the Roman World, Ann Arbor, MI 1999; L. Guy, "Naked" Baptism in the Early Church: The Rhetoric and the Reality: JRH 27 (2003) 133-142.

A. Di Berardino

NUMBERS, SYMBOLISM of. To understand the symbology of numbers in the ancient world and in the Fathers we must look to the flexio digitorum which was the manner of counting at the time, and then to grammatria and gematria or psephy and isopsephy. The term finger included the meaning of calculation and so entered into the domain of the actio which played such a great part in rhetoric. The first chapter De loquela digitorum of *Bede's work De temporum ratione gives us a clear account of all the numbers as expressed by the fingers. This bending of fingers produced symbolic images which then ascribed particular meanings to biblical numbers. Typical is the case of the 100 (for the martyrs), 60

(for the widows) and 30 (for married people) of the parable of the sowers. The representation on the fingers of 100, which took the form of a circle formed by the index finger and the thumb of the right hand, suggested the possession of the Spirit, e.g., the crown of martyrdom. The representation of 100 signifies perfection. To the 99 sheep one had to be added: that which was lost. To express 30 the index finger was set gently onto the thumb, almost as to indicate the conjugal embrace. Thus 30 was attributed to the married faithful. 60, owing to the uncomfortable position of holding the thumb toward the index finger, was for widows. In many texts we find the expression: he has got 100, or 60, or 30. If the value given to these numbers is not understood, we fail to grasp aspects of the text's meaning. This applies all the more to the kingdom of heaven expressed by the *Ogdoad, indicated by the sign of eight made with the thumb, the index finger, and the middle finger raised and the ring and little fingers folded onto the palm of the hand. This did not indicate three, as it does now, which was instead shown by the index finger and the thumb raised and the other fingers folded onto the palm of the hand. There have been many misunderstandings with respect to the gesture for eight, which in our times has not been well understood. It has been confused with the rhetorical gesture for the dead who, in fact, hoped in the Ogdoad: the kingdom of heaven. Arab numerals have universalized numerical signs, so we are obliged to enter into different methods and systems in order to understand the past. The symbology of numbers, inherited by the ancient Christians, may seem to us overingenious and artificial. It is therefore necessary to enter into the soul of their culture in order to read and understand them. The actio of numbers which lay outside a common method was regarded as forced and lacking in consistency. *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. I, 16, 2) disputed with the *Valentinians over this very point. According to St. *Augustine, without the knowledge of the language of numbers it is not possible to understand the metaphors and the mystical senses of Holy Scripture (Doct. christ. 2, 16, 25). The Lord has arranged all things acc. to measure, acc. to number and weight (Wisd 11, 20). Augustine wanted a dictionary to be compiled of the mystical sense of the numbers mentioned in the Bible (Doct. christ. 2, 39, 59). Further, he thought foolish those who believed that the numbers in Sacred Scripture were found there without reason (Trin. 4, 6). As well as St. Augustine and Bede, we have *Isidore of Seville, who wrote a tract: Liber numerorum qui in Sanctis Scripturis occurrunt. Under the title Liber de computo we have, in a jumbled form, a vast amount of material relating to the paschal cycle. The term computus* in antonomasia was that which had to do with Easter.

There is no ancient Christian author who did not directly or indirectly speak of the symbology of numbers. *Methodius of Olympus in the Symposium (8, 11, 199-203 Bonwetsch) gives us meanings attributed to particular figures. 1,000, which is equal to 100 × 10, is a symbol of the Father; 200, as the sum of two perfect numbers, is a symbol of the *Holy Spirit; 60, which contains 6 times the number 10, is a symbol of Christ. But even earlier *Clement of Alexandria presents us with a numerology acc. to the culture of the period. For him, 6, 7 and 8 are the three numbers which link humanity most directly with the divinity (Strom. VI, 16, 138, 5-6; VI, 16, 140, 1-2; VI, 16, 141, 3 Stählin).

We come to grammatria and gematria, or, as others say, to psephy and isopsephy. The relationship between the letters which make up a word and the numbers that these letters signify could have a symbolic meaning. The ancient Christians thought that every letter of the Hebrew, Greek and Latin alphabets possessed a mysterious character. *Origen, referring to the 22 inspired books of the Bible, notices in the 22 letters which make up the Hebrew alphabet an introduction to the wisdom and to the divine teachings stamped upon men (Select. in Ps. 1: PG 12, 1084). Often, a signature was written using the number corresponding to one's name, as in the graffiti of Pompeii. But every number was able to correspond to different subjects and names. Of 666, Irenaeus (Adv. haer. 5, 30, 3 Rousseau) says that many names can have this number. The number 801 is the maximum that the letters can give A = 1, Ω = 800, and is attributed to Christ as fullness and perfection, the beginning and the end of the Apocalypse (21:6; 22:12). The symbology of numbers is a crucial part of patristics, one which needs careful consideration so as to approach the subject with a research method not alien to the culture of the period. The Fathers in their theology did not want to separate themselves from the popular mind.

A. Quacquarelli, Il triplice frutto della vita cristiana 100, 60 e 30 (Mt. 13, 8 nelle diverse interpretazioni), Rome 1953; Id., Ai margini dell'actio: La loquela digitorum (La rappresentazione dei numeri con la flessione delle dita in un prontuario trasmesso dal Beda): VetChr 7 (1970) 199-224; Id., La fortuna di Archimede nei retori e negli autori cristiani antichi, in Saggi patristici. Retorica ed esegesi biblica (Quaderni di VetChr 5), Bari 1971, 381-424; Id., L'ogdoade patristica e i suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei monumenti (Quaderni di VetChr 7), Bari 1973; A.Y. Collins, Numerical Symbolism in Jewish and Early Christian Apocalyptic Literature: ANRW II, 21, 1 (1984) 1221-1287; A. Quacquarelli, Il recupero della numerologia per la metodica dell'esegesi patristica: AnSE 2 (1985) 235-249; Id., La scienza e numerologia in S.

Agostino: VetChr 25 (1988) 359-379; G. Friedlein, Die Zahlzeichnen und das elementare Rechnen der Griechen und Römer und des christlichen Abelandes vom 7. bis 13. Jahrhundert, 1984; Lexikon der mittelalterichen Zahlendbedeutungen, ed. H. Mayer - R. Suntry, Munich 1987; A. Michel, Si la mémoire n'était comptée: symbolique des nombres et mémoires artificielle de l'Antiquité à nos jours, Lyon-Paris 1991; C. Horn, Augustins Philosophie der Zahlen: REAug 40 (1994) 389-415; J.-P. Brach, La symbolique des nombres, Paris 1994; S. Barbone, El número en Agustín: Augustinus 44 (1999) 35-49; EAM 8, 781-786; I. Bodrožic', La numerologia in Sant'Agostino, Zagreb 2002; M. Marin, Note sul simbolismo aritmologico di Vittorino di Petovio, in Italia e Romania. Storia Cultura Civiltà a confronto, ed. S. Satelia, Bari 2004, 195-203.

A. Quacquarelli

NUMENIUS of Apamea (2nd c.). *Platonizing Neo-Pythagorean philosopher of the 2nd c. AD, with vast interests in the religions and cultures of the Eastern peoples and in the history of philosophy, both Greek and that of other peoples. Numenius's theological and metaphysical system based on the "three gods"—the first god or absolute good, the second god or demiurge, the third god or world (fr. 21 Des Places, 60)—clearly anticipates the *Plotinian system of the three *hypostases, even if there are some differences. His works have not come down us intact—the most important of which was On the Good—but only fragments and testimonies about his doctrine, both of which come to us through later authors (such as the Christian *Origen, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Porphyry, *Iamblichus, *Nemesius of Emesa, *Olympiodorus, *Aeneas of Gaza, *Calcidius, Proclus, Macrobius), collected and edited first by E.A. Leemans and then by E. Des Places (see final bibl.). The "first god" (on this expression see fr. 11, 15 and 21 Des Places) is the Pythagorean monad (fr. 52, p. 95, 5-6 Des Places), the absolute good of *Plato, Rep. VI 509b (fr. 16, p. 57, 4, 14; fr. 20, p. 60), the supreme intelligence (fr. 16, p. 57), the completely unknown absolute being (fr. 17, p. 58); on the one hand, he "rises above the essence" (fr. 2, p. 44, 16), is anterior to it and is its principle (fr. 16, p. 57); on the other, he is "connatural to the essence" (fr. 16, p. 57), and possesses an essence, although a different one from that of the second god (fr. 16, p. 57, 15-16); he is absolutely inactive and immobile (fr. 12, p. 54; fr. 15, p. 56), but at the same time "sows" the seminal principles (fr. 13, p. 55). The "second god" is the "fabricator" and the "demiurge" of the Platonic Timaeus (fr. 21, p. 60; fr. 16, p. 57), the second intelligence (fr. 17, p. 58), concerned with both intelligible things and sensible things (fr. 15, p. 56), is "good" (cf. Tim. 29e) in that he participates in the absolute good of the first god (fr. 19, p. 59; fr. 20, p. 60); he looks on matter, takes care of it and is joined to it while remaining separate from it, elevating it to his own character (fr. 11, p. 53); he moves (fr. 15, p. 56), proceeds through the heavens and guides them (fr. 12, p. 54), is the cause of the harmony which reigns over matter, and guides it while contemplating the ideas (fr. 18, pp. 58-59). Material is ingenerate and in origin free of forms and qualities, an opinion that Numenius shares with contemporary *Middle Platonism (fr. 52, p. 95); once, however, it has received the forms, ornaments and harmony it becomes the sensible universe and in this sense can be considered generated (fr. 52, p. 95, 10-12).

The sensible universe, the "third god" (see fr. 21), is beautiful in that it is an imitation of the essence of the "second god" and receives its ornaments from its participation in the good (fr. 16); together with the "second god"—which, as has been shown, unites itself to matter—it forms one entity (fr. 11, p. 53, 14).

Like many other advocates of the mirage oriental, Numenius sees Platonic doctrine foreshadowed in other more ancient Eastern peoples among which the Hebrews should be included (fr. 1, p. 42) and sees in Plato "a Moses who speaks Attic" (fr. 8, p. 51). Plotinus in his courses read and commented upon the writings of Numenius, as well as those of other philosophers (Porphyry, Vita Plot., ch. 14, vol. I, p. 15, 12 Bréhier), and was even accused of having taken his ideas from him (Porph., ibid., ch. 17, p. 17, 1-2). Indeed, similarities between Numenius and the great *Neoplatonic philosopher, including at the level of terminology, are not lacking, something that E.R. Dodds has highlighted (Les sources de Plotin, in EntAC V, 16-20): here we limit ourselves to noting that the expression ἐποχούμενον ἐπὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ attributed to the first god (fr. 2, p. 44, 16) is echoed by the words ἐποχούμενον τῇ νοητῇ φύσει καὶ τῇ οὐσίᾳ of Plotinus, Enn. I, 1, 8 (I, 44, 9-10). Another important point in which Numenius anticipates Neoplatonism, again highlighted by Dodds (op. cit., pp. 23-24), is the idea acc. to which the giving of goods by superior principles to inferior beings does not cause any impoverishment of the former, since the goods, while being given, continue to remain in their source (fr. 14, pp. 55-56). The three Plotinian hypostases, however, represent a more coherent system than that of Numenius, hinging on the "three gods": the first hypostases of Plotinus, the one-good, would be elevated above the intelligence and the ousia* in an unequivocal way; the second hypostasis or intelligence, while remaining identical to the demiurge, would be clearly separated from matter and from the sensible world; the third hypostasis or anima mundi*—and not the second—would have the role of guiding and directing the sensible universe, as Plato had affirmed in the Timaeus, in the Philebus and in book X of the Laws. Numenius was valued also by various Greek Fathers: the phrase "What is Plato if not a Moses who speaks Attic?" is cited by *Clement, *Eusebius and *Theodoret (see the references in Des Places, p. 52, n. 4); numerous fragments are preserved by Eusebius; some aspects of the theology of Origen—who acc. to Porphyry (Eus., HE VI, 19, 8) was an assiduous reader of Numenius—show a clear dependence on his doctrines (see *Platonism and the Fathers, apropos Origen); and *Nemesius of Emesa (De natura homimis ch 2) invokes in support of the thesis of the incorporeity of the soul not only *Ammonius Saccas but also Numenius (fr. 4b, pp. 46-47).

PWK Suppl. 7, 664-678; KLP 4, 192-194; F. Thedinga, De Numenio philosopho platonico, (Diss.), Bonn 1875; H.Ch. Puech, Numénius d'Apamée et les théologies orientales au IIe siècle, in Mélanges Bidez, 2, Paris 1934, 745-778 (repr. in En quête de la Gnose, I, Paris 1978, 25-54); A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, 3, Paris 1953, 42-47; 4, Paris 1954, 123-132; G. Martano, Numenio d'Apamea, Naples 1960; E.R. Dodds, Numenius and Ammonius, in EntAC V (1960) 3-24; J.H. Waszink, Porphyrios und Numenios, in EntAC XII (1966) 35-78; Ph. Merlan, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 96-106; E. Des Places, Numénius, Fragments, Paris 1973; The Neoplatonic Writings of Numenius, collected and tr. by K. Guthrie, Lawrence 1987; M. Frede, Numenius: ANRW 36/2 (1987) 1034-1075; S. Lilla, Introduzione al Medio platonismo, Rome 1992, 100-110 (with bibl., 188-189); Oráculos caldeos: con una selección de testimonies de Proclo . . . Numenio de Apamea, intro., tr. and notes by F. García Bazán, Madrid 1991; R. Somos, Origen and Numenius: Adamantius 6 (2000) 51-69.

S. Lilla

NUMIDIA. Annexed to Roman *Africa by *Augustus (25 BC); constituted as a military territory by *Claudius (AD 37) and into a province by *Septimius Severus (197–213), under the authority of the legate of the Third Augustan Legion stationed at Lambaesis; divided by *Diocletian into two, with *Cirta in the N and Lambaesis in the S as capitals, with four centers linked to constitute an autonomous confederation: Cirta-Costantina; Chullu-Collo; Rusicade-Skikda, Milevis-Mila; conquered by the *Vandals (429-456), then by *Justinian (535) and finally by the Arabs (ca. 700), Numidia was a turbulent province, which bore foreign domination with difficulty, with periodic revolts, starting from Aurès; an essential agricultural province (grain, oil) in which urbanization (ancient cities: *Hippo Regius, Cirta, Calama; cities of Roman foundation: Lambaesis, Thamugadi-*Timgad, Mascula-Khenchéla, Cuicul-Djémila etc.) favored the Roman occupation before the penetration of Christianity. Economic disorganization at the time of the Vandals compromised the Roman and Christian presence for a long time.

The presence of Christians in Numidia is proven in the first place by the existence of martyrs at the beginning of the 3rd c., mentioned by Maximus of Madaura: Miggin, Samae, Namphamo, Lucitas (Aug., Ep. 16, 2). At the time of *Cyprian, information about the councils leaves us to suppose that Numidia had about 30 bishoprics, among which 21 can be identified thanks to the Sententiae episcoporum of 256: Badia-Bades, 15; Bagai, 12; Bamaccora, 33; Castra Galbae, 6; Cedias-Hr Oum Kif, 11; Cirta, 8; Cuicul-Djémila, 71; Gadiaufala-Ksar Sbahi, 76; Gemellae-Sidi Aich, 82; Hippo Regius-Annaba, 14; Lamasba-Hr Merouane, 75; Lambaesis, 6; Madauro-Mdaourouch, 73; Mascula-Khenchela, 79; Midili-Hr Bou Rebia, 45; Milevis, 13; Nova-Hr Ben Khelifi or Hr el Ateuch, 60; Octavu, 78; Rusicade-Skikda, 70; Thamugadi-Timgad, 4; Thubunae-Tobna, 5.

The persecution of *Valerian (259) yielded martyrs, mentioned in the Passio Mariani (BHL 131): Agapius, a bishop otherwise unknown; Secundinus, bishop of Cedias; *Marianus and Jacobus, clerics of Cirta; Emilianus, Tertulla, Antonia. We find other martyrs of this persecution recorded in the Sententiae episcoporum of 256, such as *Nemesianus and his companions. From 303 the Gesta apud Zenophilum (record of the confiscation of the goods of the church of Cirta) gives a concrete idea of the economic status and liturgical apparatus of the community. *Donatism, which originated after the persecution of Diocletian, was deeply rooted in Numidia, where in effect it dictated the laws. At the Conference of *Carthage of 411, the province was represented by 55 + 9 Catholic bishops and 67 + 4 Donatists, that is 64 against 71. These figures give us a picture, albeit an imperfect one, of the prevalence of Donatists in the province. The development of the *schism seems to have been assisted by the missionary momentum in the countryside, after the peace of the church (313), and by the absence, among the Catholics (with the exception of *Optatus of Milevis), of strong personalities, which the Donatists possessed. We can think of the Donatist bishops (who were at the same time warrior chiefs) Donatus of Bagai or *Optatus of Timgad, or the great controversialists such as *Parmenian or *Petilian. The situation was reversed by the work of Augustine. Further evidence comes from the Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Africae, which speaks of 125 Numidian bishoprics.

PWK 17, 1343-1357; Delehaye OC 376-399, passim; V. Saxer, Vie liturgique et quotidienne à Carthage vers le milieu du III^e siècle, passim, Vatican City 1969; Id., Saints anciens d'Afrique du Nord, passim, Vatican City 1979; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, Rome 1982; N. Davis, Ruined Cities Within Numidian and Carthaginian Territories, London 2001; S. Lancel, L'Algérie antique, Paris 2003.

V. Saxer

NUMISMATICS. 1. Pre-Constantinian period. Two Aquileian bronzes of the Maxentian age bear a small cross engraved on the tympanum of the temple of the goddess Rome. In fact, the symbol, considered the first evidence of Christianity in Roman coinage (Laffranchi, Il problematico, 45ff.) even before the Constantinian era, has proved to be the decussate form of the numeral X, alluding to the decennials of the emperor (Picozzi, I "folles," 75ff.).

2. Constantinian period. The edict of 313 did not result in an immediate reflection of Christian symbolism in Roman coinage (Pautasso, I segni, 501). The first symbol is the *monogram which *Constantine had engraved on the shields of his soldiers on the vigil of the Battle of the Milvian Bridge of 312, recorded by *Lactantius (De mort. persec. 45, 5) and *Eusebius of Caesarea (Vita Const. 28-29). The coeleste signum, constituted by weaving together a X and a P—the first letters of Χριστός—appears in a medal of 315 minted at Ticinum (Pavia), engraved on the helmet of Constantine, with the words: IMP. CONSTANTINVS P.F.AVG. (Alföldi, The Helmet, 9ff.). In 316 some folles of Ticinum bear a Greek cross next to the figure of Mars or the Sun (Bruun, The Christian Signs, 5ff.); in the two following years similar folles were struck at *Rome and Londinium (London) (Daniélou, Les Symboles, 143ff.). The Greek cross, in different positions, also appears in folles of Ticinum, *Trier and Lugdunum (*Lyons) in 318 and 319, while in the same years at Siscia some folles show Constantine with the christological monogram on his helmet, with the legend: VICTORIAE LAETAE PRINC. PERP., bearing out the testimony of Eusebius (Vita Const. I, 31), who also reports that the emperor bore the initial letters of the name of Christ on his helmet. In 320 folles were issued in Londinium, Ticinum, *Aquileia, Siscia and *Thessalonica with the cross or the monogram between two defeated barbarians, with the legend VIRTUS EXERCITVS or VIRTVS PRINCIPI. A golden medallion, minted at Siscia in 326, shows on the obverse the face of Constantine tautly directed toward the divinity, his arms in the posture expansis manibus to indicate the new relationship between the emperor and God and, together, the pietas of the sovereign (Breglia, L'arte romana, 218ff.). On the back we find the emperor again, holding the labarum with the Christogram, the scene bearing the legend: GLORIA SAECVLI. In 327–328 we find again the Christian labarum which crushes a serpent, alluding to the defeated *Licinius (Franchi de' Cavalieri, Il labaro, 61ff.), on a follis of Constantinople with the legend SPES PVBLICA, expressing the hope of the empire in the sons of Constantine, with whom the second Flavian dynasty began.

3. The age of the Constantinian dynasty. From 334 to 336 folles emanated from Aquileia, Trier, *Arles and Lyons with Christograms variously placed and bearing the legend VIRTVS EXERCITVS (Pautasso, I segni, 508). In *Antioch in 336 solidi were struck with the legend VICTORIA CONSTANTINI AVG. and the monogrammatic cross, of which Eusebius also speaks (Vita Const. 2, 9). On the pecunia maiorina—new money introduced between 346 and 348 to revalue the bronze, with the legend FEL. TEMP. REPARATIO—the emperor appears with the labarum, or between two banners, or, otherwise, on a boat guided by a winged spirit between Christograms and the legend CONCORDIA MILITVM. The conflicts which between 350 and 353 set Magnentius against Constantius II are represented in numismatic iconography (Kellner, Libertas und Christogram, passim) with the personifications of Liberty and Victory with the legends VICTORIA AVG. LIB. ROMANOR., RESTITVTOR LIBERTATIS, LIBERATOR REIPUBLICAE. The bronzes of Magnentius contain Christograms on their own and with the apocalyptic letters A and Ω, thus assuming an anti-*Arian position in order to have the support of the Catholics. *Constantius II, for his part, had inserted, as well as the labarum with the Christian emblem, the legend HOC SIGNO VICTOR ERIS, reusing thus the famous Constantinian portent from the vigil of the Battle of the Milvian Bridge.

4. From Theodosius to Justinian. With Theodosius I (379–395) some solidi show the emperor with the labarum and a processional cross, an enthroned Victory with a shield bearing a cross, and the statues of Rome and Constantinople with the globus cruciger. In the solidi and in the maiorinae of Aelia *Flaccilla, wife of Theodosius, the Victory inscribes a Christogram onto a shield. The centenionales of Arcadius (394–408) and solidi of Honorius (395–423) represent the emperor crowned by the manus Dei, and the gold coinage of *Galla Placidia has the legend SALUS REI PUBLICAE in explanation of a Christogram within a laurel wreath. In the following years the iconography of the emperor bearing a cross was embellished with the volumen (Panvini Rosati, Il rotolo, 557-566) and in a solidus of Theodosius the emperor crushes a serpent with a human head, in reference to the usurper John (423–425), defeated in 425 by *Valentinian III, and recalling Ps 90:13: super aspidem et basiliscum ambulabis, leonem et draconem calpestabis. Subsequently, legends and reliefs saw little change apart from marginal elements until Zeno (479–491) and Phocas (602–610), after which an unaccompanied Latin cross is found until the end of the 10th c., sometimes with the striking title LVX MVNDI. The Christogram, however, continued in the solidi of Eudoxia, Arcadius and Justinian with the text SALVS ORIENTIS FELICITAS OCCIDENTIS.

H. Cohen, Description des monnaies frappées dans l'empire romain, VII-VIII, Paris 1888–1892; J. Maurice, Numismatique Constantinienne, 3 vols., Paris 1908–1912; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Il labaro descritto da Eusebio: Studi Romani 50 (1914) 161; L. Laffranchi, Il problematico segno della croce nelle monete precostantiniane di Aquileia: Aquileia Nostra 3 (1932) 45-52; A. Alföldi, The Helmet of Constantine with the Christian Monogram: JRS 21 (1932) 9-23; J. Daniélou, Les symboles chrétiens primitifs, Paris 1961, 143ff.; P. Bruun, The Christian Signs on the Coins of Constantine: Arctos 3 (1962) 5-35; V. Laurent, Le corpus des sceaux de l'Empire byzantin, V, Paris 1963-1972; F. Panvini Rosati, Il rotolo come attributo dell'Imperatore sulle monete romane, in Atti del VI Congr. Int. di Arch. Cristiana, Vatican City 1965, 557-566; P. Bruun, The Roman Imperial Coins, VII, London 1966; V. Gardthausen, Das alte Monogramm, Wiesbaden 1966; G. Pitt-Rivers, The Riddle of the Labarum and the Origin of Christian Symbols, London 1966; J.E. Hartmann, Greek Numismatic Epigraphy, Cambridge 1969; L. Breglia, L'arte romana nelle monete di età imperiale, Milan 1968; W. Kellner, Libertas und Christogram, Karlsruhe 1969; S. De Caro Balbi, Comparsa di simboli cristiani sulle monete dell'impero in età costantiniana: Annali 16-17 (1969–1970) 143-169; F. Panvini Rosati, La zecca di Aquileia, in Aquileia e Ravenna, Udine 1973, 289-298; V. Picozzi, I "folles" con leggenda CONSERV VRB SVAE coniati nella zecca di Aquileia sotto Massenzio: Rivista Italiana di Numismatica 71 (1969) 73-87; J.M. Whittaker, Coins and Christian Symbolism: Numismatic Circular 87 (1979) 3-4; A. Pautasso, I segni del Cristianesimo nella monetazione romana, in Atti del V Congr. Naz. di Arch. Cristiana, Rome 1982, 491-525; R. Oster, Numismatic Windows into the Social World of Early Christianity: A Methodological Inquiry: Journal of Bib. Lit. 101 (1982) 195-223; J. Green Miranda - J. Ferguson, Constantine, Sun-Symbols and the Labarum: Durham University Journal 59 (1987) 9-17; A. Lukaszewicz, À propos du symbolisme impérial romain au IV[e] siècle: quelques remarques sur le christogramme: Historia 39 (1990) 504-506; C. Brenot, À propos des monnaies au chrisme de Magnence, in Institutions, société et vie politique dans l'empire romain au IV[e] siècle ap. J.-C., ed. M. Chistol - S. Demougin - Y. Duval et al., Rome 1992, 183-191; W. Hahn, Die Zeichen des Menschensohnes am Himmel: zu den Anfängen der Kreuzdarstellung im römischen Münzbild des 4. Jahrhunderts, insbesondere auf dem Labarum, in XII. Inter. Numismatischer Kongress, ed. v. B. Kluge - B. Weisser, Berlin 2000, II, 772-779; TIP 220-223; G. Paci, Le prime testimonianze paleocristiane ad "Urbs Salvia": Picus 22 (2002) 282-288; M. Wallraff, La croce negli storici ecclesiastici: simbolo cristiano e propaganda imperiale: Mediterraneo Antico 5 (2002) 461-475.

F. Bisconti

NYSSA. City of Cappadocia, not to be confused with other cities of the name Nysa (e.g., in Caria), in the Strategia Morimene (see Ptol., V, 6, 23), the more W part, not far from the river Halys. The Itinerarium Antonini locates it to the NW of *Caesarea, on the road to *Ancyra and not far from the border with Galatia (see Greg. Nyss., Ep. 19, Pasquali, 65, 24), 24 miles from Parnassus and 32 from Osiana (cf. Greg. Nyss., Ep. 26). The site of the city cannot be identified with certainty (see Ramsay, Historical Geography, 287-288; Maraval). It was the episcopal see of *Gregory, younger brother of Basil of Caesarea and consecrated by him in 372 with the intention of increasing the number of suffragan bishops of the metropolis linked to him, since in Cappadocia I, where Nyssa is found (Maraval 243), there were few cities which could have a titular bishop, but many chorepiscopi (rural bishops), while in Cappadocia II, a province created when *Valens divided Cappadocia in two in 371–372, the episcopal sees were more numerous, and this province depended on the bishop of *Tyana—which had become the capital—hostile to the *Nicene front. In this province on the other hand Basil placed *Gregory of Nazianzus at Sasima, to counter the new metropolitan. Bishops: Gregory (372–394); Heraclidus (431); Musonius (449–451), present at *Chalcedon (Mansi VI, 981ff.); John (at Constantinople in 553: Mansi IX, 175, 192 and 391); John II (680); Paul (692).

W.M. Ramsay, The Historical Geography of Asia Minor, London 1890; W. Ruge, Nyssa: PWK 17, 2, 1662. For the bishops: M. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, I, Paris 1740, 391ff., and Fedalto 1, 27; P. Maraval, Nysse en Cappadoce: RHPhR 55 (1975) 237-247; LTK[3] 7, 953-954.

M. Forlin Patrucco - A. Di Berardino

O

OAK, Synod of the. In "the Oak" (Drus, also called Rufinianae, today Djad-Bostan: SC 177, 13), a suburb S of *Chalcedon, a council gathered in 403, whose conciliar acts have been passed down by *Photius, to decide on the disagreement that had arisen between *John Chrysostom, patriarch of *Constantinople, and *Theophilus of *Alexandria. The disagreement was caused by a few monks, whom Theophilus had expelled (401) from *Egypt and had accused of being *Origenists and who had found refuge at *Constantinople. When the conflict between them and Theophilus flared up again at the capital, the emperor *Arcadius summoned Theophilus to Constantinople to vindicate himself before a tribunal presided by John Chrysostom. When he had arrived to the capital during 403, the very capable Theophilus took advantage of his support at the royal court and among the members of the local clergy who were hostile toward their bishop. In a short time, Theophilus was able to reverse the situation such that it was he who put John Chrysostom under accusation in the council that had gathered in the village of the Oak. In attendance at the council were some Egyptian bishops who had come with Theophilus and a few others from various regions who were hostile to Chrysostom, among whom were *Acacius of Beroea, *Severian of Gabala and *Antiochus of Ptolemais. John was accused of having given help to the Origenists and of various administrative irregularities. He refused to be judged by his enemies and protested by letter against the proceedings, which had various irregularities. He refused to present himself even when the emperor's rescript had been enjoined upon him, and this rejection was adopted by the participants at the council as a reason for John's condemnation and deposition. The emperor immediately took measures to transfer him to a place in *Bithynia, and thus began Chrysostom's first exile.

Hfl-Lecl 2, 137-150; C. Baur, Der heilige Johannes Chrysostomus und seine Zeit, II, Munich 1930, 202-220; P. Ubaldi, La sinodo ad Quercum dell'anno 403: AAT 52 (1903) 33-98; J.N.D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom, Ascetic, Bishop, Preacher, London 1995, 218-227; Storia del cristianesimo, II, 463; S. Acerbi, "Accusatore, testimone e giudice": il ruolo dei vescovi di Alessandria nella sinodo della Quercia e in altri concili posteriori, in Giovanni Crisostomo: Oriente e Occidente tra IV e V secolo, 2005, 713-720.

M. Simonetti

OBLATIONS of the FAITHFUL. The NT uses two terms: eleēmosynē, often associated with prayer and fasting, as a form of worship (see Did. 1,6; 15,4; 2 Clem. 16,4), and prosphora, dear to St. Paul, who emphasizes the liturgical character of the offering, whether of Christians offering themselves (Rom 15:16; 1 Clem. 36, 1; Mart. Pol. 14, 1) or of offerings brought for worship.

The NT passages linked to oblation (Mt 6:1-4; 10:42; 19:16-26; 25:31-46; Mk 12:41-44; Lk 6:30; 11:41; 12:16-21, 33-34; 16:19-31; Acts 4:32; 10:4; 2 Cor 8:9-10, 13-14) are cited and commented upon repeatedly by the Fathers. An example of biblical citations offered as a basis of the obligation to give alms is in *Cyprian (De op. et el. 4-8).

Two intimately related attitudes are found in the patristic texts: first the theological, present in treatises (see Gutiérrez) or in preaching, either as clarification or as teaching to the people (a favorite argument was the identification of the poor or suffering person with Christ), or in the specific context of what we would today call social justice, with the clear intention of seeking solidarity within Christian communities (see Garrison; Sierra). Already appearing in the Apostolic Fathers, in relation with the Jewish tradition, is the expiatory and penitential value of alms (see Garrison). *John Chrysostom stands out in this area for his homilies, in which alms is identified with the virtue of charity, without forgetting their practical effect. *Augustine also reflects on the value of alms in relation to the forgiveness of sins or to salvation, in line with Mt 25:31-46.

Pope *Leo the Great frequently speaks of alms in his sermons, relating them to the liturgical seasons, esp. Lent (see Dolle). *Caesarius of Arles preaches on the importance of the offering; his teaching is found in the councils of *Gaul and in the Decretum Gratiani. Other notable authors such as *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Cyril of Jerusalem and *Ambrose make notable contributions to the study of the phenomenon of oblation.

A second, practical aspect offers a vision of the various guidelines and norms that disciplined this custom. In the Jewish context, the Didache* requires the offering of the firstfruits and the tithe for the benefit of the ministers of the gospel. The same principle is in *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. IV, 18,1-2) and esp. in *Origen (Hom. Num. 11,2; C. Celsum VII, 34-35; Hamman 1968, 255-256). *Hermas knows of offerings for bishops and the poor (Sim. V, 2,9-11). *Justin mentions offerings twice: they are spontaneous and tied to the Sunday assembly, for the sake of the poor (1 Apol. 1,17 and 67,1-6). The Sibylline Oracles mention the custom of leaving on the altar, besides the bread and wine, clothes for the needy (VIII, 483-486; 496-500). Sometimes the bishop appeals to the generosity of the faithful (Tertull., De ieiunio 13; Hom. Clem. III, 71,5; for Africa, see Hamman 1968, 257-259). The canonical and liturgical collections also regulate offerings, and specify their administration and the distribution of the gifts (Didasc. VIII-IX; Trad. Ap. 5, 1-2; 28,1-8; Const. Ap. 11, 34,5; 36,3-8; VII, 29,1-3; VIII, 18,30; Can. Ap. 2-4; Can. of Hipp. 159-163; Test. D. 11,11; in the following councils: Gangra, cans. 7-8; IV Carthage, can. 95; Vaison, can. 4; II Arles, can. 4; Orléans, cans. 14-16; Mâcon, can. 4 [581]; and Mâcon [585], which restores the ancient prescription of the tithe on pain of excommunication, can. 5).

John Chrysostom mentions the offering of the faithful at every liturgical assembly (Adv. Iud. 3,4; Hom. Hebr. 11,3), which the clergy must distribute, without hoarding, for works of assistance and esp. for the poor. Benefactors' names are mentioned in the litany (In Act. hom. 18,5; on which see Hamman 1968, 198-200). In the West, Cyprian (De op. et el. 15) and later Ambrose protest against the faithful who forget their offering at the liturgical assembly (In Ps. 118, prol. 2).

E. Lio, Le obbligazioni verso i poveri in un testo di S. Cesario riportato da Graziano (Can. 66, C. XVI, q. 1) con falsa attribuzione a S. Agostino: Studia Patavina 2 (1955) 18-44; R. Dolle, Un docteur de l'aumône, Saint Léon le Grand: La vie spirituelle 96 (1957) 266-284; A. Sifoniou, Les fondements juridiques de l'aumône et de la charité chez Jean Chrysostome: RDC 14 (1964) 241-269; A. Gutiérrez, La Teología de la limosna en San Cipriano: RET 27 (1967) 19-32; A. Hamman, L'offrande des fidèles, in Vie liturgique et vie sociale, Paris 1968, 229-295 (It. tr. Milan 1969); R.M. Grant, The Organization of Alms, in Early Christianity and Society, London 1978, 124-145; R. Brändle, Jean Chrysostome. L'importance de Matth. 25, 31-46 pour son éthique: VChr 31 (1977) 47-52; B. Ramsey, Almsgiving in the Latin Church: The Late Fourth and Early Fifth Centuries: ThS 43 (1982) 226-259; J. Fasiori, La dîme du début du deuxième siècle jusqu'à l'édit de Milan: Lateranum 49 (1983) 5-24; L.J. Frahier, L'interprétation du récit du jugement dernier (Mt 25,31-46) dans l'œuvre d'Augustin: REAug 33 (1987) 70-84; R. Sierra Bravo, El mensaje social de los Padres de la Iglesia, Madrid 1989 (texts); R. Garrison, Redemptive Almsgiving in Early Christianity, Sheffield 1993, 76-152; B. Leyerle, John Chrysostom on Almsgiving and the Use of Money: HTR 87 (1994) 29-47; S.L. Bridge, To Give or Not to Give? Deciphering the Saying of Didache 1.6: JECS 5 (1997) 555-568; Comunicación de bienes, in R. Sierra Bravo, Diccionario social de los Padres de la Iglesia, Madrid 1997, 68-103 (selection of texts); Cyprien - Augustin, Partage avec les pauvres, ed. A.-G. Hamman, Paris 1998; John Chrysostom, On Repentance and Almsgiving, tr. G.G. Christo, Washington 1998; A. Fitzgerald, Augustine Through the Ages, Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 557-561.

A. Hamman - M. Flores Colín

OCEANUS (4th–5th c.). An educated Christian of a noble Roman family, relative of *Fabiola and friend of *Jerome (Ep. 69 and 77), whom he met at *Rome ca. 384/385. He visited Jerome in *Palestine and returned to Rome in 395, where he was active against *Origenism. Oceanus was greatly appreciated for his conduct and his theological learning. Jerome writes: "Our holy brother Oceanus . . . is so worthy from every point of view and so erudite in the law of the Lord that he has no need for me to ask him before he can instruct you and illustrate my thought on all questions of Scripture" (Ep. 126,3). Though a layman, Oceanus was concerned with church discipline (see Jerome, Ep. 69) and orthodoxy. For this reason, alarmed by *Rufinus's translation of *Origen's De principiis, he and *Pammachius, another layman, asked Jerome for a complete translation of the work so as to condemn its errors (see Jerome, Ep. 83); Jerome made the translation (Jerome, Ep. 84,12). Oceanus also corresponded with *Augustine, to whom he wrote three letters, all lost (see Aug., Ep. 180,1).

DCB 4, 63; PLRE 1, 636; PCBE 2, 1547-1549.

A. Di Berardino

OCTATEUCH of Clement. To distinguish the Syriac canonical Clementine tradition from the Apostolic Constitutions (ed. Funk) in eight books, P. de Lagarde introduced the apt expression "Octateuch of Clement." The Syriac form is very different from the Greek tradition. It contains, in books I and II, the Testament of Our Lord Jesus Christ. These documents, cited by *Severus of Antioch in 512–518, were published by E. Rahmani at Mainz in 1899. They were then discovered at the head of canonical collections by A. Vööbus, who reedited them in 1979 on the basis of all the MSS. Book III is the Doctrina XII apostolorum (*see Ecclesiastical Canons of the Apostles), a combination of texts already published in Greek by Bickell in 1843, and later by Funk. This is the "Apostolische Kirchenordung" of the Germans. Book IV, titled Ordinance of the Apostles, was addressed by Clement to the nations, and concerned charisms, ordinations and ecclesiastical canons. The title actually corresponds to the contents of books IV-VII; it is the material of book VIII of the Greek Apostolic Constitutions, in a different order. Book VIII is titled: Eighth Book Addressed by Clement to the Peoples; it concerns ordinances of the holy apostles and canons. These are the 85 or 84 canons preserved in Greek and printed apart in all conciliar collections. The Testament itself parallels certain parts of book VIII of the Greek Constitutions. The whole of the Octateuch was recopied by *Jacob of Edessa in the 7th c. In the Arabic, *Coptic and Ethiopic translations, the Octateuch has taken a different form, containing other apocrypha. The Ethiopic Clementine Octateuch, in particular, is composed of four recensions of the Apostolic Canons,* one in 56 canons, one in 80 and two in 81; the Alexandrian Synod, in 71 canons; the Letter of Peter; the Canons After the Ascension and the Canons of Simon the Zealot. The superimposition of four recensions of Canons and other indications led Bausi to hold that the text is a combination of two different canonical collections, one Coptic-Arabic and the other Arabic-Melkite. The Ethiopic texts were edited and translated by A. Bausi, Il Sênodos etiopico; Canoni pseudoapostolici, Louvain 1995 (CSCO 552-553, Aethiopici 101-102); the Alexandrian Synod was edited and translated by G. Horner, The Statutes of the Apostles or Canones Ecclesiastici, edited with translation and collation from Ethiopic and Arabic MSS, London 1904, 1-87, 127-132 and 365-420.

F. Nau, La version syriaque de l'Octateuque de Clément, Paris 1913; G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, V/1, Rome 1944, 283-292; R.W. Cowley, The Identification of the Ethiopian Octateuch of Clement and Its Relationship to the Other Christian Literature: Ostkirchliche Studien 27 (1978) 37-45; A. Vööbus, The Didascalia Apostolorum in Syriac, Louvain 1979, CSCO 401-402, 406-407, Syri 175-176, 179-180, bibl. in 402, 5*-22*; DDC 6, 1065-1066; F.S. Jones, The Pseudo-Clementines: A History of Research: SCent 2 (1982) 1-33, 63-96; E. Ferguson, Studies in Early Christianity, 2, New York-London 1993, 195-262; A. Bausi, Presenze clementine nella letteratura etiopica: SCO 40 (1990) 289-316: 289-293; Id., Alcune considerazioni sul Sênodos etiopico: Rassegna di Studi Etiopici 36 (1990) 5-73; 58-67; H.J.W. Drijvers, Adam and the True Prophet in the Pseudo-Clementines, in Loyalitätskonflikte in der Religionsgeschichte, Würzburg 1990, 314-323; A. Bausi, Heritage and Originality in the Ethiopic Synodos: Journal of Ethiopian Studies 25 (1992) 15 and 21-23; Id., Il Qalêmentos etiopico, Naples 1992; F.S. Jones, Evaluating the Latin and Syriac Translations of the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions: Apocrypha 3 (1992) 237-258; Id., An Ancient Jewish Christian Source on the History of Christianity: Ps. Clem. Recogn. I 27-71, Atlanta 1995, SBL Texts & Tr. 37; F. Fiaccadori, Prototipi miniati dell'Ottateuco etiopico: Boll. del Museo Bodoniano di Parma 8 (1994) 69-102; L. Cirillo - A. Schneider, Les Reconnaissances du Ps. Clément, Turnhout 1999; A. Bausi, S. Clemente nella letteratura etiopica, in Studi su Clemente Romano, ed. F. Luisier, Rome 2003, OCA 268, 13-55.

M. van Esbroeck - I. Ramelli

ODES of SOLOMON. A collection of 42 poetic compositions, well known in the early church. Lactantius (Inst. IV, 12,3) cites Ode 19,6 in *Latin. The Pistis Sophia (3ff.) cites Odes 1, 5, 6, 25 in Coptic. Ps.-Athanasius (Synopsis of Holy Scripture, 6ff.) and Nicephorus (Stichometria, 9ff.) mention it.

The Odes were discovered by J.R. Harris, in Syriac, in 1907: 56 leaves in fascicles of six, containing 40 Odes and 18 Psalms of Solomon: hence the title Odes of Solomon. They were published in English in 1909 ([2]1911). A facsimile edition, with translation and commentary, was published by J.R. Harris and A. Mingana at Cambridge in 1916–1920. A second *Syriac MS, incomplete, was discovered by F.C. Burkitt, in the British Museum, in 1912 (Add. 14538 = Odes 17,7-end). The 11th Ode, in Greek, is in Papyrus Bodmer XI (Cologne-Geneva 1959) in a 3rd-c. MS.

It seems certain that the 42 Odes were originally written in Greek, in the 2nd half of the 2nd c.; they comment on the liturgy, esp. that of *baptism and *Easter, of a Jewish-Christian community in *Syria.

The Odes show no trace of the dualism characteristic of the principal *gnostic systems. The OT is venerated and paraphrased to the same degree as the NT. Their theology is that of the *trinitarian God, Creator and Savior, exactly that of the great ecclesiastical tradition. Their mystical doctrine is based on the concrete accomplishment of salvation, acquired in Jesus Christ, through his death and resurrection. All the spiritual attitudes expressed in the Odes presuppose the historical reality of this accomplishment; they bring out its significance in praise, thanksgiving and profession of faith. There are still unresolved enigmas concerning the correct interpretation of the Odes in the history of 2nd-c. Christian doctrine, in particular regarding the gnosticizing form of their lyricism and the use of certain expressions which may be of Essene origin.

CPG 1350; Quasten I, 145-150; L. Tondelli, Le odi di Salomone, Rome 1914; J.H. Charlesworth, The Odes of Salomon, Oxford

1978 (with Syriac text, Eng. tr. and notes); M. Lattke, Die Oden Salomos in ihrer Bedeutung für N.T. und Gnosis, 2 vols., Fribourg-Göttingen 1979 (cf. RecSR [1981] 455-6); A. Hamman, Les Odes de Salomon, Paris 1981; DSp 11, 602-608; Erbetta I,1, 608-658 (It. tr.); M. Lattke, Die Oden Salomons in ihrer Bedeutung für Neues Testament und Gnosis, III, Fribourg 1986; IV, 1998; Les Odes de Salomon, ed. and tr. by M.-J. Pierre, Turnhout 1994; M.-J. Pierre, Les Odes de Salomon, in F. Bovon - P. Geoltrain (éds.), Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, I, Paris ²1998, 671-743; M. Franzmann, The Odes of Solomon: An Analysis of the Poetical Structure and Form, Göttingen 1991; Oden Salomos, tr. and intro. by M. Lattke, Freiburg 1995; Id., Oden Salomos, text, tr. and comm., 3 vols., Freiburg 1999-2005; Les Odes de Salomon, ed. and tr. by E. Azar, Paris 1996; J.H. Charlesworth, Critical Reflections on the Odes of Salomon, Sheffield 1998; E. Engelbrech, God's Milk: An Orthodox Confession of the Eucharist: JECS 7 (1999) 509-526.

CH. KANNENGIESSER

ODILIA (Othilia). Abbess, saint. The earliest evidences of a cult of this saint are the invocations in the litanies: St. Emmeram of Ratisbon, 9th c.; Freising, Münstereifel, Utrecht, 10th c.; Tegernsee, 11th c. Then follow the calendars and martyrologies: Echternach, Eichstätt, 12th c.; Metz, Paris, St. Maur of Verdun, 13th c. In the same century the offices and Masses appear: Metz, St. Maur of Verdun. From the 13th c. the evidence multiplies. In the monastery of Hohenburg (from the 18th-c. "Odiliënberg") in Alsace, the saint's name appears in documents of the 10th c. In the same century a cleric of Hohenburg wrote, on the model of the Vita Salabergae, the unhistorical Life of Odilia. In the late 7th c., probably the duke Eticho (Adalrich) founded, in the family castrum, a monastery of monks, which under the influence of his daughter Odilia (d. before 723) was turned into a monastery of nuns, where she was later buried (feast 13 Dec). Odilia founded a second monastery at the foot of the mountain (Niedermünster). The first monastic Life shows Merovingian-Benedictine influence.

BHL 6271-6274; BS 9, 1110-1116; LCI 8, 76-79; LMA 6, 1350-1351; BBKL 6, 1109-1110; M. Barth, Die heilige Odilia, Schutzherrin des Elsaß 1-2, Straßburg 1938; J. Legros, Le Mont Sainte-Odile, Paris 1988; F. Petry - R. Will, Le Mont Sainte-Odile (Bas-Rhin), Paris 1988.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

ODOACER (Odovacar) (434–493). Scythian by origin, Odoacer was born in 434. He soon entered the Palatine Guard. In 476 the barbarian soldiers of which the Roman army was largely composed acclaimed him king, at the same time claiming a third of the lands of *Italy. After deposing Romulus Augustulus, Odoacer did not proclaim himself emperor, but, to legitimize his position and his government of the West with the court of *Constantinople, he sent the imperial standards (the ornamenti Palatii) to the Eastern emperor *Zeno and requested the title of Roman patrician (which he never assumed). In 481 he occupied *Dalmatia, and later defeated the Rugians and freed Sicily from the *Vandals (ca. 486). In 489 *Theodoric marched on Italy at the head of the *Ostrogoths; Odoacer, repeatedly defeated (Isonzo, Verona, Adda), shut himself up in *Ravenna and sustained a siege of two years which ended in his death and that of his people, the Heruli (15 March 493).

Odoacer's policy was essentially conservative of Roman prerogatives; distribution of lands to the barbarians did not diminish small landed properties, since it was limited to the latifundia. The Heruli held the military command, but the most important civil positions remained in Roman hands. Thus began a period of mutual adjustment between Romans and Germans. *Arian by faith, he was tolerant toward the Catholic Church, whose bishops he respected; the schism between Rome and Constantinople, provoked by the "unitive" edict (Henoticon), favored the cohabitation of the two ethnic groups on Italian soil. He issued a decree, annulled in a Roman synod of 502, against the transference of church property, and intervened directly in the election of Pope *Felix III.

PWK 18, 1888-1896; EC 11, 74-75; L. Schmidt, Die Ostgermanen, Munich 1934; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 19-41; A. Chastagnol, Le sénat romain sous le règne d'Odoacre. Recherches sur l'épigraphie du Colisée au Vᵉ siècle, Bonn 1966; M. McCormick, Odoacer, Emperor Zeno and the Rugian Victory Legation: Byzantion 47 (1977) 212-222; C. Pietri, Aristocratie et société cléricale dans l'Italie chrétienne au temps d'Odoacre et de Théodoric: MEFRA 93 (1981) 417-467; N. Geoffrey, The Last Emperor: The Fate of Romulus Augustulus: CM 43 (1992) 261-271.

M.L. ANGRISANI SANFILIPPO

OECUMENIUS (late 6th c.). Philosopher and rhetor, also called scholasticus by the tradition, he lived in the 6th c.: he was identified by Pétridès in 1903 with the comes of Isauria, correspondent of the *monophysite *Severus of Antioch (d. 538). Previously placed as late as the 11th c., three large catenistic commentaries from the late 8th c. were attributed to him, first by Donatus of Verona in the 16th c.: In Acta Apostolorum, In epistulas catholicas, In Pauli epistulas (PG 118-119). This false hypothesis, not confirmed by the MS tradition, probably derived from the presence of some other scholia* reported under the name Oikoumenion (K. Staab, Die Paulus-katenen, Rome 1926, 93-99) and taken from his works that have not reached us (Commentarii in Pauli epistulas, Scholia in Iohannem Chrysostomum). Solidly linked to Oecumenius is the Commentarius in Apocalypsin, already known in the 7th c. in a *Syriac edition and published by Hoskier (the most important codex used is the Messan. gr. 99): to be distinguished from that published under his name by J.A. Cramer (Catenae graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum VIII, Oxford 1840, 497-582), which in fact presents only excerpta of a similar commentary by *Andrew of Caesarea. In a small number of MSS which contain a synopsis scholike of the commentary on the Apocalypse, Oecumenius is named as the bishop of Trikka in Thessaly: but this is an error attributable, as Schmid has shown, to the 10th-c. compiler of the synopsis, a contemporary of a bishop Oecumenius of Trikka, perhaps the one celebrated as a thaumaturge on 3 May in the Greek Church. Monaci Castagno and De Groote have shown that the Commentary on the Apocalypse is from the late 6th c. The author, a man of broad culture, divides the work into twelve discourses in which, through *allegorical interpretation, he refers mainly to the past and only rarely to the present, with the purpose of recording the punishments for the correction of human conduct. It rejects the Origenian doctrine of apokatastasis.

CPG III 7470-7475; H.C. Hoskier, The Complete Commentary of Oecumenius to the Apocalypse for the First Time from Manuscripts at Messina, Rome, Salonika, and Athos Edited, Ann Arbor, MI 1928; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Münster i. W. 1933, 423-469; M. De Groote, Oecumenü commentarius in Apocalypsin, Turnhout 1998; Krumbacher, 131-133; S. Pétridès, Oecumenius de Trikka, ses oeuvres, son culte: Echos d'Orient 6 (1903) 307-310; W. Ensslin, Oikumenios: PWK 17, 2174; J. Schmid, Ökumenios der Apokalypsen-Ausleger und Ökumenios der Bischof von Trikka: Byz. neugr. Jahrb. 14 (1938) 322-330; Beck 417-418; J. Schmid, Oikumenios: LTK 7, 1122-1125; J.M. Sauget, Ecumenio: BS 4, 899; A. Monaci Castagno, Il problema della datazione dei Commenti all'Apocalisse di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: Atti dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino 114 (1980) 223-246; Id., I Commenti di Ecumenio e di Andrea di Cesarea: due letture divergenti dell'Apocalisse: Memorie dell'Accademia delle Scienze di Torino, series V, vol. 5 (1981), II. Classe di Scienze morali, Storiche and Filologiche, 305-426; M. De Groote, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung des Oecumenius-Kommentars zur Apokalypse: SE 35 (1995) 5-29; Id., Die Quaestio Oecumeniana: SE 36 (1996) 67-105; J.C. Lamoreaux, The Provenance of Ecumenius' Commentary on the Apocalypse: VCh 52 (1998) 88-108 (the author of the Commentary is the Oecumenius, correspondent of Severus); Patrologia V, 222-224.

A. Labate

OGDOAS – OGDOAD (ὀγδοάς)

I. In gnosticism - II. Hermeticism - III. Clement of Alexandria.

I. In gnosticism. (1) In the *Valentinian system the Ogdoas is represented first of all by the first four pairs of aeons: Βυθός–Σιγή, Νοῦς–Ἀλήθεια, Λόγος–Ζωή, Ἄνθρωπος–Ἐκκλησία; these form the πρώτη ογδοάς: see Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 1,1 (ed. Rousseau-Doutreleau, SC 264, Paris 1979, 28, 74-32, 105), I, 11,1 (168, 1205). This Ogdoas is the first of the three parts into which the *pleroma of thirty *aeons is divided: the Ogdoas, the Decad and the Dodecad: Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 1,2 (34,123). The Ogdoas is also identified with Σοφία–Ἀχαμώθ (on the identity between Σοφία and Ἀχαμώθ see Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 4,1, p. 62, 354-355), the heavenly *Jerusalem and universal mother who, expelled from the pleroma, generates the demiurge of the sensible world, in turn related to the Hebdomas: see Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 5,2 (80, 502-504), I, 5,3 (82, 522-523); Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 31 (159, 16-18 Wendland), VI, 34 (165, 20-21). Finally, the Ogdoas is also the place where Σοφία–Ἀχαμώθ resides, i.e., the eighth heaven of the fixed stars: Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 32 (161, 14-15), VI, 33 (162, 4). Considered under this last perspective, the Ogdoas is the seat of life, the heavenly Jerusalem, the place of rest to which the elect are destined before entering the pleroma of the aeons, the day of the Lord (as the Lord's day is the eighth day that follows the *Sabbath, the Jewish seventh day, so on the cosmological plane the Ogdoas comes after the Hebdomas, the group of seven lower heavens or the seventh heaven where the biblical demiurge resides): see Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 32 (161, 16-18); Clement, Exc. ex Theod. 63,1 (III, 128,9-12), 80, 1 (III, 131, 25). (2) For the school of *Secundus, the original Ogdoas is formed of προαρχή, ἀνεννόητος, ἄρρητος and ἀόρατος, which respectively generate ἀρχή, ἀκατάληπτος, ἀνωνόμαστος and ἀγέννητος: see Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 38 (169, 2-9). (3) The gnostic *Mark identifies the Ogdoas with Jesus: Hippolytus, Ref. VI, 47 (179, 4). (4) *Basilides identifies the Ogdoas both with the μέγας ἄρχων who creates and rules the sensible world (see Hippolytus, Ref. VII, 25 [203, 9], VII, 27 [207, 14-15]), and with the heaven of the fixed stars in which he and his son reside: Ref. VII, 23 (201, 15-16), X, 14 (275, 22-23). (5) For the *Barbelo-gnostics, the Ogdoas is the eighth heaven in which Barbelo, the universal mother, corresponding to the Σοφία–Ἀχαμώθ of the Valentinians, resides: see Epiphanius, Pan. 6,10 (I, 287,9-10 Holl). (6) The same doctrine recurs in the Arcontici,* for whom the "resplendent mother," corresponding to Barbelo and Σοφία–Ἀχαμώθ, resides in the eighth heaven: Epiphanius, Pan. 40,2 (II, 82, 16-20). (7) For the Wisdom of Jesus Christ, as for the Valentinians, the Ogdoas is the eighth heaven, seat of the elect (124, p. 289, 6-9 Till, TU 60, Berlin 1955).

II. Hermeticism. In Poimandres, the Ogdoas, called ὀγδοατικὴ φύσις, is the eighth heaven where the elect *soul arrives after having put off all of its vices in the lower heavens and where, before being deified and entering into divinity, it resides with the other powers singing hymns in praise of the Father (Corp. Herm. I, 26 vol. I, 16,4-13 Nock-Festugière): the correspondence with the Valentinian doctrine found in Clement (Exc. ex Theod. 63) is very close. The same motif of the hymn in praise of the divinity sung by the powers present in the Ogdoas also recurs in Corp. Herm. XIII, 15 (II, 206,16-18). In Leida papyrus W, Ogdoas is the sovereign name of the deity to which all the hierarchies of angels and demons and all created beings are subject (see R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig 1904, p. 54; A.D. Nock - A.J. Festugière, Corpus Herm. II, Paris 1945, p. 216 n. 66). In the ancient Egyptian religion, Ogdoas indicates the group of eight original deities, a doctrine closely approaching that of the schools of Valentinus and Secundus (see Reitzenstein, op. cit., p. 54).

III. Clement of Alexandria. *Clement of Alexandria was profoundly influenced by gnostic speculation on the Ogdoas. For him the Ogdoas is (1) the eighth heaven of the fixed stars, the nearest to the intelligible universe: Strom. IV, 159,2 (II, 318,31–319,1), V, 36,3 (II, 350,18); (2) the place where "gnostic" souls reside in contemplation after having overcome the Hebdomas and, at the same time, the eighth day of the Lord: Strom. VI, 108,1 (II, 486,6-9), VII, 57,5 (III, 42,11-14); (3) Jesus Christ himself: Strom. VI, 140,3 (II, 503,15-16). While doctrines (1) and (2) show very close analogies with the Valentinian school, doctrine (3) displays a clear dependence on *Mark the Gnostic, as shown by A. Delatte, Études sur la littérature néopythagoricienne, Paris 1915, 231-245.

R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig 1904, 53-55; W. Bousset, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis, Göttingen 1907, 12-19, 164, 340, 354; J. Kroll, Die Lehren des Hermes Trismegistos, Münster 1914, 304, 308, 363, 412; A. Delatte, Études sur la littérature néopythagoricienne, Paris 1915, 231-245; A.D. Nock - A.J. Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum, I, Paris 1945, p. 25 n. 64; II, Paris 1945, 215-216 nn. 65-66 (contains additional bibl.); A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, III, Paris 1953, 130-133; F. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée, Paris 1947, 301-304; Id., Clément d'Alexandrie: extraits de Théodote, (SC 23), Paris 1948, p. 185 n. 2; P.A. Recheis, Engel Tod und Seelenreise, Rome 1958, 150-151; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 184-186; R. Staats, Ogdoas als ein Symbol für die Auferstehung: VChr 26 (1972) 29-52; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica e suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei monumenti, Bari 1973; J.P. Mahé, Le sens et la composition du traité hermétique. L'ogdoade et l'ennéade, conservé dans le codex VI de Nag Hammadi: RSR 48 (1974) 54-65; Scritti ermetici in copto, ed. A. Camplani, Brescia 2000.

S. Lilla

OIKEIOSIS. The theory of οἰκείωσις ("appropriation," "affinity," "bonding," "closeness") was central to *Stoic ethics, up to Roman Stoicism and the imperial age. It was already present in the Old Stoa, and became more and more important; in neo-Stoicism it found its most mature formulation. The so-called social oikeiosis provided a basis for valuing interpersonal relationships, not only one's friends, who in the Old Stoa were wise men, but also one's family. This is esp. clear in Hierocles the Stoic (middle of the 2nd c. AD or somewhat earlier) the author of Elements of Ethics and On Appropriate Acts, which included precepts on marriage and household management. The Elements treat the Stoic theory of oikeiosis, from its beginning in the individual at birth to the more complex developments of social oikeiosis, which is proper to human beings: the social dimension of oikeiosis entails ethical values, among which kathēkonta ("appropriate acts") are prominent. In On Appropriate Acts, sections are devoted to appropriate behavior toward parents, the gods, one's country, one's siblings and one's spouse. In Hierocles's image of the concentric circles, the oikeiosis is applied to wider and wider groups of "others," beginning with the "appropriation" of one's self and passing through one's family and one's city, up to the whole of humanity. The width of the circles and their distance from the center is inversely proportional to the intensity of one's ties. In this way, the oikeiosis theory became closely connected with that of kathēkonta. Hierocles pointed out the need to perform a "contraction of the circles," reducing the distance from each circle to the next, so to create the closest possible oikeiosis. A similar purpose seems to motivate his recommendation to assimilate our feelings toward various categories of others to those due to one's father and mother. The (impossible) goal is to maintain toward the whole human race, or large groups of people, the same goodwill that one feels toward the dearest persons. The Stoics posited a bond of oikeiosis not only between each human being and the whole humanity but also between each one and the divinity, for the shared possession of the rational nature. Even the bond linking the whole of humanity was motivated by the common paternity of Zeus/Jupiter, the allegorical counterpart of the sharing of the logos by all humans.

In Hellenistic Judaism, *Philo developed a doctrine of oikeiosis of the human being to God through the Spirit by building upon the Genesis notion of the human as image of God. In the NT, too, there are clear traces of the influence of the doctrine of oikeiosis, in particular in an author steeped in Hellenistic moral philosophy such as the author of the Pastoral Epistles, who displays notable affinities with ample portions of the conceptions and works of Hierocles, probably contemporary with him.

The idea of oikeiosis was so fruitful that it continued to influence patristic philosophy, for example, *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen, and above all, *Gregory of Nyssa. Gregory revisits the Stoic doctrine of all humans' oikeiosis with the divinity in the light of Christian theology and of the Genesis account of the creation. Gregory applies the oikeiosis theory to his doctrine called "the theology of the image," which is grounded in Gen 1:26. All humans are an image of God, and thus endowed with the divine beauty: this is the πρῶτον οἰκεῖον of every human creature. The soul's own beauty is oikeion (familiar and of the same nature) to God's own beauty. The closest and most familiar thing to each human being is the Godhead itself. If God's image has been blurred by sin, it will be fully recovered in the end, thanks to Christ's assumption of humanity. The πρῶτον οἰκεῖον of each human will be recovered in all its purity and beauty in the end, after the purification of each one, which will precede the apokatastasis*. For all will recover "the beauty that is proper to them" (Hom. in Cant. 15 GNO 6,439,18). We shall "return to the Beauty that is proper and familiar [οἰκεῖον] to us, in which we were formed in the beginning, acc. to the image of our Archetype" (De Mort. GNO 9,42,20 = 11 Lozza). As a consequence, we should appropriate the Good; if we make sin our own, this is an alienation from our nature (Antirrh. adv. Apoll. GNO 3,1,199,4; 228,17). We must have an oikeiosis to the Good (De benef. GNO 9,100,20). As God is the Good, familiarity and affinity with God means for each soul alienation from evil (De beat. PG 44,1293,47). Conversely, alienation from the Good is tantamount to oikeiosis with evil (C. fat. 44,21). It is through virtue that one acquires an oikeiosis with God (De or. 238,14), and nobility consists in being familiar with God (In Bas. fr. 25). The main example of oikeiosis with the Good is offered by the *ascetics, who become familiar with the angels. In Vita Macr. Gregory describes the life of his sister and her nuns as angelic, and in In inscr. Ps. GNO 5,123,13 he outlines this oikeiosis with the angels. Ascetic life is an anticipation of the apokatastasis, and a return to (and even improvement of!) human life before the fall (De opif. Hom. 188,46). This original and *eschatological life, which is oikeios with God, cannot be oikeios with evil, as God has no familiarity to evil (Antirrh. adv. Apoll. GNO 3,1,180,24). Evil is totally extraneous to the nature of God, who is the Good itself (e.g., De An. 89CD); only God is good intrinsically and by nature, and thus stably and eternally; all other beings, i.e., the creatures, are good only by participation (Adv. Ar. et Sab. GNO 3,1,82,16), so that all that is familiar and oikeion with God is good (De op. hom. 164,9). God wants to reappropriate his creatures, after their alienation by evil: the process of purification of sins is described in De An. 97Dff. as a painful side effect of God's primary action of oikeiosis, i.e., of attracting each soul from evil back to himself, for the Godhead vindicates what is his own. The apokatastasis is the supreme action of oikeiosis performed by the Godhead in respect to all its creatures. This universal oikeiosis to God does not mean a confusion of substance or pantheism: Gregory distinguishes what is oikeion to the Godhead and what is homoousion to it, which is transcendent. This is why in De inf. 82,4 Gregory can state that the good expected for the telos is familiar, oikeion, to the human nature; for it is the Godhead itself, in whose image the human being was created at the beginning, and which in the end will be "all in all," i.e., God will be all good things for all beings. Since the Good is nothing but God, Gregory, like Origen and *Evagrius, can maintain the ontological priority of good over evil and virtue over vice. This priority entails both a chronological and an axiological precedence: virtue existed before vice, and good before evil, because they are coeternal with God, who is the Good; human nature was created familiar with virtue (De vita Greg. Thaum. PG 46, 893,42). It was created familiar with God, and sin was the falling down from oikeiosis and kinship with God, who is the Good (De ben. GNO 9,95,3). Gregory emphasizes that nothing is more familiar than God to our intellect, a theme that is particularly developed in De anima. Also in De op. hom. 161,25 Gregory insists that our intellect is familiar to that which is acc. to nature. But *Plato demonstrated that what is natural for the human being is virtue; and Gregory follows this conception, which was also shared by Origen and Evagrius. The apokatastasis will be characterized by the eviction of death, which is the consequence of evil: the vanishing of evil due to the oikeiosis of all to the Good will entail the disappearance of death, i.e., the victory of life, who is Christ. In Or. Cat. 24 Gregory explains that what is proper to life is to have death vanish. Christ will perform the actions that are oikeia to him as Light and as Life: the vanishing of darkness and death. Gregory describes the true life for the intellectual creature in terms of familiarity or oikeiosis with God, whereas death is falling away from God (C. Eun. 3,6,77).

Therefore, the oikeiosis between the human beings and God passes through Christ, just as the apo- katastasis itself. Christ has made our pathē his own (the verb is οἰκειόω) even though he, as God, is apathēs (Antirrh. adv. Apoll. GNO 3,1,181,21; 160,16; 160,20). Christ has assumed our curse and thus has liberated us from it (C. Eun. 3,10,12). Indeed, Christ has made his own all that is human (Tunc et ipse 20,9 Downing). Christ's resurrection brings all humans to return to familiarity with God and thus the highest form of freedom (In d. lum. GNO 9,222,24). This is the fundamental premise for the theosis of the human being: if Christ, who is God and is pure and without sin, has "assumed" all that is human, the human being is sanctified, purified, liberated from sin and divinized.

The notion that God is the first oikeion of all humans also provides a basis for the evaluation and social promotion of all humans. Gregory's attack against slavery and every oppression, and also his concept of the equal dignity of women and men derive from the principle that all humans are an image of God. Human beings, as images of God, participate in God's perfections, the first of which is freedom. Humans were created by God for virtue, which has no master (adespoton), acc. to Plato's definition, and thus no human being can be subject to a master as a slave (De op. hom. PG 44,184B). Gregory puts forward a full demonstration of the intrinsic illegitimacy and impiety of slavery esp. in his fourth homily on Ecclesiastes. T.J. Dennis in The Relationship Between Gregory of Nyssa's Attack on Slavery in His Fourth Homily on Ecclesiastes and His Treatise "De hominis opificio," in SP 17.3 (1982) 1065-72, has shown the link between Gregory's statements in this homily and De hominis opificio. I highlighted the close connection between Gregory's ideas in this homily and De anima, which is roughly contemporary, and in a number of other important texts, in Slavery as a Necessary Evil or as an Evil That Must Be Abolished? (Paper at the SBL Annual Meeting, Boston, Nov 21–25, 2008), pointing out the interrelation between Gregory's discourse on free will and human freedom in De anima and his thought concerning slavery in homily 4 on Ecclesiastes. In De mort. (GNO 9,54,1-5) Gregory illumines the glory of free will given to the human being by God in that it is in the image of the Godhead, adespoton in its beatitude. The saints are those who appropriate God's "being adespoton" for themselves (C. Eun. 1,1,572,3), making the assimilation to God a veritable oikeiosis. For all that is adespoton in us, like all that is beautiful and good, is by participation in divine adespoton, beauty and good. God's characteristics, including freedom, which are oikeia to us, were in the human being at the beginning, as image of God, and will be recovered in their perfection in the end. Freedom is the sovereign freedom of adhering to the Good and enjoying it, as the choice of evil always entails a limited freedom. Gregory ultimately bases his claim of the equality of nature within humanity on the equality of nature within the *Trinity, thus contrasting any *subordinationistic trend such as that of the "neo-*Arians," and likewise insists on the oikeiosis that obtains among the persons of the Trinity by nature; in C. Eun. 1,1,222 and 3,1,99 Gregory claims that the Son is oikeios to the Father by nature and essence, and not allotrios (see 3,1, 102 and 119; 3,6,48). Gregory's evaluation of women comes from the same source, the sharing of the same nature by all humans, men and women alike, and by their sharing a nature that is oikeios to God (Gen 1:26). Gregory, more than many other church fathers, insisted on the equality of both genders and on the secondary and functional nature of gender differences within humanity. This is why, as he stresses on the basis of Jesus' words, these differences will vanish in the next world.

The other Cappadocians held a similar view. They maintained that men and women have the same capacity for virtue, a point emphasized esp. by Basil (e.g., Hom. Iul. 241A), who also stressed the complete equality of both genders, deriving from the same "lump" (φύραμα), with the same honor and dignity (ὁμοτίμως) and in perfect equality (ἐξ ἴσου). Men even risk being inferior in piety (241B). Likewise, Basil emphasizes that man and woman have "one and the same virtue" and "one and the same nature" (Hom. Ps. 1, PG 29,216-217); their creation was of equal honor and dignity (ὁμότιμος); they have the same capacity and activity (ἐνέργεια) and will be given the same reward.

Basil shares with Gregory important features of his Christianized doctrine of oikeiosis as well. He notes that "knowledge is manifold: it comprises perception of our Creator, recognition of God's wonderful works, observance of God's commandments, and oikeiosis with God" (Ep. 235,3). Thus, oikeiosis with God is the highest form of the knowledge. Basil describes the intradivine relationships in terms of oikeiosis, between Father and Son (Adv. Eun. 2,23 and 28) and between the three divine *hypostases (Ad Eun. 3,3). In Ad Eun. (2,4 PG 29, 625) Basil remarks that the name "Father" indicates, not a passion, but a relationship of oikeiosis, which is granted either by nature (to the Son) or by grace (to humans). For humans, the attainment of oikeiosis with God passes through Christ, who has recalled the human being from disobedience to oikeiosis with God (De Spir. Sanct. 15,35). The convergences of thought with Gregory of Nyssa are clear, although the latter developed a deeper and more philosophically modeled doctrine of oikeiosis, which Christianized the main features of the Stoic theory of the proton oikeion and of social oikeiosis, also under the influence of Plato, Philo and Origen. Remarkably, the latter had already performed a synthesis between the Platonic and the Stoic tradition, which was typical of *Middle Platonism.

It is remarkable that *Augustine, too, even without developing a coherent doctrine of oikeiosis, surely shared with Gregory of Nyssa the notion that the πρῶτον οἰκεῖον of each human being is God. He is adamant that the Godhead, in its manifestation of Beauty (God is famously described as pulchritudo tam antiqua et tam nova), is intimior intimo meo (Conf. 1,3,6,11) and that in interiore homine habitat Veritas, i.e., Christ (De v. rel. 39,72). The divinity is oikeion to each human being even more than each human is to him- or herself. This is because, as Augustine himself explains, God created human beings for himself, and they cannot have peace until they have returned to God (with a Platonic movement of ἐπιστροφή or return), who is their "home" and what is proper and familiar to them most of all.

G. Striker, The Role of Oikeiosis in Stoic Ethics, in OSAPh 1 (1983) 145-167; M. Whitlock Blundell, Parental Nature and Stoic Oikeiosis, AncPhil 10 (1990) 221-242; V.E.F. Harrison, Male and Female in Cappadocian Theology, in JThS 41 (1990) 441-471; T. Engberg-Pedersen, The Stoic Theory of Oikeiosis, Aarhus 1990; R. Radice, Oikeiosis, Milan 2000; R. Bees, Die Oikeiosislehre der Stoa, I, Würzburg 2004; Chang-Uh Lee, Oikeiosis: Stoische Ethik in naturphilosophischer Perspektive, Freiburg 2002; G. Reydams-Schils, Human Bonding and Oikeiosis in Roman Stoicism, Oxford Studies in Ancient Philosophy 24 (2002) 221-251; B. Guckes, Zur Ethik der älteren Stoa, Göttingen 2004; I. Ramelli, L'interpretazione allegorica filosofica di Zeus come Padre nello Stoicismo, in Figuras mítico-religiosas del padre en la antigüedad clásica, ed. S. Perea Yébenes, Madrid 2004, 155-180; M.-A. Zagdoun, Problèmes concernant l'o. stoïcienne, in G. Romeyer-Dherbey, J.-B. Gourinat, eds., Les Stoïciens, Paris 2005, III; T. Brennan, The Stoic Life: Emotions, Duties, and Fate, Oxford 2005, 154-168; C. Spuntarelli, Uomo a immagine in Filone, in Il Commento a Giovanni di Origene. Il testo e i suoi contesti, ed. E. Prinzivalli, Verucchio 2005, 381-411; I. Ramelli, Hierocles the Stoic, Atlanta-Leiden 2009; eadem, Gregory of Nyssa's Christianized Form of the Stoic Oikeiosis, in Homo Romanus Graeca Oratione, ed. F. Mestre, forthcoming in Barcelona.

I. Ramelli

OIL. In the ancient Mediterranean, esp. in the sphere of Hellenistic Jewish culture, oil and the olive were of great importance. "With bread, cheese, salt and wine, olives and olive oil were the primary sources of sustenance" (PWK 17, 2012). "Like the palm and the laurel, the olive too had an important symbolic function in the field of the arts and religion" (PWK 17, 2020). The same is true in the OT world. We often read of anointing with oil; it was poured on religious objects, for the consecration of priests and kings. Metaphorically, anointing indicates the outpouring of the Spirit of God. So the *eschatological Savior would be called the "Anointed" (= Christos). All this was fulfilled in Jesus the Christ; the Spirit of God rested on him, and this act was properly an anointing (Lk 4:18-21; Acts 10:38; see also Rom 11:17.24; 2 Cor 1:21-22; 1 Jn 2:20; Heb 1:9; Rev 11:4; also Mt 25:3-8). But alongside these important *allegorical uses, the NT also knows the actual use of oil in the Lord's anointings (Mk 14:3-9; Lk 7:38) and for the healing of the sick (Mk 6:13 and, already in a "liturgical" way, Jas 5:14-16). All this is accepted by the Fathers in ever-growing measure.

*Ephrem the Syrian celebrates the significance of oil widely in his hymns (De virginitate IV-VII and XXXVII: CSCO 224, 12-29; 116). "Oil possesses a great efficacy . . . like Christ, who is all in all. . . . The name of oil is a symbol, and from it is derived the name 'Christ.' . . . And if they [the disciples] have been anointed and consecrated, mysteriously present in the oil was Christ, who has cast out all ills. . . . The name of oil, then, is a symbol and shadow of the name 'Christ'" (IV, 6-8). Hymn V exalts the oil of the candlestick and the lamp. Hymn VI celebrates the "oil, worthy of the Most High, giver of royal dignity"; it was used for the anointing of priests and kings; now "the multitudes are anointed and purified [in Christ]." In Hymn VII, 6 he says of baptism: "The Holy Spirit impresses his seal with oil on the sheep of his flock. . . . The invisible imprint of the Spirit is also impressed with oil in bodies . . . . (14) Oil is a real mirror. And from whatever angle I may observe oil, I see the gaze of Christ which shines in it."

In the postapostolic period, our earliest source is *Tertullian. He attests the use of oil for the healing of a sick man (Ad Scap. 4: PL 1, 703B) and explains its meaning in detail in the ceremony of initiation: Exinde, egressi de lavacro, perungimur benedicta unctione de pristina disciplina, qua ungi oleo de cornu in sacerdotium solebant. Ex quo Aaron a Moyse unctus est, unde Christus dicitur, a chrismate quod est unctio, . . . facta spiritualis, quia spiritu unctus est a Deo Patre (Bapt. 7: PL 1, 1206C-1207A). In more strictly liturgical contexts, early evidence of the use of a prebaptismal oleum exorcismi is found in *Serapion of Thmuis (Prayer 15), *Cyril of Jerusalem (Mystagogical Catecheses 2.3) and *John Chrysostom (Baptismal Homilies 3.27). In the Western tradition, with the exception of *Cyprian (Ep. 70,2), where mention is made of a consecration with baptismal oil during the Eucharist, we must wait until *Ambrose (De sacr. 1,5), who attests a prebaptismal anointing of exorcism before the renunciation of Satan. The evidence of the *Apostolic Tradition 21, frequently invoked, must be used with a certain prudence, considering it to be a 6th-c. addition, and thus not allowing a prebaptismal anointing of this kind to be attributed to the West until the above-mentioned evidence of Ambrose.

The Eastern traditions are more recent, and the use of oil is thought of differently: with a more pneumatic and messianic character in E *Syria and with a nonexorcist tone in *Egypt, although there, from the 6th c., it would acquire an exorcistic character with the addition of another postbaptismal anointing of foreign provenance, still today not better identified. The use of oil eventually diversified into three different applications, as already attested in Serapion of Thmuis's Euchologion: consecration of oil for healing of the sick (chs. 17 and 29), for baptismal exorcism (ch. 22), for the anointing of the baptized (ch. 25) (Funk II, 178-192). Worth mentioning are Cyril of Jerusalem's Mystagogical Catecheses II and III, the latter wholly dedicated to chrisma (PG 33, 1088A-1091A).

In the church of *Rome, the consecration of these three types of oil has been fixed, from the earliest times, on feria V of Holy Week. The Sacramentarium Gelasianum Vetus gives us in the Missa Chrismatis the formularies of consecration, still valid today in the Roman rite (Mohlberg, nn. 378-390). We must at least mention the important passage on the consecration of the chrisma: . . . Te igitur deprecamur . . . ut huius creaturae pinguedinem sanctificare . . . digneris . . . per potentiam Christi tui a cuius sancto nomine chrisma nomen accepit, unde unxisti sacerdotes reges prophetas et martyres tuos, ut sit his qui renati fuerint . . . chrisma salutis (n. 388). But the use of holy oil was not limited to these strictly sacramental circumstances. Not only was oil taken to sick people at home, as medicine, but the custom became established of taking oil from lamps lit on the tombs of saints or in holy cities, in small containers (ampullae), as a sort of physically and spiritually miraculous ointment (e.g., John Chrys., In mart. hom.: PG 50, 664 at the end).

Texts: F.X. Funk, Didascalia et Const. Apostol. I-II, Paderborn 1905; L.C. Mohlberg, Liber Sacr. R. Aeccl. (= Gelasianum vetus) (RED Fontes IV), Rome 1960; E. Beck, Des hl. Ephraem d. Syrers Hymnen, De virginitate (CSCO 224), Louvain 1962; B. Botte, La Tradition Apostolique de S. Hippolyte (LQF 39), Münster i.W. [5]1989.

Studies: Dictionaries: F.X. Kraus, Realenc. d. class. Altertümer 2 (1886), 522-525, 710-714; DACL 1, 1722-1747; 6, 2777-2791; TWNT 1, 230-232 (TDNT 1, 229-232); 2, 468-478 (TDNT 2, 470-473); 4, 807-809 (TDNT 4, 800-801); 9, 482-576 (TDNT 9, 493-580); PWK 17/2, 1998-2022; 2454-2474; LTK[2] 7, 1143-1145. Ph. Hofmeister, Die Öle in der morgenländischen und abendländischen Kirche, Würzburg 1948; DSp 11, 788-819; Cath 5, 1056-1063; DTC, Tables génér. 2135-2143; E.C. Whitaker, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy, London [3]2003; G. Winkler, The Original Meaning of the Prebaptismal Anointing and Its Implications: Worship 52 (1978) 24-45; G. Winkler, Das armenische Initiationsrituale, Rome 1982; V. Saxer, Les rites de l'initiation chrétienne du II[e] au VI[e] siècle, Spoleto 1988; B. Varghese, Les onctions baptismales dans la tradition syrienne, CSCO 512/Subs. 82, Louvain 1989; S.J. Voicu, Textes peu connus concernant l'onction prébaptismale: Irénikon 64 (1991) 468-482; M. Dudley - G. Rowell (eds.), The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition, Collegeville, MN 1993; M.E. Johnson, The Prayers of Serapion of Thmuis: A Literary, Liturgical, and Theological Analysis, Rome 1995; E. Boone, L'onction pré-baptismale: sens et origine. Un exemple dans les Actes de Thomas: SP 30 (1997) 291-295; A.H.B. Logan, Post-Baptismal Chrismation in Syria: The Evidence of Ignatius, the Didache and the Apostolic Constitutions: JTS 49 (1998) 92-108; W. Kinzig - C. Markschies - M. Vinzent, Tauffragen und Bekenntnis, Berlin 1999; P.F. Bradshaw - M.E. Johnson - L.E. Phillips, The Apostolic Tradition, Minneapolis 2002.

B. Neunheuser - P. de Navascués

OLD AGE. The recently discovered Sappho fragment (PKöln 21351 and 21376) is a reflection on old age and its sad physical effects. Indeed, before *Plato, there was a tendency to dwell on negative aspects of old age, such as the worsening of faculties, the vanishing of pleasures and the ill treatment that old people must endure. Socrates famously preferred to die than to bear the disabilities of old age. Plato, however, in his Republic, presented old age much more positively, esp. from the spiritual point of view (see in particular Resp. 1, 327A-331), noting in particular that old age is blessed because it is freed from the tyranny of passions (329BC). And Phocilides exhorted people to respect wise old men as their own fathers (Sent. 42). But *Aristotle in his Rhetoric offers a description of pessimistic old people, lacking energy and seeing only the bad aspects of things, because of sad experiences in life, or thinking and speaking only of the past (2,13,1389b; 1390a), and generally more concerned with what is useful than with virtue. He recognizes that old people are endowed with self-control (2,1389a13-14), but as a result, not of virtue, but of calculation. For old people are "self-controlled and cautious" (σώφρονες καὶ δειλοί, 2,1390b3). Several philosophers, however, not only Plato, but also Cicero, Seneca and Plutarch, refuted overly negative conceptions of old age and highlighted its advantages and its noblest aspects. A whole genre of treatises Περὶ γήρως/De senectute flourished. Cicero in his De senectute compliments his reader on his self-control or moderatio animi, thus conveying a general positive picture of an old person (Senect. 1; cf. 7 and 33). He clearly depends, at least in part, on Plato's Republic, and offers a methodic refutation of four major charges leveled against old age, the so-called crimina or vituperations senectutis. The first two are that old age prevents people from undertaking active pursuits (15-20) and heavily weakens the body (27-38). Cicero admits that it weakens the body, but he affirms that an aged person, too, can retain some vigor through exercise and good nutrition. Philosophers, moreover, warned that what is more important for old people is not so much physical exercise as the exercise of their mind and soul (see, e.g., Plato, Resp. 498B; Seneca, Ep. 15,5; 80,2-3; Pliny, Ep. 3,1; Plutarch, An seni 788B). The other two charges against old age refuted by Cicero in De senectute are the following: old age eliminates physical pleasures (39-66) and makes people closer to death (66-83). But these are not at all misfortunes: pleasure is to be avoided rather than pursued, as Cicero insists with an anti-Epicurean polemic; as for death, it is not an evil, but it is a good thing, esp. for the virtuous. Moreover, along with Plato, Cicero claims that old age is a blessed gift in that it sets people free from passions (12,39-42).

The picture of the wise old man who can still serve his state with his counsel, which is drawn by Cicero as a reply to the first vituperatio senectutis, is also to be found in Plutarch, the author of a treatise titled An seni respublica sit gerenda: the ideal old man—for these ancient authors are much more concerned with men than with women, of course—will have counsel, foresight and wise (conservative) speech; ruling becomes old men rather than young people (An seni 789DE). Precisely to avoid idleness, cowardice and softness, Plutarch advises that aged men engage in public affairs (ibid.). (See Antonio Cacciari, "Plutarco," in Mattioli, ed., Senectus, I, 361-395.)

Parkin fixes the threshold of old age for the Roman period at sixty—Ovid had old age extend between sixty and eighty years—and estimates that between 6 and 8 percent of the population was sixty or older, amounting to about four million among the about sixty million in the empire. The Senate was prevalently composed of men in their forties and fifties, seniores more than senes proper. Medical writers, of course, acknowledged the problems caused by old age and tried to offered remedies such as wine, sleep, massages and plums. Within Galen's extant work, however, only 0.6 percent is devoted to the elderly. Seneca in a lengthy and heartfelt passage (Ep. 58,32-36) focuses on the drawbacks of old age (see Parkin, 70). Juvenal (Sat. 10,188-288) lists all the misfortunes that accompany old age, such as grief, illnesses, weakness, dementia and ugliness, sharply criticizing those who pray for a long life, unaware that this is not at all a true good (his satires, like those of Persius, are replete with motifs drawn from Stoicism). In this unfortunate condition, a big comfort comes from being revered by the young, as Cicero remarked: Levior fit senectus, eorum qui a iuventute coluntur et diliguntur (De senectute, 8,26). The traditional reverence for aged people is underscored by Ovid: Magna fuit quondam capitis reverentia cani (Fasti 5,57).

In the Bible, old age is often portrayed in a positive manner, although there are also reflections such as those in Eccl 11:10 on the ephemerality of youth, and in Ps 89[90]:10: "The days of our life are seventy years, eighty for the robust, but most of them are suffering and labor, because tameness [πραΰτης] came upon us and we shall be instructed [παιδευθησόμεθα]." This is the text acc. to the LXX, which slightly differs from the Hebrew, but it was the most widely used by patristic authors. Humans are tamed by suffering and labor during the present life, which is limited, and finally they die: this was decreed by God because of our sin, as a paideutic punishment. This is why the wise aging person places his or her hope in God: "You have taught me, O God, since my youth, and still now I announce your wonderful deeds. And till old age [ἕως γήρους καὶ πρεσβείου], please, do not abandon me, that I may announce your power to every future generation, your power and your justice" (Psalm 70[71]:17-18 LXX). Especially in the OT, longevity is deemed a sign of divine benevolence: famously, the first patriarchs are said to have lived for hundreds of years (Gen 11:10-32). Both Sarah and *Abraham in their advanced age experienced God's power, which overcame the limits of nature and gave them a son, Isaac. Again in the OT, *Moses was aged when he led Israel out of *Egypt and performed all the rest of his deeds for God and his people. *Tobit, pious and just, is also portrayed as an aged man, and it is in his old age that an angel of God, Raphael, appeared to him (Tob 3:16-17). Eleazarus was ninety when he was martyred; his refusal of apostasy is motivated in 2 Macc 6 precisely by his venerable age: his heroism is said to become his old age (γήρως, πολιᾶς).

In the OT one often encounters exhortations to revere the elderly, frequent them and pay attention to their advice (Lev 19:32; Sir 6:34; 8:9), since wisdom becomes old people (Sir 25:5). In Ps 91 (LXX) the just are said to flourish and to live long, so to have a fruitful old age: "The just will flourish like a palm. . . . In their old age they will still bear fruits; they will be vigorous and prosperous to announce how the Lord is righteous" (vv. 13 and 15-16). The book of Wisdom spiritualizes and moralizes the idea of longevity and the related notion that it is a sign of the grace of God: "Venerable old age is not physical longevity; it is not calculated on the basis of the number of years: white hair for humans consists in wisdom; true longevity is a faultless life" (4, 8-9).

In the NT, too, there are old people who are presented in a prominent way. Apart from *Joseph, the "righteous," *Mary's spouse and adoptive father of Jesus, whom the tradition regards as an old man, Nicodemus, a member of the Sanhedrin, is portrayed as an old man (γέρων) in John 3, a chapter entirely devoted to his colloquium with Jesus, where the latter reveals to him many truths and, above all, his identity of Son of God who came into the world to save it. Nicodemus manifested himself as a disciple of Christ at Jesus' burial (Jn 19:38-40). *Peter was martyred as an old man, as foreshadowed in Jn 21: while when he was young he denied Jesus, in his old age he remedied this by being his witness. Lk 1:7 presents Zechariah and Elizabeth as old (προβεβηκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῶν) when they were given a child, *John the Baptist, by God, notwithstanding their age and sterility, which Zechariah emphasized in 1:18: "I am old [πρεσβύτης] and my wife is advanced in age [προβεβηκυῖα ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτῆς]." Soon after the birth of Jesus, at his presentation at the temple, the child was greeted by old Simeon, who recognized him as the Messiah whom he had been waiting for all his life long (Lk 2:29). A female complement to Simeon is offered by Anna the prophetess, a widow aged 84 who always lived in the temple: she also recognized in Jesus the Messiah (Luke 2:38). The letter to Titus ascribed to St. Paul offers a portrait of the ideal elderly: "Bid the older men be temperate, serious, sensible, sound in faith, in love and in steadfastness. Bid the older women likewise to be reverent in behavior. . . . They are to teach what is good" (2:2-3). And in another Pastoral Epistle, a presbyter is urged to treat old people with respect and affection: "Do not rebuke an older man but exhort him as you would a father; . . . treat . . . older women like mothers" (1 Tim 5:1-2).

The idea of the blessing of earthy longevity, already questioned in the book of Wisdom, in the NT tends to be replaced by the bliss of eternal life: it is a blessing, not so much to live long in this world, but to live forever with the Lord. But the basic conception remains the same: it is the Lord who is life and the giver of life, not only a long life, but life eternal.

*Philo of Alexandria, the Platonic exegete who is the main representative of Hellenistic Judaism, is well aware of the notion of the blessedness of old age in the OT, but is also aware that true life is moral and spiritual life. Thus, drawing on the Stoic distinction between the wise and the stupid and vicious person (φαῦλος), he states: "According to the Legislator [i.e., Moses], only the wise person enjoys a good old age and an extremely long life, whereas the unwise has an extremely short life and is always learning to die, or better is already dead to the life acc. to virtue" (Quis heres 293). The virtue of the sage is an allegorical or spiritual old age, indicating that the life of the wise is always long: indeed, for Philo, only the wise and virtuous are immortal in their soul; the others will vanish altogether, and, even if their earthly life is long, they are already dead.

The Fathers depended on both the Bible and their knowledge of classical literature and philosophy, including Philo himself in several cases, for their conception of old age. Those of them who were best acquainted with Philo were *Clement, *Origen, *Eusebius, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Jerome. Among them, esp. Gregory of Nyssa and Origen had a strong eschatological orientation. Like many other patristic authors as well, they thought that in the new world there will be no old age, no illness, no corruption and decay, no death. Gregory of Nyssa in his De anima et resurrectione depicts this glorious return to incorruptibility at the resurrection after *Macrina has refuted the objections raised by her brother in the dialogue (137). Gregory explained his perplexities in the following way, adducing first of all the example of old age and all its troubles, and maintaining that an aged resurrected body would be a tragedy rather than a grace: "If our bodies are to be reconstructed and restored to life in the same condition in which they were when they ceased to live, then humans, hoping for resurrection, hope for an unending disaster. For, what view could be more pitiful than when, at the end of time, the bodies, cramping and wrinkled by senescence, will be created again only to obtain horror and ugliness as a result, with their flesh devastated by time, and their skin wrinkled and hardened, adhering to their bones? Then, since their nerves will be contracted, in that they will be no more lubricated by their natural liquid, and for this reason the body will be all crooked, the result will be a pitiful and miserable sight, with one's head bent toward one's knees, and one's hands, on both sides, unable to do anything they should be used for by nature, always involuntarily shaken by a tremble."

But Macrina replies that resurrection, ἀνάστασις, will be the restoration of our nature, not to the state that we had at the moment of our death, but to its original condition (148A; 156C: ἡ εἰς τὸ ἀρχαῖον τῆς φύσεως ἡμῶν ἀποκατάστασις, "the restoration of our nature to its original condition"). Thus, we shall not rise old, or babies, or ill, but perfect. For "in the original life, of which God himself was the creator, there existed neither old age nor infancy, as it seems probable, nor sufferings due to various illnesses, nor any other physical misery (since it seems unlikely that God created anything of this sort), but human nature was a divine thing, before the human being acquired an impulse to evil. . . . Our nature, when it became liable to passions, was joined to the consequences of passible life. But after returning to its state of impassible beatitude, it will have nothing to do anymore with the consequences of sin," among which are "old age, illness and death." Old age will disappear together with all aspects of corruptibility, to yield to incorruptibility and immortality, not a long life, but an eternal life. Subsequently, indeed, Macrina adds: "After abandoning, in dying, all the characteristics that it had acquired through the disposition of liability to passions, i.e., ignominy, corruption, weakness and different ages, human nature does not lose itself, but it is transformed into incorruptibility . . . and glory, honor, power and perfection in all respects. . . . Now, incorruptibility, glory, honor and power, which are commonly thought to be characteristics proper to the divine nature, originally belonged to the human being, made in the image of God and are hoped for again for the future." The closing section of De anima is a depiction of the recovery of incorruptibility after resurrection, when old age has disappeared: "After the purification and vanishing of passions due to the healing process of purgatorial fire, instead of those defects each corresponding positive reality will appear: incorruptibility, life, power, honor, grace, glory and every other similar prerogative that we conjecture it is possible to contemplate both in God and in God's image, i.e., human nature."

Another Cappadocian father, *Gregory of Nazianzus, shared Gregory of Nyssa's conception of the absence of old age in the other world: "He will not grow old in his spirit: he will accept dissolution as the moment established for the necessary freedom. He will gently pass on to the other world, where nobody is immature or old, but all are perfect in their spiritual age" (In seipsum, Oratio 26, 11 PG 35, 1241-42). Also the idea of physical *death as liberation from enslavement to corruption with a view to the future resurrection is common to both Gregorys.

*Ephrem the Syrian compared human life to our fingers, to indicate that it does not last longer than a span, and that each phase in life has its own characteristics, like each finger. "Fingers represent the five steps on which the human being proceeds" (Commentary on "All Is Vanity" 5-6). This is a variant in respect to the widespread classical parallel between the ages of human life and the seasons, expressed, e.g., in Ovid (Met. 15,199-236).

Jerome praises old age in that it approaches apatheia and thence auget sapientiam, dat maturiora consilia (Comm. in Amos, 2, prol.). To this idea of old age as the age of wisdom is also connected the classical topos of the puer senex (see, e.g., the legendary Etruscan Tages, looking like a child but wise as an old man), which had fortunate developments in early Christianity. As Gregory of Nyssa in his De virginitate observes, it is above all ascetics who incarnate this ideal: "Many ascetics, in spite of their young age, became old in the pureness of wisdom, reaching old age by means of their logos and overcoming time through their behavior." This notion was grounded in a differentiation between physical and spiritual age, which was particularly developed by Origen, who, in line with Philo, distinguished the inner and the outer ἄνθρωπος, physical and spiritual senses, the latter perfectly and mysteriously corresponding to the former. Origen notes that in Scripture two ages are mentioned or meant: the first is that of the body, which obeys nature's law and does not depend on our free will; the other is the age of the soul, which depends on us (Hom. in Luc. 20.6-7): Duae in Scripturis feruntur aetates: altera corporis, quae non est in potestate nostra, sed in lege naturae; altera animae, quae proprie in nobis sita est, iuxta quam, si volumus, cotidie crescimus et ad summitatem eius venimus, ut non simus ultra parvuli et fluctuantes et qui circumferamur omni vento doctrinae, sed, esse parvuli desinentes, incipiamus esse viri atque dicamus, "quando factus sum vir, destruxi ea quae erant parvuli." Huius, ut dixi, aetatis profectus, qui incrementum habet animae, in nostra est potestate . . . Aliud de Paulo sumamus exemplum: "Donec perveniamus," inquit, "omnes in virum perfectum, in mensuram aetatis plenitudinis corporis Christi" [Eph 4:13]. In nobis ergo est ut ad mensuram perveniamus aetatis corporis Christi, et, si in nobis est, omni labore nitamur deponere parvulum et destruere illum et ad aetates reliquas pervenire, ut nos quoque audire possimus, "Tu autem ibis ad patres tuos cum pace, nutritus in senectute bona," [Gen 15:15] utique spiritali, quae est vere senectus bona [compare what I have pointed out above in the book of Wisdom and in Philo], canescens et ad finem usque perveniens in Christo Iesu. These considerations also have roots in the Bible, as all of Origen's thought. The book of Wisdom spiritualizes age and old age; in 4:8 it is stated that "age is not measured by the number of years." In Tob 1:4, acc. to the Vulgate, Tobias is presented as a typical puer senex: "Although he was the youngest of all, his behavior was not that of a child." In the NT, Christ in Revelation appears both as a newborn lamb (ἀρνίον) and as a very old man, with hair as white as wool and snow (Rev 1:14).

Likewise, a spiritual understanding of youth and old age is in Clement of Alexandria, of course well known to Origen: in Protr. 10,108 he states that even those who have grown old in the error of paganism can return young thanks to Christian faith. I think that this is the same idea that underlies Ambrose's reply to *Symmachus: for *Rome it will certainly not be a shame, but a benefit, to convert to Christianity in its old age, longaeva converti.

Jerome, who at first was a fervent admirer of Origen, took up the puer senex theme in Ep. 60, a funeral encomium of the young presbyter Nepotianus, whose choice of the ascetical life is presented as an overcoming of physical age and gender in order to fulfill Paul's ideal (Gal 3:28) that "in Christ there is neither man nor woman." *Prudentius applied the puer senex topic to another Christian young person, *Eulalia of Mérida, who died as a martyr at twelve, and to whom he devotes one of his hymns. Even when she was much younger, she did not behave as a baby or small child, but as an aged person (vv. 21-25). But already *Athanasius in his biography of St. *Anthony presented the latter as a child who, like a mature man, did not play.

The Christians presented as pueri senes are mostly young martyrs and ascetics. Related to this is the notion that ascetics, and esp. virgins, are less exposed to the injury of time (Jerome, Ep. 38a). This idea is to be connected to Gregory of Nyssa's De virginitate, who describes virginity as an anticipation, already in this world, of the angelic and divine life that all human beings will lead in the telos, the life in which, acc. to him, as I have mentioned, there will be no more illness, no more infancy, no more old age, no more death.

Ph.S. Miller, Old Age in the Greek Poets, CW 48 (1955) 177-182; H.N. Couch, Cicero on the Art of Growing Old, a Translation and Subjective Evaluation of the Essay Entitled Cato the Elder on Old Age, Providence, R.I., 1959; M.S. Haynes, The Supposedly Golden Age for the Aged in Ancient Greece and Rome, The Gerontologist 2 (1962) 93-98; 3 (1963) 26-35; P. H. Niebyl, Old Age, Fever and the Lamp Metaphor, Journal for the History of Medicine 26 (1971) 351-368; G.S. Kirk, Old Age and Maturity in Ancient Greece, Eranos Jahrbuch 40 (1971) 123-158; Chr. Gnilka, Aetas spiritalis. Die Überwindung der natürlichen Altersstufen als Ideal frühchristlichen Lebens, Cologne-Bonn 1972; M.J. Smethurst, The Authority of the Elders: The Agamemnon of Aeschylus, CPh 67 (1972) 89-93; E. Eyben, Die Einteilung des menschlichen Lebens im römischen Altertum, RhMus 116 (1973) 150-90; G. Koumakis, Aristotle's Opinions on Old Age from a Social Point of View, Philosophia 4 (1974) 274-285; G. Luck, Ne lateat ratio finem quaerentibus aevi . . ., AJPh 100 (1979) 531; Chr. Gnilka, Kalogeros. Die Idee des guten Alters bei den Christen, JAC 25 (1980) 5-21; R.D. Williams, Virgil. Aen. VI,304, CQ 31 (1981) 469-470; M.I. Finley, The Elderly in Classical Antiquity, G&R 28 (1981) 156-171; É. Lamirande, Les ages de l'homme d'après Saint Ambroise de Milan (397), Cahiers des Études Anciennes 14 (1982) 227-233; Chr. Gnilka, Greisenalter in RAC, XII, Stuttgart 1983, 995-1094; A.J.L. van Hooff, Old Age in Ancient Greece, Tijdschr. voor Gerontol. & Geriatrie 14 (1983) 141-148; A.M.M. Talbot, Old Age in Byzantium, ByzZ 77 (1984) 267-278; T. Falkner, Old Age in Euripides' Medea, CB 61 (1985) 76-78; P. Desideri, La vita politica cittadina nell'Impero. Lettura dei "Praecepta gerendae reipublicae" e dell'"An seni res publica gerenda sit," Athenaeum 64 (1986) 371-381; L.J.J. Houdijk - P.J.J. Vanderbroeck, Old Age and Sex in the Ancient Greek World, WZRostock 36 (1987) 57-61; J. Gordon Harris, Biblical Perspectives on Aging: God and the Elderly, Philadelphia 1987; G. Zerbi, Gerontocomia (On the Care of the Aged), and Maximianus, Elegies on Old Age and Love, ed. and trans. by L.R. Lind, Philadelphia 1988; Old Age in Greek and Latin literature, ed. Th.M. Falkner and J. de Luce, New York 1989; G. Minois, History of Old Age: From Antiquity to the Renaissance, tr. S.H. Tenison, Chicago 1989; R. Garland, The Greek Way of Life, from Conception to Old Age, London 1990; Th.M. Falkner, The Politics and the Poetic of Time in Solon's "Ten Ages," Classical Journal 86 (1990) 1-15; W. Suder, Geras: Old Age in Greco-Roman Antiquity: A Classified Bibliography, Wróclaw 1991; H.C. Covey, The Definitions of the Beginning of Old Age in History, International Journal of Aging 34 (1992) 325-337; A. Chrichton, The Old Are in a Second Childhood: Age Reversal and Jury Service in Aristophanes' Wasps, BICS 38 (1991-1993) 59-80; Ulrich Förster, Weisheit und Alter: Konzeptionen von Lebensklugheit in Antike und Gegenwart Frankfurt 1993; E. Giannarelli, Il puer senex nell'antichità, in O. Niccoli (ed.), Infanzie. Funzioni di un gruppo liminale dal mondo classico all'Età moderna, Florence 1993, 73-112. Th.M. Falkner, The Poetics of Old Age in Greek Epic, Lyric, and Tragedy, Norman 1995; R.F. Hock, A Support for His Old Age: Paul's Plea on Behalf of Onesimus, in The Social World of the First Christians: Essays in Honor of W.A. Meeks, ed. L.M. White, O.L. Yarbrough, Minneapolis 1995, 67-81; A.L. Motto, Seneca on Old Age, CFC(L) 19 (2000) 125-139; S. Panayotakis, Insidiae Veneris: Lameness, Old Age and Deception in the Underworld (Apul. Met. 6, 18-19), in Groningen colloquia on the novel 8, ed. H. Hofmann - M. Zimmerman, Groningen 1997, 23-39; Giovanni Paolo II, Lettera Agli Anziani, Vatican City 1999; M.C.G. Razzano, La vecchiaia di Solone: età e politica nella città greca, Rome 2001; A.D. Nikolopoulos, Tremuloque gradu venit aegra senectus: Old Age in Ovid's Metamorphoses, Mnemosyne 56 (2003) 48-60; K. Cokayne, Experiencing Old Age in Ancient Rome, London-New York 2003; T.G. Parkin, Old Age in the Roman World: A Cultural and Social History, Baltimore 2003; Hoping for Continuity: Childhood, Education and Death in Antiquity and the Middle Ages, ed. K. Mustakallio, Rome 2005; A History of Old Age, ed. P. Thane, Malibu, CA 2005; L. Edmunds, The New Sappho: Ephanto (9), ZPE 156 (2006) 23-26; R. Rawles, Notes on the Interpretation of the New Sappho, ZPE 157 (2007) 1-7; Senectus. La vecchiaia nel mondo classico, ed. U. Mattioli, A. Cacciari, I-III, Bologna 1995-2007 (I on the Greek world; II, Rome: here esp. O. Fuà, Da Cicerone a Seneca, 183-238; III, La vecchiaia nell'Antichità ebraica e cristiana); I. Ramelli, Stoicismo romano minore, Milan 2008.

I. Ramelli

OLD and NEW. In its translation of various Hebrew words, the Septuagint expresses the idea of a diminution or even loss of some value due to the long use of a good thing (Dt 8:4; 29:4; Neh 9:21); metaphorically, these terms connote the fallenness of humanity and the world (Ps 32:3; 49:15; 72:7; Gen 18:12; Job 21:13; Is 65:22), without using the abstract term antiquity. The latter term appears in the NT only in Rom 7:6, where it emphasizes the irreconcilability of the old principle of the written norm ("antiquity") and the new worship given to God in the *Holy Spirit ("newness"). A relationship is established between the law that regulates the service of God from the outside without intimately moving the person, and the Holy Spirit given to the faithful that renews the person from within, generating a new type of service. The concept of antiquity, common in various NT contexts, adds to the classical connotation of something in existence for a long time, that of its supersession (see 1 Cor 5:17; Eph 4:22-24). Mk 2:21-22 is emblematic, where the past (i.e., Jewish practices) is compared to an old, torn garment that cannot be repaired with unshrunken cloth, and to old wineskins, worn out and rigid, that cannot handle the pressure of the new wine. Other concepts emphasize that the Word, though having recently appeared, is from of old (Hermas, Par. IX, 12,2; To Diognetus, 11,4; Epitaph of Abercius 16).

The distinction between the OT and NT is frequent, however. Newness is contrasted with antiquity; Paul uses the former in Rom 6:4 to describe the life of the Christian after baptism as a participation in the death and resurrection of Christ, and in Rom 7:6, as mentioned, to compare the worship given to God before and after Christ's coming. While in profane classical literature "novelty" referred to a new linguistic term (Thucydides, Hist., III, 38,5), and more often something that excites or surprises (Plutarch, Moralia 16; Philo, De vita contempl. 63), its broad meaning in the NT refers to the full and complete reality of the salvation given by Christ, compared with which the old status has no value. Under this aspect Mk 2:21-22 places the accent on the power and dynamism of the new, which manifests the fallenness and obsolescence of the old and its inadequacy with respect to the in-breaking of the kingdom of God. The preference given to the adjective new can be explained by its ability to comprehensively indicate either the whole of the work of salvation or some of its aspects, such as new covenant (Mt 26:28 and par.; 1 Cor 11:25ff.), new commandment (Jn 13:34; 1 Jn 2:7-8), new creation (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15), new heavens and new earth (2 Pet 3:13; Rev 21:1), new person (Eph 2:15; 4:24), new name (Rev 2:17; 3:12), new Jerusalem (Rev 3:12; 21:2), new song (Rev 5:9; 14:3). Such conceptions were received and deepened in the patristic literature, becoming, esp. for the 2nd-c. apologists, an argument to be appealed to as an event that has already occurred and as still in the future: "a time will come when everything will be renewed in the Lord, because Christ is the new law and the new covenant" (Barnabas, XI,4; XIV,3; XV,7).

One of the accusations directed by pagans at the Christians was that of being "new," recent (hesterni), of not having a long history, since the criteria of the truth and morality of a doctrine, religion or practice was its antiquity. This accusation was also made during the persecutions, since the Christians with their novitas upset the social and religious life of the city. The Christians employed two apologetical strategies in response. On the one hand, they demonstrated their antiquity by showing their continuity with the Jewish people, making the history of the OT their own; on the other hand, they appealed to reason. Homer was older than the Greek philosophers, who drew on the OT. Isaiah was prior to the Pythagoreans. Not everything that is old is true and reasonable, but statements and practices themselves must be examined. The auctoritas patrum was also present in the law.

K. Prümm, Il cristianesimo come novità di vita. Il cristiano di fronte al mondo pagano, Brescia 1965; G. Bornkamm, Taufe und neues Leben (Röm 6): Das Ende des Gesetzes. Paulusstudien, I, Munich [5]1966, 34-50; J. Behm, καινός: TDNT 3, 447-454; H. Seesemann, πάλαι: TDNT 5, 717-720; T. Stramare, La nuova umanità secondo Dio: Div 19 (1972) 103-129; H. Haanbeck - H.G. Lunk, Antico-vecchio: Diz. conc. bibl. N.T., Bologna 1976, 121-123; Id., Nuovo: ibid., 1104-1109; H. Hagendahl, Cristianesimo latino e cultura classica, Rome 1988; A.J. Droge, Homer or Moses? Early Christian Interpretation of the History of Culture, Tübingen 1989; P. Pilhofer, Presbyteron kreitton: der Altersbeweis der jüdischen und christlichen Apologeten und seine Vorgeschichte, Tübingen 1990; R. Moriarty, The Claims of the Past: Attitudes to Antiquity in the Introduction to "Passio Perpetuae": SP 31 (1996) 306-313.

E. Peretto

OLYMPIA, deaconess (ca. 361/368–ca. 410). Various ancient documents mention her: *Palladius's Dialogue on the Life of St. John Chrysostom and his Lausiac History; *Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History; 17 letters sent to her by *John Chrysostom; and an anonymous Life (2nd half of 5th c.).

Born between 361 and 368 at *Constantinople, of a family belonging to the circle of the imperial palace, she was brought up by Theodosia, sister of St. *Basil's friend *Amphilochius of Iconium. Sources attribute to her friendly and familiar relations with

*Gregory of Nazianzus and *Gregory of Nyssa. She married Nebridius, prefect of Constantinople, in 386, but was soon widowed. It is related in terms of sublime spirituality how she refused to obey the emperor *Theodosius and marry a high imperial official. Her refusal resulted in the sequestration of all her goods and the start of her life of poverty and *ascesis. She used her property—restored to her because of her edifying life—for great works of charity in the capital, for which *Nectarius, archbishop of Constantinople from 381–397, made her a deaconess when aged just 30. Olympia lived at Constantinople, sharing her life of service with numerous women who joined her. When Chrysostom arrived there as archbishop (398), he highly esteemed and supported Olympia's community; Olympia and her companions in turn collaborated with him; various of her companions were ordained deaconesses. After the emperor *Arcadius's decree of 404 had exiled Chrysostom to Cucusa in Armenia, Olympia also suffered various persecutions, finally being exiled to Nicomedia, where she died ca. 410. We possess 17 letters written to her by Chrysostom from his exile.

BHL II, p. 154, nn. 1374-1376; Palladius, Dialogus X, 16 (PG 47, 35-61); Id., La Storia Lausiaca, 56,1; 61,3, Milan 1975; Sozomen, HE VIII, 9,24.27 (PG 67, 1538); Jean Chrysostome, Lettres à Olympias et à tous les fidèles, SC 103, Paris 1964; EC 9, 96; BS 9, 1154-1158; It. tr. Lettere a Olimpiade, ed. M. Forlin Patrucco, Milan 1996. Studies: G. Battista, Olimpiade e Giovanni Crisostomo: Claretianum 30 (1990) 335-383; G. Clark, Women in Late Antiquity: Pagan and Christian Lifestyles, Oxford 1994; E.M. Synek, Heilige Frauen der frühen Christenheit: zu den Frauenbildern in hagiographischen Texten des christlichen Ostens: Das östliche Christentum, N.F. 43, Würzburg 1994, 173-189; R. Teja, Olimpiade la diaconessa, Milan 1997; N. McLynn, The Other Olympias: Gregory Nazianzen and the Family of Vitalianus: Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 2 (1998) 227-246.

E. Cavalcanti

OLYMPIODORUS, deacon (6th c.). In a subscription of the codex Vat. Barber. gr. 549 of the commentary on Jeremiah we read that Olympiodorus was ordained deacon by Bishop John II Niciota of Alexandria (505–515/516). He was thus born between 470–490. He says that he wrote commentaries on Job and Ecclesiastes at the request of the otherwise unknown Julian and John. *Anastasius the Sinaite calls him a "great philosopher," adding that he is "a philosopher who with his books described Alexandria, of which he was deacon" (see PG 93, 10 and Hagedorn, Olympiodor, XLV). So, he was a learned exegete who commented on various biblical books; numerous ample fragments of his work remain in the catenae*; the editions of his works were in fact put together from these catena citations. He commented on the book of Job (CPG 7453; PG 93, 13-469; now ed. by Hagedorn; Olympiodorus was much used in the catena on Job, from which *Niceta extracted the fragments for his edition reprinted in Migne), Ecclesiastes (CPG 7454; PG 93, 477-628), Jeremiah (CPG 7455; PG 93, 628-725); Lamentations; (CPG 7456; PG 93, 725-761) and the letter of Jeremiah (CPG 7458; PG 93, 773-780), Baruch (CPG 7457; PG 93, 761-773) and Psalms (CPG 7460). Anastasius the Sinaite also cites a passage of his work Contra Severum Antiochenum (CPG 7459; 7771; PG 89, 1189). Other fragments are considered spurious. His *exegesis has a moralizing character.

CPG 7453-7465; PG 93, 13-780; D. und U. Hagedorn, Olympiodor Diakon von Alexandria, Kommentar zu Hiob, PTS 24, Berlin 1984; Id., Die älteren Katenen zum Buch Hiob, PTS 40, Berlin 1994, 97-98; PTS 48, Berlin 1997. U. Bertini, La catena su Giobbe: Biblica 4 (1923) 129-142; C. Zedda, Sulla paternità origeniana di alcuni frammenti esegetici, in Misc. A. Piolanti, II, Rome 1964, 25-35; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Julians, PTS 14, Berlin 1973; S. Leanza, Le catene esegetiche sull'Ecclesiaste: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 542-552. On CPG 7454: S. Lucà, Anonymus in Ecclesiasten, CCG 11, Turnhout 1983, XV; A. Labate, Catena Hauniensis in Ecclesiasten, CCG 24, Turnhout 1992. On the fragment cited by Anastasius: K.-H. Uthemann, Anastasii Sinaitae Sermones, CCSG 12, Turnhout 1985; Grillmeier 2/4, 106-108 (It. tr. 2001, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della chiesa 2/4, 145-147); LTK³ 7, 1050.

A. Di Berardino

OLYMPIODORUS of Thebes (ca. 370–ca. 430). Pagan historian and poet, a native of Thebes (*Egypt) who lived in the 1st half of the 5th c. at the court of *Constantinople, where he was employed in various missions because of his diplomatic abilities; ca. 412 he was sent to meet with the Hunnian prince Donatus. He made various voyages and was an attentive observer, and thus had knowledge of geography; he may have visited *Rome ca. 425. He wrote a Roman history, covering the years AD 407–425, in 22 books dedicated to *Theodosius II. The work (acc. to Gillett completed after 441) is lost except for some fragments preserved in *Photius (Bibl. codex 80), who criticizes his sloppy style. Olympiodorus does not consider it a history in the traditional sense but a collection of materials for a history, thus in annalistic form using the consular system for dating. It accurately transliterates the *Latin technical terminology. Nonetheless the work was heavily used by *Zosimus (from book 5,27 on), who wrote in the early 6th c., and by ecclesiastical authors such as *Philostorgius (ca. 380–after 439) and *Sozomen (d. after 450). Olympiodorus is well informed about Constantinopolitan political life and about events of the Western pars of the empire, the main focus of his work, and even of events which occurred in distant *Britain, to which *Stilicho had not given adequate military attention. He knows well the sack of *Rome of 410 and the political and military errors that led to it, as well as the slow recovery of the Western empire with the help of the East. Today his work is being reevaluated to the disadvantage of Zosimus, who borrows much from him. Livrea considers him the probable author of the Blemyomachia, preserved in a Berlin MS. He in fact knew of the Blemmyes, who lived at Egypt's S border and once took ca. 20,000 prisoners in an incursion, and of the Nobadae, whom he perhaps visited as an ambassador. Olympiodorus was also an alchemist.

Frammenti storici, intr., tr. and notes with appendix containing the Gk text, ed. R. Maisano, Naples 1979; R.C. Blockley, The Fragmentary Classicising Historians of the Later Roman Empire: Eunapius, Olympiodorus, Priscus and Malchus, Liverpool 1981, 151-220 (text and tr.; intr. pp. 27-47); C. Chaffin, Olympiodorus of Thebes and the Sack of Rome: A Study of the Historikoi Logoi, with tr. frags., comm. and additional material, Lewiston, NY 1993; Anonymi fortasse Olympiodori Thebani Blemyomachia (P. Berol. 5003), ed. E. Livrea, Meisenheim 1978; LTK[3] 7, 1051; PLRE 2, 798-799; J.F. Matthews Olympiodorus of Thebes and the History of the West (A.D. 407-425): JRS 60 (1970) 79-97; E. Livrea, Chi è l'autore della Blemyomachia (P. Berol. 5003)?: Prometheus 2 (1976) 97-123; B. Baldwin, Olympiodorus of Thebes: AC 49 (1980) 212-231; G. Zecchini, Aezio. L'ultima difesa dell'Occidente romano, Rome 1983; F. Paschoud, Romains et barbares au début du V[e] siècle après J.C. Le témoignage d'Eunape, d'Olympiodore et de Zosime, in La nozione di "romano" tra cittadinanza e universalità, Naples 1984, 357-367; C. Zuccali, Problemi e caratteristiche dell'opera storica di Olimpiodoro di Tebe: Rivista storica dell'Antichità 20 (1990) 131-149; A. Gillett, The Date and Circumstances of Olympiodorus of Thebes: Traditio 48 (1993) 1-29; C. Zuccali, Sulla cronologia dei Materiali per una storia di Olimpiodoro di Tebe: Historia 42 (1993) 252-256; C. Viano, Olympiodore l'alchimiste et les présocratiques: une doxographie de l'unité: (De arte sacra, § 18-27), in Alchimie: art, histoire et mythes, ed. D. Kahn – S. Matton, Milan 1995, 95-150; B. Mugelli, Olimpiodoro di Tebe: i viaggi nelle "capitali" della cultura: Atene (frr. 28, 32) e Roma (frr. 43-44): AFLS 21 (2000) 103-118; A. Baldini, Considerazioni sulla cronologia di Olimpiodoro di Tebe: Historia 49 (2000) 488-502; D. Rohrbacher, The Historians of Late Antiquity, London-New York 2002; A. Baldini, Ricerche di tarda storiografia (da Olimpiodoro di Tebe), Bologna 2004.

A. Di Berardino

OLYMPIUS. 4th-c. bishop, some say of *Toledo (H. Chadwick, 172), others of *Barcelona. According to *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 23), he wrote a (lost) Librum Fidei adv. eos qui naturam et non arbitrium in culpam vocant (on original *sin). *Augustine cites him together with *Irenaeus, *Cyprian, *Reticius, *Hilary, *Ambrose and *Gregory (C. Iul. I, 3,8; II, 10,33; III, 17,32), and in the same work (C. Iul. I, 2,8: PL 44, 644-645) alludes to a work—in quodam sermone ecclesiastico—which may be the same one cited by Gennadius.

CPL 558. E. Flórez: ES 29, 77-81; H. Chadwick, Prisciliano de Ávila, Madrid 1978, 284-289; Domínguez del Val 2, 24.

E. Romero Pose

OLYMPIUS (d. 412). Honorius's magister officiorum, a native of Euxine *Pontus. He succeeded *Stilicho, whom he ruined, obtaining his arrest (408) and persecuting his followers. Olympius may have inspired the law of 14 Nov 408 that excluded pagans from the palace administration. Upholder of a last-ditch antibarbarian policy, he prevented any agreement with the invader *Alaric. He was finally disgraced and put to death by *Constantius (Zosimus, Historia nova V, 32-46; Photius, Bibl., cod. 80; CT 16, 5, 42). *Augustine wrote two letters to Olympius, one asking help for a bishop in a question of property, the other requesting action against heretics (Ep. 96 and Ep. 97).

PLRE 2, 801-802; J. Matthews, Western Aristocracies and Imperial Court, A.D. 364-425, Oxford 1975, passim; S. Mazzarino, Stilicone, Milan [2]1990.

E. Prinzivalli

ONOMASTICS. In pagan *Latin inscriptions in the first two centuries of the imperial age, the onomastic system of the naming of persons was based on three elements (praenomen, gentilicium, cognomen). From the 3rd c. on, the praenomen and then the gentilicium progressively fell into disuse. Thus in the great majority of Christian titles only the cognomen appears, for both men and women, since this was presumably sufficient to identify people. However, esp. in some provincial, more conservative contexts, or in particular social classes, the use of the tria nomina persisted, though only sporadically, while the duo nomina continues to be attested fairly frequently in the 4th c., becoming rare only in the 5th–6th c. In Christian inscriptions one notes that sometimes the cognomen functions as a praenomen or gentilicium, or vice versa (see, e.g., CIL V, 1661, from Aquileia: Furia Firmina Gaudentia and Diehl, 286, from Rome: Valerius Victor Paternus). In Greek, the name usually has only a nominal element, often followed by the surname in the simple genitive, or preceded by υἱός, παῖς, something very rare in Latin Christian inscriptions. It is thought that the Greek examples of two or three names are imitations of the Roman usage, as the transliteration of praenomina and gentilicia shows (e.g., Μάρκος Αὐρέλιος, Κλ. 'Ακείλιος, Τίτος Φλάβιος).

The etymology of first names was given no particular importance by the Christians (as among the Jews): thus they usually bear names of pagan origin, or specifically mythological names, e.g., Aphrodite, Galatea, Herculius, Isidorus, Liber, Mercurius, Phoebe, Martialis, Saturus, Silvanus, Socrates, Ptolomaeus and many others. Similarly, at least until the 4th–5th c., biblical names were not very widespread (the most common being Maria, Susanna, Iohannes, Petrus), while it is thought that typically Christian or Christianized cognomina, like Agape, Anastasius, Benedictus, Martyrius, Redemptus, Spes or Renatus, spread esp. as the practice increasingly spread of baptism at a very young age. Also notable here are the so-called theophoric names, which spread in other forms also in the pre-Christian era, almost as if to put oneself under the special tutelage of the deity. Many of these were used by Africans: Quodvultdeus, Habetdeus, Deogratias, Deusdedit, Adeodatus, Theodulos. Also found quite frequently in inscriptions are names of humiliation (or disgrace), at first peculiar to Christians, but quickly adopted by pagans too, though simply as fashionable, no longer paying attention to their meaning: Asellus, Calumniosus, Contumeliosus, Importunus, Onager, Stercorius, Coprion, Projectus and Projecticius (these last two for abandoned babies).

Surnames, or signa, could be introduced from expressions of various kinds (qui et, quae et, ὅς καί, signum, sive, id est . . .), and follow the cognomen, or they could be used alone. Sometimes, despite the ending in -ius, they referred to women (Amantius, Simplicius, Toribius). A certain number of feminine cognomina are irregularly lengthened in the genitive and dative, with the prevalence of weak forms over strong and Greek endings: Agnes (-etis, -eti), Aproniane (-enis, -eni, or -etis, -eti), Cyriace (-etis, -eti), Iuliane (-enis, -eni, or -etis, -eti). These are certainly not diminutives, as was hypothesized in the past. As early as the 4th c. barbarian first names appear, notably more widespread in the following centuries.

In general it is not possible, from the type of name, to trace the origin of the person who bears it, given that normally Greek or Eastern first names are used by Westerners, and vice versa, for exoticism or fad. Not yet sufficiently emphasized are the function and importance of seemingly unusual cognomina, which had only a local diffusion (see *names, Christian).

DACL 12, 1481-1553; EC 5, 435-436; W. Schulze, Zur Geschichte lateinischer Eigennamen, Berlin 1904 (= Berlin-Zurich-Dublin 1966); M. Schoenfeld, Wörterbuch der altgermanischen Personen- und Völkernamen, Heidelberg 1911 (= ibid. 1965); F. Grossi Gondi, Trattato di epigrafia cristiana latina e greca del mondo romano occidentale, Rome 1920 (= ibid. 1968), 71-91; P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Rome 1958 (= Bari 1980), 367-371; I. Kajanto, On the Problem of Names of Humility in Early Christian Epigraphy: Arctos 3 (1962) 45-53; Id., Les noms, in SyllInscrLatVetMusVat 2, Helsinki 1963, 40-72; Id., The Latin Cognomina, Helsinki 1965; Id., Supernomina: A Study in Latin Epigraphy, Helsinki 1966; A. Ferrua, I nomi degli antichi cristiani: La Civiltà Cattolica 117 (1966) 92-98; D. Mazzoleni, Nomi di barbari nelle iscrizioni paleocristiane della Venetia et Histria: RomBarb 1 (1976) 159-180; I. Kajanto, The Emergence of Late Single Name System, in L'onomastique latine (Colloques internationaux du C.N.R.S. 564), Paris 1977, 421-430; H.I. Marrou, Problèmes généraux de l'onomastique chrétienne, ibid., 431-435; Ch. Pietri, Remarques sur l'onomastique chrétienne de Rome, ibid., 439-445; N. Duval, Observations sur l'onomastique dans les inscriptions chrétiennes d'Afrique du nord, ibid., 447-456; C. Carletti, Appendice bibliografica: Epigrafia, in P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 817-818; M. Kajava, Roman Female Praenomina, Rome 1994; I. Kajanto, Roman Nomenclature During the Late Empire, in I. Di Stefano Manzella (ed.), Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano (= Inscriptiones Sanctae Sedis, 2), Vatican City 1997, 103-111; D. Mazzoleni, La produzione epigrafica nelle catacombe romane, in V. Fiocchi Nicolai - F. Bisconti - D. Mazzoleni, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma, Regensburg 1998, esp. 155-159.

D. Mazzoleni

ONUPHRIUS (4th c.). Egyptian *anchorite, probably mid-4th c. His life, and that of other monks, is described in a *Coptic text attributed to one Papnutis (*Paphnutius). The part referring to Onuphrius also exists in Greek and other languages—it is thus not clear whether the Coptic text is the original. He lived quite alone, naked, clothed only by his hair, which reached his knees. A palm tree gave him one fruit per month for food. For reasons that are not clear, his reputation became popular outside of *Egypt and gave rise to various legends. His iconography too is particularly rich, inside and outside Egypt. Feast 12 (or 10) June.

BS 9, 1187-1200; BHG 1378-1382; 2330; Auctarium p. 143; E.A.T. Wallis Budge, Coptic Martyrdoms in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1914, LIV-LXVII, 205-224, 455-473.

T. Orlandi

OPERA OMNIA. In the age of the MS, the idea of bringing together the works of a single author had to contend with two difficulties: one financial, the other critical. The first could be overcome, but the second required a critical sense which appeared only in the Renaissance, thanks to the efforts of the great editors, mainly Johann Froben (Frobenius) assisted by Erasmus. So, with regard to the Fathers, we know only one attempt to bring together St. Augustine's works, at Clairvaux (now Troyes BM 40). For him, apart from the Retractationes, there was *Possidius's Indiculus (PL 46, 5-22) which simplified the collecting.

The publication of opera omnia began at Basel with the publisher J. Froben (1460–1527), who worked with Johann Petri (1441–1511) and Johann Amerbach (1441–1513). This brought improvements to the correctness of the texts; above all it required a critical examination of authenticity and the discarding of spurious works.

From 1505–1506 the editio princeps of St. Augustine's opera omnia appeared, but without critical apparatus. In 1513 Erasmus's collaboration brought a critical surge: opera omnia of *Jerome, in 10 vols., 1516; of *John Chrysostom (in Latin), 1517; of *Cyprian, 1520; of *Tertullian, 1521 (ed. by Rhenanus); of *Arnobius, 1522; of *Hilary, 1523; of *Irenaeus, 1526; of *Ambrose, 1527. A new 10-vol. edition of Augustine's works by Erasmus appeared in 1528–1529, a landmark for choice of MSS, correctness of texts and elimination of apocrypha. All *Origen's works, edited by Erasmus, were published after his death by Rhenanus.

Erasmus's activities were carried on by his disciple Beatus Bild, surnamed Rhenanus. The impetus had been given. In the following centuries the Maurists brought out exemplary editions of opera omnia, at first of the Latin fathers, then of the Greeks (published with the Greek text for the first time). They had the good sense not to discard the spuria completely, but to put them in appendixes.

J. de Ghellinck, Patristique et moyen âge, II and III, Brussels 1947-1949; DHGE 15, 667-679; 19, 126-129; for Rhenanus, see A. Horawitz: SAW 70 (1872) 189-244, 323-378; Auctoritas patrum I-II: Zur Rezeption der Kirchenväter im 15. und 16. Jahrhundert / Contributions on the Reception of the Church Fathers in the 15th and 16th Century, eds. L. Grane - A. Schindler - M. Wriedt, Mainz 1993, 1998; Reception of the Church Fathers in the West: From the Carolingians to the Maurists, ed. I. Backus, 2 vols., Leiden 1997; "I Padri sotto il torchio." Le edizioni dell'antichità cristiana nei secoli 15-16, ed. M.R. Cortesi, Florence 2002; I. Backus, Historical Method and Confessional Identity in the Era of the Reformation, 1378-1615, Leiden 2003.

A. Hamman

OPHITES – NAASSENES. *Gnostic groups of the 2nd–3rd c., in whose religious doctrines and practices the serpent (Gk, ὄφις; Heb, nāḥāš) occupied a prominent place. The use of the serpent must be seen against the background of their polemical attitude, characteristic of various gnostic systems, toward the God of the OT: indeed, the corrupter of Adam and Eve, presented in the account of Gen 3 as a symbol of evil and origin of sin, was venerated by the Ophites as a spreader of gnōsis, i.e., that knowledge of good and evil that the demiurge-God of the OT had forbidden to human beings. His power was further manifested by *Moses in the episode of the bronze serpent (Num 21) and recognized by Jesus himself (Jn 3:14) (see Iren., Adv. haer. I, 30,7; ps.-Tertull., Adv. omn. haer. 2). Besides this polemical value, they concurred in explaining the prominence of the serpent in gnostic speculation, the great importance of and fundamental function of this animal in so many aspects of pagan religiosity as a symbol of the generative force of nature, of divination and prophecy, and as linked to the cult of the dead and to astrology (ref. in Leisegang).

Within gnostic speculation, the symbolism of the serpent assumed values and functions that varied considerably acc. to context. Most likely, the facts relating to the Ophites or to the Naassenes, documented by the *heresiologists, should be understood not as referring to a single or specific gnostic group, but to various schools which, though beginning from some common doctrinal elements, then developed diversified theological systems.

*Irenaeus, who identified the Ophites with the *Sethians, attributes to them a cosmogonic and anthropogonic mythical account which in many aspects anticipates, in a more simplified form, the *Valentinian myth (Adv. haer. I, 30). In the so-called Diagram of the Ophites (described in Orig., C. Celsum VI, 24ff.), a design schematically representing the universe as these sectarians imagined it, the serpent becomes a cosmic symbol: it is the monster (the biblical Leviathan) that surrounds the terrestrial world as its lord and master. According to *Epiphanius (Pan. 37), who describes some of their religious practices, the Ophites used a live serpent for the consecration of the *Eucharist. Particularly important is the evidence of ps.-*Hippolytus (Ref. V, 6,3-11,1; X, 9,1-3), who quotes, citing literally as well as paraphrasing and summarizing, a long passage taken from a Naassene work and an anapestic psalm also used among them. The former (also known as the "Preaching of the Naassenes") recounts the myth of humanity's origin, following a scheme that shows some analogies with the doctrine of *Saturnilus. According to the author of this work, the theme of the Primordial Man and his descent to the world, which makes up the nucleus of the gnostic myth, is present, though in confused and obscure forms, in the religious heritage of various peoples, as attested by the rich review of pagan myths (Greek, Phrygian, Assyrian, Egyptian etc.) that accompanies the anthropogonic account. The psalm develops the theme of the *soul which wanders in the labyrinths of the world until Jesus descends to free it by revealing "gnosis" to it. A painting, found in the catacombs of Viale Manzoni, Rome, seems to refer to this Naassene doctrine of the soul. According to ps.-Hippolytus, the Naassene group was closely related to the Perati, the Sethians and the gnostic *Justin.

CPG 1155-1156; W. Völker, Quellen zur Geschichte der christlichen Gnosis, Tübingen 1932, 11-33; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici cristiani, Bari 1970, 25-71; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums urkundlich dargestellt, Leipzig 1884, repr. Hildesheim 1963, 249ff., 277ff.; A. Hönig, Die Ophiten, Berlin 1899; R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig 1904, 83-102; H. Leisegang, Die Gnosis, Leipzig 1924, 111-185; EC 9, 80-81; LTK 7, 1178-1179; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan 1993, 37-130; J.D. Kaestli, L'interprétation du serpent de Genèse 3 dans quelques textes gnostiques et la question de la gnose "ophite," in J. Ries (ed.), Gnosticisme et monde hellénistique. Actes Coll. de Louvain-La-Neuve (11-14 mars 1980), Louvain-La-Neuve 1982, 116-130; J. Frickel, Hellenistische Erlösung in christlicher Deutung. Die gnostische Naassenerschrift, Leiden 1984; M.J. Edwards, The Naming of the Naassenes: Hippolytus, Refutatio V, 6-10 as Hieros Logos: ZPE 112 (1996) 74-80; M.G. Lancellotti, The Naassenes: A Gnostic Identity Among Judaism, Christianity, Classical and Ancient Near Eastern Traditions, Münster 2000.

C. Gianotto

OPTATIANUS (260/270–before 335). Publilius Optatianus Porfyrius, born probably in *Africa (as perhaps attested to by the tradition of his poems, and by the importance given *Carthage in Carm. 16,18 or, even more so, 20); in 306 presumably attained the post of proconsul Achaiae, but was exiled ca. 315 or soon after, following an accusation to the emperor *Constantine (see Carm. 2,31ff.). Despite the impossibility in exile of having his poetry written out in a decorative style adequate to their literary form (see Carm. 1,1-12), he sent to the emperor his collection of 20 figured *panegyric poems on the occasion of Constantine's twentieth anniversary and succeeded in obtaining his recall from exile in 325 (certainly before the murder of Crispus in 326; Jer., Chron. 232 [Helm] erroneously dates the return in 328 = a. Abr. 2345). In 329 and 333 he was praefectus urbi. Since his works contain no echo of Constantine's tricennalia, the author presumably died before 335.

A poetical corpus is preserved, called panegyric in the MSS, which, besides the dedicatory work to Constantine (inauthentic) and a response letter (also spurious; Polara, vol. 1, 31ff.), contains the 20 pieces composed in exile, along with 7 that were in part composed later (certainly prior to the exile were 6, 10, 18). Besides this collection, in the Codex Salmasianus of the Anthologia Latina (81 Riese) are preserved some so-called versus anacyclici (distichs which, without a change in meaning and preserving the same meter, can also be read from back to front), while some fragments are found in the mythographer Fulgentius (Mythol. 2,1).

The poems are in general extremely artful carmina figurata*: three pieces, in continuity with Hellenistic figured poetry, represent via the outline of the work themes presented in various places (20: a hydraulic organ; 26: an altar; 27: panpipes); others are crossword poems tracing geometric designs, objects, letters—a scheme invented by the author. Letters highlighted by color are introduced periodically within some poems that, while contributing to sense of the poem, at the same time create geometrical motifs (e.g., Carm. 6), an object (e.g., Carm. 9: palm of victory) or large letters with symbolic meaning (e.g., Carm. 5: AVG XX CAES X). Since, alongside pagan subjects, the last group contains poems which, by content and by the representation of the Greek letters X and P, are clearly Christian (e.g., Carm. 8), the author can be considered a Christian. His influence was substantial, mainly on early-medieval authors, who received the subgenre of "figured poetry" (Alcuin, Rabanus Maurus).

Editions: G. Polara, Publilii Optatiani Porfyrii Carmina, 2 vols., Turin 1973 (with comm.); Id., Quaderni di Koinonia 2 (1976; tr.).

Studies: E. Kluge, Publilius Optatianus Porfyrius und sein Werk, Diss., Munich 1920; E. Groag, Der Dichter Porfyrius in einer stadtrömischen Inschrift: WS 45 (1926) 102-109; G. Polara, Ricerche sulla tradizione manoscritta di Publilio Optaziano Porfirio, Salerno 1971; Id., Cinquant'anni di studi su Optaziano (1922-1973): Vichiana 3 (1974) 110-124; T.D. Barnes, Publilius Optatianus Porfyrius: AJPh 96 (1975) 173-186; K. Smolak, Art. Publilius Optatianus Porfyrius: Herzog 5, 237-243; U. Ernst, Carmen Figuratum. Geschichte des Figurengedichts von den antiken Ursprüngen bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters, Cologne-Weimar-Vienna 1991, 97-142; A. La Penna, Poche note a Optaziano Porfirio: Maia 48 (1996) 51-55; M.-O. Bruhat, Les "Carmina Figurata" de Publilius Optatianus Porfyrius. La métamorphose d'un genre et l'invention d'une poésie liturgique impériale sous Constantin, Diss., Paris, Univ. 4, 1998.

D. Weber

OPTATUS of Milevis (4th c.). Bishop of Milevis in *Numidia. From *Jerome (Vir. ill. 110) we know that he wrote his six books against *Donatism, Valentiniano et Valente principibus, sometime between 364 and 367 (probably, acc. to some scholars, toward 366–367). The work's original title is not known, either from Jerome or from the MS tradition: those proposed by modern editors and scholars (the best known being Adversus Parmenianum Donatistam, De schismate Donatistarum) have a merely indicative value. Contrary to Jerome's indication and to the plan laid down by Optatus himself (book I, ch. 6), the work as handed down consists of seven books: passages of book VII are interpolated into book III. It is now accepted that, around 385, Optatus had wanted to prepare a 2nd edition (witness the Catholic and Donatist episcopal lists of *Rome cited in II, 3-4, brought up to date in some codices with the names of Pope *Siricius, elected 384, and the Donatist bishops Lucian and Claudian), but was unable to complete it: someone in his circle was charged with completing the new edition, using the material collected by Optatus which appears in book VII, though not without making transpositions and interventions of his own.

The work is a reply to the anti-Catholic treatise written by the Donatist *Parmenian in ca. 362. In the first book Optatus, who addresses Parmenian as "brother," recalls the points treated by the Donatist in his work and explains the order he intends to follow in his own treatment: then he corrects some statements of Parmenian on Christ's flesh, and distinguishes the concept of *heresy from that of *schism, retorting to Donatus the accusation of schism that Parmenian had thrown at the Catholics. The main argument of book I is the history of the origins of the schism up to the Council of Rome held under Pope *Miltiades: here Optatus wants to show that some of the bishops who had accused *Caecilian's consecrator *Felix of Aptunga of traditio should themselves be considered traditores*. The theme of book II is the unicity of the Catholic church, characterized by its universality. In *Africa, only the Catholic church is in communion with the universal church, and only the Catholic church is in possession of the qualities that, acc. to Scripture, are proper to it. In book III Optatus defends the imperial intervention in Africa, reminding the Donatists that they had been the first to appeal to the emperor's authority. The severe measures adopted against them were made necessary by their own violence, and their claim to style themselves martyrs in a persecution unleashed by the Catholic church was empty. In book IV Optatus rejects Parmenian's thesis that, in the sinners of Scripture, we should see the Catholics. It is rather the Donatists, responsible for so many crimes, who are sinners. Book V is dedicated to the theme of the validity of baptism. Against the Donatists who, following ancient African practice, considered the baptism conferred by heretics invalid and therefore rebaptized Catholics who (spontaneously or otherwise) came over to their church, Optatus defends the baptismal doctrine of the church of Rome accepted by the African Catholics at the Council of *Arles in 314, acc. to which the efficacy of the sacrament does not depend on the person of the minister, but on the action of God. Book VI describes Donatist violence, esp. at the time of *Julian the Apostate, but above all Optatus laments the spiritual harm done by the Donatists through their propaganda. Book VII, added to the second edition, attempts to reply to objections the treatise raised among the Donatists. After an invitation to unity in the Catholic church, it examines the interpretation of some biblical passages to which the Donatists appealed in their controversy, and gives a defense of Macarius, the architect of unity in 347.

Optatus's work was also to have provided a collection of documents on the origins of the schism (see I, 22.26). Only one of our MSS, Parisinus 1711, cites some documents (Gesta apud Zenophilum, Purgatio Felicis) which make up part of the original documentation collected by Optatus, as well as eight letters (six by *Constantine) added to the collection at a later date. Optatus's work has great value, both historical and theological. He collected a great number of documents to reconstruct the events of the schism and rebut the Donatists' charges, anticipating what *Augustine would do esp. on the occasion of the Council of *Carthage of 411. Theologically too, anticipating Augustine, Optatus thoroughly explores the ecclesiological and sacramental doctrine in the points contested by the Donatists (unity of the church, efficacy of the sacraments in relation to who administers them). Also characteristic of Optatus is the tendency to mitigate the reasons for disagreement between the parties, presenting his opponents as extremists with whom he can dialogue and whose positions he can disprove, rather than as enemies.

A sermon, In natali sanctorum Innocentium (PLS 1, 288-294: actually a Christmas sermon adapted to the Feast of the Holy *Innocents), features in a MS under the name of Optatus of Milevis and has been attributed to him since A. Wilmart's edition of it; the prevalent opinion now is that formulated earlier by A. Pincherle, who saw it as the work of a Donatist, perhaps of *Optatus of Thamugadi: precise points of contact have been noted between it and the work of *Tyconius (F. Scorza Barcellona, E. Romero Pose). We must certainly reject the attribution to Optatus, upheld by G. Morin, of three ps.-Augustinian sermons on *Epiphany: Serm. 131 and 132 of the Maurists' Appendix (PL 39, 2005-2007 and 2007-2008) and the Sermo sancti Augustini de Epiphania (PLS 1, 297-300). Optatus's name has been proposed, on the basis of stylistic arguments that are ultimately unconvincing, for two *Easter sermons (PLS 1, 295-296; PLS 4, 665-667).

CPL 244: PL 11, 883-1104 (this is Ellies du Pin's edition, Anversa 1702); CSEL 26 (ed. C. Ziwsa) 1893; It. tr.: Ottato di Milevi, La

vera Chiesa, ed. L. Dattrino, Rome 1988 (rec. RSLR 28 [1992] 646-655); SC 412-413 (ed. M. Labrousse, 1995-1996); CPL 245-249 and 940 (spurious sermons of dubious attribution); DTC 11, 1077-1084; EC 9, 449-451; BS 9, 1307-1311; PWK 18, 1, 765-772; TRE 25, 300-302; E. Michaud, La théologie d'Optat de Milève d'après le "De schismate Donatistarum": Revue Intern. de Théol. 16 (1908) 208ff.: O.R. Vassall-Phillips, The Work of St. Optatus Against the Donatists, London 1917; P. Batiffol, Le catholicisme de saint Augustin, I, Paris 1920, 77-108; A. Wilmart, Un sermon de saint Optat pour la fête de Noël: RSR 2 (1922) 271-302; G. Morin, Deux sermons africains du V^e-VI^e siècle avec un texte inédit du symbole: RBen 35 (1923) 233-236; A. Pincherle, Un sermone donatista attribuito a S. Ottato di Milevi: Bilychnis 22 (1923) 134-148; Id., L'ecclesiologia nella controversia donatista: Ricerche Rel 1 (1925) 5-55; Id., Noterelle ottazianee: ibid. (1927) 440-445 (= Cristianesimo antico e moderno, Rome 1956, 70-76); U. Moricca, Storia della letteratura latina cristiana, 2, Turin 1928, 698-722; A. Wilmart, Un prétendu sermon pascal de S. Augustin: RBen 1 (1929) 197-203; A. Pincherle, Due postille sul donatismo: Ricerche Rel 18 (1947) 160-164 (cf. Cristianesimo antico e moderno, 76-79); S. Blomgren, Eine Echtheitsfrage bei Optatus von Mileve, Stockholm 1959; Id., Spicilegium Optatianum: Eranos 58 (1960) 132-141; H.D. Altendorf, rev. of S. Blomgren, Eine Echtheitsfrage . . . : ThLZ 85 (1960) 598-600; A.C. de Veer, À propos de l'authenticité du livre VII^e d'Optat de Milève: REAug 7 (1961) 389-391; H. Silvestre, Trois sermons à retirer définitivement de l'héritage d'Optat de Milève: Proceed. of the African Cl. Assoc. 7 (1964) 61-62; V. Saxer, Un sermon médiéval sur la Madeleine. Reprise d'une homélie antique pour Pâques attribuable à Optat de Milève (392): RBen 80 (1970) 17-50; R.B. Eno, The Work of Optatus as a Turning Point in the African Ecclesiology: Thomist 37 (1973) 668-685; F. Scorza Barcellona, L'interpretazione dei doni dei Magi nel sermone natalizio di (Ps.) Ottato di Milevi: SSR 2 (1978) 129-149; E. Romero Pose, Ticonio y el sermón In natali sanctorum Innocentium (Exégesis de Mt 2): Gregorianum 60 (1979) 513-544; Patrologia III, 112-116; PCBE 1, 795-801; DSp 11, 824-829; G.A. Cecconi, Elemosine e propaganda. Un'analisi della "Macariana persecutio" nel III libro di Ottato di Milevi: RecAug 36 (1990) 42-66; L. Dattrino, Il battesimo e l'iniziazione cristiana in Ottato di Milevi: RivAC 66 (1990) 81-100; B. Kriegbaum, Zwischen den Synoden von Rom und Arles: die donatistische Supplik bei Optatus: Archivum Historiae Pont. 28 (1990) 219-244; C. Mazzucco, Ottato di Milevi in un secolo di studi. Problemi e retrospettive, Bologna 1993; R.B. Eno, The Significance of the List of Roman Bishops in the Anti-Donatistic Polemic: VChr 47 (1993) 158-169; B. Kriegbaum, Ein neuer Lösungsvorschlag für ein altes Problem: die sogenannten preces der Donatisten (Opt. 1,22): SP 22 (1989) 277-282; J.E. Merdringer, Optatus Reconsidered, ibid. 294-299; R.B. Eno, "Radix catholica": REAug 43 (1997) 1-13; J.R. Alexander, Count Taurinus and the Persecutors of Donatism: Zeitschrift für antikes Christentum 2 (1998) 247-267; M.J. Edwards, Optatus. Against the Donatists, TTH 27, Liverpool 1997.

F. Scorza Barcellona

OPTATUS of Thamugadi. *Donatist bishop of Thamugadi (*Timgad), 388-398. A tyrannical personality who exercised enormous power in *Numidia during his ten-year episcopate (Aug., C. Ep. Parmen. II, 2,4: Optatum Gildonianum decennalem totius Africae gemitum). Revered by the Donatist population, who celebrated the anniversary of his consecration with enthusiastic displays (Aug., C. litt. Petil. II, 23,53), Optatus was accused by the Catholics of having abused his authority against minors and others, whose property had been entrusted to him, and against landed proprietors who got in his way (ibid. II, 35,82); he also sought to suppress by force the schism of the *Maximianists within the ranks of Donatism (Aug., C. Cresc. IV, 25,32; see also III, 54,65). In *Augustine's mind, Optatus was associated with the plundering, increasingly widespread (C. litt. Petil. I, 24,26; Ep. 43,8,24) and organized, of the *circumcellions (C. Ep. Parmen. I, 11,17: [Circumcelliones] qui primo tantummodo fustibus, nunc etiam ferro se armare coeperunt). In 397/398, Optatus threw in his lot with Count *Gildo in the last rebellion against the authority of the emperor *Honorius (Aug., C. Cresc. III, 12,15: inter Gildonis satellites praecipuus haberetur teneretur moreretur [Optatus]), and with him was defeated, captured and executed (Aug., C. litt. Petil. II, 92,209). Though perhaps not himself a revolutionary (see E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken, 74-78), his violent actions and despotic ways (Aug., C. Cresc. IV, 25,32) gave an opening to the revolutionary social elements in the Donatist church. His power is symbolized by the large cathedral and dependent buildings built to glorify his name on a hill overlooking Timgad (see E. Albertini, CRAI [1939] 100-102; Ch. Courtois, Timgad, l'antique Thamugadi, Alger 1951, 72ff.).

In the mid-20th c. the hypothesis was advanced (Pincherle), and has not yet been disproven (Scorza Barcellona), that Optatus was the author of a Christmas sermon (In natali sanctorum innocentium, PLS I, 288-294) which the MS tradition attributes to *Optatus of Milevis.

Sources: Augustine, cited texts (ed. Petschenig, CSEL 51-52). Studies: A. Pincherle, Due postille sul donatismo: Ricerche Religiose 18 (1947) 161-164, now in Id., Cristianesimo antico e moderno, Rome 1956, 76-79; H.J. Diesner, Die Periodisierung des Circumcellionentums: Wiss. Zeitsch. Univ. Halle 10 (1962) 1329-1338; E. Tengström, Donatisten und Katholiken, Göteborg 1964, 74-78 and 84-90; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, ch. 15; F. Scorza Barcellona, La celebrazione dei santi Innocenti nell'omiletica latina dei secoli IV-VI: StudMed 15 (1974) 705-767 (707-712 on the sermon attributed to Optatus of Milevis); PCBE I, 797-801; P. Langa, Optato Gildoniano, in Notas complementarias, BAC 32, Madrid 1988, 898-899.

W.H.C. Frend - P. Marone

OPUS IMPERFECTUM IN MATTHAEUM. Name given to a lengthy anonymous Latin commentary on *Matthew's gospel, which ends at ch. 25 and shows lacunae here and there. Though handed down under the name of *John Chrysostom, its author was an unknown early 5th-c. *Arian. The earlier hypothesis of a Latin translation of a lost Greek original has been disproved by the Latin sources. The *exegesis is mainly *allegorizing, with technical procedures that closely recall *Origen, touching on themes of a strongly existential character: humanity seen in the struggle between good and evil, between the devil, who has enslaved the flesh, and God, who succors the soul, which is free in its decisions, but insufficient to achieve salvation without divine help. The author's Arian faith is evident in various polemical and doctrinal passages and esp. in the recurrent theme of persecution: he is head of a small Arian community which sees its membership diminishing daily, due to the pressure of the dominant Catholics; so he insists on the theme of temptation, the sifting that awaits the best. In the *eschatological perspective of the last judgment, which will see the defeat of the persecutors, the army of the Antichrist is represented by the Catholic church, and the beginning of the end time is made to commence with *Constantine and *Theodosius, emperors who persecuted the Arians. So *Pelagian ideas in the author, recently suggested by one scholar, must be ruled out.

CPL 707; PG 56, 611-946; J. van Banning: CCL 87B, Turnhout 1988; Patrologia III, 95-97 (bibl.); M. Simonetti, Note sull'Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum: Studi Medievali 10 (1969) 1-84; P. Nautin, L'Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum et les Ariens de Constantinople: RHE 67 (1972) 381-408; 745-766; R. Étaix, Fragments inédits de l'Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum: RBen 84 (1974) 271-300; J. van Banning, The Critical Edition of the Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum: An Arian Source, SP 17, Oxford 1982, 382-387; F.W. Schlatter, The Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum and the Fragmenta in Lucam: VChr 39 (1985) 384-392; Id., The Pelagianism of the Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum: VChr 41 (1987) 267-284; Id., The Author of the Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum: VChr 42 (1988) 364-375 (cf. K. Cooper: SP 27 [1993] 249-255); J. van Banning, Il Padre Nostro nell'Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum: Gregorianum 71 (1990) 293-313; F. Mali, Das Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum und sein Verhältnis zu den Matthäuskommentaren von Origenes und Hieronymus, Innsbruck 1991; T. Sindona, Aspetti sociali nell'Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum: Koinonia 20 (1996) 77-105; J.H.A. van Banning, Gregory the Great and the Surviving Arianism of His Time: Did He Know the Opus Imperfectum in Matthaeum?: SP 38 (2001) 481-495; J.A. Kellerman - T.C. Oden, Incomplete Commentary on Matthew, 2 vols., ACT, Downers Grove, IL 2010.

M. Simonetti

ORACLES

I. In general - II. Chaldean Oracles - III. Sibylline Oracles.

I. In general. One form of divination consisted of a reply, expressed in various ways and means, by a deity, or at least by a suprahuman interlocutor, to a query put by the believer on personal or communal questions. In some cases the oracle could be a spontaneous manifestation of the deity through a human mediator or prophet, who expresses a divine pronouncement without having been interrogated, as in the case of the Greco-Roman (later Jewish-Christian) Sibyl. In this form the oracular phenomenon was more or less tangential to the prophetic function. In Greece, Dodona and Delphi were seats of famous oracles, dedicated respectively to Zeus and to Apollo. At Dodona, divination took place by observing the movement of the leaves of the sacred oak and the waters of a nearby spring, as well as through certain prophets, the Homeric Selloi, or the "Dove" prophetesses (peleia) mentioned by Herodotus. Archaeology has also brought to light numerous small tablets containing written requests to the oracle. At Delphi the Pythia, inspired by the god, uttered enigmatic replies which the priests then interpreted. Christian polemic against *astrology and its practices also applied to the oracular art, whose veracity was sometimes not wholly denied, but was attributed to the activity of demons. Thus, e.g., *Tertullian claims that these, knowing some truths and borrowing others from biblical prophecies, deceive people through oracles so as to subject them to their power (Apol. 22). *Tatian too recognizes in oracles a certain curative capacity inspired by evil spirits (Orat. 18). Meanwhile the pagans objected to the use of oracular writings by the Christians themselves to confirm their own doctrines. *Lactantius, in support of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, appeals—besides to the Bible—to the "prophecies of the Sibyl" and the replies of Milesian Apollo. One document attesting to Jewish and then Christian use of the pagan oracular genre is the Sibylline Oracles (see below). *Augustine's treatise De divinatione daemonum, while repeating the polemical arguments against oracular practices worked out in earlier patristic tradition, confirms the persistence and strength of such practices, which penetrated widely even into the Christian population, despite imperial decrees against haruspices and diviners.

A. Bouché-Leclercq, Histoire de la divination dans l'antiquité, I-IV, Paris 1878-1881; DACL 2, 1198-1212; P. Amandry, La mantique apollinienne à Delphes, Paris 1950; H.W. Parke, The Oracles of Zeus, Oxford 1957; D.E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World, Grand Rapids, MI 1983, [2]1991; H.W. Parke, The Oracles of Apollo in Asia Minor, London 1987; J.G. Heintz (ed.), Oracles et prophèties dans l'antiquité, Paris 1997; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Profeti Oracoli Sibille. Rivelazione e salvezza nel mondo antico, Rome 2002; A. Busine, Paroles d'Apollon: pratiques et traditions oraculaires dans l'Antiquité tardive (II^e-VI^e siècle), Leiden 2005.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

II. Chaldean Oracles. Attributed to an author named Julian, perhaps Julian the Theurge (2nd c. AD), and highly esteemed in *Neoplatonist circles, this collection of brief theosophical and cosmosophical hexametrical compositions survives only partly and indirectly through the citations of pagan and Christian authors. The first Christian to mention it is *Arnobius; later, *Marius Victorinus and *Augustine. Among pagans, besides *Porphyry, *Iamblichus was particularly inspired by the theology of the Chaldean Oracles, to which he dedicated a (lost) commentary in 28 books. Some extracts of a similar exegetical work by *Proclus are preserved by Michael Psellos (11th c.), who wrote a Commentary on the Chaldean Oracles. The doctrine expressed by the collection, Platonic in inspiration, contemplates the notion of a supreme transcendent God (the Father) from whom derive an Intellect with demiurgic function and a third principle (Hecate), intermediate between the two and identifiable with the anima mundi*. Numerous angels and demons populate the higher world, exercising their action on humans positively or negatively. They play a fundamental role in the practice of *theurgy, which consists of establishing contact with the gods through ritual acts of initiation. The Chaldean Oracles affirm a dualistic *anthropology, with the notion of the *soul fallen from the divine world, imprisoned in the body and subject to cosmic destiny. Salvation is possible through theurgic rites and rigorous abstention, aimed at dominion over the bodily passions.

E. Des Places, Oracles Chaldaïques. Avec un choix de commentaires anciens, Paris 1971; H. Lewy, Chaldean Oracles and Theurgy: Mysticism Magic and Platonism in the Later Roman Empire, Jerusalem 1960, Paris [2]1978 (ed. M. Tardieu); R. Majercik, The Chaldaean Oracles: Text, Translation and Commentary, Studies in Greek and Roman Religion 5, Leiden 1989; A. Tonelli, tr. and ed., Oracoli caldaici, Gk. text with It. tr., Milan [2]2002; S. Lanzi (ed.), Michele Psello. Oracoli caldaici con appendici su Proclo e Michele Italo, Milan 2001.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

III. Sibylline Oracles. 1. The pagan Sibyl. Among the ancients, the Sibyl was a woman who went into ecstasy and prophesied, very often announcing catastrophes. Her words were considered oracles. Her origin should perhaps be sought in Persia, whence she spread esp. to the Greek colonies of *Asia Minor. She was sometimes considered a demoniac, sometimes a deity (Thea Sibylla). Various places of worship were dedicated to her, so that her name ended up becoming a common name, the Sibyls, to whom a collection of oracles was attributed. The Greeks knew the Sibyl of Marpessos; more important was that of Erythrai, who settled at Delphi, where she was considered sometimes the bride, sometimes the daughter of Apollo. *Clement of Alexandria cites the beginnning of a Carmen Sibyllinum by Heraclius the Sophist (Strom. I, 108). Then the Sibyl came to Cumae, where she pronounced oracles in a grotto. Virgil evokes her in Aeneid VI, 98ff. The collection of her oracles, preserved in the Capitol, was burned in the fire at the temple of Jupiter. The most famous oracle of Cumae was the announcement of the savior of the world, immortalized in Virgil's 4th Eclogue, which *Constantine in his Oratio ad sanctos applies entirely to Christ (19-21). There we read the acrostic of Christ ΙΧΘΥΣ ΣΤΑΥΡΟΣ (Or. Sib. VIII, 217-250). *Augustine gives it in *Latin translation (Civ. Dei 18,23).

2. The Sibylline Oracles. The Jews of *Alexandria used the collection of Sibylline Oracles and their authority in the Greek world mostly for their own religious propaganda. To this end they adapted, transformed, interpolated and added new compositions. These oracles usually announced, in the spirit of the prophets, catastrophes and the end of the world, as does the medieval hymn Dies irae. The primitive Jewish nucleus is book III of the Sibylline Oracles, in the first version, written ca. AD 140. Books IV and V drip with hatred toward *Rome at the time of *Vespasian and *Titus, who destroyed the temple. The Christians acted similarly to the Jews, exploiting the Jewish source, interpolating, esp. in books I-III, and rewriting specifically Christian parts, like books VI-VIII, probably in the 2nd c. The Shepherd of *Hermas makes reference to them (Vis. II, 4). They rise in turn against Roman persecution in book VIII, announcing the fall of Rome and of the emperor *Nero. The collection in eight books goes back to the 6th c.; in 1817 A. Mai discovered another four books (11-14); the eighth, because of its length, was divided into three.

3. Structure. Books I-II form a whole, a Jewish redaction (I, 1-223) with Christian interpolations (224-400) and later editing. In book II it is hard to distinguish what is Jewish from what is Christian. Book III announces various catastrophes; it seems to be entirely Jewish with no Christian interpolation.

Books VI-VIII are entirely Christian. Book VI contains only 28 verses, including a hymn to Christ and to the cross. Book VII shows gnostic conceptions from the late 2nd c., such as baptism of fire (VII, 84). Book VIII, of 500 verses, is much more important, since it refers to Christian life and liturgy (VIII, 402-411). Lactantius takes 30 citations from it. The first part could have been written by a Jew. It announces God's chastisement and the fall of Rome. The second part is a triumphal hymn to Christ, as judge and Lord of the world. The third is a hymn to God the Creator and to the Logos, his incarnate son. The book concludes with norms for Christian life. There seems to be no gap between this book VIII and the four books discovered by A. Mai (XI-XIV, a numbering that follows the MS tradition of the family of codices [Ambrosianus E 64 sup., Vaticani 1120 and 743, Monacensis 312], which divides book VIII into three).

4. Survival of the collection. Already known to Hermas, the oracles are cited by *Justin (1 Apol. 20,1; 44,12), *Athenagoras, *Theophilus (Ad Aut. 2,9), ps.-Melito, *Tertullian, frequently by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 6,5 cf. 1,21; 3,3; 6,5,43,453), *Commodian, *Lactantius, Eusebius, the Apostolic Constitutions, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Sozomen and *Augustine. Augustine knew a Latin translation of VIII, 217-243 (see also Kurfess's edition, pp. 222-264). *Celsus knew an interpolated version and reproved Christians for using it to their own advantage (Origen, C. Cel. 7,53). Its influence continued to be felt over the centuries: in the Dies irae, Dante, Calderón, Giotto, Michelangelo, Raphael and in painting. A Prophetia Sibillae magae exists in Latin, published by B. Bischoff (Mél. de Ghellinck, Gembloux 1951, pp. 121-147).

Texts: CPG 1352; Oracula Sibyllina, ed. A. Rzach, Vienna 1891 (the best); ed. Geffcken, GCS 1902; ed. A. Kurfess, Munich 1951 (text with Ger. tr., bibl.; new ed. and tr., ed. by J.-D. Ganger, Düsseldorf); It. tr. Erbetta III, 497-529; P. Sacchi, Apocrifi dell'Antico Testamento, III, Brescia 1999, 385-535 (the Jewish Oracles).

Studies: A. Rzach, PWK 2A, 2073-2183 (bibl. up to 1924; after, see J. Quasten, Patrologia, I, Turin 1967, 151-152); H. Fuchs, Der geistige Widerstand gegen Rom, Berlin 1938; H. Jeanmaire, La Sibylle et le retour de l'âge d'or, Paris 1939; A. Peretti, La Sibilla nella propaganda ellenistica, Florence 1943; B. Altaner, Augustinus und die nt. Apokryphen: AB 67 (1949) 244-247; E. Demougeot, St. Jérôme, les O.S. et Stilicon: REA 54 (1952) 83-92; A. Kurfess, Kaiser Konstantin u. die Erythr. Sibylle: ZRGG 3 (1951) 353-357; Id., Zur V. Buch der O.S.: RhM 29 (1956) 225-241; Id., Juvenal und die Sibylle: HJ 76 (1957) 79-83; Id., Dies irae: ibid. 77 (1958) 328-338; J.B. Bauer, Die Gottesmutter in den Or. Sib.: Marianum 18 (1956) 118-224; M.-L. Thérel, Une image de la Sibylle sur l'Arc thriomphal de Sainte-Marie Majeure à Rome?: Cahiers Archéol. 12 (1962) 153-171; F. Paschoud, Roma aeterna, Rome 1967; V. Nikiprowetzky, La troisième Sibylle, Paris 1970; L. Breglia Pulci Doria, Oracoli sibillini tra rituali e propaganda: (studi su Flegonte di Tralles), Naples 1983; D.E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World, Grand Rapids, MI 1983, [2]1991; It. tr. Brescia 1996); Oracles Sibyllins, III, text with tr., ed. and annotated by V. Nikiprowetzky, in La Bible, III: Écrits intertestamentaires, ed. A. Dupont-Sommer - M. Philonenko, Paris 1987, 1035-1140; G. Panayiotou, Addenda to the LSJ Greek-English Lexicon. Lexicographical Notes on the Vocabulary of the Oracula Sibyllina: Hellenica 38 (1987) 46-66, 296-317; V. Nikiprowetzky, La Sibylle juive et le "Troisième Livre" des "Pseudo-Oracles Sibyllins" depuis Charles Alexandre: ANRW 20/1 (1987) 460-542; A. Momigliano, Dalla Sibilla pagana alla Sibilla Cristiana: ASNP 17 (1987) 407-428; H.W. Parke - B. McGing, Sibyls and Sibylline Prophecy in Classical Antiquity, London-New York 1988; D.S. Potter, Prophecy and History in the Crisis of the Roman Empire: A Historical Commentary on the Thirteenth Sibylline Oracle, Oxford-New York 1990; S.A. Redmond, The Date of Fourth Sibylline Oracle: Second Century 7 (1990) 129-149; B. Tessèdre, Les représentations de la fin des temps dans le chant V des Oracles sibyllines: Apocrypha 1 (1990) 147-165; J.-M. Nieto Ibáñez, El hexámetro de los oráculos sibilinos, Amsterdam 1992; H.W. Parke, Sibille, Genoa 1992; G.J.M. Bartelink, Die Oracula Sibyllina in den frühchristlichen griechischen Schriften von Justin bis Origenes: 150-250 nach Chr., in Early Christian Poetry: A Collection of Essays, ed. J. Den Boeft - A. Hilhorst, Leiden 1993, 23-33; Sibille e linguaggi oracolari: mito storia tradizione, eds. I. Chirassi Colombo - T. Seppilli, Pisa 1998; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Oracoli Profeti Sibille. Rivelazione e salvezza nel mondo antico, Rome 2002; LCL 639-640; R. Buitenwerf, Book III of the Sibylline Oracles and Its Social Setting: With an Introduction, Translation and Commentary, Leiden 2003; J.-M. Roessli, Augustin, les sibylles et les Oracles sibyllins, in Augustinus afer, ed. P.-Y. Fux et al., Fribourg 2003, 263-286; Id., Catalogues de sibylles, recueil(s) de Libri Sibyllini et corpus des Oracula Sibyllina. Remarques sur la formation de quelques collections oraculaires dans les mondes gréco-romain, juif et chrétien, in Recueils normatifs et canons dans l'antiquité, ed. E. Norelli, Lausanne 2004, 47-68.

A. Hamman

ORANGE, Council of. Met 8 Nov 441 at Orange (Lat. Arausio) in *Gaul; *Hilary of Arles presided, *Eucherius of Lyons took part. It issued 30 disciplinary canons, which show clearly the pastoral problems of the time and the customs of the *Gallican liturgy. For the council of 529, see *Merovingian Councils).

CCL 148, 77-93; Hefl-Lecl II, 430-454; Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, Paris [2]1966, II, 121-122; III, passim; Palazzini 3, 237.

Ch. Munier

ORANS (iconography). This term is used to indicate a male or female figure, usually in front view, in the gesture of expansis manibus. This attitude can be explained if we consider it proper to someone praying or calling for help; still it expressed a dialogue, following a custom repeatedly mentioned in the OT: "All day long I call upon thee, O Lord; I stretch out my hands to thee" (Ps 88:10; see also Ex 17:11; Ps 118:48 [LXX]; Lam 3:41). In the past this symbol was considered exclusively Christian, though with various interpretations (the soul, Mary, the ecclesia), but the studies of W. Neuss and Th. Klauser have stressed the existence of similar representations outside the Christian figurative context. Besides monumental evidence (the famous statue of Livia [1st c. AD] which substantially repeats the type of the Artemisia of Halicarnassus [4th c. BC], the stuccos of the Pythagorean basilica of Porta Maggiore, *Rome, to cite only the best known), literary sources document the familiarity of this gesture in the Hellenistic and Roman artistic cultures (Pliny, Nat. Hist. XXXIV, 73; 78; 90).

In a quite numerous series of coins, going from *Trajan to *Maximian Herculius, a female figure recurs in the indisputable gesture of the orans, indicated by the legends as Pietas, Pietas publica, Pietas augusta, Pietas Augusti or Augustae, Augustorum etc., i.e., a personification of Pietas erga homines and adversus deos. The pietas of the deceased erga deos appears in some 3rd-c. *sarcophagi next to the figure of the shepherd carrying a lamb, symbol of φιλανθρωπία, and generalized figures of philosophers (Ws 1,3; 2,3; 19,1). Certainly belonging to the same iconographical tradition are some clearly Christian-inspired monuments, in which the figure of the orans is combined, for its christological significance, with that of the Good *Shepherd. These two symbolic images are repeated on the oldest Christian sarcophagi (Ws 1,2; 3,1; 19,3-6; 178,2) and on the vaults of cubicles in the catacombs (Wp 25; 61), figuratively expressing the two poles of the work of salvation: the Savior and the saved. The introduction of biblical scenes and the evident allusion to the means of salvation help to clarify the precise sense of these symbolic figures, taken from the pre-Christian repertoire (Ws 127,1; 127,2). The iconographical type of Pietas or Εὐσέβεια was taken up by the Christians with no formal change. The isolated orantes are depicted among the trees which represent paradise (Wp 110; Ws 19,6), or with the capsa of the volumina, an allusion to doctrine as means of salvation, or between two apostles who introduce the deceased into paradise (Ws 111,4; 215,7), acc. to the indispensable formulas for expressing the state of being "saved."

When the artist endows the image with individual elements (name, facial characteristics, age etc.), he fixes in the portrait of the deceased the general characteristics of the type: e.g., in the cemetery of *Domitilla the deceased Veneranda, in the act of praying, is introduced by St. *Petronilla into *Paradise (Wp 213). Further evidence of the desire to represent the deceased in heavenly peace is provided by numerous funerary slabs, on which the text of the epigraph is accompanied by the image of the dead orans (e.g., ICUR 5, 14385; 15137). Finally, some well-known biblical characters are shown as orantes: *Noah, *Jonah, *Daniel, *Susanna, the three young men in the *fiery furnace. The presence of the dove alongside Noah (Ws 9,3) or of the angel alongside Daniel (Ws 96; 218,1-2) and the three young men (Wp 137,1; 23,1; Ws 161,1; 201,4) indicates the divine intervention that has taken place. *Mary, martyrs and saints also appear expansis manibus, again testifying to the state of eternal beatitude; e.g., St. *Agnes on a 5th-c. pluteus slab (U. Broccoli, Corpus VII, 5, pl. 106) and on gold-glass (C.R. Morey, Gold Glass, pl. XIV, 83-85), St. Cecilia in her crypt in the catacombs of St. Callistus (Wp 260,2), St. *Januarius (U.M. Fasola, La cat. di s. Gennaro, pl. VII), St. *Apollinaris in his basilica at *Ravenna (F.W. Deichmann, Mosaiken von Ravenna, pl. 38). This gesture, variously interpreted but certainly familiar to the first Christians in its most simple and spontaneous meaning, in harmony with the words of St. *Paul (1 Tim 2:8) and of the Fathers (Clem. Rom., I Ad Cor. 39,1; Tertull., De orat. 14,29: PL 1, 1272, 1286-1288; Orig., De orat. 21: PG 11, 479-482), has been exhaustively clarified in De Bruyne's proposed hermeneutic: the biblical characters do not invoke salvation, they are already saved. Thus the dead orans is a symbol of joy because she or he is in divine peace; the isolated images are nothing but a stereotyping of this symbol. Primitive Christian iconography knew no doubt or pessimism, but was permeated by the constant certainty of Christ's saving intervention.

DACL 12, 2298ff.; EC 9, 179-181; EAA 5, 704-708; LCI 3, 352-354; W. Neuss, Die Oranten in der altchristlichen Kunst: Festschrift P. Clemen, Bonn 1926, 130ff.; H. von Schoenebeck, Die Christliche Sarkophagplastik unter Konstantin: MDAI (R) 51 (1936) 275-320; A. Grabar, Martyrium, II, Paris 1946, 24, 292-295; A. Stuiber, Refrigerium interim. Die Vorstellungen vom Zwischenzustand und die frühchristliche Grabeskunst, Bonn 1957; Th. Klauser, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der christlichen Kunst: JbAC 2 (1959) 115-131; 3 (1960) 112-133; L. de Bruyne, Les Lois de l'art paléochrétien comme instrument herméneutique: RivAC 39 (1963) 12ff.; E. Sauser, Frühchristliche Kunst, Innsbruck-Vienna-Munich 1966, 368-377; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri in Roma, Bologna 1966, 266ff. (bibl.); F. Bisconti, Contributo all'interpretazione dell'atteggiamento di orante: VetChr 17 (1980) 17-27 (bibl.); V. Saxer, "Il étendit les mains à l'heure de sa Passion": le thème de l'orant dans la littérature chrétienne des II^e et III^e siècles: Augustinianum 20 (1980) 335-365. For the examples cited in the text, see F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden Baden 1958; C.R. Morey, The Gold Glass in the Vatican Library with Additional Catalogue of Other Gold Glass Collections, Vatican City 1959; C. Carletti, I tre giovani Ebrei di Babilonia nell'arte cristiana antica, Brescia 1975; U.M. Fasola, La catacomba di s. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; U. Broccoli, La diocesi di Roma: Corpus della scultura altomedievale, VII, 5, Il Suburbio, 1, Spoleto 1981; TIP 235-236; A. Donati - G. Gentili, Deomene. L'immagine dell'orante fra Oriente e Occidente, Milan 2001.

A.M. Giuntella

ORATIO CYPRIANI. Two prayers exist with this title, wrongly attributed to *Cyprian of Carthage and to the legendary *Cyprian of Antioch. They are two prayers, preserved in *Latin, to be freed from *sin, from the devil and from sickness, i.e., for health of body and *soul. The Greek original was published by Th. Schermann (Die griech. Kyprianosgebete: OC 3 [1903] 303-323). The first bears the title Oratio I Cypriani antiocheni pro martyribus, and begins with the angelic trisagion Hagios: the whole is at once a profession of faith and an invocation. Biblical names appear in it (Tobias, Daniel etc.). It has recently been recognized as a source of inspiration for symbolic figures painted in the catacombs (H. Leclercq, DACL 12, 2230). The Oratio II Cypriani quam dixit sub die passionis suae is full of examples of answered prayer. It gives an impression of being a series of exorcisms invoking God against the infernal powers.

CPL 67 (p. 14); PL 4, 985-999; 101, 567-569; CSEL III, 3, 144-151; DACL 12, 2324-2345; A. Wilmart: RBen 48 (1936) 281, note 1; A. Di Berardino, Patrologia III, 298; K. Michel, Gebet und Bild in früchristlicher Zeit, I, Leipzig 1902, 53-63; G. Philippart, Orationes Cypriani: AB 91 (1973) 298. For the value of this type of prayer in hagiographical literature, see B. de Gaiffier, Études critiques d'hagiographie et d'iconologie, Subsidia Hagiographica 43, Brussels 1967, 58-60; R. Gryson - D. Szmatula, Les commentaires patristiques sur Isaïe, d'Origène à Jérôme: REAug 36 (1990) 3-41 (orationes pp. 22-24).

L. Dattrino

ORDER – ORDINATION. Basing themselves on the apostolic writings, the ecclesiastical writers consider Christ's priesthood to be the one priesthood, in which ordained *ministers and the faithful participate. Many authors speak in this way, including *Origen (Hom. in Lev. IX, 1: GCS VI, 417-419), *Clement of Alexandria (Adumbratio in I Pt.: PG 9, 730), *Ambrose of Milan (Expos. in Lc. V, 33; VIII, 52: PL 15, 1645, 1781), *Augustine of Hippo (Civ. Dei XX, 10: PL 41, 676; CCL 48, 717-718) and *Leo the Great (Serm. IV, 1: CCL 138, 14). At the same time they make a clear distinction between ordained ministers and the faithful, starting with *Justin who distinguishes ἀδελφοί from προεστός and διάκονοι (1 Apol. 65: PG 6, 428). *Tertullian makes the same distinction (Bapt. 27: CCL 1, 291-292; De praescr. 32,41: CCL 1, 212-213, 221-222; De virginibus velandis, 9: CSEL 2, 1218-1219). *Hippolytus of Rome, in his ritual for ordination, states it with the utmost clarity (Trad. Apost., ed. B. Botte 1963, pp. 7-20), and ps.-*Dionysius repeats it in his De eccles. Hier. (V, 1-6: PG 3, 500-505; SC 58, 10-103).

The same distinction appears very early within the hierarchy itself; e.g., in *Hermas (Vis. III, 5,1: SC 53, 110-112) and still more in *Ignatius of Antioch (Magn. 3,7; Funk 2, 116; Trall. 2,3; Funk 2, 96; Philad. 3,7; Funk 2, 170, 174, 184), who also specifies that the faithful are subject to the bishop, the priest and the deacon (Eph. 2,4,20; Funk 2, 236, 240, 256; Magn. 2,3, 6,13; Funk 2, 114, 130; Trall. 2,13; Funk 2, 94, 112, etc.). This distinction became more and more firmly established.

On the other hand, we know that in the West one controversy tended to see the bishop as simply a priest to whom a power had been added. Thus *Ambrosiaster (In ep. ad Tim. primam 13,8-10: CSEL 81, 267; In ep. ad Eph. 14,11-12: CSEL 81, 98-101). *Jerome in particular defends this thesis (Ep. ad Evangelum 116: CSEL 56, 308-312; Com. in ep. ad Titum 1,5). *Tertullian, in various places, takes up the mentioned distinctions (Bapt. 17: CCL 1, 291-292; De praescr. 32: CCL 1, 1218-1219), and *Cyprian too mentions them in his letters (Ep. 5,1: CSEL 3, 478; Ep. 17: CSEL 3, 521; Ep. 18: CSEL 3, 523; Ep. 23: CSEL 3, 568). Though from the beginning the Fathers distinguish an ordained hierarchy from the faithful, they are not so clear when they distinguish between ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος. *Clement of Rome, e.g., calls those who hold power at Corinth πρεσβύτεροι (1 Cor 47,6; 44,2; 47,1: Funk 1, 160, 170-171). *Theodore of Mopsuestia seeks to explain the progressive distinction between ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος, esp. in his Commentary on I Tim. In small communities the πρεσβύτερος did a bit of everything and for this reason was called ἐπίσκοπος. Later, only those would be called bishops who had the power of *laying-on of hands (χειροτονεῖν), and they were indicated by this name. They were responsible for a province and bore the name of *apostle.

After the death of the apostles, their successors bore the name of ἐπίσκοποι (Theod. Mops., In Tim. III, 8: ed. Swete 2, 117-126). It is interesting to note that it was apparently *Irenaeus of Lyons who, for the first time in the West, called a local bishop ἐπίσκοπος (Adv. haer. 3,3,1: SC 211, 31). Hippolytus shows us above all the "great priest," the bishop: this name clearly indicates that he constitutes the first order, and the priest shares a part of these powers. The place Hippolytus assigns to the deacon—who was ordained to serve the bishop not just in performing the liturgy but for every concrete need of the life of the ecclesial community—offers us a theology of the diaconate whose richness would later, and quite quickly, be lost from sight; already by the 5th c. the deacon had only, and almost exclusively, a liturgical function. We have proof of this decline in the formularies for ordination contained in the *Verona sacramentary (Sacr. Veronense, ed. L.C. Mohlberg, pp. 120-121, nn. 948-951). If Hippolytus leaves the priest little to do, it is because it is the bishop who usually celebrates the *Eucharist and the other sacraments. The priest celebrates as a delegate of the bishop, as is openly shown by the rite of fermentum in Ordo romanus I (M. Andrieu, Les ordines romani du haut moyen âge, II, Louvain [2]1960, 61-64). *Innocent I's well-known letter to *Decentius of Gubbio speaks very clearly and distinctly of the rite of fermentum (Ad Decentium Eugubinum 5: PL 56, 516-517; ed. R. Cabié, La lettre d'Innocent I à Decentius de Gubbio, Louvain 1973; Ordo Romanus II, ed. M. Andrieu, 6). Cyprian describes the custom in *Africa, where the priest celebrates in the bishop's absence (Ep. 13,2: CSEL 3/2, 510-511). The offering of the Eucharist is proper to the bishop or the priest, and is never entrusted to the deacon. *Athanasius refines this idea, mentioning a layman in a small village where there was no priest, who had been permitted to celebrate the Eucharist (Apol. c. arian.: PG 25, 269).

A certain theological exploration of the matter unfortunately issued in a form of legalism, to the extent that the Council of Serdica (343) required anyone being consecrated bishop to be first, for a certain length of time, lector, deacon or presbyter (Mansi 3, 4). Luckily, as we know, these legal prescriptions were not really observed until later: St. Ambrose's consecration as bishop is a case in point. As for rites of ordination, from the Apostolic Tradition through the Roman sacramentaries to the 10th-c. Romano-German Pontifical, we find only laying-on of hands and a consecratory prayer (Pontificale romano-germanico del X secolo, ed. 1972, C. Vogel - R. Elze, ST 269, Vatican City, I, 1972, 20-36; 205-226). Laying-on of hands was considered the essential rite of ordination, and it was frequently indicated as conferring the grace of the *Holy Spirit and the power received from the bishop to communicate it to others (Basil., Ep. 188, 1: PG 32, 668). In the Antiochene-Constantinopolitan area, perhaps before the mid-4th c., episcopal consecration called for the laying of the open book of the gospels on the head of the ordinand. This rite, which accompanied the laying-on of hands and sometimes replaced it, is attested to ca. 380 by the Const. apost. VIII, 4,6 (Metzger III, 142), and in the early 5th c. by *Severian of Gabala (Hom. de legislatore: PG 56, 404, 10-13) and by *Palladius (Dialogus de vita Chrysostomi 16: Malingrey - Leclercq 1988, 302). Jerome, in expressing his thought on the episcopate, makes the ordination of a bishop consist only in the choice of a simple priest who is made to sit on a higher seat (Ep. 146 ad Evangelum: PL 22, 1194; CSEL 56, 316). The Latin fathers, therefore, give no indication of other rites than that of laying-on of hands; the other rites appear only in the 10th c. with the Romano-German Pontifical.

Though St. Augustine says much about the grades of the hierarchy, on the rites he repeats what his predecessors had written; more than once, however, esp. in his letters, he insists on the need for irreproachable moral conduct in those who have received orders (Ep. 21: PL 33, 38; CSEL 88, 112; Ep. 22: PL 33, 90; CSEL 88, 113-119). But he does not deny the validity of orders conferred by an unworthy, heretical or schismatic minister. His anti-*Donatist works try to explain the respective roles of the minister, the sacrament as such and the faith of the subject. What is said of baptism is applicable to the other sacraments, which must be considered valid even if conferred outside the church (Bapt. III, 17,22: PL 43, 149; CSEL 51, 213-214; ibid. III, 17,23: PL 43, 150; CSEL 51, 214-215). An expression in Bapt. sums up Augustine's theological opinion on the validity of the sacrament: non cogitandum quis det, sed quid det (Bapt. IV, 10,16: PL 43, 164; CSEL 51, 240). St. *Leo, and with him many other ecclesiastical writers, followed this Augustinian doctrine on ordinations conferred outside the church (Leo the Great, Ep. 12,6: PL 54, 653). Augustine's De catechizandis rudibus and De doctrina christiana give the same doctrine.

We should not overlook the influence exercised by *Gregory the Great. His Liber regulae pastoralis, which had considerable success and was even translated into Greek, took up the Augustinian doctrine on ordination conferred on a subject whose moral conduct before ordination left something to be desired, invoking the theology of baptism: Sicut baptizatus semel baptizari iterum non debet, ita qui consecratus est semel in eodem ordine iterum non valet consecrari (Ep. 46: PL 77, 585). For the doctrine pertaining to the validity of the sacrament of orders conferred by a heretic, we cannot here go into the controversies of the 8th c. and later, but in general the Augustinian doctrine was adhered to. On the other hand, the Roman council of 769 invalidated all ordinations made by the usurping Pope Constantine (Mansi 12, 701). The same case was repeated with Hincmar of Reims, resolved through the intervention of Nicholas I, for the ordinations conferred by Ebo, bishop of the same city. The decisions of the Council of Soissons (853) on this matter followed the Augustinian line, as did the theological position adopted to resolve the problem of the ordinations conferred by Pope Formosus. On this occasion Auxilius, in ca. 911, provided a patristic document: De ordinationibus papae Formosi, and a dialogue titled Infensor et defensor: small works summing up the Augustinian doctrine for unworthy bishops or a usurping pope (De ordinationibus 19.20.25.26: PL 129, 1060-1074; Infensor et defensor 5-6: PL 129, 1082). These problems returned to the fore in various minor episodes and were usually resolved by following the Augustinian doctrine on baptism and ordination.

A. Michel, Ordre: DTC 11, 1275-1286; var. aus., Études sur le sacrement de l'Ordre, Paris 1957; J. Lécuyer, Épiscopat et presbytérat dans les écrits d'Hippolyte de Rome: RecSR 41 (1953) 30-50; Id., Le sacerdoce dans le mystère du Christ, Paris 1967 (ch. 13, Les successeurs des Apôtres et le sacrement de l'Ordre, 339-392. Évêque et prêtre, 393-410); J. Colson, Ministre de Jésus Christ ou Sacerdoce de l'évangile, Paris 1966 (awareness in the subapostolic period 211-346; patristic index 367-374); A. Lemaire, Les ministères aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1971; R.D. Dupuy, Mysterium salutis, 8, Brescia 1975, 618-647; A. Santantoni, L'ordinazione episcopale, SA 69, Rome 1976; J. Lécuyer, Le sacrement de l'Ordre, Paris 1983; Y. Congar, Ordinations invitus, coactus, de l'Église antique au canon 214: RSPh 50 (1966) 169-197; P. van Beneden, Aux origines d'une terminologie sacramentelle. Ordo, ordinare, ordinatio dans la littérature chrétienne avant 313, Spicilegium sacrum lovaniense, Louvain 1974; C. Vogel, Ordinations inconsistantes et caractère inamissible, Études d'histoire du culte et des institutions chrétiennes 1, Turin 1978; E.J. Kilmartin, Ministère et ordination dans l'Église chrétienne primitive: La MaisonD 138 (1979) 49-92; P.F. Bradshaw, Ordination Rites of the Ancient Churches, New York 1990; A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité. Pouvoir d'innover et retour à l'ordre dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1992; A. Santantonini - S. Parenti, Gli ordini sacri e i ministeri, in A.J. Chupungco (ed.), Scientia liturgica, IV, Casale Monf. 1998, 209-240; H. Brakmann, Die altkirchlichen Ordinationsgebete: JbAc 47 (2004) 108-127.

A. NOCENT

ORDINES ROMANI. While the sacramentary—the celebrant's text—contains the euchological formulary of the Christian rites, the ordines, which serve as a guide to the master of ceremonies, offer a detailed exposition of the rites, and are an indispensable supplement to the sacramentary. The Ordines romani also often indicate the Incipit and Explicit of the readings. Before being gathered in collections, the ordines existed as separate booklets, each one intended for a specific function. This was also true of the Ordines romani. They were preserved, and willingly called Romani, thanks to the religious policy of the Carolingian sovereigns Pepin the Short and Charlemagne, who introduced the Roman *liturgy into their domains. To attain this end, however, they had to seek a compromise with *Gallican customs. To this period (early 9th c.) go back the oldest MSS of the ordines: among them can be distinguished those in which the Roman rites have preserved their original purity, and those in which Frankish customs had been adapted, collections A (ca. 700–750) and B (early 9th c.) in Andrieu's edition. Besides the 50 Ordines romani (from the 8th to 11th c.) published by Andrieu, others have been found.

I-X: papal and episcopal mass.
XI: baptismal ritual.
XII-XIV: order of songs and readings.
XV-XIX: order of the monastic liturgy.
XX-XXXIII: various celebrations of the liturgical year.
XXXIV-XL: sacred ordinations.
XLI-XLIV: dedication-consecration of churches.
XLV-LXVIII: coronation of the emperor.
XLIX: funerals.
L: Ordo romanus antiquus (part of the 10th-c. Romano-German Pontifical of Mainz).

The most important of the Ordines romani is no. I, which describes the liturgy of the stational Mass celebrated by the pope in the 6th–7th c., and which is at the beginning of the history of the Roman Mass. The Ordines romani lost their function when the rubrics were included in the sacramentaries or, conversely, when the ordines also included the prayers. A central role was played by the Romano-German Pontifical written in St. Alban's at Mainz (ca. 950–963).

CPL 1998-2007; LMA 6, 1437-1439; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 1, Milan [3]1964, 332-337; C. Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, Washington, D.C. 1986, 135-224; A.-G. Martimort, Les "Ordines," les Ordinaires et les cérémoniaux, Turnhout 1991; E. Palazzo, Histoire des livres liturgiques. Le Moyen Âge. Des origines au XIII[e] siècle, Paris 1993, 187-196; J. Nebel, Die Entwicklung des römischen Messritus im ersten Jahrtausend anhand der Ordines Romani, Thesis ad Lauream n. 264, Pont. Athenaeum S. Anselmi de Urbe, Pont. Inst. Liturgicum, Rome 2000.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

ORIENTATION. See *EAST – ORIENTATION

ORIENTIUS (early 5th c.). Author of a poetic composition subdivided into two books of 518 distichs (309 + 209), called Commonitorium by its first editor, Delrio, in the 17th c. The author's name, otherwise unknown, is given at the end (Comm. 2,417). The first to mention him was *Venantius Fortunatus in the 6th c. (Vita s. Martini 1,17: PL 88, 366), who places him between *Prudentius and *Sedulius. Orientius certainly lived in *Gaul (Comm. 2,184), which was devastated by the numerous barbarian incursions of the early 5th c., of which he speaks amply, without naming the invaders (Comm. 2,165-202). He wrote after 405/407; the invasions caused in him feelings of horror and desperation. We know three biographies of an Orientius, bishop of Augusta Ausciorum (= Auch in Gascony), and everything suggests an identification with the author of the Commonitorium. The work is a long exhortation to live a fully Christian life. To this end he also teaches the fragility of human things, the importance of the worship of God and right conduct of life in view of the heavenly kingdom. He denounces the various vices that were widespread in his milieu. The moral aspect predominates in his work, which could also be defined as a long sermon in verse. The work abounds in descriptions. In the only MSS of the Commonitorium there are also various other poetical works, almost certainly not by Orientius. These are De nativitate Domini, De epithetis Salvatoris, De Trinitate, Explanatio nominum Domini, Laudatio (these last three are thought to form a single literary work) and two Orationes.

CPL 1465-1468; PL 61, 977-1006; R. Ellis: CSEL 16, 1 (1881) 191-261; L. Bellanger, Paris-Toulouse 1903 (with Fr. tr.); M.D. Tobin: PSt 74 (1945) (with Eng. tr.); C.A. Rapisarda, Catania 1958, [2]1970; Id., It. tr. in NDid 10 (1960) XII-36, and Catania 1970.

Studies: Bibl. in Patrologia III, 310; L. Bellanger, Études sur le poème d'Orientus, Toulouse 1902; Id., Le poème d'Orientus, Paris-Toulouse 1903 (revision and enlarging of the previous work); C.A. Rapisarda, Introduzione critica ad Orienzio con bibliografia: NDid 8 (1958) 1-78; DSp 11, 903-906; P. Courcelle, Histoire littéraire des grandes invasions germaniques, Paris [3]1964, 98-101, 145-146, 339-347; P.M. Duval, Les sources de l'histoire de France, I, Paris 1974, 701-702; K. Smolak, Poetische Ausdrücke im sogenannten ersten Gebet des Orientus: WS 87 (1974) 188-200; D.R. Shackleton Bailey, Emendations of the Commonitorium of Orientius: Classical Philology 72 (1977) 130-133; V. Tandoi, Noterelle orienziane: Vichiana n.s. 13 (1984) 199-210; M.G. Bianco, Il Commonitorium di Orienzio. Un protrettico alla conversione nella Gallia del V secolo: AFLM 20 (1987) 33-68; N. Adkin, Orientius and Jerome: SE 34 (1994) 165-174; S. Blomgren, In Commonitorium Orientii adnotatiunculae: Eranos 94 (1996) 1-4; LACL3 527-528.

A. Di Berardino

ORIGEN (ca. 185–ca. 254)

I. Life - II. Works - III. Character of Origen's thought - IV. The exegete - V. The spiritual person - VI. The speculative theologian.

Origen is, with *Cyprian, the pre-Nicene author about whom we possess the greatest amount of biographical data, which is scarce in his works, but abundant in book VI of *Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, to which we can add the information provided by *Jerome and *Photius from lost works of Eusebius. His relations with his pupils and his teaching programs are described in *Gregory Thaumaturgus's Panegyric to Origen.

I. Life. Origen, surnamed Adamantius, man of steel, or of diamond, was born of a Christian family, probably at *Alexandria. His father, *Leonides, gave him a particularly thorough education, Greek and biblical. In 202 Leonides suffered martyrdom during *Septimius Severus's persecution, and the family's goods were confiscated. Some months later Origen opened a school of grammar (i.e., literature) so as to maintain his mother and six younger brothers; Bishop *Demetrius put him in charge of instructing *catechumens, while some Egyptian prefects continued the persecution. For some time he kept up this dual teaching role; then, probably when his family no longer needed his help, he gave up teaching secular culture to dedicate himself entirely to catechesis. Urged by the radicalism which characterized his youth, he sold all the MSS in his possession for a petty sum, a gesture which seems to indicate a renunciation of all but the knowledge of God; apostolic demands, however, made him return to what he had abandoned, and to deepen his philosophical knowledge, he followed the courses of *Ammonius Saccas, the father of *Neoplatonism. He lived a life of extreme austerity and, taking Mt 19:12 literally, castrated himself. Having obtained great success in his teaching, he put *Heraclas in charge of catechesis proper, reserving for himself the students most eager to make progress, also maintaining contacts with *heretics and pagans. At age 30 he began to write, urged by Ambrose, a wealthy Alexandrian whom he had brought back from *Valentinianism to *orthodoxy. Ambrose had been drawn to *gnosis, not finding in the great church the intellectual nourishment he craved. Converted by Origen, he persuaded his teacher to produce what he had lacked, putting considerable means at his disposal. During this first period living in Alexandria, Origen made many journeys: to *Rome, where he seems to have heard *Hippolytus preach; to Palestinian *Caesarea, where Bishop *Theoctistus, like *Alexander of Jerusalem, allowed him to preach although a layman, provoking a protest from Demetrius; to Roman Arabia (Jordan), called there by the governor; finally, to Antioch with a military escort, summoned by Julia Mammaea—mother of the emperor *Alexander Severus—who wished to be informed about Christianity.

The bishops of *Achaia ca. 231 invited Origen to *Athens to dispute with groups of heretics. On his way through *Caesarea in Palestine, Theoctistus and Alexander ordained him priest. On his return to Alexandria, Demetrius, annoyed by an ordination carried out without requesting his consent, called a council of bishops and priests who exiled Origen from *Egypt; then Demetrius, supported by some bishops, declared him deposed from the priesthood. Saddened, Origen withdrew to Caesarea, where he was welcomed by his Palestinian friends and where, as in many other provinces of the East, Demetrius's sentence was ignored. Origen resumed teaching, and from Gregory's panegyric to him, we know something of his teaching in that city: a type of school that was more a "missionary" course of study for young pagan sympathizers, developed with the aim of presenting the Christian version of philosophical problems, without yet teaching Christian doctrine proper. Origen preached frequently, and we have many of his homilies. His literary activities remained considerable, since Ambrose joined him at Caesarea with stenographers and copyists. He traveled often: to Athens, where he began his Commentary on the Song of Songs; to *Arabia (Jordan) where, during a synod, he brought Bishop *Beryllus of Bostra back to orthodoxy and where he disputed with a group of Christians who asserted that the *soul died with the body and was raised with it; to *Nicomedia, where he dictated his letter to *Julius Africanus; to *Cappadocia, called there by Bishop *Firmilian. Perhaps it was in Arabia that a small council met around Bishop *Heraclides; its proceedings were discovered in 1941 at Tura in Egypt. In 250, this overflowing and multiform activity was abruptly ended by *Decius's persecution: imprisoned and tortured, Origen courageously proclaimed his faith. What they desired was not his death but his apostasy, which, as the most outstanding Christian figure of his time, would have had a considerable effect. The emperor's death restored him to freedom within a few months, but in broken health. He died soon after, aged 69, probably in 254. His tomb was still visible in the 13th c. at *Tyre, in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

II. Works. Origen was probably the most prolific author of Antiquity, pagan or Christian: the list of his works given by Jerome in letter 33 to Paula, though incomplete, is astonishing. His Hexapla set down the whole text of the OT in six columns: Hebrew, in Hebrew and Greek characters; the four Greek versions of Aquila, *Symmachus, the Septuagint and *Theodotion; for some books he had supplementary versions, called Fifth, Sixth, Seventh; the additions and lacunae of each text he represented with graphic signs borrowed from Alexandrian grammarians. He also commented, by different methods, on much of the Bible. Of his learned commentaries we possess, in Greek, nine books on John and eight on Matthew; in Rufinus's Latin version, ten books on Romans and four on Song of Songs; an anonymous Latin translator gives us the whole second half of the commentary on Matthew. About 300 homilies are preserved: in Greek, on Jeremiah and on Saul and the Witch of Endor; in Rufinus's Latin version, on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, the birth of Samuel, Psalms 36, 37 and 38; in Jerome's Latin version, on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Song of Songs, Luke, as well as homilies on various psalms, until now attributed to Jerome himself, but which he only translated. Origen also wrote many scholia (brief exegetical notes on scriptural passages); such scholia were often made into collections. They are hard to identify today in the mass of innumerable short or long fragments from lost commentaries or homilies. These fragments have come down to us in one of three ways. We possess two collections of excerpts: the Apologia for Origen in six books (only book I remains, in Rufinus's Latin translation), composed by the martyr *Pamphilus of Caesarea with the help of the historian Eusebius, defends Origen from the accusations made against him in the 3rd and 4th c., and cites numerous other texts of his, many cited nowhere else; while the Philocalia of Origen, surviving in Greek, contains extracts collected by *Gregory of Nazianzus and Basil of Caesarea for a veiled apologetic motive. We also find many fragments attributed to Origen in the exegetical catenae, compilations of patristic interpretations on a book of Scripture, which thus form a verse-by-verse commentary. Finally, Origen is very often cited by later authors accusing or defending him. In addition, Jerome tells us that his own commentaries on the Pauline Epistles Galatians, Ephesians, Titus and Philemon closely follow Origen's corresponding commentaries, now lost save for fragments.

A second group of works, though not declaredly exegetical, give plenty of room to Scripture. De principiis, or Peri Archōn, the source of posthumous accusations against Origen, is the first Christian attempt at theological reflection to start from the regula fidei and rely on Scripture and reason: it survives entirely only in Rufinus's Latin translation; one seventh of it is preserved in Greek in the Philocalia, and some fragments are cited by Jerome, *Justinian and other authors. The other works survive in Greek: De oratione (Peri Euchēs), with a commentary on the Lord's Prayer; Exhortatio ad martyrium, addressed to Ambrose when he was in danger of being arrested during the persecution of *Maximinus Thrax; the Dispute with Heraclides, rediscovered at Tura (see above); Contra Celsum, a refutation in eight books of the attack by the philosopher *Celsus in his anti-Christian True Doctrine, and the most important apologetic work of Christian Antiquity. Fragments survive, Greek and Latin, of other lost works such as De resurrectione and Stromata. Of Origen's abundant correspondence, two complete letters remain, to Julius Africanus and Gregory Thaumaturgus, and fragments of some others.

The greater part of Origen's immense work has not escaped the ravages of time and the persecuting violence of the emperor *Justinian. What remains still has considerable breadth, but the greater part consists only of Latin translations and fragments. This raises important critical problems, since his translators Rufinus and Jerome did not just translate, but paraphrased, aiming by their translations to fit the texts into the Latin thought-world; and the fragments in the catenae often consist of summaries made by the catenists, who sought to retain the main ideas. The result of this procedure was certainly not satisfactory, esp. in De Principiis, since Rufinus on one side and Jerome and Justinian on the other translated or chose passages acc. to the opposed positions they took up in the Origenist dispute; even the texts preserved in the Philocalia underwent cuts.

III. Character of Origen's thought. Later we will look at the accusations, mostly unfounded, made against Origen's thought after his death. His accusers, however, have some excuse. First, the historical mentality which tries to place a writer in his own time is a relatively recent acquirement—even today we cannot say it is all that widespread among theologians; the same with the idea of a development of dogma or, rather, of the church's awareness of revelation. Second, Origen himself never troubles to "define" his theological thought. He depends heavily on the biblical text he is commenting on and follows it step by step, not bothering to counterbalance it immediately with complementary statements, which will be found elsewhere, in the interpretation of another text. In the theorizing contained in De Principiis, he often examines two or even three different solutions, which he seeks to expound in all their clarity, often leaving the conclusion to the reader. For this reason, while studying him we must keep in mind the whole of his work, at least what remains of it: we can then see that the different passages balance each other, making up a theology full of tension and nuances which generally turns out to be orthodox. He must never be judged on an isolated text, since this expresses only a partial aspect which, taken alone, is unilateral and hence heterodox. But his detractors from the 4th c. had neither the time, nor the patience, nor the will to study him in this way. The need to "define," which appears in the many councils provoked by the *Arian crisis, from *Nicaea to *Constantinople, with their various formulas of faith, arose both from the influence of Roman law, which, from the time of Constantine, assimilated the rule of faith more and more to the civil law, and from the need, against heretics, to enunciate doctrine in the clearest and most complete terms possible, so as to leave the enemy no loophole. The resulting mentality created the most adverse conditions possible for understanding and judging Origen fairly. We must also bring out another essential point: in all his works, Origen is simultaneously an exegete, a spiritual man and a speculative theologian. We cannot understand his *exegesis and his speculation if we forget that they are the product of a spiritual man, since they are informed by the preeminence of the spiritual element, as is the cosmology of De Principiis. And vice versa: his spirituality and his theology are those of an exegete; he has made theology of his exegesis and his spirituality. Many distortions of his thought by modern criticism come from ignorance of this spiritual element. Also, Origen knew the philosophy and science of his time very well, and taught it, as we see in the program illustrated in the Panegyric. But he himself was not a philosopher: he used philosophy as a theologian. As for science, he used it to explain the literal meaning of Scripture; as he did with philology, which he knew from his Alexandrian education.

IV. The exegete. Origen is, together with Jerome, the greatest critical exegete (the Hexapla) and the greatest literal exegete of Antiquity. He possessed inexhaustible curiosity about the different readings found in MSS of both the OT and NT, and pointed them out in his commentaries and even in his homilies: but, for him as for all the Fathers before Jerome, the Greek text took precedence over the Hebrew, since it was the one the *apostles had given to the church. His explanations of the literal meaning are always accurate, helped by philology and by all the disciplines of his time, and using his knowledge of Hebrew customs and exegesis, which he gained by cultivating relationships with rabbis. Many have been scandalized by his statement in De Principiis IV, 2,5 that some texts have no valid literal sense. But for Origen, the literal sense means the material meaning of the letter, not, as for us, the meaning which the sacred author wished to express. Consequently, when the Bible speaks in figurative language, which it does frequently, it cannot be reduced to a literal meaning in Origen's sense. If we examine the cases of this sort which we find in the Homilies on the Hexateuch, we will see that they arise either from errors of interpretation of the Septuagint (which was, as we said, the text of the church for the Fathers before Jerome, and not the Hebrew text even when that was known) or from the fact that, in relatively rare cases, Origen has failed to properly situate himself in the literal, literary, psychological or historical context. But these instances develop from details of little importance, and Origen believed much more in the historicity of scriptural passages than the most conservative of contemporary exegetes: see his defense of the historicity of *Noah's ark against the objections of the Marcionite *Apelles, who rightly said that the dimensions given would not allow room for so many animals (Hom. Gen. 11,2; C. Cels. IV, 31). In some NT events, such as the theophany of Jesus' baptism, Jesus' temptation etc., he rightly sees a sensible expression of a spiritual vision.

But if it was for us Christians that Scripture, including the OT, was composed (1 Cor 10:11), the *Holy Spirit did not do so just with regard to the literal meaning: otherwise the legal and ceremonial prescriptions of the old covenant abolished by Christ ought to be eliminated from the Bible, along with those narratives which, in the pastoral perspective in which Origen places them, are of interest only for the teaching which can be drawn from them. The meaning intended by the Spirit is the spiritual one, which Origen finds in the NT and in the earlier tradition, but of which he himself is the great theorist. The OT is only revelation in that it is, in its entirety, a prophecy of Christ, and exegesis must show that Christ is its key. NT exegesis applies what is said of Christ to every Christian and shows, in Christ's actions, the prophecy and anticipated possession of the eschatological blessings. Christ's first coming is both the fulfillment of the time which preceded it and the prophecy of his second coming; the difference between the "temporal gospel" as lived here on earth and the "eternal gospel" (Rev 14:16) of beatitude does not lie in ὑπόστασις, "substance," since there is only one gospel, but in ἐπίνοια, in the human manner of considering things, since we see only "through a glass darkly" what we will see "face-to-face": yet even now we possess the "true goods," and all the sacramentalism that characterizes the time of the church is found in germ in this distinction.

Despite the incomprehension it would meet from the 16th c. on, this type of exegesis is essential to Christian dogma, since, if revelation is Christ, the OT is not as a whole revelation if it does not, as a whole, speak of Christ. We can certainly criticize Origen's exegesis for not taking the human author sufficiently into account, in the persuasion that the Holy Spirit is the author of Scripture; and, since the exegesis of Scripture must be worthy of God, for seeking a meaning in every detail, often resulting in an arbitrary procedure, compensated by the beauty and spiritual wealth of many of his expositions. But into the pattern we have described are woven many influences, biblical, rabbinic, Philonian, Hellenic, *gnostic etc., which give Origenian exegesis an extremely complex character. There has been no lack of attempts at classification. Above all, the theory of triple meaning goes back to Origen himself (De Principiis IV, 2,4), in which the meanings correspond to the divisions of his trichotomic *anthropology: the corporeal or literal meaning, the psychical or moral meaning, and the spiritual or mystical meaning. H. de Lubac (Exégèse médiévale I/1, 198-211) traces the doctrine of the fourfold meaning, first enunciated by *John Cassian, back to Origen's practice: literal meaning, allegorical meaning (affirmation of Christ as the center of history), tropological meaning (concerning the Christian's behavior after Christ's coming), anagogical meaning (giving a presentiment of the eschatological blessings). Some modern authors distinguish "typology" from "allegory," understanding the latter in a different sense from that of the doctrine of the fourfold meaning: interpretation which conforms to the horizontal, progressive and linear conception of Christian time is "typological"; exegesis which supposes, above the actual world, a divine or angelic world which it reflects in some way is "allegorical." This distinction is legitimate if it refers to different literary forms: what is not acceptable is the value judgment on "allegory," which is accused of not being Christian. In fact, "allegorical" exegeses of this type are not rare in the NT, and if Christian time is sacramental it implies, in addition to the horizontal dimension, a vertical dimension which manifests the fact that the eschatological realities are already present in the actual world.

V. The spiritual person. The spiritual teaching is present throughout every exegetical work. Origen's ascetic and moral conceptions are still largely unstudied. Spiritual combat dominates his anthropology and his angelology. Humanity is at once spirit (πνεῦμα), soul and body: pneuma is the gift God gives to each one to guide him or her in knowledge, prayer and virtue. But the soul is dual: its higher part, mind (νοῦς) or heart, is educated by pneuma and is the faculty of the soul which receives grace; the lower part, "flesh" or "thought of the flesh" (Rom 8,6-7), corresponds in some measure to the concupiscence which attracts the person toward the body. Moreover, the soul is urged by angels and demons who are behind their army commanders, Christ and Satan. We find in Origen a fairly complete doctrine, scattered here and there in pages of exegesis, on martyrdom, on virginity or chastity, on virtue and the virtues, on sin and on all that Christian *ascesticism implies.

Origen was the originator of many mystical themes that would be taken up by his successors. To the traditional, collective exegesis of the bride of the Song of Songs as representing the church, he added an exegesis that applied to the individual Christian soul. He compared Is 49:2 to Song 2:5, thus creating the image of the arrow and wound of love. Because Christ's *incarnation produces its effects in everyone, he must also be born and grow in every soul. Spiritual ascent, through prayer and virtue, is represented by the apostles' ascent of the mountain, on whose summit Jesus appeared to them in his divinity, which appeared through his humanity: the transfiguration is the symbol of the highest knowledge that the human being can have, here below, of God and his Son. The spiritual senses which develop in those who progress allow them, in analogy with the five bodily senses, to know intuitively and innately the divine realities to which they had earlier adhered by faith. This innate character comes about with the development of their participation in God's image, the Word, which persons received at the moment of their creation and which they make grow in themselves by Christian life and by the practice of the virtues—since only like knows like—until they reach the "likeness" of beatitude which coincides with perfect vision.

Knowledge has for its object the mysteries, those of visible and invisible beings, those of the relations within the *Trinity, all unified in the person of the Son, mystery par excellence, image of the Father, intelligible World: in him are found the plans and germs of creation in that he is God's wisdom. The mystery is understood in the light communicated by the divine persons, where the Son, adapting himself in various ways acc. to each one's capacity, becomes food which nourishes the person with the divine nature, which the Son receives constantly from the Father; he is a wine which rejoices the soul, filling it with sweetness, delight, "enthusiasm," i.e., the feeling experienced through the divine presence. Knowledge is the meeting between the divine freedom that gives itself and the human freedom that receives: God does not take possession of the person against his will, in an ecstasy that would take away his fundamental conscience and freedom, since only the devil acts in such a way, in those possessed and in those in the grip of a passion. Knowledge has as its usual beginning point the exegesis of Scripture, meditated upon in renunciation of sin and of the world and in purity of heart: faith is its necessary beginning, but its object becomes ever more present to the five spiritual senses, and perfectly understood, knowledge is indistinguishable from love, in union: "Adam knew Eve, his wife" (Gen 4:1). The esotericism of which Origenian spirituality has been wrongly accused is really a matter of not giving a soul something which it could not support and which would damage it: a rule common to all spiritual directors. Similarly, to accuse him of an aristocratic vision would be to forget that he expounded all these arguments in homilies preached to all the Christians of Caesarea, exhorting his hearers to make progress in order to know. Remember too that Origen often manifests a profoundly affective devotion to Christ, and that in his works we find some evidence, few but clear, of a personal mystical experience.

VI. The speculative theologian. Origen's theology is inseparable from his exegesis and his spiritual teaching and is inspired by them. He remains faithful to the regula fidei of his time, which he sets out in the preface to De Principiis, and, starting from this, with the help of Scripture, reason, and his own spiritual and pastoral experience, he conducts his research with all modesty, without claiming to dogmatize: De Principiis is a theology ἐν γυμνασίᾳ, "in exercise," i.e., in research. In large measure, it is developed in reaction to the heresies of his time. Against the *Marcionites, Origen affirms the goodness of the Creator and his identity with Jesus' Father, as well as the agreement of the two Testaments and the value of the OT. Against the *Valentinians, he affirms free will, personal responsibility and the rejection of predestination seen as a law of nature. Against *docetism, he affirms the authentic humanity assumed by Christ as a condition of redemption. He also opposes two*trinitarian heresies: against the modalists, he proclaims the distinct personality of each person, and against the *adoptionists, the eternal generation of the Word. Finally, the tendencies toward *anthropomorphism, *millenarism and literalism present in the Great Church provide him with the occasion to profess the incorporeality of God, the *soul and the final beatitude, as well as the abolition, in Christ, of the Jewish law in its ceremonial and legal precepts. It would obviously be unjust to criticize him, as his detractors frequently do, for not having foreseen later heresies and for sometimes using in an orthodox sense (as comparison with other texts shows) expressions which later received a heterodox meaning. The philosophy behind his theology is *Middle Platonism, an eclectic *Platonism mixed with a lot of *Stoicism and a little *Aristotelianism. But Origen is not properly a philosopher, because he uses his philosophical knowledge as a theologian.

Regarding the Trinity, Origen seeks to express, in a way that is more dynamic than ontological, the unity of the persons and the distinct personality of each one. The Father is the source of the divinity that he communicates to the Son in his eternal and continuous generation and to the Spirit, in such a way that the Son is and remains in the Father, as the Father in the Son: the Son remains in the Father even when, in the incarnation, he is on earth with his human soul. We find in Origen, for the first time, concerning the eternity of the Son's generation, the formula οὐκ ἦν ὅτε οὐκ ἦν ("There was no time when he was not" [Peri Archōn I, 2,9; IV, 4,1, confirmed by *Athanasius, Com. Rom. I, 5]). On the other hand, he opposes in the Valentinians their representation of the generation of the Son as probolē or prolatio, i.e., a representation implying, like human or animal generation, a division of substance. The Father is the first since he is the beginning and since it is he who sends the Son and the Spirit on their mission: this is the essence of Origen's supposed "*subordinationism" which, save for a few clumsy expressions, does not involve an inferiority of power for the other two persons. The Son possesses, in the unity of his person, a multiplicity of titles (ἐπίνοιαι): the different names attributed to him by Scripture, which express the different aspects of his relations with the Father and with humanity. As Wisdom, he is the intelligible World which contains the principles and seeds of beings and all knowledge of mysteries; as Logos, he reveals them, and it is he who carries out the work of creation. The union of the Word with human nature is, in accordance with the doctrine of the preexistence of souls, prior to the incarnation since the Word's human soul was created together with the other souls in preexistence: through its union with the Word it was "in the form of God," impeccable, and so Christ, in his humanity, is the bridegroom of the church, which, in preexistence, was formed of the totality of the other souls. To redeem his fallen bride, he became incarnate in *Mary's womb, and with him the Word. He revealed his divinity to humanity by translating it into a human person. This soul, in the passion, was abandoned as a ransom to Satan and descended into hell, where he freed the souls of the righteous dead and brought them back with him in his ascension. Origen teaches, in his own way, the *hypostatic union and, for the first time, the communicatio idiomatum. The Holy Spirit comes from the Father through the Son, who communicates his titles to it: it is the Sanctifier and constitutes the "matter" or "nature" of the charisms which correspond to the "actual graces" of scholastic theology.

Origen works out a doctrine of angels and demons: guardians of individuals or peoples, or overseers of various realms of nature. Humanity has been created, like the angels, in the image of God, the Word: they partake of the existence and divinity of the Father and the filiation and rationality of the Word, all these terms being understood in a sense that is more supernatural than natural. But sin covers God's image in humanity with diabolical or bestial images, which only the Redeemer can overcome. Origen's speculations on resurrected bodies tend to affirm simultaneously their identity with and their otherness from the earthly body, acc. to the Pauline image of the seed and the plant (1 Cor 15:35-44). If Origen does not see Mary as completely exempt from sin, he is the first to affirm clearly her perpetual virginity; he sees in her one of the great "types" of the spiritual person and, acc. to *Socrates (HE VII, 32), he called her Theotokos*. He also works out a precise doctrine on *baptism, the *Eucharist, *penance, *orders and marriage.

What is called Origenism is taken, not from the whole of Origen's theology, which would become the nourishment of the 4th-c. Fathers, but from some speculations in De Principiis, deprived of their hypothetical and antithetical character, and systematized by successors. In the absence of a defined ecclesiastical doctrine on the soul, Origen maintains the preexistence of souls, including that of Christ. In the beginning, God created "minds," all equal and immersed in divine contemplation. Slackening of fervor constituted the primitive fault which divided them into angels, human beings and demons: at that time the "minds" cooled down into souls, since ψυχή is connected with ψῦχος, cold. This doctrine, inherited from Plato, provided Origen with a reply to the *Marcionite attacks on God the Creator, since it allowed him to trace the inequality of human beings at birth to a consequence of free will: it also allowed him to avoid the difficulties of the two other replies to the problem of the soul's origin, *traducianism and creationism. In the context of his time, he cannot be called a heretic, since the church had no doctrine on the origin of souls, apart from their creation by God.

In a way corresponding to the equal beginning of all creatures, Origen maintains an equality of their final condition, by their perfect reintegration into the good (= apokatastasis*). Scripturally, this doctrine is based on 1 Cor 15:24-28, in which passage Origen reads the salvation even of the enemies of Christ, and interprets the annihilation of death as the destruction of the will of enmity which the devil (De Principiis III, 6,5) has toward God. Apokatastasis, thus understood, is the true hinge of Origen's thought in that it preserves for the one God, against gnostics and Marcionites, the presence of goodness and justice, considering evil as transitory and punishment as medicinal. So as to not see apokatastasis as a necessary process, Origen insists on the fact that, through a long period of purification, every creature will freely choose the good, and for this reason he postulates an unlimited series of worlds, for which he was later reproved. The other errors he was accused of are often contradicted by reliable Greek texts and arose from the a misunderstanding on the part of his accusers or from a subsequent specialization of vocabulary: it was not understood that the world created from all eternity by God is the intelligible world of Platonic "ideas" or Stoic "reasons," designs or seeds of beings, the world contained in the Word, hence created from all eternity by the Father in the generation of the Son. Neither was it understood that the claim that the Son does not see the Father is directed against anthropomorphism and that see is used here in its ocular sense: because in fact Origen frequently speculated on the Son's knowledge of the Father. Furthermore, Methodius's accusations about resuscitated bodies arose from a misunderstanding, since he took Origen's use of the word εἶδος in its common meaning of external appearance, while in Origen it indicates a metaphysical principle. Origen cannot have claimed in De Principiis to believe in metempsychosis, which he judges absurd in his surviving Greek commentaries, considering it as incompatible with the church's teaching; nor can he have believed in the renewal of Christ's sacrifice in heaven, since in book I of Com. Jo. (35 [40], 255), contemporary with De Principiis, he clearly affirms its uniqueness. It was also not understood that to apply to Christ the term γενητός, not distinct from γεννητός and κτίσις, which does not have precisely the meaning of creature, does not make the Word a creature. Neither was it understood that his "subordinationism," motivated by his conception of origin and of "economy," remains orthodox, despite some clumsy expressions. Finally, it was not fully understood that by attributing to him the absurd theory of spherical glorious bodies, *Justinian interpreted what Origen said of stars (De Oratione XXXI, 3) as referring to risen bodies.

A virtually complete bibl. up to 1969 in H. Crouzel, Bibliographie critique d'Origène, La Haye-Steenbrugge 1971: a suppl. up to 1980: ibid. 1982; 1996; A. Monaci Castagno (ed.), Origene. Dizionario, Rome 2000.

Editions: In the GCS collection of various authors in 12 vols.; numerous works with text and Fr. tr. in SC; Ch. Delarue's ed. in J.P. Migne's re-edition (PG 11 to 17) with the Hexapla and some fragments, published by A. Galland and A. Mai. For the Philocalia, ed. Robinson, Cambridge 1893. Fragments on the Pauline Letters in JTS 3 (1902); 9-10 (1908-1909); 13-14 (1912-1913). Homilies on Ps in CCL 78 (see V. Peri, Omelie Origeniane sui Salmi, Vatican City 1980). See CPG 1410-1525; Suppl. 23-31.

General works: DTC 12, 1489-1565; R. Cadiou, La jeunesse d'Origène, Paris 1935; J. Daniélou, Origène, Paris 1948; P. Nautin, Origène, sa vie et son œuvre, Paris 1977; A. Monaci Castagno (ed.), La biografia di Origene fra storia e agiografia, Ravenna 2004.

Exegesis: H. de Lubac, Histoire et Esprit, Paris 1950; R.P.C. Hanson, Allegory and Event, London 1959; R. Gögler, Zur Theologie des biblischen Wortes bei Origenes, Düsseldorf 1963; A. Zöllig, Die Inspirationslehre des Origenes, Freiburg i.Br. 1902; E. Molland, The Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology, Oslo 1938; G. Lomiento, L'esegesi origeniana del Vangelo di Luca, Bari 1966; N. de Lange, Origen and the Jews, Cambridge 1976; H. Crouzel, Pourquoi Origène refuse-t-il parfois le sens littéral dans ses Homélies sur l'Hexateuque?: BLE 70 (1969) 241-263; M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004.

Spirituality: W. Völker, Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes, Tübingen 1931; A. Lieske, Die Theologie der Logosmystik bei Origenes, Münster 1938; P. Bertrand, Mystique de Jésus chez Origène, Paris 1951; H. Crouzel, Théologie de l'image de Dieu chez Origène, Paris 1956; H.U. von Balthasar, Parole et Mystère chez Origène, Paris 1957; F. Fässler, Der Hagios-Begriff bei Origenes, Fribourg 1958; G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes, Regensburg 1958; F. Hartmann, Origène et la théologie du martyre: EThL 34 (1958) 773-824; H. Crouzel, Origène et la "connaissance mystique," Bruges-Paris 1961; G. Gruber, ΖΩΗ. Wesen Stufen und Mitteilung des wahren Lebens bei Origenes, Munich 1962; M. Martínez Pastor, Teología de la Luz en Orígenes, Comillas 1963; H. Crouzel, Virginité et Mariage chez Origène, Bruges-Paris 1963; J. Dupuis, L'"esprit de l'homme," Bruges 1967; M. Eichinger, Die Verklärung Christi bei Origenes, Vienna 1969; W. Gessel, Die Theologie des Gebetes nach "De Oratione" von Origenes, Munich 1975.

Theology: C. Verfaillie, La doctrine de la justification chez Origène, Strasbourg 1926; C. Vagaggini, Maria nelle opere di Origene, Rome 1942; K. Rahner, La doctrine d'Origène sur la pénitence: RecSR 37 (1950) 47-97, 252-286, 422-456; M. Harl, Origène et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe Incarné, Paris 1958; P. Nemeshegyi, La paternité de Dieu chez Origène, Paris 1960; J. Chênevert, L'Église dans le commentaire d'Origène sur le Cantique des Cantiques, Brussels 1969; J. Rius-Camps, El dinamismo trinitario en la divinización de los seres racionales según Orígenes, Rome 1970; J.A. Alcain, Cautiverio y redención del hombre en Orígenes, Bilbao 1973; H.J. Vogt, Das Kirchenverständnis des Origenes, Cologne 1974; L. Lies, Wort und Eucharistie bei Origenes, Innsbruck 1978; H. Strutwolf, Gnosis als System. Zur Rezeption der valentinianischen Gnosis bei Origenes, Göttingen 1993. Gli Atti dei due Colloqui internazionali su Origene, Montserrat 1973 and Bari 1977: Origeniana, Bari 1975; Origeniana Secunda, Rome 1980 (the Origenian colloquia are in the eighth ed., ed. by L. Perrone, P. Bernardino and D. Marchini, Louvain 2003); F. Cocchini, Origene, Bologna 2006; for the bibl. see the journal "Adamantius."

H. Crouzel - E. Prinzivalli

ORIGENISM. Six successive stages can be distinguished in "Origenism." The first was that of related to Origen himself, i.e., the whole of the speculations that, through the misunderstandings of his successors, constituted the basis of later Origenism.

The second was that of Origenism as understood by his 3rd- and 4th-c. detractors, who were answered by Pamphilus's Apology for Origen. Besides the preexistence of the soul and apokatastasis*, they contested, through a series of misunderstandings, the doctrine of the resurrected body and of eternal creation.

The third was the Origenism of the Egyptian and Palestinian monks (2nd half of 4th c.): it was expounded mainly by *Evagrius of Pontus in the Kephalaia Gnostica—acc. to the unexpurgated *Syriac translation published by A. Guillaumont in PO 28/1 (1958)—and in the Letter to Melania, ed. in the Syriac translation and a Greek retroversion by W. Frankenberg (Evagrius Ponticus, Berlin 1912). Evagrius's thought is very complex and highly speculative. With respect to Origen, he seems to emphasize the initial and final unity of creatures with God, but nuances of his own emerge, as well as problematic wording.

The fourth and most important stage was Origenism as supposed by the 4th- and 5th-c. anti-Origenists—*Epiphanius, *Jerome, *Theophilus of Alexandria (while Origen was defended by *John of Jerusalem and *Rufinus of Aquileia). Their contentions must undergo the screening of criticism, however, since, as was quite normal for their time, they lacked a historical sense: they had no notion of the development of dogma—awareness of which has been attained only quite recently—and did not judge Origen based on the situation of his own time. Moreover, they excelled neither in philosophical nor in theological understanding. They completely failed to understand the change of mentality which separated the persecuted, minority church of Origen's time and the triumphant church of their own, esp. regarding the importance of a Christianization of philosophy for the guidance of the intellectual world, and the need for a theology "in exercise" (γυμνασία), i.e., of research. They accused Origen in view of the heresies of their own time, esp. *Arianism, without asking what the heresies were that he had to face, and which determined his particular problems. They had absolutely no awareness of the doctrinal progress brought about in the church by the reaction to Arianism, as compared with the succinct regula fidei of the 3rd c., which Origen had expounded in the preface to De Principiis; nor of the evolution of vocabulary, and they thus understood the terms used by Origen in the sense which such terms had assumed in the 4th c., which, in some theologically important cases, was much more precise than that of the 3rd c. In reading Origen they projected onto him the Origenism of their own time—that of the third stage—since it was that which they actually were targeting. They made no systematic studies of Origen's work, and based their accusations on isolated texts, taking no account of the explanations often found in other passages in the same book, sometimes only a few lines away. What Origen wrote in the form of exercise (γυμναστικῶς), they understood as put forth in the form of doctrine (δογματικῶς), with a conception of orthodoxy and regula fidei which was increasingly being modeled on that of civil law and expressed in "definitions" in the struggle against heresy.

The battle began with Epiphanius, metropolitan of Salamis or Constantia in *Cyprus: he classified Origen's "heresy" together with those that filled his Ancoratus and his Panarion, and insisted on obtaining a condemnation of Origen from Bishop John of Jerusalem. In 393 a certain *Atarbius, by what right we do not know, made a round of the convents of *Palestine, gathering signatures for Origen's condemnation. Ill received by Rufinus in his convent on the Mount of Olives, against all expectation he was welcomed by Jerome—until then an ardent defender of Origen—in his monastery at *Bethlehem. The battle grew bitter, with Rufinus and John against Jerome and Epiphanius. A reconciliation was reached between Rufinus and Jerome, but the dispute was revived when Rufinus, back in Rome, translated book I of Pamphilus's Apologia, followed by the Peri Archōn and a MS which, stolen by *Eusebius of Cremona, a monk and friend of Jerome, scandalized Jerome's Roman friends. They obliged Jerome to make a new translation of the Peri Archōn which, intent on being literal, highlighted Origen's heresies and Rufinus's inexactitudes, doing everything possible to embitter thoughts. Meanwhile the patriarch of Alexandria, Theophilus, was chosen to arbitrate between the two contending parties. At first favorable to Origen, for reasons of patriarchal politics he changed sides, expelled the auxiliary bishop Isidore and the "Long Brothers," and obtained the deposition of *John Chrysostom, who had given them asylum in *Constantinople. He condemned Origen at a regional synod in 400. These events had immediate repercussions in the West, thanks to Jerome, and are echoed in two letters of Pope *Anastasius. This first dispute terminated in 402 with Rufinus's silence.

The fifth stage was the Origenism, or rather the Evagrianism, of the Palestinian monks (1st half of 6th c.) of the Great Laura and the New Laura, convents under the obedience of St. *Sabas. The main expression of their doctrine is the Book of St. Hierotheus, the work of the Syrian monk *Stephen bar

Sudhaile, who aggravated Evagrius's Origenist thought into a radical *pantheism. In the interim between Justinian's first and second interventions, these Origenists divided into two groups. The extremists were called isochristi (ἰσόχριστοι), since they held that both at the beginning and at the end, all "minds" are equal to Christ: his superiority over them is only provisional; he had no part in original *sin. The moderates, whose late alliance with the anti-Origenists led to the condemnation of the isochristi, were called protoktisti* (πρωτόκτιστοι), since they attributed to Christ a superiority over other minds: their opponents labeled them tetraditi, accusing them of transforming the *Trinity into a tetrad by introducing Christ's humanity into it.

The sixth stage consisted of the presumed Origenism against which the emperor Justinian's condemnatory documents were directed: we must be careful not to confuse the documents of 543 with those of 553. The former, occasioned by an appeal by the anti-Origenist Palestinian monks and presented to the emperor by the papal *apocrisarius Pelagius, consist of the Liber adversus Origenem or Letter to Menas, followed by extracts from De Principiis and anathemata (DS 403-411): approved by the emperor's domestic synod, they were presented for signature to the pope and the patriarchs. They take aim at Origen himself, seen in the perspective of the Origenism of the time and with some gross misunderstandings, both in the Letter and in the anathemata. The other condemnatory documents come from the 5th ecumenical council, Constantinople II, compiled before and after the official opening. While Justinian sought to obtain the assent of Pope *Vigilius, whom he had brought to the capital by force, before declaring the council open, acc. to the hypothesis of Fr. Diekamp he addressed a letter to the assembled bishops, which is the rough draft of 15 anathemata which do not figure in the official acts of Constantinople II and which are not thus legally the product of an ecumenical council: they take aim explicitly at the isochristi, and Origen is cited only as the standard-bearer to whom they appeal. Moreover, some of these anathemata reproduce texts of Evagrius word for word. In the council's official Acts—the emperor, having given up on obtaining the pope's consent, had declared the council open on his own authority—the anathemata directed against the "*Three Chapters" contain Origen's name last in a list of heretics, in anathema no. 11. The same list, but without Origen's name, appears in the emperor's Homonoia, which is the rough draft of these anathemata. Very probably Origen's name was added, as the symbol of the isochristi, following the discussions on the Origenists which preceded the official opening. Pope Vigilius's documents, approving after its close a council that was held against his will, do not mention Origen. From a legal point of view, the presence of Origen's name in the list in question is not particularly important: it does not mean that he was formally a heretic (though the conciliar fathers were probably persuaded of it by certain rumors of an alleged apostasy, spread by Epiphanius) but probably means that in his writings there are some errors, taking into account the way in which they were read at that time; but it is more exact to say, perhaps, that it was really the isochristi who were condemned under his name. A consequence of this condemnation was the loss of the greater part of his works in the original language. This greatly hindered the propagation of Origen's thought in the Byzantine world, or rather its direct propagation, since, through the 4th-c. Fathers—nearly all of whom were his disciples—Origen's theology has invisibly marked the whole Christian tradition.

If Origen seems to have been generally rejected by the Byzantine Middle Ages, the Latin Middle Ages, up to the 13th c., read him passionately in the *Latin translations: Origen influenced Bernard of Clairvaux, William of Saint-Thierry and, through them, the Cistercian tradition. On the other hand, recent attempts to make him the source of Bulgarian Bogomilism and of Catharism do not seem worthy of consideration. Between the 13th and 14th c., his *Platonism was hard to reconcile with the ruling *Aristotelianism: in this period he was remembered only for his *exegesis. In the Renaissance he was defended by Pico della Mirandola and much admired by Erasmus. In the 16th c. the first editions appeared that would be perfected in the following centuries, as well as several studies. At the start of the 20th c., Origen, confused with later Origenism, judged almost exclusively on a rather one-sided reading of the De Principiis, was seen more as a Greek philosopher than as a Christian theologian: his spirituality went completely unnoticed, and his exegesis was considered arbitrary and absurd (A. von Harnack, E. de Faye, P. Koetschau, H. Koch). Origen's spirituality was rediscovered by W. Völker (1931), and our understanding of his exegesis is the work of H. de Lubac (1950): his personality has recovered its essential dimensions. At present Origen is, after *Augustine, the most widely read of the ecclesiastical writers of Antiquity.

F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im sechsten Jahrhundert und das fünfte allgemeine Concil, Münster 1899; F. Cavallera, Saint Jérôme, Louvain 1922; Origénisme: DTC 11, 1565-1588; A. Guillaumont, Les "Kephalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens, Paris 1962; H. Crouzel, Qu'a voulu faire Origène en composant le Traité des Principes?: BLE 76 (1975) 161-186, 241-260. Origen's influence on the 4th-c. Fathers is frequently emphasized in studies of them. For the Latin Middle Ages: H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale, I/1, Paris 1959, 198-304; J. Deroy, Bernardus en Origenes, Haarlem 1964; P. Verdeyen, La théologie mystique de Guillaume de Saint-Thierry: in various contributions, in Ons geestelijk erf (Anversa) from 1977 to 1979; H. Crouzel, Origène est-il la source du catharisme?: BLE 80 (1979) 3-28. For the Renaissance: H. Crouzel, Une controverse sur Origène à la Renaissance: Jean Pic de la Mirandole et Pierre Garcia, Paris 1977; M. Schär, Das Nachleben des Origenes im Zeitalter des Humanismus, Basel 1979; A. Godin, Erasme lecteur d'Origène, Geneva 1982; J.F. Dechow, Dogma and Mysticism in Early Christianity, Macon, GA 1988; E.A. Clark, The Origenist Controversy: The Cultural Construction of an Early Christian Debate, Princeton, NJ 1992; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth Century Origenism, Rome 2001; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, SEA 82, Rome 2002.

H. Crouzel - E. Prinzivalli

ORIGEN the Neoplatonist (3rd c.). Nearly all modern scholars (Daniélou, Origène, Paris 1948, 89; Schwyzer, PWK 21, 1, 480; Dörrie, Hermes 83 [1955] 468-472; Dodds, Numenius and Ammonius, in Les sources de Plotin, Geneva 1960, 26 and 31, n. 1; Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 68-69; Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 3) agree that the Origen mentioned by *Porphyry in Vita Plot. chs. 3 (I, 4,24-32) and 14 (I, 20,20-23), and by *Longinus, cited by Porphyry, Vita Plot. ch. 20 (I, 22,37), and who, with *Plotinus and Herennius, was a disciple of *Ammonius Saccas (fr. 2,5 and 6 Weber, pp. 4-5), must be distinguished from the other much more famous Christian *Origen—also a disciple of Ammonius—whom Porphyry refers to in *Eusebius, HE VI, 19,6-7 (II, 558,26-560,7 Schwartz; but Dörrie, Hermes 83 [1955] 469-470, is wrong in holding that Porphyry, in this passage of Eusebius, confused the Christian Origen with Origen the Neoplatonist). The attempt to identify the two and deny the independent existence of Origen the Neoplatonist, made by R. Cadiou (La jeunesse d'Origène, Paris 1935, 231-262) and recently repeated, with no new arguments, by F.H. Kettler (Origenes, Ammonius Sakkas und Porphyrius, in Kerygma und Logos, Festschrift C. Andresen, Göttingen 1979, 325-327), does not seem tenable. A deeper examination of the facts that make this distinction necessary, together with a collection of the evidence related to Origen the Neoplatonist (preserved by Porphyry, *Eunapius, *Photius, *Proclus and *Nemesius of Emesa), and a reconstruction and interpretation of his philosophical system, can be found in K.O. Weber's monograph Origenes der Neuplatoniker (Zetemata 27, Munich 1962), which remains the classic work on which any study of him must be based. Here we will simply say that, as Porphyry relates, he was at *Alexandria, with Plotinus and Herennius, when Ammonius Saccas died ca. 242 (Vita Plot. ch. 3 = fr. 2 Weber); that he visited Plotinus when the latter held his lectures at *Rome after 244 (Vita Plot. ch. 4 = fr. 3 Weber; on the date, see Cadiou, p. 235 and Dörrie, p. 471); that he wrote two treatises, On Demons and That Only the King Is Creator, the latter during the reign of *Gallienus, which began in 253 (Vita Plot. ch. 3 = fr. 2 Weber); that he also left notes for a commentary on the Timaeus, mentioned by Proclus (fr. 8-16 Weber, pp. 6-11); and that, as Proclus relates (Theol. plat. II, 4 [= fr. 7 Weber]), his metaphysical system differed from that of Plotinus in that he did not put the One above mind and being, but considered mind (equivalent to absolute being) as the supreme principle, remaining more faithful to the teaching of his master Ammonius Saccas (cf. Schwyzer, PWK 21, 1, 480; Weber, p. 160).

R. Beutler, PWK 18, 1, 1033-1036; H.R. Schwyzer, PWK 21, 1, 479-480; K.O. Weber, Origenes der Neoplatoniker, Zetemata 27, Munich 1962; L. Brisson et al., Porphyrius, La vie de Plotin, I, Paris 1982, 259-261, 261 n. 1; II, Paris 1992, 213-216, 217-219, 265.

S. Lilla

OROSIUS (4th–5th c.). We first hear of the Spanish priest (Paul?) Orosius in 414 when, still a young man, he arrived at *Hippo and made contact with *Augustine. On the latter's advice, in 415 he went to *Palestine, where he met *Jerome, and by his imprudence became involved in the beginnings of the *Pelagian controversy. In 416 he returned to the West, bearing various messages and the claimed relics of *Stephen the protomartyr, which contributed to the conversion of numerous Jews at Minorca. He returned to Hippo, where he wrote his historical work in 416 and 417. Of his final destiny we know nothing (details, discussion of controversial points and testimonia in Schanz IV, 1, 483-485).

We have three of Orosius's works: (1) Commonitorium de errore Priscillianistarum et Origenistarum. In this very brief memoria, sent to Augustine by Orosius after his first stay at Hippo, he provides an orientation on these heretical doctrines which had spread on the Iberian Peninsula and invites the bishop to refute them. (2) Liber apologeticus contra Pelagianos. This is our only source on the conference of *Jerusalem of 415 where, under the presidency of Bishop *John, the ideas of Pelagius, who was present, were discussed. Orosius railed against Pelagius's doctrine, but his *Latin was poorly translated into Greek by the interpreter, and he was subsequently accused by John of having maintained that, even with God's help, humanity could not remain sinless (Apol. 9,2). In this treatise Orosius gives a summary of the conference, denies having expressed the heretical opinion he was charged with and esp. refutes Pelagianism (for these two works see Patrologia III, 467-469). (3) Historiarum adversus paganos libri VII. This is Orosius's main work, and it is the oldest universal Christian history. The material is divided as follows: Book 1: Geographical introduction, history from the flood until the founding of *Rome. Book 2: Rome, from its foundation to the capture of the Urbs by the *Gauls (390 BC); history of *Persia and Greece up to the Battle of Cunassa (401 BC). Book 3: Roman history up to the eve of the war against Pyrrhus; Greek history until the collapse of Alexander's empire. Book 4: History of Rome up to the destruction of *Carthage (146 BC). Book 5: Rome from 146 to 70 BC. Book 6: Rome from 70 BC to the coming of Augustus. Book 7: History of the empire until AD 417.

The writing of this work was, like Augustine's City of God, a consequence of the taking of Rome by *Alaric in 410. The pagans claimed that this catastrophe was the consequence of the abandonment of the traditional religion, definitively prohibited by *Theodosius in 392, and many Christians were shaken: for almost a century, in fact, the doctors of the church had proclaimed that the Roman Empire had been established by divine providence for the spread and triumph of Christianity, whose fate thus seemed linked to Rome. Augustine, in the City of God, refutes this political theology. In the prologue to his History, Orosius says that Augustine, when he was writing Book 11 of the City, asked him to make a list of the innumerable evils that had afflicted humanity in the past (evidently to attenuate the gravity of the catastrophe of 410); Orosius concludes by stating that his research led him to discover that past evils were infinitely more terrible than those of the present, and that the kingdom of death had been crippled after Christianity's triumph (Prol. 10-14). Orosius's History is not a calm exposition of objective research, but an impassioned argument. Against the pagans—as the title specifies—with apologetic intent, he seeks to demonstrate the coherence of the action of providence in history: for him the designs of God are not inscrutable, but clear.

Like many ancient historians, he does not directly use the authors he cites (esp. *Plato, Polybius, Sallust, Trogus Pompeius), and does not cite his true sources, the identification of which is still discussed (see Goetz, 25-29). Among them, however, besides the Bible, are Justin the historian (for the events not pertaining to Roman history), a summary of Livy, Florus, Eutropius, the Chronicle of *Eusebius-*Jerome, Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History translated into Latin by *Rufinus and Augustine's City of God. Orosius is neither too erudite nor too accurate: he believes *Suetonius to have been the author of the Gallic War (VI, 7,2), and that Sallust had narrated the period of *Domitian (VII, 10,4). He draws from his sources what is useful to his argument, i.e., catastrophes, defeats, large numbers of deaths; if he has differing versions, he chooses the most dramatic. Thus his narrative, at least up to Augustus, is essentially a series of tragic upheavals.

Orosius follows the schema of the succession of the four worldly empires acc. to Dan 2 and 7, but with a geographical and chronological correction that is his own: Babylon, Macedonia, Carthage, Rome (II, 1-3 and VII, 2). He is fascinated by synchronisms and by the symbology of *numbers, to which he sacrifices exactness. By forcing some things, he is able to elaborate an extraordinary construction of chronological parallelisms between the four worldly empires. To underscore the Christ-Augustus synchronism, e.g., he falsifies the date of three episodes which mark the beginning of the monarchy at Rome so as to locate it on the day of *Epiphany, the manifestation of Christ's monarchy (VI, 20 and 22; VII, 1; on these various passages see Paschoud, 115-119 and 125-131). Orosius's History is divided into seven books, like the seven days of the week; the last book is dedicated to the imperial age, which thus appears as the Sunday of human history. In fact, acc. to Orosius, from the time of Augustus good begins to again triumph over evil, to then predominate almost exclusively during the Christian empire. In this way Orosius almost completely eliminates any eschatological dimension of history: he counts ten persecutions of the Christians, compared to the ten plagues of Egypt; after the tenth plague, the Egyptians were swallowed by the Red Sea, which the Hebrews crossed safe and sound; likewise, suggests Orosius, after the tenth persecution, the Christians will be safe from evil: they will escape the eleventh persecution, that of the *Antichrist (VII, 26-27; cf. Paschoud, 119-125).

Orosius thus ends by demonstrating the opposite of what Augustine expounds in the City of God; it is no surprise that Augustine never mentions Orosius after the publication of his History—indeed, he refutes him without naming him (e.g., Civ. Dei XVIII, 52). One might ask whether Orosius is telling the truth when he says that he wrote the work at Augustine's request (see Corsini, 35-51). In the Middle Ages, Orosius's interpretation of history was better understood than Augustine's lofty speculations, and his work was very popular and had a considerable influence: only the "century of lights" forced Orosius off his pedestal. His importance today is not in his value as a source: he in fact does not give us much information that we do not find in older and more reliable historians. But he provides fundamental evidence of the history of ideas in his time, even if he fails to overcome his contradictory tendencies (Christian cosmopolitanism vs. loyalty to the empire, hatred toward the barbarian invaders vs. adhesion to the idea that the invasion makes possible the evangelization of the Germans), and he created the universal Christian history that would be at the basis of medieval historiography. Finally, Orosius, master of the resources of rhetoric, vigorous and impassioned, is not without literary talent.

CPL 571-574; PL 31, 663-1216; CSEL 5 (Zangemeister, 1882: Liber apol., Hist.) and 18, 149-157 (Schepss, 1889: Comm.). Serie Mondadori-Fondazione L. Valla (text, It. tr. by A. Bartalucci, intr. and notes by A. Lippold), 2 vols., Milan 1976 (only Hist.); FC 50 (Eng. tr. by I.W. Raymond - R.J. Deferrari, 1964; only Hist.); Pauli Orosii operum concordantiae, ed. A. Encuentra, Hildesheim 1998; G. Fink, Recherches Bibliographiques sur Paul Orose: Revista de Archivos, BiblMus 58 (1952) 271-322 (bibl. to 1952); Schanz IV, 1, Munich 1920; J. Svennung, Orosiana, Uppsala 1922 (problems of language); B. Lacroix, Orose et ses idées, Montréal-Paris 1965; E. Corsini, Introduzione alle "Storie" di Orosio, Turin 1968; Patrologia III, 466-470; F. Fabbrini, Paolo Orosio, uno storico, Rome 1979; H.W. Goetz, Die Geschichtstheologie des Orosius, Darmstadt 1980; F. Paschoud, La polemica provvidenzialistica di Orosio, in La storiografia ecclesiastica nella tarda antichità, Atti del Convegno di Erice, Messina 1980, 113-133; J.E. López Pereira, Estado de la cuestión bibliográfica sobre Orosio: Euphrosyne 18 (1990) 395-412; A. Polichetti, Rassegna di studi orosiani: Koinonia 18 (1994) 33-61; 19 (1995) 179-197; M.V. Escribano, "Tyrannus" en las "Historiae" de Orosio: entre "breuitas" y "aduersum paganos": Augustinianum 36 (1996) 185-212; S. Bodelón, Orosio: una filosofía de la historia: Memorias de historia antigua 18 (1997) 59-80; V. Gauge, Les routes d'Orose et les reliques d'Étienne: Antiquité tardive 6 (1998) 265-286; E. Spät, The "Commonitorium" of Orosius on the Teachings of the Priscillianists: AAntHung 38 (1998) 357-379; J. Vilella, Biografía crítica de Orosio: JbAC 43 (2000) 94-121.

F. Paschoud

ORPHEUS

I. In general - II. Iconography.

I. In general. Mythical singer and poet; Greek tradition usually linked him with *Thrace, though different versions of his parentage and life circulated in Antiquity. Son of a Muse, sometimes Calliope, and of Apollo or of the river god Oiagros, Orpheus was connected with the voyage of the Argonauts and involved in an infernal katabasis in search of his wife Eurydice. A particular tradition tells of his violent death at the hands of the Maenads, followers of Dionysius, whose orgiastic cult Orpheus had neglected in his special veneration for Apollo. But beyond such traditions of his "life," the essential fact remains the quality of "theologian" attributed to him by virtue of the many religious writings which, from the 6th–5th c. BC, circulated in Greece in Orpheus's name and in that of people variously connected with him (Musaeus, Linus). This literature, usually called ta orphika ("the Orphic things"), was interested in a particular way in theocosmogonic and anthropogonic speculations and became very popular in the late Hellenistic period. In it was expressed a particular religious vision with dualistic leanings, based on the idea of the fragmentation of the original One, which, through a process of evolution, resulted in the present situation involving the presence, in the human body, of a divine substance (the *soul) which aspires to liberation. A life of abstention, sometimes accompanied by cathartic practices, ensures such liberation, freeing the soul from the cycle of rebirth.

To the first generations of Christians the figure of Orpheus, like that of other pagan "sages," appeared in an ambivalent light: rejected as a spokesman of the error of idolatry, he yet seemed, due to some aspects of the religious teaching connected with him, to be one who had prefigured some facts of revelation. The statement of *Augustine suffices, who, reflecting an opinion quite widespread among Christians, saw in Orpheus one who, with the Sibyls, "predicted" some truths about the Father and the Son (Contra Faust. XVII, 15). *Clement of Alexandria attests the use of the figure of the mythical Thracian singer who could tame wild beasts with the sweetness of his music, as a "symbol" of Christ who draws people to himself by the fascination of the divine Word, leading them to the truth (Protr. 1,1-10). This symbolism justifies Orpheus's presence in the Christian art of the first centuries, his image often being characterized by the attributes of the Good *Shepherd: the frescoes of some Roman catacombs (3rd and 4th c.) show Orpheus sometimes acc. to classical iconographical schemes, sometimes in the type of the Good Shepherd, as a figure of Christ.

O. Kern, Orphicorum Fragmenta, Dublin-Zurich [3]1972; W.K.C. Guthrie, Orpheus and the Greek Religion, 1935; DACL 12, 2735-2755; M.L. West, The Orphic Poems, Oxford 1983; Ph. Borgeaud (ed.), Orphisme et Orphée: en l'honneur de Jean Rudhardt, Geneva 1991; A. Masaracchia (ed.), Orfeo e l'Orfismo. Atti del Seminario Nazionale (Rome-Perugia 1985-1991), Rome 1993; L. Brisson, Orphée et l'Orphisme dans l'antiquité gréco-romaine, Paris 1995; Inni orfici, ed. by G. Ricciardelli, Milan 2000; L. Vieillefon, La figure d'Orphée dans l'antiquité tardive, Paris 2003.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

II. Iconography. In early Christian figurative art, the myth of Orpheus is reduced to his figure in Eastern dress, seated among wild beasts or other animals, which he soothes with the sound of the lyre. But there is no reason to consider this as evidence of the presence of an Orphic component in Christianity from the start. The figure of Orpheus thus rendered—in the intentional likeness of the Good Shepherd—recalls, in a unique transference of images and hence only for purposes of communication, the figure of Christ who fascinates and softens even the most restive hearts; but precisely because of the danger of confusion between the two, the scene had little popularity among Christians (Clem. Al., Protr. 1,3; Eus., Praep. ev. XII, 12; Vita Const. 14; ps.-Just., Cohort. ad Graec. 14; Cyr. Al., Contra Jul. 1,26: PG 76, 541; Aug., Contra Faust. XVII, 5). Orpheus appears, however, acc. to a well-defined scheme, in some Roman cemetery frescoes (1st half of 3rd–end of 4th c.): at *Callistus (Wp 37), *Domitilla (Wp 229), Sts. Marcellino and Pietro (Wp 98 and Nestori 1993, 74, n. 79), and Priscilla (ibid., 26, n. 29). The Christian character of some figures of Orpheus sculpted on two *sarcophagus fronts from Ostia (Rep. 70 and 1022) and one from Porto Torres (Pesce, Sarcofagi, n. 57) seems less probable.

According to the most recent findings of iconological research (Murray, The Christian Orpheus, 19ff.), the identification of Orpheus with Christ involves the other, already made in Jewish art, between Orpheus and David in his role as lyrist and psalmist. There is clear evidence of this in a painting in the synagogue of *Dura Europos, a mosaic in that of *Gaza, one in *Jerusalem and a painting—now lost—in the Roman cemetery of Vigna Randanini (Corby-Finney, Orpheus-David, 7ff.). A painted ceiling in the cemetery of Domitilla (Wp 55), which includes the figure of Orpheus in a central clipeus and that of David in a lateral scene, constitutes, for the declining 3rd c., an important proof and a salient phase of this process of assimilation.

A. Boulanger, Orphée: rapports de l'orphisme et du christianisme, Paris 1925; M. de Fraipont, Orphée aux catacombes, Paris-Tournai 1935; B. Bagatti, Il mosaico dell'Orfeo a Gerusalemme: RivAC 28 (1952) 145-160; G. Pesce, Sarcofagi romani di Sardegna, Rome 1957; J.B. Friedman, Syncretism and Allegory in the Jerusalem Orpheus Mosaic: Traditio 23 (1967) 1-13; A. Ferrua, Una nuova regione della catacomba dei SS. Pietro e Marcellino: RivAC 44 (1968) 29-68; F.M. Schoeller, Darstellungen des Orpheus in der Antike, Freiburg i.Br. 1969; H. Stern, Orphée dans l'art paléochrétien: CArch 23 (1974) 1-16; C. Murray, The Christian Orpheus: CArch 26 (1977) 19-27; P. Corby-Finney, Orpheus-David: A Connection in Iconography Between Greco-Roman Judaism and Early Christianity?: Journal of Jewish Art 5 (1978) 6-16; P. Testini, Arte mitraica e arte cristiana, in Mysteria Mithrae, Rome 1979, 435-437; C. Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife, Oxford 1981, 37ff.; F. Bisconti, Un fenomeno di continuità iconografica: Orfeo citaredo, Davide salmista, Cristo pastore, Adamo e gli animali: Cristianesimo e giudaismo: eredità e confronti. XVI Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità cristiana, 7-9 maggio 1987: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 429-436; Id., TIP, 236-237; L. Vieillefon, La figure d'Orphée dans l'Antiquité tardive. Les mutations d'un mythe: du héros païen au chantre chrétien, Paris 2003.

F. Bisconti

ORTHODOXY

I. Orthodoxy-heterodoxy - II. Orthodox Church.

I. Orthodoxy-heterodoxy. In ancient Christianity the term orthodoxy, which means "right or correct opinion" (doxa orthē), connotes Christian doctrine and life in conformity with the original truth about Jesus of Nazareth and his teachings. It is therefore opposed to heterodoxy, whose error it shows up, in the synonymous sense of pseudodoxy ("false opinion"). In this development there is a departure from the classical philosophical meaning of heterodox (having different opinions), as opposed to those who are of the same opinion (homodoxoi). The Pastoral Epistles speak of heterodox teaching (1 Tim 1:3 and 6:3), and 2nd-c. authors speak of heterodox doctrines (Ign., Magn. 8,1; Smyrn. 6,2) and heterodox teachers (Polyc., 3). Just as the term heresy,* from its original meaning of "choice," acquired a pejorative sense, so too did heterodoxy, though this was perhaps a parallel phenomenon, and only later did the two terms come to be identified as synonyms of deviation from Christian doctrine and discipline. This fusion is clear in *Eusebius, where the *quartodeciman churches, excommunicated by Pope *Victor, are called "heterodox" (HE 5,24,9), and false teachers in the church heterodidaskaloi (HE 3,28,8; 7,7,4). These are opposed not to homodoxia but to orthodoxia, while orthodox teachers, like *Irenaeus and *Clement, are called "ambassadors of the church's orthodoxy" (HE 3,23,2), in whom there are no heresies (Athan., C. Arian. 2,42-43). The affirmation of orthodoxy involves the same set of problems as the dialectic orthodoxy-heresy.

J.F. McCue, Orthodoxy and Heresy: Walter Bauer and the Valentinians: VChr 33 (1979) 118-130; M. Simon, From Greek Hairesis to Christian Heresy, in Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition, Paris 1979, 101-116; A. Meredith, Orthodoxy, Heresy and Philosophy in the Later Half of the Fourth Century: The Heythrop Journal 16 (1973) 5-21; J.M. Leroux, Le surgissement d'une orthodoxie au IVe siècle: La Vie Spirit., Suppl. 118 (1976) 294-309; H. Chadwick, Heresy and Orthodoxy in the Early Church, Aldershot 1991.

II. Orthodox Church. In subsequent eras the term orthodoxy was used to indicate the Eastern churches in communion with *Constantinople, which, taken as a whole, were called the "holy, orthodox, Catholic, apostolic Eastern church," distinguishing themselves from the other communities that were not in communion with them, e.g., the *Nestorian, *Jacobite and *Coptic churches—which in turn declared themselves to be Orthodox. The first Sunday in *Lent is celebrated as the feast of orthodoxy (going back to 824), commemorating the triumph over iconoclasm and heresy in general.

S. Bulgakov, The Orthodox Church, London 1935; W. de Vries, Der christliche Osten in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Würzburg 1951; P. Evdokimov, L'orthodoxie, Paris 1959; J.D. Zizioulas, La continuité avec les origines apostoliques dans la conscience théologique des églises orthodoxes: Istina 19 (1974) 65-94.

V. Grossi

ORTU ET OBITU PROPHETARUM ET APOSTOLORUM, De. In the first centuries of our era, the Lives of the prophets were widely spread among Jewish and Christian circles, which from the beginning used them for apologetic purposes (T. Schermann). Added to them, esp. in Late Antiquity, were many legends about the *apostles, in brief treatises whose purpose was to provide essential information on these scriptural personalities. Included in this long literary tradition must be the De ortu et obitu prophetarum et apostolorum, a Latin booklet of biblical prosopography which circulated from the 5th to the 6th c. in a vast NW area that included *Italy, *Gaul and *Spain. The anonymous author collects brief information on 39 persons from Scripture—prophets, apostles and disciples of the Lord Jesus—indicating for each their origin and place of birth (ortus), type of death and place of burial (obitus).

The existence of the De ortu et obitu had been hypothesized in the 1st half of the 20th c., but the first complete edition of the text was published only recently, thanks to the chance discovery of two MSS (F. Dolbeau, 1986). The author's anonymity had not worked in the text's favor, which was broken up over time and ultimately lost, making its way into other compilations such as the prologues to the prophets in some Latin Bibles and *Isidore of Seville's De ortu et obitu patrum, a very popular work due to the prestige of its author. The subsequent editing of other MSS besides the two on which the critical edition is based has allowed both a more precise dating of De ortu et obitu (between *Jerome, from whose works it takes the life of *Jonah and those of six NT personages, and Isidore of Seville), and the identification of a reliance on some compilations of *Epiphanius of Salamis, author of various short biographies of prophets and apostles, the Greek model drawn on by the anonymous Latin author.

Th. Schermann, Propheten- und Apostellegenden. Nebst Jüngerkatalogen des Dorotheus und verwandter Texte, TU, Leipzig 1907; F. Dolbeau, Deux opuscules latins, relatifs aux personnages de la Bible et antérieurs à Isidore de Séville: Revue d'Histoire des Textes 16 (1986) 83-139; Id., Nouvelles recherches sur le "De ortu et obitu prophetarum et apostolorum": Augustinianum 34 (1994) 91-103.

V. Lombino

OSROENE (Osrohene, Osrhoene). The NW territory of Mesopotamia was conquered by *Trajan, who made it a Roman province in 114 (prov. Mesopotamiae), but it was almost immediately abandoned by *Hadrian (d. 138). With the military campaigns of Lucius Verus it became first a Roman protectorate, then in 195 with *Septimius Severus, a Roman province under the authority of a procurator; in 198 the province of Mesopotamia was also created with capital *Nisibis (today Nusaybin, Turkey), with military garrisons at Resaina and Singara, which became, with Nisibis, coloniae. In an early period the Roman province of Osroene excluded the kingdom of *Edessa, left to Abgar VIII (167–177) as a vassal king; his successor, *Abgar IX (177–213), was deposed by the emperor *Caracalla and his kingdom annexed to the province; the city of Edessa received the status of colony (213). Only in the 3rd c. did Abgar X obtain a certain functional independence in the wars with the *Sassanids. The capital of the region was Edessa (Urfa); the population was a mixture of Arameans, Greeks and Persians. Osroene was a strategic territory between the Roman Empire and, first the Parthians, and from the 3rd c. on, the Sassanids. The area was partially lost in the 2nd half of the 3rd c.; with *Diocletian and *Galerius the two provinces of Osrohene (capital Edessa) in the W and Mesopotamiae (capital Nisibis) in the East were re-created. As a consequence of the defeat of *Julian in 363, E Mesopotamia was partially ceded to the Sassanids. The province of Osroene was part of the diocese of the East and was led by a dux with the rank of vir spectabilis, with troops under him. Christianity arrived in Osroene, in particular Edessa, from the 2nd half of the 1st c. from *Jerusalem or from Adiabene (see *Edessa, *Bardesanes, *Abgar, *Mesopotamia, *Persia). A variety of Christian groups confronted each other there: *Marcionites, the followers of Bardesanes, *encratites, Catholics and, from the 3rd c., *Manichees. At the beginning of the 4th c. there were various episcopal sees, but only the bishop of Edessa was present at the Council of *Nicaea (325). In the 4th c. the region contained strongly Christianized areas alongside substantially pagan cities (e.g., Harran, Charrhae). Monasticism, under various forms, spread rapidly. In the 6th c. the majority of Christians were *monophysites. The territory of upper Mesopotamia was conquered by the Arabs in the course of the 7th c.: they occupied *Syria with the Battle of Yarmuk (636), and Edessa in 639.

M.G. Angeli Bertinelli, I Romani oltre l'Eufrate nel II sec. d.C. (le province di Assiria, di Mesopotamia e di Osroene): ANRW II, 9, 1 (1976) 3-45; R.C. Blockley, East Roman Foreign Policy: Formation and Conduct from Diocletian to Anastasius, Leeds 1992; F. Millar, The Roman Near East, 31 B.C.-A.D. 337, Cambridge, MA-London 1993; G. del Olmo Lete - J.L. Montero Fenollós (eds.), Archaeology of the Upper Syrian Euphrates, Barcelona 1999; Mesopotamia and Iran in the Parthian and Sasanian Periods: Rejection and Revival, c. 238 BC-AD 642, Proceedings of a Seminar in memory of Vladimir G. Lukonin, ed. J. Curtis, London 2000; T. Gnoli, Roma, Edessa e Palmira nel III sec. dopo Cristo. Problemi istituzionali. Uno studio sui papiri dell'Eufrate, Pisa-Rome 2000; S.K. Ross, Roman Edessa, London-New York 2001; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiennes dans l'Empire perse, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002; The Roman Eastern Frontier and the Persian Wars: A Narrative History, Part 2, AD 363-628, compiled and edited by G. Greatrex and S.N.C. Lieu, London 2002; N. Lenski, Failure of Empire: Valens and the Roman State in the Fourth Century, Berkeley, CA 2002; Procedings of the II Intern. Congress on the Archaeology of the Ancient Near East, ed. I. Thuesen, I-II, Winona Lake, IN 2004.

A. Di Berardino

OSSIUS (Hosius) (ca. 256–d. after 357). Born ca. 256, bishop of Cordoba ca. 300, a confessor during *Diocletian's persecution, and friend of *Constantine, who asked him to make peace during the *Arian controversy (ca. 324). In the role of peacemaker he presided over the Council of *Antioch early in 325 and played a significant role in the Council of *Nicaea. He also played a prominent role in that of *Serdica (343), where, with the local bishop *Protogenes, he headed the Western bishops. Later, when the West too passed under *Constantius's administration, he refused to subscribe to the condemnation of *Athanasius in 356. But in 357, aged over 100, he was forced to subscribe to the pro-Arian formula of *Sirmium. He died soon after. His yielding, due to old age, made a great impression and provoked violent reactions in the West, from *Hilary, *Phoebadius and the *Luciferians. Ossius's De laude virginitatis and De interpretatione vestium sacerdotalium, mentioned by *Isidore (Vir. ill. 5), are lost. But we have some canons approved at Serdica, a letter written with Protogenes to inform Julius of Rome of some decisions of the Council of Serdica, and one written in 356 to Constantius, who was pressuring Ossius to subscribe to Athanasius's condemnation: here, for the first time after the start of the Constantinian policy of collaboration between church and empire, a bishop points out how beneficial it would be for the emperor to abstain from meddling in the internal affairs of the church, such as the Arian controversy. On the basis of Mt 22:21, Ossius affirms the separation of the two powers.

CPL 537-539; PL 8, 1317-1332; 10, 557-564; 632-848; PLS 1, 184-196; V.C. De Clercq, Ossius of Cordova, Washington, D.C. 1954; Patrologia III, 58-59; BBKL II, 1074-1075.

M. Simonetti

OSTROGOTHS. Information on this population is closely linked to the events of the Gothic Germanic stock until ca. 376, the time at which, following the clash with the *Huns, the detachment (in fact already present) of the *Visigoths from the Ostrogoths became definitive. The former refused to submit to the victors and migrated S, continuing their raids in the territories of the Eastern Roman Empire until the conflict at Hadrianopolis in 378, after which they moved W. The Ostrogoths, on the other hand, chose to subject themselves to the Huns, remaining in the region between the Don and the Dniester Rivers along the Black Sea. With the breakup of the Hunnic kingdom around 453, the Ostrogoths moved N, occupying the territories of *Pannonia, where they stayed from 456/457 to 473, as foederati of the empire. From Pannonia the Ostrogoth people slowly moved toward the Balkans, affecting areas of Lower Moesia, Dacia Ripensis and *Thrace, from where they took the road to Byzantium. The emperor *Zeno, recognizing the danger to the city of *Constantinople, in 487 charged *Theodoric and his army with moving against *Odoacer and reconquering the Italian peninsula. In 489 Theodoric began his journey toward *Italy, where he defeated and killed the king of the Heruli (493); he then obtained formal recognition on the part of the Eastern emperor, who gave him the title rex Romanorum et Gothorum of Italy. Keeping intact the foundations of the Roman imperial administrative organization, Theodoric sought to use it to perfect the organizational system maintained until then by his people. Regarding the legal system, Theodoric, as a functionary of the Byzantine emperor, was careful to apply Roman law in Italian lands and for citizens of the old empire, whereas toward his people he wanted to respect the traditional norms still in force; sources in fact give us certain evidence of the collection and written codification of Gothic laws, called belagines, from before the arrival in Italy (Iordanes, Get. XI, 69,3-6; M.F. Ennodius, Panegyricus XX, 87; Anonymus Valesianus 14 [60]; Cassiodorus, Var. VII, 3).

Religiously, the Ostrogoths remained faithful to their *Arian tradition. Nonetheless, relations with the church of *Rome and with the pope stayed always on a level of reciprocal acceptance and concord, and esp. the Goths, conscious of the importance that ecclesiastical good graces had for relations with the Byzantine Empire, always wanted to keep the religious side in good order. On more than one occasion Gothic kings intervened in church affairs; a primary concern for Theodoric was the *Laurentian schism (498–507), and he intervened directly in the resolution of the issue. Following the gradual reapproach of the Roman church to that of the E, divided because of the *Acacian schism (484–519), relations with Roman Christianity also changed radically; esp. with the issuing of *Justin's edict (523) against heretics, the king of the Goths launched a policy of intolerance against senators and illustrious persons favorable to the empire, such as *Boethius, *Symmachus and Albinus, all tried and put to death for treason. Theodoric's attitude to the pope was also one of suspicion; the pope's representative, Bishop John I (523–526), was sent to Constantinople to plead the Ostrogoth cause in Italy. At Theodoric's death (526), the kingdom passed to his grandson Athalaric and his daughter Amalasuntha.

Despite an auspicious start for the new Gothic government, other reasons for discord reemerged on the occasion of the election of Pope *Boniface II (530–532), opposed by the faction of the clergy which backed the deacon *Dioscorus (d. 530). Very strong throughout this period was the presence, in the Germanic government, of *Cassiodorus, who distinguished himself during the reign of Theodoric and esp., as praefectus praetorio Italiae, under Amalasuntha. Not even the Roman senator's political ability was able to prevent the queen, upon Athalaric's death (534), from being deposed, imprisoned and killed by her husband and successor as ruler, Theodatus. The woman's death moved the Byzantine emperor *Justinian to decide for war against the Goths. The Byzantine general *Belisarius, victor in the campaign against the *Vandals in *Africa, was charged with reconquering the peninsula and evicting the Germanic population. Thus began the Greco-Gothic conflict, which bloodied the Italian peninsula for eighteen years. Theodatus was soon killed by an assassin sent by Vitiges, general of the Gothic army, who took over command of the government (536). The two armies clashed, resulting in a victory by the Roman Belisarius, who also captured the Germanic king (540). A truce followed, until the Goths found a worthy military leader in Totila. The war then recommenced, even more intensely than before. The city of Rome in particular suffered gravely during a long period of sieges. The situation changed radically when Justinian decided to turn the war over to *Narses. Arriving in Italy in early 552 with a huge army, he went straight to *Ravenna, then turned to Rome: the two armies, Roman and Gothic, met at Tagina, where Totila died in battle. The Byzantine march continued to the walls of Rome, where the garrison left by the barbarian king was easily defeated and the city retaken. Meanwhile the Goths elected Teia as king, having moved their base of operations to Campania, near the Monti Lattari, where the decisive battle took place. Narses got the better of his foe, who was forced to retreat in March 553; Teia died in battle. At that point the war could be considered over, with the definitive defeat of the Gothic people, followed by their complete dispersion and the temporary reconquest of the Western territories by the Eastern emperor.

Sources: Acta Synhodorum habitarum Romae, MGH Auct. Ant. XII, 399-454; Boethius, Philosophiae Consolationis Libri Quinque, CSEL 67; Cassiodorus, Variarum Libri XII, CCL 96; Ennodius, Panegyricus dictus regi Theoderico, MGH Auct. Ant. VII, 203-214; Excerpta Valesiana, BT; Duchesne LP I; Iordanis, De origine actibus Getharum, MGH Auct. Ant. V/1, 53-138; Paul the Deacon, Historia Romana, MGH Auct. Ant. II, 216-224; Procopius of Caesarea, De bello gothico, BT.

Studies: O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Storia di Roma dell'Istituto Nazionale di Studi Romani, IX, Bologna 1941, 45-94; I Goti in Occidente. Problemi, Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, III, Spoleto 1956; T.S. Burns, The Ostrogoths, Wiesbaden 1980; Id., A History of the Ostrogoths, Bloomington, IN 1984; Ch. Pietri, Aristocratie et Société dans l'Italie Chrétienne au temps d'Odoacre et de Théodèric: MEFRA 93/1 (1981) 417-467; H. Wolfram, Storia dei Goti, Rome [2]1985 (1st ed. Munich 1979), 431-618; P. Heather, Goths and Romans 332-489, Oxford 1991; Id., The Goths, Oxford 1996; A. Schwarcz, Die Goten in Pannonien und auf dem Balkan nach dem Ende des Hunnenreiches bis zum Italienzug Theoderichs des Großen: Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung 100 (1992) 50-83; G. Vismara, Il diritto nel Regno dei Goti in Italia: Studia et Documenta Historiae et Iuris 58 (1992) 1-33; Teoderico il grande e i Goti d'Italia, Atti del XIII Congr. int. di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1993; B. Luiselli, Teodorico e gli Ostrogoti tra romanizzazione e nazionalismo gotico: Rom-Barb 13 (1994-95) 75-98; T. Sardella, Società, chiesa e stato nell'età di Teoderico: papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; P. Amory, People and Identity in Ostrogothic Italy (489-534), Cambridge 1997; V. Epp, Goten und Römer unter Theoderich dem Großen, in Migration und Integration. Aufnahme und Eingliederung in historischen Wandel, M. Beer - M. Kintzinger - M. Krauss (eds.), Stuttgart 1997, 55-74; L. Gatto, Figura e funzione del Comes. Momento di raccordo e di convivenza fra Goti e Romani, in Società multiculturali nei secoli

V-IX: scontri, convivenza, integrazione nel Mediterraneo occidentale, Atti delle VII Giornate di Studio sull'Età Romanobarbarica (Benevento, 31 maggio - 2 giugno 1999), Naples 2001, 127-142; G. Tabacco, Egemonie sociali e strutture del potere nel medioevo italiano, Turin [3]2000, 76-92; S. Rota, La Chiesa di Roma di fronte ai barbari (V-VIII secolo), in La Comunità Cristiana di Roma. La sua vita e la sua cultura dalle origini all'alto Medio Evo, eds. L. Pani Ermini - P. Siniscalco, Vatican City 2000, 139-170; F. Giunta, Gli Ostrogoti in Italia, in G. Pugliese Carratelli (ed.), Magistra Barbaritas. I barbari in Italia, Turin [2]2001; K. Tabata, I comites gothorum e l'amministrazione municipale in epoca ostrogota, in Bibliothèque de l'antiquité tardive, 3, Études d'antiquité tardive offertes à Lellia Cracco Ruggini, J.M Carrié and R. Lizzi Testa (eds.), Turnhout 2002, 67-78; B. Luiselli, Dall'arianesimo dei Visigoti di Costantinopoli all'arianesimo degli Ostrogoti d'Italia: Rendiconti dell'Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei, Classe di Scienze morali, storiche e filologiche 16/1 (2005) 5-30; G. Pilara, Ancora un momento di riflessione sulla politica italiana di Teoderico, re dei Goti: StudRom 53/3-4 (2005) 431-469; Id., Il regno di Amalasunta e Atalarico: questioni politiche e sociali per un'analisi dei rapporti fra Stato e Chiesa: Signum. Rivista di studi medievali e moderni I (2006) 93-115, Id., La città di Roma fra Chiesa e Impero durante il conflitto gotico-bizantino, Rome 2006.

G. Pilara

OUR FATHER. See *LORD'S PRAYER

OUSIA. The term ousia is derived from the Greek verb einai, "to be." It is usually translated "substance" or "essence" (Lat. substantia, essentia), but carries an ample series of meanings not completely expressed by these words. Einai, "to be," was normally opposed to genesthai, to "come to be" or "become," so that ousia represented a thing considered as persisting, or that which was permanent in something, beyond its changeable states. The problem remained of how this was to be explained or with what it should be identified; on this there was little agreement, and various theories were developed.

*Plato was the first great thinker to use the word in philosophical discussion. He showed Socrates asking the question: "what is"—e.g.—"justice?" as distinct from any specific just act. For Plato the ousia of a thing was its "Idea," its eternal and perfect archetype; ousia could also be used in a collective sense for "reality," i.e., the entirety of Ideas, as opposed to "appearance," changeable phenomena.

*Aristotle made limited use of this conception, holding that things were composed of their form (eidos, idea) and their matter: the form of things was permanent and characteristic of the species, but did not subsist outside its relation in matter: the Platonic conception of Ideas was thus rejected. Aristotle explained that the ousia could refer both to the form of things and to their matter, or to their union, i.e., to the thing itself. In the Categories he distinguished between the first ousia, the individual person or thing, and the second ousia, the species or genus to which it belonged. Considering its subsequent importance, this nomenclature was surprisingly not widespread until about AD 200: in any case it failed to clarify the distinction between the species understood collectively (e.g., the human race) and its specific form (e.g., human nature).

*Stoicism saw the world as a process in evolution, whose development was controlled not by a permanent system of Ideas or Forms, but by a single rational principle operating within it: formless matter and informing reason were thus two aspects of what was really a single and entire complex. Against this, however, Platonism considered the Stoics to be materialists for whom the permanent reality (ousia) of the world was its matter, rather than the intelligible and spiritual realities (noētai ousiai), as they themselves held.

In the Bible, ousia is not used as a philosophical term, but only in the sense of "property" or "possession." The Christian writers quickly became familiar with the Platonic distinction between material ousia and immaterial ousia, the latter including not just intelligible realities (e.g., moral ideas) but also rational beings, such as demons or angels (as in some old Platonizing writers, e.g., *Philo). The discussion soon turned to God's ousia: it was commonly held that we could be sure of God's existence (one possible sense of ousia), but that we could never comprehend his nature (which could also be called ousia). Thus God's ousia was declared incomprehensible, though in fact it was often discussed, having recourse to biblical texts such as "God is . . . fire . . . light . . . love." It was often asserted that God could be classified among "immaterial realities," though with the important proviso that God, for Christians, was the sole creator of all other reality.

Ousia played an important role in the theology of the Trinity, in which a composite of the term—homoousios ("of the same ousia," "consubstantial," "coessential")—was decisive. Discussion centered on the Logos, or Son of God, and it was soon admitted that God's Word could not be understood simply as an activity, like a pronounced word, but must be a totally independent reality: whence it seemed to follow that it must be a distinct ousia. Applying the same principle to the *Holy Spirit, it might seem that there were three ousiai in God, a formulation which can be found in some Greek writers before the Council of *Nicaea. The formulation was criticized as suggesting three different natures or degrees of divinity. But some Greek authors, from

*Origen on, had expressed God's triple reality with the alternative expression "three *hypostases," using a term that had come to be more clearly associated with individual beings. This formulation too was opposed by some Latin authors, for whom hypostasis corresponded to their term substantia, which was its etymological equivalent. Thus, acc. to the Latins, the Origenian Greeks believed in three types of divinity, whereas the Latin expression una substantia (and its equivalent "one hypostasis," used by some Greeks) risked being understood as "one single person."

The Council of Nicaea, opposing the teaching of *Arius, established that there was a single ousia in God, and that the Son came from the Father's ousia; but the doctrine of the three hypostases was not directly attacked, and the Eastern theologians continued to insist on the distinct reality of the Father, Son and Spirit. Modern discussions on Nicaea often hold that the conciliar bishops must have presupposed a definition of ousia which implied the Aristotelian distinction between first and second ousia: either "a thing," or "a nature." This is mistaken: the Categories had little influence on the Christian writers of that period, and in any case the Nicene formula was conceived in order to ensure wide agreement, while it condemned Arianism (see Kelly, Doctrines, 233-237; Stead, Divine Substance, 223-266). The solution was clarified in the course of the 4th c. as discussions proceeded between those who (like *Athanasius) spoke of "one hypostasis" in three persons, and those who continued to defend the "three hypostases." An important reference point was the Council of *Alexandria of 362, in which Athanasius decided for tolerance: the expression "one hypostasis" need not be understood as a fusion of the three persons, and the expression "three hypostases" was not to be condemned, as though a division were being made. Shortly later the Cappadocians opted for the formula "three hypostases, but one ousia," which became the normal orthodox expression. Ousia thus came to indicate the essential attributes common to all three persons: but even among the Cappadocians themselves we can find traces of their earlier and more flexible use. Both they and later orthodox theologians emphasized the incomprehensibility of God's ousia: all that we can understand are his activities or "energies."

G.C. Stead, The Concept of Divine Substance: VChr 29 (1975) 1-14; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London [3]1977; G.C. Stead, Divine Substance, Oxford 1977 (bibl.).

G.C. Stead

OXYRHYNCHUS. The city of Oxyrhynchus (Oxyrhynchon Polis, "city of the fish with the pointed nose") was the metropolis of the Roman province of Arcadia, 160 km (99.4 mi) SW of Cairo (ancient Memphis) in the W desert, 17 km (10.6 mi) from Beni Mazar on the Bahr Yusuf Canal, W affluent of the Nile terminating in Lake Moeris and the oasis of Fayum. In the Roman and Byzantine period it was a prosperous capital of the Oxyrhychus district. Oxyrhynchus (today the village of el-Bahnasa) had streets with columns, a theater for 11,000 spectators, a hippodrome, four thermal baths, temples for Egyptian (Serapis, Zeus Ammon, Isis, Osiris), Greek (Demeter, Apollo, Hermes, Dionysius) and Roman (Fortuna, Capitoline Jove, Mars) divinities. In 641 it came under Arab dominance and slowly declined, in part because its water system had been ruined. Few ruins remain of the ancient splendor, and few elements of the considerable Christian presence; there have been various finds of *Coptic art. There was also a Jewish community at Oxyrhynchus (see R. Mazza). From 1896, with the work of two English archaeologists, B. Grenfell and A. Hunt, and later of other archaeologists (including Italians), an impressive quantity of ostraca, papyri and fragments (in Greek, *Coptic, *Latin, Hebrew, *Syriac, Arabic) have been found, preserved thanks to the particular climatic conditions. The papyri date from the Ptolemaic period to the 8th c. Most of them regard the life of the city and relations among citizens (private and public acts, registers, inventories, letters, tax receipts etc.), by which it is possible to have a vivid outline of the way of life and the problems of an important Late Antique urban center. The papyri containing literary works are very numerous (Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, Sappho, Alcaeus, Callimachus, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, Menander, Apollonius of Rhodes, Demosthenes etc.), with further papyri containing scientific works (astronomy, mathematics) and an epitome of Livy's work. With new technology it is possible to read thousands of as yet unpublished papyrus fragments, since much of the content of the discovered material is otherwise unknown. The most substantial parts of the Oxyrhynchus papyri have been published in the series of the Oxyrhynchus papyri; more than 75 volumes have been published since 1898.

The legend that Joseph, Mary and Jesus, in the flight from Herod, took refuge at Oxyrhynchus has been passed down. The Christian community is attested from the 3rd c., since some Christians suffered persecution under *Diocletian (the eunuch Elias, Isaac of Tiphre and Epiusa). A papyrus (POxy 1,43) attests the existence of two churches at the beginning of the 4th c., but its first known bishop is Pelagius, a Meletian (PG 25, 376); the first Catholic is Theodore (PG 24, 1430). To a visitor in the late 4th c., the city seemed totally Christian. In fact, the author of the Historia monachorum in Aegypto, attributed to *Rufinus by *Jerome (Ep. 133), presents the situation this way in 394: "It was then the turn of Oxyrhynchus, city of the Thebaid. . . . The city teems with monks; and around it—nearby—there are many others. Even the public buildings (which could at one time be dedicated to the gods), the temples of the ancient error, had by now become the dwellings of monks. In that city there were more monasteries than private houses. The city, as is known, is large, full of people; it numbers 12 beautiful churches" (ch. V). In the village of al-Sanquriya (Deir al-Sanquriya), 3 km (1.9 mi) outside of el-Bahnasa, are the remains of a Christian monastery.

Many papyri are Christian: numerous biblical texts from both the OT and NT; passages from the Gospel of Thomas, the Didache (POxy 15,1782), *Hermas (POxy 1,5; 3,404; 15,1828), the Acts of Paul (POxy 1,6), *Aristides (POxy 15,1778), *Irenaeus (POxy 3,405) and more. The papyrus fragment Oxyrhynchus 840 describes a controversy in the temple between Jesus and a leader of the priests over purifications; papyrus Egerton 2 from ca. 150 contains four gospel pericopes and is important for the dating of *John's gospel. One papyrus (POxy 42,3035) concerns the order for the arrest of a Christian by the local curia (perhaps during a persecution); another (POxy 31,2601; Naldini, 169-170 and 438) refers to the sacrifices to which all were obligated; another is the first attestation of the observance of Sunday in Egypt by the courts, acc. to *Constantine's law of 321 (POxy 54,3759). POxy 11,1357 presents a Christian calendar (year 535/536; see AB 42 [1924] 83-99). Many papyri preserve letters of Christians, e.g., POxy 8,1162, of a presbyter; POxy 8,1161, of a sick woman; POxy 6,839 speaks of a healing; POxy 1,198, POxy 14,1683, POxy 10,1299 of family and everyday problems, etc. An ostracon reports that Bishop Aphu of Oxyrhynchus required of candidates for the diaconate the memorization of 25 psalms, two letters of St. Paul and parts of the gospels (W.E. Crum, Coptic Ostraca, London 1903, n. 29, n. 3); others relate prayers for healing of a fever (POxy 6,924; 8,1152; DACL 13, 1384).

Fedalto 2, 629; L.G. Modena, Il cristianesimo a Ossirinco secondo i papiri: Bulletin Société royale d'Archéologie. Alexandrie 31, n.s. IX, 2 (1937) 254-269; P. Pruneti, I centri abitati dell'Ossirinchite, Florence 1981; O. Montevecchi, La papirologia, Milan 1988; S. Daris, Scritti rari e scritti anonimi da Ossirinco: Aevum Antiquum 2 (1989) 47-95; J. Krüger, Oxyrhyncos in der Kaiserzeit. Studien zur Topographie und Literaturrezeption, Frankfurt a.M. 1990; M. Lama, Aspetti di tecnica ad Ossirinco: copie letterarie su rotoli documentari: Aegyptus 71 (1991) 55-120; M.S. Funghi - G. Messeri Savorelli, Lo "scriba di Pindaro" e le biblioteche di Ossirinco: SCO 42 (1992) 43-62; S. Daris, I papiri letterari di Ossirinco: Papyrologica Lupiensia 5 (1996) 109-128; M. Naldini, Il cristianesimo in Egitto, Florence 1998; M. Capuani, Egitto copto, Milan 1999 (Eng. tr. Christian Egypt: Coptic Art and Monuments Through Two Millennia, Collegeville, MN 1999); R. Mazza, Documenti dall'Egitto relativi agli Ebrei (sec. V-VII): AnSE 17 (2000) 383-394; W. Johnson, Bookrolls and Scribes in Oxyrhynchus, Toronto (Ont.) 2004; F. Bovon, "Fragment Oxyrhynchus840," Fragment of a Lost Gospel, Witness of an Early Christian Controversy over Purity: JBL 119 (2000) 705-728.

A. Di Berardino

P

PACATUS (d. after ca. 410). A difficult person to identify. Harnack once tried to identify him as Latinius Drepanius Pacatus, an orator from Aquitaine (4th/5th c.) (SPAW 1921, 266-284; 834-835). Harnack also suggested that he could be connected to another individual with the name Pacatus, an apologist and author of the treatise Contra Porphyrium, a few fragments of which remain (PL 68,359; PG 5,1025-1028). These hypotheses should be rejected (W. Bährens, "Pacatus," Hermes 56 [1921] 443-445); it seems better to associate him with a certain Pacatus, who was a close friend of *Paulinus of Nola. The presbyter *Uranius sent a letter to him concerning Paulinus's death (Epistula de obitu Paulini ad Pacatum). As one can gather from the letter itself, it seems certain that this Pacatus intended to commemorate Paulinus's life by writing a biography in poetic verses (ch. 1: Nunc autem veniamus ad ea quae tibi, qui vitam eius versibus illustrare disponis, dicendi materiam subministrent ["Now, because you are planning to describe his life in Latin verse, let us talk about the facts of his life that are going to provide you information for speaking about him"]).

CPL 1152a; Pacatus (Ps. Polycarpi Smyrnensis) Contra Porphyrium, ed. F.X. Funk - F.D. Diekamp, Patres Apostolici, II, Tübingen 1913, 397-400; Epistula de obitu Paulini: PL 53, 859-866; E. Galletier, Panégyriques latins, III, Paris 1955, 49 n.4; J.F. Matthews, Gallic Supporters of Theodosius, Latomus 30 (1971) 1073-1099; A. Pastorino, Il De obitu sancti Paulini di Uranio, Augustinianum 24 (1984) 115-141; Pacatus Drepanus, Panegyric to the emperor Theodosius, Liverpool 1987; A. Lovino, Su alcune affinità tra il Panegirico per Teodosio di Pacato Drepanio e il De obitu Theodosii di sant'Ambrogio, VetChr 26 (1989) 371-376.

L. Dattrino

PACHOMIUS (ca. 292–347). Founder of *cenobitism. Born into a *pagan family in the remotest S part of Egypt, he converted upon witnessing the love of Christians for the new recruits of the imperial army. From the moment of his baptism (313), he was attracted to the monastic life in order to serve his brothers; he followed the austere school of the solitary Palamon. After an unsuccessful attempt at communal life, he deemed it necessary to impose strict poverty and rigid discipline upon his brothers. He possessed the gift of understanding different individuals, maintaining their total allegiance and organizing their collective efforts. At times, he was too heavy handed, which pleased no one. Some even accused him of acting on the basis of visions and spiritual intuitions, because he was not one for abstract knowledge. In many *monasteries, esp. at Tabennesi and Pbou, he gathered thousands of monks and nuns, who were maintained by a thriving economy. Shortly before his death in 347, he was subject to the judgment of local bishops gathered at Latopolis, but his disciples' zeal rescued him. Even *Athanasius of *Alexandria remained his faithful supporter. Toward the end of his life, though, he rejected his disciple *Theodore, who appeared to be destined to succeed him.

For many years, Theodore preserved the most vivid, respectful, but also very human memories of Pachomius. It was precisely these memories of his humanness that provide the basis of the *Coptic Lives and the Greek First Life. (The Greek version was edited, perhaps, before the first Coptic Life was put to writing, because the brothers who translated it were more comfortable with Greek. But the Greek was written on the basis of the best preserved memories in Coptic. The Greek recension had a remote audience in mind; it omits his various idiosyncrasies and downplays the founder's visions and charismatic authority.) The other Greek Lives and the Latin Life that is dependent upon it already distance themselves from the sound authenticity of the ancient documents. With regard to the Rules*, it is difficult to determine if they were written before the founder's death. In *Jerome's translation these Rules appear in four collections that do not line up. It was precisely this Latin text that exerted great influence in the West. Only fragments have been found in Coptic (the same could be said of the Lives); in Greek, only excerpts have survived. Pachomius is also the author of *letters written in a cryptic language, later translated by Jerome, then discovered in Coptic and Greek. Some Coptic *catecheses, moreover, have been discovered.

The Lives turn Pachomius into an opponent of *Origen; this probably reflects the controversies at the beginning of the 4th c. The hypothesis that his community collected the "*gnostic" texts discovered at *Nag Hammadi remains subject to fierce debate.

CPG 2353-2355; DIP 6, 1067-1073; BBKL 6, 1413-1419; A. Boon, Pachomiana latina, Louvain 1932; F. Halkin, S. Pachomii Vitae Grecae, Brussels 1932; L.Th. Lefort, Les vies coptes de s. Pachôme, Louvain 1943, 1966; L.Th. Lefort, Oeuvres de s. Pachôme et de ses disciples (CSCO 159-160) Louvain 1956; L.Th. Lefort, S. Pachomii Vita Bohairice Scripta (CSCO 107, S.Coptici 11, Traduction) Louvain 1964; L.Th. Lefort, S. Pachomii Vitae Sahidice Scriptae (CSCO 99, 100; S.Coptici 9,10) Louvain 1965; A.J. Festugière, La première Vie grecque de S. Pachôme: Les moines d'Orient, IV,2, Paris 1965; A. Veilleux, La liturgie dans le cénobitisme pachômien, Rome 1968; F. Ruppert, Das pachomianische Mönchtum, Münsterschwarzach 1971; A. de Vogüé, Saint Pachôme et son oeuvre d'après plusieurs études récentes, RHE 69 (1974) 425-453; H. Quecke, Die Briefe Pachoms, Regensburg 1975; A. Veilleux, Pachomian Koinonia, I-III, Kalamazoo 1980–1981; F. Moscatelli, Vita copta di S. Pacomio, Padua 1981; H. Bacht, Das Vermächtnis des Ursprungs: Studien zum frühen Mönchtum II: Pachomius – Der Mann und sein Werk, Würzburg 1983; P. Rousseau, Pachomius: The Making of a Community in Fourth-Century Egypt, Berkeley 1985; T. Baumeister, Der aktuelle Forschungsstand zu den Pachomiusregeln, Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift 40 (1989) 313-321; A. de Vogüé, De Saint Pachôme à Jean Cassien: Études littéraires et doctrinales sur le monachisme égyptien à ses débuts (SA 120) Rome 1996; A. Camplani, Sulle date del Sinodo di Latopolis e della morte di Pacomio, StudMon 37 (1995) 7-18; A. Khosroyev, Die Bibliothek von Nag Hammadi. Einige Probleme des Christentums in Ägypten während der ersten Jahrhunderte (Arbeiten zum spätantiken und koptischen Ägypten 7), Altenberge 1995; E. Wipszycka, The Nag Hammadi Library and the Monks: A Papyrologist's Point of View, JJP 30 (2000) 179-191.

J. Gribomont

PACIAN (4th c.). Bishop of *Barcelona toward the end of the 4th c.; died during the reign of *Theodosius. He wrote various works (Jerome, Vir. ill. 106), among which was the Cervus (or Cervulus), to dissuade the faithful from celebrating the feasts in honor of the New Year. From his writings, three letters written to the *Novatianist *Sympronianus have survived to our day. In these letters, he combats the rigorist ecclesiology of these heretics by contrasting the unity of the Catholic Church with the plurality of heresies and by recalling the fact that even Novatian himself approved the pardon of the lapsi (the lapsed) before becoming a *schismatic. Using a large number of passages from the NT, he demonstrates that even after *baptism the church allows for the repentance of the sinner; the church desires the conversion of sinners, not their death. Pacian discusses penance in his Paraenesis ad paenitentiam to exhort sinners to public penance, which, at that time, many Christians refused to do either out of dread for the sanctions imposed by the penance, or out of concern for what others would think of them. We even possess one of Pacian's baptismal sermons. Pacian, however, did not write the Liber ad Iustinum Manichaeum and the De similitudine carnis peccati, treatises G. Morin attributed to him. Scholars have properly attributed the second work to *Eutropius.

CPL 561-563; PL 13, 1051-1094; Ed. L. Rubio Fernández, Barcelona 1958; Patrologia III, 124-126 (bibl.); BBKL VI, 1423-1426; P. Mattei, La figure de Novatien chez Pacien de Barcelone: Souces et valeur documentaire des 'Lettres' à Simpronianus sur le sujet, Augustinianum 38 (1998) 355-370; Id., Baptême hérétique, ecclésiologie et Siracide 34,25: Notes sur l'influence de Cyprien dans un texte de Pacien de Barcelone, RTL 30 (1999) 180-194; Pacien de Barcelone et l'Hispanie au IV^e^ siècle, ed. D. Bertrand et al., Paris 2004.

M. Simonetti

PAGAN - PAGANISM. The Latin term paganus, a, um (from pagus, -i: village) referred to what was rustic, of the countryside, of the village; its secondary meaning was civil, middle class, as opposed to the military class. Scholars have discussed the historical process that introduced the religious meaning of the term paganus, which has remained in the corresponding adjective pagan, meaning: the one who (or that which) *belongs to ancient polytheism, Gentile. Some scholars have argued that the religious meaning came from the secondary meaning (T. Zahn and after him many other scholars), others from the original meaning (J. Zeiller). The question is extremely complex and has been long discussed, with scholars offering different hypotheses. It should be noted, however, that only in the 4th c. do certain documents attest that the term paganus acquired the modern meaning in the language of Christians: the first document, dated between 300 and 330, is an inscription (CIL X/2, 7112) pertaining to a baby girl, Iulia Florentina, who was born as a pagana and received *baptism, that is fidelis facta. In the second document, which is also presented in an inscription (mutila; CIL VI, 30463; Diehl Inscript. Lat. Christ., vol. I, 1342), we read of a woman who inter fidels fidelis fuit, inter [al]ienos pagana fuit. This meaning of paganus became the norm during the 2nd half of the 4th c. *Orosius, at the beginning of the 5th, says that the pagani are alieni a civitate Dei (Hist. adv. Paganos, pro. 1,9).

This semantic evolution is difficult to explain; as a result, various suggestions have been forwarded. In the 2nd half of the 4th c. one finds the use of the term paganismus, even though it is rare, in, e.g., *Marius Victorinus's writings (see Comm. in epist. Pauli ad Galatas 2:9). If one wants to trace the notion of "paganism" as a religion and a way of life that does not mix with *Judaism or Christianity, it is necessary to keep in mind several other ideas. Already from the 2nd c., the apologists divided humanity into three group: Greeks (Ἕλληνες), *Jews (Ἰουδαῖοι) and Christians (Χριστιανοί); this came about because Christians did not identify themselves with either Hellenic or Jewish culture. On this basis, they defined themselves as the τρίτον γένος or the καινὸν γένος in order to defend the newness and originality of Christianity precisely with reference to paganism and Judaism; for this reason, they directed their apologetic treatises both πρὸς Ἰουδαίος and πρὸς Ἕλληνας.

When *Tertullian, the first, or one of the very first, Christian writers of the Latin language, wrote a work against the pagans, he titled it Ad nationes, making it thus known that in all likelihood he recognized that the concept romanus retained its ethnic or political meaning but did not deprive Christians of the title of Roman citizens nor did it intend to place them outside the res publica. That Christians applied to pagans the Latin term nationes or gentes, which translates the Greek term ἔθνη, as has been suggested (see A. Schneider, Le premier livre, pp. 13ff.), came about perhaps (1) through the influence of the OT—the LXX (Septuagint) designates the holy people of Israel as a λαός and the pagans as ἔθνη, the last term being taken up by the NT, along with its derivative ἐθνικοί—and (2) from the influence of Roman "nationalism" that set the populus romanus against the gentes or the nationes, inasmuch as they were peoples foreign, provincial and not too geographically distant from the barbarians.

At the end of the 3rd c., *Arnobius would still entitle his *apologetic work Adversus nationes. Later the term paganus would prevail; this brings to mind the work of Paulus *Orosius, Historiarum adversus paganos libri VII.

It is clear that the worst sense of the notions of "pagan" and "paganism" took hold among Christians: these terms stood for beliefs in false gods accompanied by negative and reprehensible rituals, practices, customs and practices. But at the same time, these terms reveal the historical situation of the relationship between paganism and Christianity, which constitutes another theme of great interest for understanding the historical dynamics of the first centuries of the common era, as the enormous bibl. on this topic demonstrates.

T. Zahn, Paganus: Neue Kirchl Zeitschr. 10 (1899) 18ff; J. Zeiller, Paganus Étude de terminologie storique, Paris-Fribourg 1917; B. Altaner, ZKG 58 (1939) 130ff; C. Mohrmann, Encore une fois paganus: VChr 6 (1952) 109-121 (= Id., Études sur le latin des Chrétiens, t. III, Rome 1979, 277-289); E. Demougeot, Remarques sur l'emploi de Paganus: Studi in onore di A. Calderini e R. Paribeni, I, Milan 1956, 337-350, H. Grégoire, Les persécutions dans l'Empire Romain, Brussels [2]1964, 188-220; I. Opelt, Griechische und lateinische Bezeichnungen der Nichtchristen. Ein terminologischer Versuch: VChr 19 (1965) 1-22; A. Schneider, Le premier livre "Ad nationes" de Tertullien, Geneva-Rome 1968, 10ff., 187ff. (Christians as a tertium genus) and passim. On the conflict/encounter between paganism and Christianity, see the classic work of P. de Labriolle, La réaction payenne, Paris 1934 ([2]1948). For a more recent treatement, see L. Padovese, Lo scandalo della croce. La polemica anticristiana nei primi secoli, Rome 1988; F. Ruggiero, La follia dei cristiani. La reazione pagana al Cristianesimo nei secoli I-V, Rome 2002 (there are extensive bibl. references on pp. 213-251, see P. Siniscalco, Il cammino di Cristo nell'Impero romano, Rome-Bari [5]2004 (with a short bibl. on pp. 335ff.).

P. Siniscalco

PAHLAVI. Dead language belonging to the W Iranian group into which numerous works of Christian interest seem to have been translated, generally from *Syriac. Of these works, only *Manichean texts and a Psalter have survived.

C.A. Friedrich, Bruchstücke einer Pehlevi-Übersetzung der Psalmen. Aus dem Nachlass herausgegeben von Kaj Barr, Berlin 1933; B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament . . ., Oxford 1977, 276-277; W. Sundermann, Christliche Evangelientexte in der Überlieferung der iranisch-manichäischen Literatur: MIOF 14 (1968) 388-415; Ph. Gignoux, L'auteur de la version pehlevie du psautier serait il nestorien?, in Mémorial Mgr G. Khouri-Sarkis, Louvain 1969, 233-244; D. Shapira, Biblical Quotations in Pahlavi: Henoch 23 (2001)187-195 [Old Testament questions]; C.G. Cereti, La letteratura pahlavi, Milan 2001; C.G. Cereti, Le Croci di San Tommaso e la letteratura cristiana in lingue medioiraniche, in Studi in onore di Umberto Scerrato per il suo settantacinquesimo compleanno, ed. M. V. Fontana and B. Genito, Naples 2003, 193-206.

S.J. Voicu

PAIDEIA. Christianity certainly produced a comprehensive conception of paideia, understood as an expression of a new vision of the world and the transcendent, and therefore as education on the basis of such principles. Nevertheless, this conception was not (like many other teachings) the object of theory and systematic inquiry during the first years of the new religion.

The School of *Alexandria, esp. its leaders *Clement and *Origen, achieved a theoretical advance by reaching one of the first comprehensive examinations of the topic. In the Pedagogue, Clement maintains that Greek learning, *Hellenic paideia, provides a model for Christian learning; it serves as a preliminary state of Christian truth. In the Pedagogue, Clement assigns Christ the role of the divine educator. Clement thus places himself before the Greeks even with respect to the idea of learning/culture in its totality. To present Christ as a pedagogue implied a curriculum, and its full meaning can be understood only by considering the historical background of the entire tradition of Greek paideia. It does not mean, therefore, that one should limit oneself only to the comparison of teachings; instead, it means that one should retain the theoretical principles that underlie this comparison. The lofty meaning Clement assigns to the term "pedagogue" is close to the philosophic meaning that Plato had given to God, when he defined him in the Laws (X, 897b) as "the pedagogue of the entire world." By analogy, Christ should be seen on this very high level, as the universal pedagogue. Other philosophers and writers, Greeks and barbarians, were able to achieve a "pedagogy" only because of God's *providential plan. Greek philosophy, however imperfect it may have been, was therefore a type of preliminary education for the perfect *gnostic.

The true paideia, as a result, is identified as the Christian religion, i.e., Christianity in its intellectual form, which was formulated by Clement, because it is clear that only if it is understood as *gnosis does Christianity express the divine paideia. This being a given, Clement attributed an important part of gnosis to the disciplines of enkyklios paideia, i.e., the "humanistic" learning, which was dialectic, astronomy and geometry. The primary function of dialectic is to lead the gnostic to an understanding of the world of the forms (Strom. I 176,3; 177,1; VI 80,8). Astronomy helps the gnostic move from a contemplation of the physical world to the transcendent world. The gnostic does not reject the contemplation of the world and its beauties (Strom. IV, 163,1; 169,1) because he knows that by contemplating the harmony and order of the universe, his *soul will be liberated from every contact with the earth (Strom. VI, 80,3; 90,3, etc.). This positive assessment of the encyclopedic disciplines is likewise in agreement with the *Platonic *tradition. In the seventh book of the Republic, Plato had already indicated the role of each of these disciplines. Dialectic renders the human mind capable of knowing the first principle (533cd). Astronomy, in turn, must be the study of what one finds beyond the world (529d), because the contemplation of the order of the universe causes humans to have *faith in God (Laws 966de). Even geometry helps the intellect to elevate itself to contemplate reality because the objects of this science are not subject to change or corruption (Republic 527b).

The same conception of the encyclopedic disciplines can be found in the schools of thought upon which Clement depends such as *Philo's or those contemporaneous to him such as *Middle Platonism and *Hermetism. For example, acc. to Alcinous, dialectic leads to the knowledge of the first principles and the divine things (Didask. pp. 162, 8-10 and 17-18); astronomy allows humans to pass from the world of the senses to the world of the forms and to obtain some knowledge of the creator of the universe (162, 22-28 and 30-32). In sum, only after the study of all these propedeutic teachings can one begin the study of theology.

Origen made the discussion more complex precisely because of his less favorable attitude toward Greek philosophy, despite the fact he studied it no less than Clement. Even Origen maintains that paideia should characterize the Christian religion, and he attributes paideia to the Son of God, whom he analyzes not so much under the aspect of a pedagogue who teaches truth, but rather under the aspect of the Logos who has come to earth to fulfill the duty of the Teacher. The pedagogical aspect of Christ's teaching consists in teaching the human soul—which is clothed with flesh and materiality as a result of its *sin of being "satiated" in the vision of God, a sin committed before time began—to fulfill its mission of knowing the truth and returning to final union with its creator. As Courcelle notes in his well-known and extensive study, it was Origen, in a certain sense, who recovered and used the two values that the pagan tradition had expressed in the teaching of the Oracle at Delphi, "Know Thyself": (1) the original and essentially religious value; (2) the specifically philosophical value recognized and proposed by *Socrates. The need for inner knowledge thus becomes central in a certain type of Christian, or even a purely human, education, starting from the manifold experience of pagan learning; this idea runs through the awareness of Christianity and the *pagan world of Late Antiquity until the era of St. Bernard of Clairveaux.

*Basil of Caesarea used this theme of self-awareness, reworked in a Christian way, esp. in his homily Attende tibi ipsi, in which he interprets the analogous exhortation of Dt 15:9: "Take heed to yourself so that your thoughts do not become iniquitous in your heart." Basil's position in that homily is common to the other great Cappadocians: following the teaching of Origen, Basil proposes a formulation of primarily philosophic ideas intended for Christian rulers—ideas that were originally developed by the Platonic tradition. *Plotinus's thought can be summarized in a concise expression found in the Enneads: "The one who knows one's self will also know one's origin" (VI, 5,7,13). *Porphyry of Tyre dedicated himself to further explaining the ideas of his teacher Plotinus on this point, esp. in the following works: On the Statement "Know Thyself," The Sentences and Letter to Marcella. Of utmost importance in Porphyry's thought is the affirmation that "the soul through true knowledge of our essence . . . reaches the Good, which is its happiness." The exhortation of Dt 15:9 should be interpreted in a way analogous to the Greek precept "Know thyself," in the sense that Basil exhorts one to know one's self, i.e., both one's weaknesses and the *virtues that one has received from God. Basil, therefore, always maintains the necessary distinction between the two propositions and the two spheres of thought, resolving the statement "know thyself" as the self-control required by Christian morality. As a result, one should not focus on the "Greek" aspect of the exhortation to "know thyself," as many have done, but one should preserve its specific Christian sense. Granted, within this homily there are some elements that undeniably come from pagan philosophy. In fact, in ch. 3, Basil uses the Alexandrian tradition, acc. to which humans have been made in the image and likeness of God not in entirety but solely in the intellect. One can find a hint of this conception in the Homilies on the Hexameron (VI, 1,6): "You will know yourself to be earthly by nature, but a work that has come from the hands of God: a creature much weaker than irrational beings with respect to physical strength, yet the chosen master of the animals and beings without a soul. With respect to natural qualities you are inferior, but through the superiority of reason you are capable of lifting yourself up to heaven" (tr. Naldini). If we pay attention to ourselves, the homily continues, we will have the opportunity to find God in ourselves: we are truly a microcosm, and the very God who reveals himself for our admiration in the creatures of the universe is present in us.

Accordingly, Basil rejected, probably from the very beginning of the period after his departure for *Athens, the pretentious claims of the traditional curriculum of studies. And the impression the Exhortation to Youths gives us is no different from his other statements from those years. According to Basil, the entire structure of the educational system had already collapsed and needed to be rebuilt within a Christian framework. Though not realizing it, only what he had absorbed from his Christian readings could remain intact in his texts. What for other Christian authors, esp. in the Latin-speaking world, constituted such a drastic disagreement, Basil resolved with peaceful determination in his balanced and also resolute and innovative awareness. His ascetical interests are certainly undeniable, but he knew how to display them in such a way as to avoid the extremes of individuals such as *Eustathius of Sebaste in the area of ethics-doctrine, just as (and this is what interests us here) his exasperation with the condemnation and rejection of non-Christian values. Even his pedagogical interests in the Exhortation to Youths reveal the influence of Origen's teaching insofar as the work follows a selection of writings and ideas within the pagan paideia to obtain only what is valid for the Christian, just as the Alexandrian had done. This also applies to the so-called scientific disciplines for "benefit," i.e., understood in a Christian sense, for non-Christian writings and philosophies that function as a propedeutic for understanding the sacred Scriptures and penetrating the mysteries of Revelation.

*Gregory of Nazianzus applies the same approach (Oration IV, 101ff.) to defend the same right to avail oneself of Greek paideia when *Julian the Apostate believed he could take it away from Christians on the pretext that it did not belong to them but only to pagans. In the same way, he defends Greek paideia against those shortsighted and insular faithful who considered it unsuitable for a Christian writer (Oration 36,4); so that as a result precisely in the Eulogy for Basil (Oration 43.11), he digresses at length to defend its usefulness for the Christian writer both on the literary level and the educational level for theological insight. "Paideia, therefore, should not be despised," he concludes.

During these same years, the Latin world addressed this theoretical issue, and two very well-known figures focused their attention not only on sapientia but also on eloquentia, which, in their eyes, was also present in Christian authors. If in the past Christians refuted the criticisms against the plain and improper style of the *Bible by making recourse to the concept of the "true" and the "useful" that those writings obtained for people, at the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th, Christian scholarship possessed a richness that could not be called into question. From this fact arises *Jerome's proud claim in the dedicatory statements of the De viris illustribus: pagans critical of the church because they do not think it has had philosophers or orators will have to recognize that they are mistaken when they read the catalog of Christian writers, Greeks and Latins, from the religion's origins until Jerome himself (many of the judgments of the De viris illustribus return in Letter 70, To Magnus). *Augustine addresses the issue in the De doctrina christiana, which contains an explicit educational program centered on a serious and in-depth study of Scripture. In fact, if until that time Christian writers had adopted the schema of prodesse, acc. to Horace's formula, but held it distinct from the delectare, in the sense that one could find the first element in the Bible, but the second in pagan rhetorical education, Augustine maintains that now auctores nostri, i.e., those Christians mentioned by Jerome, are able to supply the constitutive elements for a Christian paideia. Such auctores (authors) are both the Bible, which possesses its own artistic merit that cannot be judged by the measure of pagan rhetoric, and Christian authors, by that time considered classical, who in their own way presented the rhetorical virtues of delectare and prodesse, which are tightly united.

H. Koch, Pronoia und Paideusis, Berlin-Leipzig 1932; H.I. Marrou, Saint Augustin et la fin de la culture antique, Paris 1958; A. Quacquarelli, Le fonti della paideia antenicena (Renovatio mundi), Brescia 1967; Id., Scuola e cultura nei primi secoli, Brescia 1974; W. Jaeger, Cristianesimo primitivo e paideia greca, Florence 1974; P. Courcelle, Connais toi toi-même. De Socrate à saint Bernard, Paris 1974–1975; M. Naldini, La posizione culturale di Basilio Magno, in Basilio di Cesarea, la sua età, la sua opera e il basilianesimo in Sicilia. Atti del congr. int., Messina 1983, 199-216; M. Simonetti, in Sant'Agostino, L'istruzione cristiana, ed. M.S., Milan 1994; C. Moreschini, Filosofia e letteratura in Gregorio di Nazianzo, Milan 1997; M. Simonetti, Auctores nostri (Agostino, doctr. Christ. 4,6,9): Auctores nostri 1 (2004) 183-200.

C. Moreschini

PAINTING

I. Wall decoration: Style and content - II. Miniature painting - III. Icons.

I. Wall decoration: Style and content. Scholars have now definitively abandoned the thesis of earlier authors who dated early Christian painting to the 1st or 2nd c. AD. After comparative investigations with "pagan" products and after the affirmation of a line of research that, alongside the purely stylistic elements, examined the archaeological-topographical data that were decisive for the chronology, scholars now believe that the most ancient pictorial depictions of Christianity should not be dated before the early years of the 3rd c. From the formal point of view, it has also been accepted that early Christian painting, as in the case of early Christian art in general, was perfectly inserted into Late Antiquity's artistic sensibilities (an expression of the deep economic, political, social and spiritual crisis that shook the Roman world in the 3rd c.). The artistic sensibilities of that era tended toward a popularizing vein that primarily privileged the content and expressive value of the image at the expense of its correct and formal delivery. This tendency, moreover, was perfectly in line with the very essence of ancient Christian art, and at that, in addition to trying to reach formal perfection, aimed to recall the foundations of its own faith through the figurative "language" capable of "expressing" such concepts in a manner clear and easily intelligible to all.

Until the religious peace achieved in the early 4th c., early Christian painting was almost exclusively documented for us through the frescoes found in cemeteries (and, esp., the Roman catacombs). The use of paintings for decorating the tomb as a second home, a practice already widespread in the classical world, continued to recall to one's mind through images the means through which faith assures the believer of salvation. The documentation is therefore full of lacunae, leaving one to ask whether during this period, alongside funerary decoration, there also developed the decoration of Christian places of worship, as one would be led to believe by the example of the domus ecclesiae in *Dura Europos, a caravan city on the river Euphrates, destroyed by the Persians shortly after 256 (C.H. Kraeling - C. Bradford Welles, The Christian Building: The Excavations at Dura Europos. Final Report VIII, Part II, New Haven, CT 1967). Here, in an empty space of the house that was turned into a baptistery, are found painted images of the OT and the NT, recalling the neophyte's salvation obtained through the death and resurrection worked in baptism by Christ, the new *Adam, in an extremely schematic and well-depicted style (but also monumental, as in the case of the scene of the Holy Women at the Sepulcher). The chief structure of the figures in the baptistery, its coordinate composition and the loss of its natural proportions have caused some scholars to note the strong Iranian influences (Bisconti, Arte e artigianato, 53-56). The appearance of these paintings in the baptismal contexts and not in the meeting room of the domus has been considered by some to be evidence of the church authority's utmost aversion, in the first centuries, for decorating the church's walls (an aversion, moreover, attested by the 36th canon of the Council of *Elvira [306]: Mansi II, 11), where, however, the figures on the baptistery could have performed the simple task of illustrating to the neophyte the sacramental means of the *soul's regeneration (on this question, see Bisconti, Arte e artigianato, 23-30, 48).

At *Rome, the first manifestations of paintings—which, as noted above, can be found solely in a cemeterial context—are dated to the first decades of the 3rd c. During this period, the wall decoration of the recesses of the catacombs' galleries—obtained through the use of the fresco or, much more rarely, in tempera painting—was marked acc. to the typical pattern of an illusionist wall division of red-green lines on a white background. This scheme combines—on ceilings and walls—aedicules, panels, portraits, lunettes, etc. acc. to the various geometrical textures, connected by linear segments, and represents the soul's life using the extreme simplification of the ancient decorative architectural partitions of the Pompeian tradition (Bisconti, Memorie, 27-36; Id., La pittura, 36-40; Mielsch, Römische Wandmalerei, 112-123). Within this linear syntax (as one can see, e.g., in the crypts of Lucina in the cemetery of S. Callisto [Wp 24-25; 26,1; 27,1; 28; 29,1 = Nestori, p. 99, nos. 1-2], in the recess of the coronatio in the catacomb of Pretextatus [Wp 17-20 = Nestori, p. 87, no. 3] or in the recesses of the so-called sacraments likewise in S. Callisto [Wp 15,2; 26,2-3; 27,2-3; 29,2; 38-39; 40,3; 41; 46-48,1 = Nestori, pp. 102-103, nos. 21-25]) there are figures (those decorations often taken from the then-current cosmic, zoomorphic and Dionysian fashion repertoire of the classical tradition), formulated with a rapid and uninhibited impressionistic technique which, by means of vivid and essential chromatic components, forms a quick outline of the image, ignoring its volume and details.

Early depictions are marked by a heavy symbolism centered on the concept of salvation and the sacramental means that ensure it, means to which the symbolic images taken from the classical repertoire allude. Take, for example, the Good Shepherd and the Orans*, repeated in alternation, as on the ceiling of the recess of the aforementioned crypts of Lucina, to signify the two ends of the work of salvation, the Savior and the saved soul—while the Good Shepherd in a synthetic way also alludes to the pastoral contacts and the prefiguration of the afterlife. Another example includes some of the first depictions of biblical events such as those of *Daniel in the lions' den, the story of *Jonah, the baptism of *Jesus, the sacrifice of Isaac, the Samaritan woman at the well, the miracle of the rock, the resurrection of *Lazarus, the healing of the *paralytic, etc. Other figures such as the *fisherman and the philosopher, likewise drawn from classical iconography, as in the case of the Good Shepherd and the Orans, could assume additional symbolic meanings alluding to baptism and the "new" doctrine held by believers, in addition to a generic reference to the afterlife and culture. At times, alongside scenes that are not repeated in a later age (one thinks, e.g., of the "fish of Lucina," which perhaps alludes to the *Eucharist [Wp 28 = Nestori, p. 99, no. 2] or to the so-called crowning with thorns in the aforementioned homonymous recess [Wp 18 = Nestori, p. 87, no. 3]), we find iconographic formulations during this period that, while not having specific representation in later paintings (e.g., the scene of the Samaritan woman or the resurrection of Lazarus in the recesses A 3 and A 6 of the sacraments [Wp 39,1; 46,2 = Nestori, pp. 102-103, nos. 22, 25]), still provide evidence of an earlier phase that can be defined by the formation of an iconographic Christian repertoire. This phase is characterized by the elaboration of figurative partitions that have not yet been codified into those fixed patterns that are typical of later periods which make their subjects easily recognizable and understandable to all. In the most ancient area of the catacomb of Priscilla, the occurrence of Christ's incarnation is represented by the image—which is also an original formulation no longer used—of Mary with baby Jesus in arms, alongside the prophet Balaam, who points to the star to signify the fulfillment of prophecy (F. Bisconti, La Madonna di Priscilla: Interventi di restauro ed ipotesi sulla dinamica decorativa: RivAC 72 [1996] 7-34).

Outside the Roman setting, but still in a funerary context and still during the first decades of the 3rd c., the paintings of a mausoleum of the necropolis of Cimitile, near *Nola, with scenes of Jonah and humanity's first parents (Korol, Die frühchristlichen Wandmalereien, 38ff.), thematically, stylistically and chronologically can be assigned to a period very close to that of the paintings of the vestibule found in the upper level of the catacomb of S. Januarius at Naples. In that catacomb, in the context of a decorated, elaborate, linear, red-green syntax, motifs drawn from the classical repertoire and thematically Christian scenes appear in alternation (*David and Goliath, the episode of the "mystical" tower inspired by the Shepherd of *Hermas; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Roma 1975, 26-27). In *Egypt, at *Alexandria, an underground tomb reveals the same mixture of themes from the classical tradition (scenes of rural life, a portrayal of a bust of the god Pan) and from images probably or certainly Christian in origin (Good Shepherd, Jonah under the booth that he had made for himself), a mixture documented in contemporary Roman works (H. Riad, Tomb Paintings from the Necropolis of Alexandria: Archaeology 17/3 [1964] 169-171; J. Weitzmann-Fiedler, Tomb Chamber, in Age of Spirituality. Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century, New York 1979, 273-274).

Returning to Rome, shortly after the mid-3rd c., the lighter, linear, red-green style of the first decades of that century tends to become increasingly more illusory and loses its compositional coherence with the gradual insertion of suspended elements and clutter that tend to break up the linear syntax and destroy the illusion of open space (e.g., in the recesses of the Good Shepherd at Domitilla: Wp 6,2; 7,2; 9-12,1 = Nestori, p. 121, no. 23). One can perceive such features surely after the mid-3rd c. in the hypogeum of the Aurelii on Viale Manzoni (Nestori, pp. 44-47, nos. 1-4), thus affirming the current classification, noticeable esp. in the monumental figures of the individuals represented on the walls of one of the hypogeum recesses. Several scenes are marked by the typical bucolic-pastoral and philosophical themes; nevertheless, others produce a more controversial interpretation and probably reveal the patron's will to express his or her own distinct philosophical and religious ideas (F. Bisconti, L'ipogeo degli Aureli in Viale Manzoni: Un esempio di sincreresi privata: Augustinianum 25 [1985] 889-903). Frescoes depicting episodes from the OT and the NT (in addition to a banquet scene, held by some to allude secretly perhaps to the Eucharist), of the so-called Greek Chapel in the catacombs of St. Priscilla (Wp 13-15,1; 16 = Nestori, pp. 27-28, no. 39) have created chronological problems—as have other paintings of the most ancient regions of the catacombs: a dating was proposed (based on studies conducted more or less contemporaneously) between 170-180, rather than placing them in the first decades of the 4th c. (see Reekmans, La cronologie, 284-285). The megalographic dimensions of the cycle of Susanna (unique in its formulation), in addition to that undeniable classicism that pervades the "chapel," has caused some scholars to set a post-Gallienic dating (A. Recio, La "Cappella Greca" vista y diseñada entre los años 1783 y 1786 por Seroux d'Agincourt: RivAC 56 [1980] 49-94), in the context, i.e., of that classicist Renaissance, whose signs one can clearly identify in the same catacomb of Priscilla, and the so-called recess of the Velatio (Wp 66,1; 78-81; 82,2 = Nestori, p. 23, no. 7), where the figures of the arcosolium at the bottom, to be interpreted as representations of three moments of a young woman's life (C. Dagens, À propos du cubiculum de la "Velatio": RivAC 47 [1971] 119-129), are painted with intense colors and plastic shaping (F. Bisconti, Scavi e restauri nella regione della "Velata" in Priscilla: RivAC 77 [2001] 49-95).

The period extending from the last decades of the 3rd c. to the Constantinian age (Die Katakombe, 190ff.). The most ancient group of frescoes likewise characterized by the linear wall pattern and an establishment of solid and well-constructed figures (one thinks, e.g., of the so-called recess of Nicerus with the sole scene of the crippled woman: Die Katakombe, 312-318, no. 65), are those in several recesses of the so-called staircase Y and the area of the agapai (ibid., 297-300, 309-312, nos. 58, 64), compositions marked by clear dramatic contrasts that, through the use of divisionist optic effects, achieve a revealing intensity. In these paintings one repeatedly finds a unique variety of floral and geometric decorations, alongside a progressive transformation (starting esp. from the tetrarchic age) of lines of the 3rd c. from the ornamental pattern into bands, whose frames of figured scenes almost became an essential element of the decoration (Bisconti, La pittura, 42-43). From a thematic point of view one should note the introduction of new OT and NT scenes and the frequent representation of gravediggers (fossores*) at work, and banquets, at times, perhaps, alluding to the heavenly banquet and at other times realistically representing funerary banquets offered by the living for the dead.

As a result of the Constantinian peace, further new themes were introduced into the pictorial repertoire to celebrate the steps of Christ's earthly journey or to recall episodes from the OT esp. significant in relation to the history of redemption or in the perspective of the always latent salvific symbology. The theme of Christ the teacher appears, alone or surrounded by the apostolic college (complete or incomplete), a theme alluding to the doctrine preached by Christ, but also to the final judgment and the unity of the church; aside from the typical scenes ranging from philosophers teaching to the courtly scenes representing the emperor and his dignitaries, the dependency on the iconographic substantiates the idea that such images were meant to evoke a subtle anti-Caesar response. The images are set at one point more often within wide frames, bordered by large moldings, juxtaposed and interconnected in the walls of the recesses on horizontal vignettes, often above the interior wall lining, that imitate marble panels, or on the ceilings, within the compartments at times similarly separated by a red-green lining partition (Bisconti, La pittura paleocristiana, 42). At times, the images, as in the contemporaneous sarcophagi designed in a flowing vignette fashion, are set one next to the other, without dividing elements, against one sole decorative background, that can occupy, e.g., a wall of a gallery (Wp 62,1; 204; 212 = Nestori, pp. 18-19, nos. 5-6). From the formal point of view, the Constantinian age signals the recovery of plasticism and a reconsolidation of the forms contained in the surrounding marked lines; the figures are often represented facing forward; the faces become rounded, characterized by dark and compact hair (see, e.g., the well-known depiction of the Madonna with Child in Maius: Wp 163,1; 207-209 = Nestori, p. 36, no. 22).

At Rome, the most significant artifact of the 4th c.—datable between the Constantinian age and the last decades of that century—is the catacomb on the Via Dino Compagni (A. Ferrua, Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960). This catacomb was a private cemetery, almost entirely decorated with frescoes, in which, alongside pieces of unusual artistic quality, we find themes formulated with a peculiar iconography and, in certain cases, totally new scenes (e.g., the now very famous "medical lesson": ibid., pl. 107 = Nestori, p. 77, no. 9); these are rare phenomena, all of which are to be properly connected to the private monuments in which evidently painters of the highest skill were able to work. These workers were not tied to those traditional iconographic patterns that were invariably repeated by modest artisans who worked in the community cemeteries. Some have placed the extraordinarily rich iconographic repertoire (esp. with OT scenes) in relation to the existence of miniatured Bibles, from which painters borrowed themes and iconographic images (L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der Via Latina in Rom. Untersuchungen zur Ikonographie der alttestamentlichen Wandmalereien, Münster 1978). If, because of the pictorial quality, one can therefore reasonably conclude that it was wrought by a particularly wealthy commission, then the existence, among the various paintings, of mythological subjects is probable evidence in the hypogeum, in the 2nd half of the 4th c., of the presence of groups that had not yet been converted to the new faith interred alongside groups of Christian families. From the formal point of view, the characteristics of the Constantinian age, which can be found in the early recesses, follow representations marked by a more knowledgable classicism and the formal composition typical of the style from the decades immediately following the mid 4th c.

This classicist manner, however, characterized by a more emphasized linearism, can be found in the figure compositions of the closing decades of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th. During this period, added to the more customary themes of the funerary repertoire were others marked to exalt the glory of the martyrs and the royalty of the Teacher—scenes that often drew inspiration from the most prestigious models existing in places of worship. Images of Christ with the apostolic college or with *Peter and *Paul alone were enriched with individual iconographic details that were intended to emphasize the royalty of Jesus (A. Ferrua, Un nuovo cubicolo dipinto della via Latina: Rendiconti della Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia 45 [1972–1973] 176-179); the theme of the Traditio Legis, perhaps elaborated for the apse of the basilica of St. Peter in the Vatican, makes its appearance in painting in a fresco from the beginning of the 5th c. of the catacomb ad Decimum in Grottaferrata (Roma) (L. Recio Veganzones, Las pinturas de la catacumba "ad Decimum" de Grottaferrata: RivAC 59 [1983] 387-409). In the fresco of the ceiling of the recess of the catacomb of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter (Wp 252-254 = Nestori, p. 48, no. 3), the derivation from lost basilica models is evident in the characteristic superimposition of the two partitions in which the artist develops the exaltation of Christ's royal magisterium, between Peter and Paul, and the acclamation of the four eponymous martyrs on the mountain of Paradise. The stylistic characteristics of that historical period are revealed in the elongated figures, the hieratic faces, the almond eyes and the helmet-shaped hair, in the marked linearism of the forms, dematerialized in an abstract ambience. Similar characteristics can be also found in that painting representing Christ among seven individuals, from the catacomb of Albanus, near Rome, datable to the beginning of the 5th c., to which was added in the same catacomb at the end of the century a fresco with Christ among four saints, a fresco characterized by a greater linearity and abstraction (M. Marinone, La decorazione pittorica della catacomba di Albano: RIA 19-20 [1972-73] 103-138).

Outside the funerary context, in the 2nd half of the 4th c., we find at Rome a fresco of the small local cult under the church of SS. Giovanni e Paolo al Celio (M. Cecchelli, Osservazioni sul complesso della "domus" celimontana dei SS. Giovanni e Paolo: Atti IX Congr. Int. Arch. Crist., I, Vatican City 1978, 551-562; B. Brenk, Microstoria sotto la chiesa dei SS. Giovanni e Paolo: La cristianizzazione di una casa privata: RIA, sr. III, 18 [1995] 188-197) and one in a private oratory near the Lateran basilica (V. Santa Maria Scrinari, Documenti paleocristiami nell'ambito dello storico ospedale di S. Giovanni al Laterano: Rend. PARA 48 [1975/76] 377-391). The two monuments show the stylistic characteristics of the cemeterial painting of the period (esp., for the oratory of the Lateran, one can see affinities with the frescoes of the catacomb on the Via Dino Compagni), and both present scenes of considerable interpretive difficulty.

Many problems of interpretation—not so much concerning the paintings, as much as the function of the monument—surround the hypogeum of S. Maria in Stelle, at Verona (W. Dorigo, L'ipogeo di S. Maria in Stelle in Val Pantena: Saggi e memorie di Storia dell'Arte 6 [1968] 9-31), believed by some to belong to a funerary context, by others pertaining to a local cult. The depictions drawn from the OT and NT that adorn the walls of one of the two underground areas, reshaped in monumental forms and characterized by elongated figures, contained in heavily marked, contoured lines, are dated to the end of the 4th-5th c. One must date to a later age, however, the depiction of Christ with the apostolic college, a depiction marked by a greater linearity. The catacombs and hypogea of Syracuse, Sicily, have restored a good number of paintings from the 4th-5th c; they adorn the arcosolia, cubicles and at times the same closings of burial cells with depictions of the deceased in gardens of paradise filled with flowers, wreaths, birds, shepherds. Also represented are themes drawn from the OT (scenes of Jonah and Daniel), as well as more complex images of the crowning or introduction of the deceased into paradise in the presence of Christ and of the apostolic band (Ahlquist, Pitture). The frescoes of the catacombs of St. Januarius at Naples, if already existing in the 4th c., seem to repeat decorative patterns and themes common to those of the Roman catacombs; in the 5th c. in the lunettes of arcosolia of the deceased's portraits, they are characterized by the depiction of heavily individualized faces, isolated, in groups, and at times associated with the images of the saints (St. Januarius, St. Peter and St. Paul) (Achelis, Die Katakomben, plates 16, 18-24, 27, 30-33, 38, 40-44). A tomb in an underground chamber found in the necropolis of Bonaria at Cagliari was likewise painted with frescoes during the early years of the 4th c., with a complex scene from the sea, displayed on the entire wall at the bottom of an arcosolium, that connects the episode of Piscator hominum a singular occurrence in early Christian art) to an episode from Jonah's life, represented with truly revealing iconographic idiosyncrasies (A.M. Nieddu, La pittura paleocristiana, 246-261).

Outside Italy pictorial evidence datable to the 4th c. has been found in the Balkans, at Niš (L. Mirkovic, La nécropole paléochrétienne de Niš: Archaeologica Iugosl. 2 [1956] 85-100), at Pécs in Hungary (F. Fülep, Sopianae. Die Stadt Pécs zur Römerzeit, Budapest 1975, 24 and 26) and in Greece, esp. at *Thessalonica (Salonica), where a continuous activity of painting is documented from the late 3rd c. (tomb of the Eastern necropolis, decorated acc. to the red-green linear model) through the entire 4th c. (tomb of the Good Shepherd, the so-called tomb of Eustorgius, on the Via of St. Demetrius, of the necropolis, with various biblical depictions) (D. Pallas, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Grèce découverts de 1959 à 1973, Vatican City 1977, 65-73). The frescoes from the 2nd half of the 4th c. that adorn a sepulcher room with a curved ceiling are particularly significant: the walls become entirely occupied by a vignette made of large edges where there appear images of the Good Shepherd, a philosopher, a deceased person, as well as numerous biblical scenes; all of this artwork was done in a quite simplified and well-designed style (E. Marki, Early Christian Representations and Themes Imitating Secular Painting in a Grave Complex in the West Cemetery of Thessaloniki: Deltion tes Chr. Arch. Etaireias 19 [1996-97] 125-149). Also worthy of note are the frescoes of Pécs, which came to light during 1975-76. They adorn an interior room of a large mausoleum with depictions of a person seated on a throne in paradise and the biblical episodes of Adam and Eve's fall into *sin and Daniel in the lion's den, compositions that present iconographic and stylistic characteristics comparable to Roman cemetery painting of the 2nd half of the 4th c. (F. Fülep, Excavations of the Early Christian Mausoleum of Pécs: Archaeológiai Értesitı 104 [1977] 246-257). In Thrace, in a village of Osenovo near Varna (Bulgaria), more or less during the same period, paintings were completed for a tomb-shaped room (depicting the deceased person, members of his family, birds and other animal and vegetable elements, all of which was under a ceiling painted with stars containing images of the Sun and Moon) of particular note for their characteristic styles, marked by a singularly early taste that establishes a revealing artifact of Late Antiquity's provincial artistic fashion (A. Minčev - P. Georgiev, The Tomb at Osenovo: A Monument of the Late Antique Paintings on the Thracian Coast of Pontos, in Actes du IIe Congrès International de Thracologie [Bucarest, 4-10 septembre 1976], II, "Histoire et Archéologie," Bucures ti 1980, 411-423). In Romania, in the ancient city of Constantia (today Tomis) in Scythia Minor, in addition to its famous tomb containing the frescoes of a banquet (C. Chera, Wandmalerei aus dem 4. Jh. n. Chr. in einem Grab von Tomis [Constanța - Rumänien]: Babesch., suppl. 3, Leiden 1993, 136-140), archaeologists have restored another important sepulcher, more or less contemporaneous (end of the 4th c.), entirely covered with frescoes on the walls: above a high façade that reproduces faux architectural structures, an ornament curls within large frames where one finds scenes of a banquet and the deceased in a prayerful disposition (A. Barbet - M. Bucovală, L'hypogée paléochrétien des orants à Con- stanta (Roumanie), l'ancienne Tomis: MEFRA 108 [1996] 105-158). In the 1st half of the 5th c., at Constantinople, pictures with images of Christ, the apostles and perhaps *Moses receiving the law, all placed above a façade made with fake marble, adorn the walls of a sepulchral room, covered with a circular ceiling, subsequently enriched by figurative reliefs representing Christ with the apostolic college, deceased orantes praying at the sides of a *cross, Moses receiving the law and the sacrifice of Isaac (J.G. Deckers - Ü. Serdaroğlu, Das Hypogäum beim Silivri-Kapi in Istanbul: JbAC 36 [1993] 140-163). At *Ephesus, in the so-called Grotto of St. Paul, a noteworthy fresco, datable to the beginning of the 5th c., represents the rare image of the apostle *Paul in the act of teaching his disciple *Thecla in the presence of her mother Theoclía; the episode inspired by the account of the Acta Pauli et Theclae (R. Pillinger, Neue Entdeckungen in der sogenannten Paulusgrotte von Ephesos: Mitteilungen zur christlichen Archäologie 6 [2000] 23-29).

As to the decoration of the buildings of worship, one should note the paintings of a Christian chapel found in a village of Lullingston (England; 2nd half of the 4th c.): six individuals are portrayed, one alongside the other and placed above a fake marble vignette (the Christian faithful, patrons?); two panels with Constantinian *monograms set within crowns adorn another wall of the chapel and that of a foyer (N. Davey - R. Ling, Wall-Painting in Roman Britain, London 1982, 138-145).

In Egypt, paintings datable to the closing decades of the 4th c. and decorating the dome of a tomb in the necropolis of El-Bagawat have drawn great interest, esp. for the presence of a scene from the exodus of the Hebrews. Placed alongside the usual depictions inspired by Stoic models, it was formulated in an exceptionally schematic and summary manner. For this reason, scholars have thought that there was a strong Jewish influence (M.L. Thérel, La composition et le symbolisme de l'iconographie du mausolée de l'Exode à El-Bagawat: RivAC 45 [1969] 223-270; G. Crispino, Il mausoleo dell'Esodo di El-Bagawat. La lettura iconografica del programma decorativo della cupola: RivAC 79 [2003] 243-288). In the same necropolis, also of great interest is a slightly later fresco adorning the dome of the "mausoleum of peace," where the vignettes depict several biblical scenes, sacred persons and symbolic figures (M. Zibawi, L'arte copta. L'Egitto cristiano dalle origini al XVIII secolo, Milan 2003, 32-38). Likewise in Africa, and in the second quarter of the 4th c., an artist(s) painted frescoes on a noteworthy funerary hypogeum found at Gargaresh (Tripoli) with scenes of Adam and Eve, Jesus' entrance into *Jerusalem and torchbearers—paintings that show close connections to the frescoes from the Via Dino Compagni and the mosaics of the Piazza Armerina (A. Di Vita, L'ipogeo di Adamo ed Eva a Gargaresh: Atti IX Congr. Int. Arch. Crist., II, Vatican City 1978, 199-256).

With the 6th c., at Rome, alongside the persistence of the classical tradition, one begins to notice the nascent penetration of Byzantine taste that hardens the image into an abstract immobility, materializing its essential chromatic parallels. Such tendencies can clearly be found, in addition to what one finds in other cemeterial paintings, e.g., in the famous fresco of the catacomb of Commodilla, representing the Virgin with child among Sts. *Felix and Adauctus, the latter portrayed in the act of presenting the deceased Turtura (Nestori, p. 138, no. 3 = Die Katakombe "Commodilla," 61-65, no. 3e; M. Minasi, Le vicende conservative dell'affresco di Turtura nel cimitero di Commodilla: RivAC 73 [1997] 65-94). Alongside the flat and schematic style that depicts figures with linear outlines and fixed, abstract faces, we find, in the image of Turtura, modes that are clearly Western in the exquisite realism of the face. The ancient frescoes (6th to the beginning of the 7th c.) of the diakonia of S. Maria Antiqua al Foro also drew inspiration from the characteristics of Byzantine fashion (J. Nordhagen, S. Maria Antiqua: The Frescoes of the Seventh Century: AAAH 8 [1978] 89-142), such as the "Maria Regina" and the Annunciation, with the "Pompeian Angel," the latter characterized by a formal classicist mark of the Hellenistic tradition, noticeable in the soft transitions of the layers and the use of thick and warm colors. In the catacombs of St. Januarius and St. Gaudiosus at Naples, portraits of bishops, images of saints, the deceased, a unique scene of Christ the "lawgiver" between Peter and Paul and an introduction of a deceased person were done during the course of the 6th and even the 7th c., following an exceptional linearism and a marked formal simplification (Achelis, Die Katakomben, pls. 26, 28, 39, 45; Fasola, ibid., 119-123, 143-144, 180-182, figs. 89, 93, pl. X; N. Ciavolino, L'iconografia petrina nell'arte paleocristiana a Napoli: Campania Sacra 21 [1990] 300-304; G. Liccardo, Il catalogo figurato dei vescovi nelle catacombe di San Gennaro. Note intorno all'apostolicità della Chiesa di Napoli: Campania Sacra 22 [1991] 5-14; N. Ciavolino, Scavi e scoperte in Campania dal 1983 al 1993, in Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Arch. Cristiana, Cassino, 20-24 settembre 1993, Cassino 2003, 646-647, 653-659).

A noteworthy bit of documentation of 6th- to 7th-c. painting comes to us from Egypt, thanks to the frescoes of Bawit and Saqqara that adorned the walls of the numerous small chapels that the Coptic monks made in their monasteries. In the majority of the works at Bawit, an advanced process of geometrization of the forms can be seen, esp. in the frequent apsidal depictions of Christ in majesty and Mary on the throne between the apostles and saints, facing forward, in a hieratic way, with clear colors and strong contoured lines (J. Clédat, Le monastère et la nécropole de Baouît: Mémoires publiés par les membres de l'Institut français d'archéologie orientale du Caire 12 [1904]). Even more schematic are the paintings of Saqqara: the images of Christ on the throne and the Madonna lactans, painted on the vaulted ceiling, are clearly two-dimensional and linear (J. Quibell, Excavations at Saqqara (1906–1907), Le Caire 1908, pl. XLff.; J. Maspéro - E. Drioton, Fouilles exécutées à Baouît: Mémoires, Impr. de l'Institut français d'archéologie orientale, 1931, 59).

Returning to Rome, a vibrant approach, animated by a return to a more condensed style, characterizes the layers of frescoes of S. Maria Antiqua containing Solomon and the seven Maccabean sons, datable to the mid 7th c., i.e., earlier than the grandiose composition of Christ on Golgotha commissioned by Pope John VII (705–707) in the presbytery of the church (J. Nordhagen, S. Maria Antiqua . . . , 114-120; Id., The Frescoes of John VII (A.D. 705–707) in S. Maria Antiqua in Rome: AAAH 3 [1968]). The most ancient frescoes of the church of St. Saba with the row of saints can be dated to the mid 7th c., although the oldest frescoes of the same subject in the basilica of St. Chrysogonus must be dated later (Matthiae - Andaloro, Pittura, 271-272). Increasing decoration and more elaborate styles of calligraphy are to be found in the last depictions that adorned the historical nucleus of the catacombs, as in the coronation of Sts. Abdon and Sennen in the Pontian cemetery (Wp 258 = Nestori, p. 146, no. 6), the Traditio Clavium (Handing Over of the Keys) and the faded figure of St. Luke found in the basilica of Commodilla (Nestori, p. 138, no. 3 = Die Katacombe "Commodilla," 50-57, 83-85, nos. 3a, 3i), datable to the late 7th c. acc. to the inscription lying underneath.

II. Miniature painting. In the wake of the Late Antique miniatures inspired by the Hellenistic-Roman tradition (Vergilius Romanus, Vergilius Vaticanus, Iliade Ambrosiana, Dioscoride di Vienna, etc.: Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 32-72), starting from the 5th c., the earliest Christian miniatures appear, adorning (usually at the bottom of the page, using the technique of tempera) biblical MSS on the codices of parchment that had by that point replaced the ancient scrolls. Scholars should probably attribute the Itala of Quedlinburg (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 40-41) to the beginning of the 5th c. and to a Roman scriptorium. The presentations of the figures and the still illusionist scenery (as one can see in the scenes that are preserved in the life of Samuel) have caused some scholars to compare the work to the Virgilius Vaticanus. One can detect a heavily classicist imprint in a few fragments of the "Cotton" Genesis, datable to an Alexandrian milieu of the 5th-6th c. (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 73-75), and esp. in the famous Genesis of Vienna (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 76-87), the most elegant MS of the early Christian era that has survived, and which, alongside the then typically Byzantine characteristics (denial of spatiality, abstract background, refusal to create a precise relationship between figure and background, and figurative stylizing of several elements), strong reminiscences of Hellenistic-Roman naturalistic art, esp. in the scene of the flood, likewise marked by large spatiality and full-view perspective (R. Bianchi Bandinelli, La composizione del diluvio nella Genesi di Vienna: MDAI(R) 62 [1955] 66-77).

The Vienna miniatures—copies of a more ancient and exquisite model and executed by more than one artist—were probably produced in the 6th c. somewhere in *Syria or *Palestine. Close in style and date to the Genesis of Vienna are the illustrations of the gospel of Matthew contained in the Codex Sinopensis of the Bibliotheque Nationale of Paris, and those of the gospel of Matthew and Mark from the Rossano Cathedral (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 14, 89-90), all of which can be traced to a 6th-c. Syrian milieu. The miniatures of Rossano, in particular—grouped outside the text, at the beginning of the work—show a highly refined style, by then fully Byzantine in its flattening and its tendency toward abstraction of the figures and backgrounds. One moves even further from the naturalism of the classical tradition with the miniatures of the gospels of Rabbula (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 101-108), produced in Syria in 586 and preserved in Florence's Biblioteca Laurenziana. They consist of eight full-page miniatures and a series of canonical tables decorated with pictures and scenes of the NT. This style is rather schematic, but the miniatures are not lacking realistic tones in the living and expressive faces and their explorations of spacious scenic designs in certain compositions—such as the scene of the crucifixion—which, even as late as the 6th c., harks back to the classic tradition. The Bible of Paris and the Gospel of St. Augustine (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 109-115)—the latter containing two noteworthy miniatures, one representing scenes from Christ's passion, the other depicting Luke the evangelist sitting on a throne—should be dated at the end of the 6th c. Lastly, we should attribute to the 7th c. and a N African milieu the miniatures of the Pentateuch "Ashburnham," at the Bibliotheque Nationale of Paris (Weitzmann, Manuscrits, 118-125), with its stories from the OT, in which the absence of every trace of spatial composition, the dramatic sense, the abundance of incredible architectural structures and the sensibility for a richer coloring seem to announce the medieval aesthetic.

III. Icons. The most ancient sacred images painted on wood, using encaustic technique and having a devotional purpose, cannot be older than the 6th c. The majority of these works come from the Monastery of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. To three very talented artisans who worked between the 2nd half of the 6th c. and the 1st half of the following century at Constantinople, where the classical tradition was preserved with utmost care, posterity owes three magnificent icons representing Christ, the Virgin on the throne between two saints, and St. Peter. In the first (Weitzmann, The Monastery, no. B1, pp. 13-15, pls. I-II, XXXIX-XLI), the great refinement in the artistic composition constructs a plasticity, in its gentle transition of planes, with the face of Christ, to whose rigidity the conspicuous asymmetry of his large eyes, mustache and beard provide a counterpoint; the same contrasting rhythms recur in the Madonna on the throne with the toddler Jesus (Weitzmann, The Monastery, no. B3, pp. 18-21, pls. IV-VI, XLIII-XLVI). To the relative mobility of Jesus are contrasted the two saints George and Theodore, rigidly facing forward and solemn; above them, the heads of the archangels that gaze on high upon the divine hand are rendered with an impressionist technique. Lastly, inspired by the compositions of the consular ivory diptychs, the icon of St. Peter (Weitzmann, The Monastery, no. B5, pp. 23-26, pls. VIIIX, XLVIII-LI) finds in its expressive and spiritual face the focal point of the entire composition. More abstract and calligraphic are the faces of Sts. Sergius and Bachus on an icon, likewise from Mount Sinai, today at the Museum of Kiev, which can be dated to the 7th c. (Weitzmann, The Monastery, no. B9, pp. 28-30, plates XII, LII-LIII).

In Rome, between the last quarter of the 6th c. and the beginning of the 8th, must be attributed two images of the Virgin, one at S. Maria and the other at the basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere. Both show marks of Byzantine inspiration, but with a typical linearistic intonation typical of the Western tradition (C. Bertelli, La Madonna di Santa Maria in Trastevere, Rome 1961; M. Andaloro, La datazione della tavola di S. Maria in Trastevere: RIA 19-20 [1992-1993] 139-215; Matthiae - Andaloro, Pittura, 255-256; Andaloro, L'icona, 416-424, 660-663).

I. General research on early Christian painting: G. Wilpert, Le pitture delle catacombe romane, Rome 1903; Id., Die römischen Mosaiken und Malereien der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV. bis XIII. Jahrhundert, Freiburg i.Br. 1916; F. Wirth, Römische Wandmalerei von Untergang Pompejis bis Ende des dritten Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1934; H. Achelis, Die Katakomben von Neapel, Leipzig 1936; J. De Wit, Spätromische Bildnismalerei, Berlin 1938; G. Agnello, La pittura paleocristiana della Sicilia, Vatican City 1952; R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Continuità ellenistica nella pittura dell'età medio e tardo romana: RIA (1953) 1-85 (see Id., Archeologia e cultura, Rome [2]1979, 344-423); A. Grabar - C. Nordenfalk, Early Medieval Painting from the Fourth to the Eleventh Century, Lausanne 1957; M. Borda, La pittura romana, Milan 1958; R. Farioli, Pitture di epoca tarda nelle catacombe romane, Ravenna 1963; S. Pélékanidis, Gli affreschi paleocristiani ed i più antichi mosaici parietali di Salonicco, Ravenna 1963, 7-29; M. Chatzidakis - A. Grabar, La pittura bizantina e dell'alto medioevo, Milan 1965; J. Kollwitz, Die Malerei der konstantinischen Zeit: Akten VII. Intern. Kong. für christliche Archäologie. Trier 5-11 September 1965, Vatican City 1969, 29-158; L. de Bruyne, La peinture cimétériale constantinienne, ibid., 159-214; G. Matthiae, Pittura romana del Medioevo, Rome 1965 (new edition with scientific update and bibl. by M. Andaloro, Rome 1987); W. Dorigo, Pittura tardo romana, Milan 1966; A. Grabar, Le premier art chrétien (200–395), Paris 1966; Id., L'âge d'or de Justinien, Paris 1966; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966, 255-309 (with extensive bibl. on pp. 357-368); T. Hubert - J. Farther Porcher - W.F. Volbach, L'Europe des invasions, Paris 1967; L. de Bruyne, L'importanza degli scavi lateranensi per la cronologia delle prime pitture catacombali: RivAC 44 (1968) 81-113; R. Bianchi Bandinelli, Rome. La fin de l'art antique, Paris 1970; L. Reekmans, La chronologie de la peinture paléochrétienne. Notes et réflexions: RivAC 49 (1973) 271-291; A. Nestori, Repertorio topografico delle pitture delle catacombe romane, Vatican City 1975; B. Brenk, Spätantike und frühes Christentum (= Propyläen Kunstgeschichte, Supplementband I), Berlin 1977; H. Mielsch, Zur stadtrömischen Malerei des 4. Jahrhunderts n. Chr.: MDAI(R) 85 (1978) 151-207; J. Fink, Die römischen Katakomben (= Antike Welt. Zeitschrift für Archäologie und Kulturgeschichte 9), Munich 1978; E. Russo, L'affresco di Turtura nel cimitero di Commodilla, l'icona di S. Maria in Trastevere e le più antiche feste della Madonna in Roma: Bollettino dell'Istituto Storico Italiano e Archivio Muratoriano 88 (1979) 35-85; J. Osborne, The Roman Catacombs in the Middle Ages: PBSR 53 (1985) 278-328; J-G. Deckers - H.R. Seeliger - G. Mietke, Die Katakombe "Santi Pietro e Marcellino." Repertorium der Malereien, Vatican City-Münster 1987; P-A. Février, À propos de la date des peintures des catacombes romaines: RivAC 65 (1989) 105-133; D. Korol, Die frühchristlichen Wandmalereien aus den Grabbauten in Cimitile/Nola, Münster-Westfalen 1987; J.-G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Anonima di Via Anapo." Repertorium der Malereien, Vatican City 1991; M. Andaloro, Pittura romana e pittura a Roma da Leone Magno a Giovanni VII, in Committenti e produzione artistico-letteraria nell'alto medioevo occidentale (Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo 39), Spoleto 1992, 569-609; F.W. Deichmann, Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1993, 105-203; J.-G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malereien, Vatican City 1994; F. Bisconti, Memorie classiche nelle decorazioni pittoriche delle cata- combe romane. Continuità grafiche e variazioni semantiche, in Historiam Pictura Refert. Miscellanea in onore di Padre Alejandro Recio Veganzones O.F.M., Vatican City 1994, 23-66; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Zum Stand der Katakombenforschung in Latium: RQA 89 (1994) 216-218; A. Ahlquist, Pitture e mosaici nei cimiteri paleocristiani di Siracusa. Corpus iconographicum, Venice 1995; A.M. Nieddu, La pittura paleocristiana in Sardegna: Nuove acquisizioni: RivAC 72 (1996) 245-283; Romana Pictura. La pittura romana dalle origini all'età bizantina, Milan 1998, in part, the study of F. Bisconti, La pittura paleocristiana, pp. 33-53; F. Bisconti, La decorazione delle catacombe romane, in V. Fiocchi Nicolai - F. Bisconti - D. Mazzoleni, Le catacombe cristiane di Roma. Origini, sviluppo, apparati decorativi, documentazione epigrafica, Regensburg 1998, 71-144; F. Bisconti, Arte e artigianato nella cultura figurativa paleocristiana. Altre equivalenze tra letteratura patristica e iconografia paleocristiana, in Res Christiana. Temi interdisciplinari di patrologia, Rome 1999, 23-108; K.-D. Dorsch - H.R. Seeliger, Römische Katakombenmalereien im Spiegel des Photoarchivs Parker. Dokumentation von Zustand und Erhaltung 1864-1994, Münster 2000; C. Bordignon, Caratteri e dinamica della tecnica pittorica nelle catacombe di Roma, Rome 2000; Dieci anni di restauro nelle catacombe romane. Bilancio, esperienze e interventi conservativi delle pitture catacombali, Roma, 3 marzo 2000, Vatican City 2000; H. Mielsch, Römische Wandmalerei, Darmstadt 2001; N. Zimmermann, Werkstattgruppen römischer Katakombenmalereien, Münster 2002; La conservazione delle pitture nelle catacombe romane. Acquisizioni e prospettive. Atti della giornata di studio, Rome, 3 marzo 2000, Vatican City 2002; A.M. Nieddu, L'arte paleocristiana in Sardegna: La pittura, in Insulae Christi. Il cristianesimo primitivo in Sardegna, Corsica e Baleari, Oristano 2002, 365-381.

II. On miniatures: K. Weitzmann, Ancient Book Illumination, Cambridge, MA 1959; Id., Illustrations in Roll and Codex. A Study of the Origin and Method of Text Illustration, Princeton, NJ [2]1970; Id., Studies in Classical and Byzantine Manuscript Illumination, Chicago-London 1971; Id., Manuscrits gréco-romains et paléochrétiens, New York 1977; Id., Byzantine Book Illumination and Ivories, London 1980; L'illustrazione nel rotolo e nel codice, ed. M. Bernabò, Florence 1991; Miniature. Le splendide illustrazioni dei codici dal IV al XV secolo, Rome 1996; M.G. Ciardi Duprè Dal Poggetto - J. Lowden, s.v. Miniatura: EAM 8, 413-414, 452-456.

III. On icons: K. Weitzmann - M. Chatzidakis - K. Miatev - S. Radojčić, Frühe Ikonen. Sinai, Griechenland, Bulgarien, Jugoslawien, Vienna-Munich 1966; D. and T. Talbot Rice, Icons and Their Dating, London 1974; K. Weitzmann, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons. I: From the Sixth to the Tenth Century, Princeton, NJ 1976; Id., The Icons. Holy Images. Sixth to Fourteenth Century, New York 1978; M. Andaloro, L'icona cristiana e gli artisti, in Aurea Roma. Dalla città pagana alla città cristiana, Rome 2000, 416-424, 660-663.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

PALEOGRAPHY

I. Greek writing from the 1st to the 8th c. AD - II. Latin writing from the 1st to the 8th c.

Paleography aims to reconstruct the history of script in all its manifestations, situating it in its sociocultural framework. For a large portion of the period covered here (1st-8th c. AD), Greek and Latin script developed within the same cultural framework; a true Greek-Latin paleography, however, remains to be constructed. The major ideas are common to paleography for each language. For reasons of swiftness and economy, everyday script, i.e., what one finds in private notes and documents, tended to reduce the number of strokes and to connect them together: it was a cursive script. The script intended for books above all sought to attain legibility and elegance: the strokes were distinct, the execution slower and more accurate; the aesthetic effect was achieved by the writer's deliberate style. One can understand the forms and the transformations of the book script, which were autonomous until a certain point, only if one keeps in mind some changes that took place in the context of everyday script, the usual place where developments in writing occur.

I. Greek writing from the 1st to the 8th c. AD. Before the 1st c. a differentiation between the everyday script and the book script took place. Both forms of writing were still done in capital letters, enclosed, i.e., between two ruled lines. Although the everyday script emphasized the cursive character to the point of compromising its legibility, aside from the rather plain forms that were close to the then-current usage but used primarily in "literary texts," the book script also developed truly and properly speaking calligraphic styles. Two of these were very characteristic and signaled the Roman period of the history of Greek writing (30 BC–AD 324). The Bacchylides Papyrus (BM 733) provides a typical example of the "severe style" or "Bacchylidean majuscule." This work contains no ornate strokes; it shifts between wide and narrow strokes, a contrast that will return several times in the history of Greek writing. It flourished in the period between the beginning of the 2nd and the end of the 3rd c. The Hawara Papyrus of Homer's Iliad provides an example of "Roman uncial" or "round majuscule": the letters and the rotund stylization are extremely typical; the golden age of this writing coincides with the age of the Antonines (i.e., Roman emperors 138-180). The end of the Roman period saw the birth of scripts that would strengthen, establish and perpetuate themselves in a canonized form during the Byzantine age. With the triumph of the codex over the scroll and parchment over *papyrus, the latter form witnessed the success and spread of the "biblical majuscule."

Although originating in a *pagan environment, this script attained perfection in the biblical codices of the entire 4th c. (e.g., Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus) and, because of Christianity's triumph, it spread everywhere. Its appearance is extremely calligraphic; it tends toward neat geometric forms (almost every letter, including the round ones, can be written within squares); the layout is modest, the contrast is balanced between the upstrokes and down strokes; ornate strokes are absent, at least until the period when the script attained perfection. When "canonized," the biblical majuscule enjoyed a long usage from the 5th to 8th c.: more noticeable contrasts and the presence of ornate "peaks" that were becoming more and more artificial signaled its gradual decline. Alongside the biblical majuscule, another form of writing established itself esp. in the Alexandrian area: the "Alexandrian majuscule" (a name preferable to "*Coptic uncial"). A more fluid script (the strokes are joined by ligatures), it presented the already revealed contrast between wide and narrow letters in the most common type (see the famous Codex Marchalianus of the Prophets, Vat. gr. 2125). In use until the 8th c., it eventually exhausted its distinctive characteristics. In the ancient form, the origin of which is to be sought perhaps in the Bacchylidean majuscule, the "Ogival [Gothic] majuscule" was a writing that leaned to the right and that presented a contrast between the wide and narrow letters; its strokes were curved; with the passing of time, the characters tended to separate. This writing, which reached its perfection in the Codex Freer of the gospels (dated to the 5th c.), spread above all during the 6th and the 9th c., gradually supplanting the biblical and Alexandrian majuscule (it would also develop a vertical shape).

If the majuscule preserved its monopoly of higher-level book script until the 8th c., everyday script had been moving for some time toward the minuscule, a script contained between four lines. From the 6th c. onward, the script of documents and in growing measure the script of some "literary" documents was almost entirely minuscule. Its development was very distinct from the majuscule book script, which by that time had become entirely artificial; but its canonized forms tenaciously resisted. Although the script of the first Christian *books had a modest design, it was often similar to the current usage, the script of codices, above all biblical codices, became all the more solemn, a sign of a change in the book's function. Nevertheless, from the 8th c. onward, and probably already from the 7th c., various forms of cursive minuscule, more or less stylized, were used in the books not intended to impress others (e.g., personal copies on papyrus); one of these would become the origin of the book script minuscule that would triumph in the 9th c.

II. Latin writing from the 1st to the 8th c. After the fall of the Western Roman Empire, the development of Latin writing was somewhat parallel to the development of Greek writing. The first documents written on papyrus date back to the 1st c. BC, and the first literary papyri to the beginning of the Christian era. The book script from this period was a majuscule, the capitalis rustica; the use of quill pen with a broad and flexible tip created a clean contrast between the upstrokes and down strokes, and the layout was modest and precise. The characteristics of the capitalis cursiva, the writing used for documents, were different; here the hard and subtle quill pen produced equal strokes that tended to fuse and, at times, lengthen; in certain MSS this script, however, was substituted by a more majestic and solemn script that patterned itself on the squared majuscule of the monuments, the capitalis elegans (e.g., in the so-called Virgilius Augusteus fragment). Between the 2nd and 4th c., technical factors (the use of parchment, the change of the positioning of the quill on the page) and cultural factors over which scholars still debate (e.g., the spread of the Christian book) favored changes (from majuscule to minuscule) and innovations, which then led, in the 6th c., to the rise and establishment of new scripts: the uncial and the semi-uncial script was used in books; cursive minuscule was used in documents.

Uncial, the original meaning of which remains unclear, was characterized by a rounded stylization of the letters, some of which were formed on the basis of the cursive; the most typical examples are the letters A, D, E and M. The uncial achieved great precision in the 4th and 5th c., then degenerated into forms that were not as precise; it survived until the 9th c.; from the 4th c. to the beginning of the 8th c., it was the most widespread book script. The origin of the semi-uncial remains subject to debate; nevertheless, in this script majuscules were mixed with numerous minuscules that were cursive in origin: particularly characteristic were the letters a, b, d, g, m, r and s. In the 4th c. a new form of cursive also appears in the documents: the cursive minuscule that was characterized by the decisive adoption of the four-line system and by a series of graphic forms that, whatever their origins may have been, were freely adapted and transformed in the interplay of the many ligatures. More disciplined forms of minuscule and semi-minuscule cursive were also used in books, above all in 7th- and 8th-c. *Italy.

With the fall and the subsequent breakup of the Western Roman Empire, local cultures and particular scripts called "national scripts" arose and took hold. From the 5th to the 8th c., the *monasteries and the episcopal *schools replaced the workshop of professional copyists, adapted the majuscule script and, on the basis of the cursive minuscule, developed individual book scripts. One can distinguish between the different types of pre-Carolingian minuscules in N and central Italy; in S Italy, which underwent a long cultural eclipse, the Beneventan minuscule acquired its characteristic strokes in the course of the 8th c. In *Spain, the Visigothic script, both book and cursive script, was differentiated by a large number of very particular forms (e.g., a, e and g). In *Gaul and *Germany, under the *Franks, the Merovingian script, Chancery, and then the book script witnessed a brief but considerable development from the 6th to the 8th c. One can identify more types connected to the centers of Luxeuil, Laon and Corbie and to those connected with Germany and Switzerland. But the most characteristic area was certainly *Ireland and *Britain, which exerted strong influence on the continent because the Irish missionary monks established monasteries such as Bobbio. Two scripts (called insular) were used in this area: one called the "majuscule" or "semi-uncial insular" was used in the most exquisite and calligraphic MSS such as the Lindisfarne gospels; the other, with its narrow and sharpened forms and characterized by the use of particular ligatures, was called "insular minuscule." The latter would spread in the continent's monasteries until the Carolingian minuscule—a script connected to the formation of the new Roman-Germanic Empire and Charlemagne's cultural renaissance—put an end to the age of script particularism. But by that time, the patristic era had ended.

Retrospective bibliography: J. and M.D. Mateu Ibars, Bibliografía paleografica, Barcelona 1974 (to be used with caution). Current Bibliography: Scriptorium. Revue internationale des études relatives aux manuscrits, since 1946 (published in conjunction with "Bulletin codicologique"); an excellent retrospective for the Greek portion: J. Irigoin, Les manuscrits grecs 1931–1960: Lustrum 7 (1962) 5-93, 332-335; for a select bibl. of recent publications: B. Bischoff, Latin Palaeography: Antiquity and the Middle Ages, tr. D. Ó Cróinín - D. Ganz, Cambridge 1990; J. Irigoin, Bibliographie, in A. Dain, Les manuscrits, Paris [3]1975, 191-205; D. Harlfinger, Griechische Kodikologieund Textüberlieferung, Darmstadt 1980, 657-678; P. Canart, Paleografia e codicologia greca. Una rassegna bibliografica (Littera antiqua 7), Vatican City 1991; L. Boyle, Paleografia latina medievale, ed. M.E. Bertoldi, Rome 1999. For general discussions on the history of Latin writing: B. Bischoff, above; A. Petrucci, Breve storia della scrittura latina, Rome 1992; C. Cencetti, Compendio di paleografia latina, Naples 1963; Id., Lineamenti di storia della scrittura latina, Bologna [2]1997; G. Battelli, Lezioni di paleografia, Vatican City [4]1999. Fundamental documentation for the patristic era: E.A. Lowe, Codices latini antiquiores, 1-11 and suppl., Oxford 1972; A. Bruckner - A. Marichal, Chartae latinae antiquiores, ed. A. Bruckner - A. Marichal, Olten-Lausanne 1954; 2nd series, ed. G. Cavallo - G. Nicolaj, Dietikon etc. 1997-. The history of Greek writing, a fundamental work: V. Gardthausen, Griechische Paläographie, III, Leipzig 1911–1913 (repr. Leipzig 1978); for the majuscule period: E.G. Turner, Greek Manuscripts of the Ancient World, Oxford 1971 (a collection of facsimiles with an important introduction); G. Cavallo, Ricerche sulla maiuscola biblica, Florence 1967; La paléographie grecque et byzantine, Paris 21-25 octobre 1974 (C.N.R.S. Colloque international n. 559), Paris 1977; G. Cavallo - H. Maehler, Greek Bookhands of the Early Byzantine Period. A.D. 300-800 (Institute of Classical Studies, Bulletin Supplement 47), London 1987; E. Crisci, Scrivere greco fuori d'Egitto. Ricerche sui manoscritti greco-orientali di origine non egiziana dal IV secolo a.C. all'VIII d. C. (Papyrologica Florentina 27), Florence 1996; Paleografia e codicologia greca. Atti del II Colloquio internazionale (Berlino - Wolfenbüttel, 17-21 ottobre 1983), ed. D. Harlfinger - G. Prato, I-II, Alexandria 1991; Scritture, libri e testi nelle aree provinciali di Bisanzio. Atti del seminario di Erice (18-25 novembre 1988), I-II (Biblioteca del "Centro per il collegamento degli studi medievali e umanistici nell'Università di Perugia" 5), Spoleto 1991; I manoscritti greci tra riflessione e dibattito. Atti del V Colloquio Internazionale di Paleografia greca (Cremona, 4-10 ottobre 1998), ed. G. Prato, I-III (Papyrologica Florentina 31), Florence 2000.

P. Canart

PALEOSLAVONIC, Translations in. Methodius, one of the creators of the Slavonic alphabet and simultaneously one of the promoters of Paleoslavonic literature, worked primarily as a translator of Greek together with his brother Constantine the Philosopher (= Cyril), and by himself, particularly after the latter's death (February 869). His biographer—probably his disciple Clement of Ochrida—narrates in the Vita Methodii, ch. 15, how Methodius translated, among other things, the so-called očskija knigy, i.e., the "books of the fathers." The meaning of this claim has sparked much debate among specialists. The hypothesis that these books were the Paterikon*, which narrates the life and actions of the *desert fathers, seems very unlikely because this type of document was not indispensable for the Slavs who had recently converted to Christianity. It seems much more likely that the statement refers to the "fathers of the church," i.e., patristic works in the strict sense of the term, inasmuch as such works were truly necessary for every group of people immediately after it had embraced the Christian faith. The *conversion of a new people to Christianity created a demand for translations into their respective language of the sacred *Scriptures and some fundamental liturgical *books, but also for patristic texts that could offer material for their subsequent formation. Knowledge of these writings truly was the best stimulus for consolidating and deepening the Christian instruction of the new converts: these texts were a common literary treasure no less precious than the books used in the *liturgy, and they became so much the more necessary because among the new converts heretical teachings soon began to spread and threatened the purity of the true *faith. One finds an important testimony along these lines in the famous Responsa Nicolai I Papae ad consulta Bulgarorum of 866 (ch. 106): the pope instructs the newly converted Bulgarians: "Now, concerning these individuals whom you allowed to come into your homeland from different places, they are teaching various and different things" (de his autem, quos in patriam vestram de diversis locis advenisse perhibetis varia et diversa docentes). From other historical sources we learn that preachers of various heretical doctrines came into the newly converted country: *Paulicians, *Manicheans, dualists and even followers of Muhammad. Even tenets of *dualism that had been disseminated for a long time that then crystallized in the heresy of the Bogomiles reemerged.

Paleoslavonic literature, esp. Paleobulgarian, comprised primarily numerous original works of translations from the Greek and, more specifically, patristic works, and not the works of Byzantine writers, properly speaking. The first among the S and E countries to undergo conversion, Bulgaria became the true center of translation and, as a result, of the spread of patristic texts among the orthodox Slavs. Later, the Serbs and the Russians would take up and continue this project so that as a result, during the medieval era, almost all the works of the major Fathers were translated, and even, at times, the works of lesser-known authors. The translation of patristic works thus became an essential component of medieval literature. Nevertheless, it is difficult to determine the chronology of these translations, esp. for the centuries after the group's conversion, i.e., as soon as they established numerous centers of literary activity, even if, however, for some of these, it is relatively easy to establish the precise chronology of the translations made in Bulgaria during the 2nd half of the 9th c. and the one following. Some of these translations contain a specific date, but one can determine the date of the others through *paleographic, linguistic and historical evidence. It should be noted, however, that the choice of works for translation was not determined by accident but by the needs of the community's spiritual life, inasmuch as such a choice was motivated by the desire to answer questions or by the occurrence of these questions in the religious life.

The names of the great Fathers such as St. *Basil of Caesarea, St. *John Chrysostom and St. *Gregory of Nazianzus became widely known through the translations of their liturgies: they were venerated as saints, and their images were regularly depicted in places of honor on altars. Also translated were the writings of St. *John of Damascus, this illustrious representative of the Greek patristic tradition. Toward the years 893/894, his famous De fide orthodoxa was translated into Paleobulgarian; but only 48 of its 100 chapters were translated, and precisely those chapters that would be particularly relevant to the new converts and perhaps more useful for their contents: on the terrestrial and celestial world, on human nature, certain natural phenomena and other topics. At some later time, even his book on Dialectica was translated. Despite the various difficulties the translator had to overcome in rendering the complex theological and philosophic terminology, the translation was executed with laudable precision. Already in the Early Middle Ages the dualist currents of thought held among the S Slavs were identified in part with the teachings of *Arius of *Alexandria primarily because of their denial of the *Trinity. It was well known that during the High Middle Ages, the teaching of the Bogomiles, the Patarines and the Cathari was referred to as the ariana haeresis. The Bulgarians certainly did not intend to combat "authentic" Arianism, which by that time had disappeared for centuries, when, at the very beginning of the 10th c., Bishop Constantine of Preslav (then the capital of Bulgaria) at the request of Prince Simeon (893–927), undertook a translation of *Athanasius of Alexandria's Sermons Against the Arians; he completed his translation in the year 906. Overcoming numerous difficulties to render this text, which was esp. complicated because of its abstract terminology, into a language that still lacked a literary tradition of that sort, the bishop of Preslav offered his contemporaries a powerful weapon to combat the dualist heresy that was solidifying itself precisely during those times.

Gregory of Nazianzus was among those authors who were most well known to the Slavs from the earliest ancient times. It is worth mentioning that Constantine the Philosopher (= Cyril) was already acquainted with his writings during his youth and was thus particularly devoted to him, a devotion that served him well during his entire life. In the Vita Constantini-Cyrilli 3, his biographer narrates that as a son of a well-to-do family, after experiencing a certain disappointment, he enclosed himself within his home and dedicated himself to learning Gregory's works by heart. It was precisely under his influence that Constantine composed his first literary work: a poem of seven strophes in praise and honor of his first teacher. Constantine undoubtedly read and learned Gregory's great works by heart, i.e., his *sermons and his very beautiful poems, but also his epistolary correspondence: another passage from the Vita (ch. 5) attests to this fact, in which the young scholar attributes to Gregory a citation taken from his Letters. Already the first Slavic authors reveal, among other things, that the Cappadocian Fathers had exerted an influence on them.

The Bulgarian writer John the Exarch (who lived between the beginning of the 2nd half of the 9th c. and the end of the third decade of the subsequent century) composed his voluminous Hexameron not much earlier than 918. This work was a vast compilation based primarily upon the work of the same name of Basil of Caesarea, *Severian of Gabala, John Chrysostom and other, lesser-known sources. The Hexameron presents, as is well known, a vast commentary on the first chapter of Genesis, with numerous digressions on related issues. As a response to the dualistic heretics' arguments that generally denied the importance of the OT as a sacred book for the Christian church, in this work, the fundamental importance of the book of Genesis is revealed while insisting on the intrinsic connection between the two testaments. The Hexameron offered Slavic readers an authoritative exposition related to questions concerning the *creation acc. to the conceptual categories of *Moses. In its vast scope, the compilers inserted information on the celestial and terrestrial world and on the plants and animals of a given region, often in truly realistic form with details deriving from an attentive observation of nature. Though using all the writings of patristic provenance above, John also used other sources and, naturally, some personal reflections; he was thus able to create a true encyclopedia of dogmatic and naturalistic content. Inspired by the example of Basil and a few other Fathers (e.g., *Theodoret of Cyrrhus—from whose work Graecarum affectionum curatio he cites extensive passages), John the Exarch edited his compilation with a deep sense of praise for divine Wisdom and the amazing harmony of the creation of the universe and humankind. Even in that statement, he was subliminally and fervently responding to the pessimistic ideas of the dualistic heretics who maintained that as in the case of humanity, the visible and material world was a creation of the principle of *evil. Following the example of his sources, moreover, he always criticized the astrological beliefs of the Protobulgarians.

Toward the end of the 9th c. and the beginning of the following, the so-called Dialogi quattuor (CPG 7482) of ps.-*Caesarius, the alleged brother of Gregory of Nazianzus, who lived during the 4th c., were translated in Bulgaria. The document was actually written by an unknown author from the *Acoemetae; he lived during the mid-6th c. Even in this case, together with his very interesting observations on ethnography, one finds in his writings criticisms of *astrology. The anonymous author used the Book of the Laws of the Countries of *Bardesanes (d. 222), offering copious extracts which are extremely interesting for their contents. It should be noted that the Paleoslavonic translation is more complete and accurate than the Greek text that has come down to us and constitutes a source for supplementing and correcting this text, preserved in relatively late MSS.

In the panoply of writings used in the refutation of Arian tendencies, one must also mention the Visio S. Petri Alexandri, a work connected to the name of the bishop and *martyr of Alexandria, *Peter (d. 311), which was translated in an early period that cannot be dated with precision. The popularity of this hagiographic text was such that the scene of the vision was reproduced on murals and icons, in which the bishop is portrayed before the *image of Christ wearing a torn garment; also included is the inscription of the bishop's question, which asks who was responsible for this tear, and Christ's response: "The ungodly Arius." Because the dualistic tendencies lasted for a long time, artists continued to produce these depictions, which were inspired by a hagiographic source, until the Late Middle Ages.

As a response to the philosophic determinism of the dualistic heretics who denied individual responsibility for their own actions, the *resurrection and the retributions for *sin, during the first decades of the 10th c., *Methodius of Olympus's De autexusio (De libero arbitrio) was translated. Given that the full Greek text was lost, the Paleoslavonic translation acquired considerable value in patristic studies (it was edited in 1930 by A. Vaillant in the PO 22,5 pp. 631-889, with a wise retroversion into Greek and a French translation). During this same period, the Christian Topography of *Cosmas Indicopleustes (a merchant and then monk in Alexandria) was translated into Slavonic. In addition to refuting Ptolemy's cosmographic system, this work offered the Slavic reader a very rich picture of geographic, ethnographic and naturalistic information on *Ethiopia, India, the Island of Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and other countries, with helpful information on the plants and animals of a given region and with illustrations made by the author himself, which were faithfully reproduced in the copies of the Slavonic translation. The work constituted a specific answer to the widespread notions in Greater Moravia, already toward the middle of the 10th c., regarding the roundness of the earth and existence of antipodes. Constantine the Philosopher vigorously combated these widespread notions during his stay in the area, as did the official church.

Other numerous patristic works of prose and poetry were subsequently translated, a detailed list of which is impossible to offer here; it would thus be worthwhile to mention just a few of the most important works. We know, e.g., that when the largest monastic center in SW Bulgaria was established in the third decade of the 10th c., the *monastery of Rila, they translated there *Ephrem the Syrian's fundamental work, the Paraineseis (Admonitiones). Fragments of this document and allusions to it can be found in the Spiritual Testament of the founder (St. James of Rila), written ca. 940; fragments remain in Glagolithic script of the 10th c., and an entire Paleoslavonic translation in a Cyrillic MS of the 14th c. Slavic translators also translated *Hippolytus's Commentary on Daniel, the Greek text of which is incomplete, though in this translation it is preserved in its entirety. Thanks to translations, other devotional patristic texts for the edification of monks and *laypeople were also available to Slavic readers in the length of their original versions, such as *John Moschus's Pratum spirituale and *John Climacus's famous Scala Paradisi, which was very popular: it was copied, read and cited very often until the end of the medieval period as in recent times. A fragment from *Palladius of Helenopolis's Dialogue on the Life of St. John Chrysostom, composed on the model of Plato's Phaedo, and also containing fascinating information on the "peoples of India and the Brahmans," attracted much interest and was published as a separate narrative document. *Isidore of Pelusium (d. ca. 435) enjoyed much fame; various letters he wrote were translated and disseminated in the orthodox Slavic-speaking world. Already during the High Middle Ages, the Catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 387) were translated into Slavonic, the second series of which were analyzed and published by the Slavicist A. Vaillant (1932). We also possess some works of *Epiphanius of Salamis of Cyprus (d. 403) in medieval Slavonic translation.

Selecting different writings of famous Fathers such as Gregory of Nazianzus and John Chrysostom, the translators were accustomed to gathering large collections of excerpts (sborniki) that would usually enjoy a wide dissemination. The collection from John Chrysostom's writings with the eloquent title Zlatostruj (Chrysorrhemon), composed around the beginning of the 10th c. under the inspiration of King Simeon, acquired much prestige. In the first decades of the same century, *Hesychius of Jerusalem's Commentary on the Psalms (5th c.) was translated into Paleobulgarian. Alongside this translation, later copyists added the actual text of the *Psalms: the two texts are found in the famous codex of the University Library of Bologna, known as the Psalterium Bononiense; it can be dated to the 1st half of the 13th c. In response to certain Renaissance tendencies to offer a naturalistic interpretation of the *Song of Songs, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Interpretatio was translated probably toward the end of the 14th c. Slavic authors of that period cited and even alluded to this work. Ps.-*Dionysius was known to the Slavs already toward the 9th-10th c. and was cited by them more than once; but it seems that the entire translation of his writings was completed only during the 2nd half of the 14th c.; the translation was preserved, moreover, in a copy dated to 1371.

In sum, one can conclude that the translation of numerous writings of the Fathers established the most solid basis for the birth and development of literature of the orthodox Slavs. Such Slavic translations, furthermore, are also of considerable interest for knowing Greek patristic literature and should be used with gratitude and care.

CPG II-III (useful but incomplete); A.S. Archangelskij, Tvorenija otcov Cerkvi v drevne russkoj pis'mennosti. Izvlečenija iz rukopisej i opyty istoriko- literaturnych izučenj, I-IV, Kazan 1889-1890 (a foundational work, its place has still not be been supplanted); G.H. Bonwetsch, Hippolyt's Kommentar zum Buche Daniel und die Fragmente des Kommentars zum Hohenliede, Leipzig 1897 (See Dujčev: Medioevo bizantino slavo, II, Rome 1968, p. 10 n.2); Bishop Michail, Agrafy v tvorenijach Sv. Metodija: Žurnal Moskovskoj patriarchii 6 (1954) 43-50; M. Heppell, Slavonic Translations of Early Byzantine Ascetical Literature. A Bibliographical Note: JEH 5 (1954) 86-100; V.V. Daniov, Pis'ma Isidora Pelusiota v "Izbornike Svjatoslava 1073 goda": Trudy Otdela drevnerusskoj literatury 11 (1955) 335-341; M. Heppell, Some Slavonic Manuscripts of the "Scala Paradisi" (Lestvica): ByzS18 (1957) 233-270; I.K. Bunina, Sistema vremen staroslavjanskogo glagola, [The system of tenses of the Old Church Slavonic verb], Akad. nauk SSSR, Moscow 1959; A. Vaillant, Le saint Ephrem slave: ByzS 19 (1958) 279-286; L. Scharbau, Untersuchungen zum Tempusgebrauch im Gotischen und Altkirchenslavischen. PhD dissertation, Università di Kiel 1958; G. Nandris, Handbook of Old Church Slavonic, London 1959; A. de Santos Otero, Los Evangelios apócrifos, Madrid [2]1963; D. Bogdanovič, Jovan Lestvičnik u vizantijskoj i staroj srbskoj književnosti, Beograd 1968 (see also Dujčev: ByzZ 66 [1973] 102-103); I. Dujčev, Medioevo bizantino-slavo, II, Rome 1968, 3-27, 589-594 (for the Slavic version of the Dialogues of ps.-Caesar: 191-205, 604-605); R. Riedinger, Pseudo-Kaisarios. Überlieferungsgeschichte und Verfassersfrage, Munich 1969 (see also Dujčev: ByzZ 67 [1974] 403-406); G.M. Prochorov, Korpus sočinenij s imenem Dionisija Areopagita: Trudy Otdela drevnerusskoj literatury 31 (1976) 351-361; A. de Santos Otero, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung der altslavischen Apokryphen, I-II, Berlin-New York 1978–1981; I. Dujčev, La letteratura greca patristica nella Bulgaria medievale: Παρνασσός 25 (1983) 173-178; R. Picchio - H. Goldblatt, eds., Aspects of the Slavic Language Question, vol. 1, New Haven, CT 1984; E.M. Vereshchagin, Istoriia vozniknoveniia drevnego obshcheslavianskogo literaturnogo iazyka: Perevodcheskaia deiatelnost Kirilla i Mefodiia i ikh uchenikov, Moscow 1997; W.R. Veder, Utrum in Alterum Abiturum Erat?: A Study in the Beginnings of Text Transmission in Church Slavic, Bloomington, IN 1999; J. Schaeken

- H. Birnbaum, Die Altkirchenslavische Schriftkultur: Geschichte, Laute und Schriftzeichen, Sprachdenkmaler (mit Textproben, Glossar und Flexionsmustern), Munich 1999; H.G. Lunt, Old Church Slavonic Grammar, New York [7]2001; Kirilo-Metodievska bibliografiya 1516-1934. Pod obshchata redaktisiya na S. Nikolova, Sofiya 2003; D. Petkanova, s'stavitel, Starob'lgarska literatura: entsiklopedichen rechnik, 2. preraboteno i dop'lneno izdanie. Nauchni redaktori I. Dobrev i A. Miltenova, Veliko T'rnovo 2003.

I. Dujčev

PALERMO. People have inhabited Palermo for a long time. In the 7th c. BC, the Phoenicians invaded Panormos, a city so named in Greek because of the size of its port ("all port"). Perhaps the Phoenicians named it ziz (flower); then in 480 the Carthaginians arrived. When war broke out between *Rome and *Carthage, Sicily became a war theater, and Palermo served as the base for the Carthaginian fleet. Rome first attacked the military bases; then after Kamarina (258 BC) Rome conquered Palermo (in 254 BC). With a flourishing maritime traffic, Palermo functioned as an important base for the Romans as well. When Sicily became the first Roman province, some Sicilian cities preserved their autonomy. During Cicero's time, Palermo was among the cities "free and immune" from taxation. During the reign of Octavian, Palermo possessed the status of a Roman colony. Already since the time of Cato the Elder, Sicily was considered the breadbasket of Rome, being one of the major Mediterranean producers of grain along with Spain, Africa and Egypt. Even in the 4th c. BC there was an abundance of grain in Sicily, as *Prudentius mentions in his book Contra Symmachum (II 940-942). Even in the 5th c., because of its agricultural wealth and its strategic location, different groups of people were continually drawn toward Sicily; in AD 440 the island was occupied by *Genseric, king of the *Vandals; *Theodoric, king of the *Visigoths, was careful not to confiscate Sicily's lands lest the flourishing agriculture be damaged. *Belisarius took Palermo from the *Goths in 535, a date signaling the end of the Roman governance and the beginning of the Byzantine domination (535–831). The Arabs then conquered Palermo in 831 and made it the capital of Sicily, taking the primacy from *Syracuse, which had been the island's capital until that point. The Arabs made Palermo the capital of the Muslim emirate of Sicily.

Given the dearth of information that has come down to us, it is uncertain when Christianity began to spread in Sicily. The most ancient and certain historical evidence goes back to the 3rd c., when Cyprian, bishop of Carthage (AD 250-258), referred to a message sent to Sicily concerning the lapsi; this event presupposes the existence of organized Christian communities on the island, local anti-Christian persecutions, and even the presence of *martyrs and the lapsed. The *heretical controversies that raged through the East and Africa between the 3rd and 5th c. never took place on the island. The first known *bishops from Palermo date to the 5th c., beginning with a certain Gratian (Gams 951).

The process of Christianization was more intense in Catania and less so in Palermo, perhaps because of the restraining presence of aristocratic pagans. A valuable Catanian inscription that can certainly be dated to the first decades of the 4th c. because of its mention of a certain Zoilus corr(ector) pr(ovinciae), attests to the existence of a martyrium (the place of a martyr's grave). The inscription is an epigraphic note describing a certain Iulia Florentina, the dulcissima atque innocentissima, who at eighteen months and twenty-one days of age died at Hybla and was baptized at the point of death. Her body, the inscription reads, was entombed per presbiterum in a loculus pro foribus MartXPorum. The provenance of the title indicates that at Catania one can find the martyrium, near which the baby girl was buried. The epigraph is preserved at the Louvre Museum in Paris (see G. Rizza, Un Martyrium paleocristiano di Catania).

At Palermo, in the 5th c., there exists only one testimony to the spread of *monasticism in Sicily: the sepulchral inscription of Munatia Eul(alia) religiosa femina, who died in 488 (CIL X, 7329). One should note that the inscription comes precisely from Palermo, a city that certainly has not provided much epigraphic material (see F.P. Rizzo, "Eremiti e itinerari commerciali nella Sicilia orientale tardoimperiale: il caso sintomatico di Ilarione," in Storia della Sicilia, ed. S. Pricoco, 81). Until the 7th c., Sicily's priests were primarily of Latin extraction; this was inevitable perhaps due to the presence of senators on the island, who, though officially residents of Rome, often stayed at their large Sicilian estates. The predominance of ecclesiastical officials of Latin extraction is proven, moreover, by the fact that *Paschasinus had to use a Greek translator at the Council of *Chalcedon AD 451 when he had been charged by *Leo the Great to present Rome's reasons for opposing the autonomous tendencies of the Eastern church (see Leo the Great, ep. 88, to Paschasinus, bishop of Lilybaeum). Worthy of mention for the reconstruction of Christianity at Palermo is the fact that Leo entrusted his own scripta to Silanus, a *deacon of the Palerman church, so that he might transmit them to Paschasinus. L. Cracco Ruggini perceives in a series of names of monks, abbots, nuns and abbesses mentioned in the letters of *Gregory the Great used in reference to the *cenobites of Sicily that most of the Sicilian clergy were primarily Latin (see L. Cracco Ruggini, "Il primo cristianesimo in Sicilia [III-VII secolo]," in Il cristianesimo in Sicilia, ed. V. Messana and S. Pricoco, 113-114).

Gregory the Great's letters offer us valuable testimonies on Sicilian monasteries, chapels and hospices of the 6th c.; some of these were already in existence for years, while others were founded and brought to material completion through the benefices of Gregory's family and his donations to the Sicilian church (*Gregory of Tours, Hist. Franc. X, 1). Gregory mentioned several monasteries at Palermo: St. *Theodore, St. Erma, Sts. Maximus and *Agatha (called Lucuscanus), Pretorian, St. Adrian, St. Martin. Gregory the Great certainly established two of these: the *monastery of St. Erma over which Urbicus was the superior (Urbicus monasterii mei praepositus; Greg. the Great, Epist. V, 4, September 594) and that of Sts. Maximus and Agatha, which the pontiff called monasterium nostrum (Greg. the Great, Epist. IX, 20, October 598, sent to Abbot Urbicus). Again at Palermo, there was the oratory of the Blessed *Mary that was recently (nuper) ordered to be built, as Gregory the Great writes, on the initiative of the same pontiff (coepta nostra) in cella fratrum in the monastery of which Marinianus was abbot (it seems that he is referring to the monastery of Pretorianus) (Greg. M., Epist. I, 54–July 591). There existed only one xenodochium*; it was attached to the monastery of St. Theodore and was established by Peter, the director of which was Bacauda (Greg. the Great, Epist. I, 9, October 590). From the Gregorian letters we know that groups of *Jews were present at Palermo and in other important Sicilian cities: Catania, Syracuse and Agrigento.

D.G. Lancia di Brolo, Storia della Chiesa in Sicilia nei primi dieci secoli del Cristianesimo, 2 vols., Palermo 1880-1884; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia dalle origini al principio del secolo VII, 2 vols., Faenza ²1927 (repr. Modena 1997); G. Rizza, Un Martyrium paleocristiano di Catania e il sepolcro di Iulia Florentina, in Oikoumene, Studi paleocristiani pubblicati in onore del Concilio Ecumenico Vaticano II, Catania 1964, 593-612; G. Rapisarda Lo Menzo, L'Empatia di Gregorio Magno attraverso il suo epistolario: Orpheus 24/1-2 (1977) 15-65; Il Cristianesimo in Sicilia dalle origini a Gregorio Magno, ed. V. Messana and S. Pricoco, Caltanissetta 1987; Storia della Sicilia e tradizione agiografica nella tarda antichità, ed. S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 1988; R. Marino, La Sicilia dal 241 al 210 a.C., supplement to Kókalos 7, Rome 1988; Sicilia e Italia suburbicaria tra IV e VIII secolo, ed. S. Pricoco, F. Rizzo Nervo and T. Sardella, Soveria Mannelli 1991; G. Rapisarda Lo Menzo, Studi gregoriani. Gregorio Magno e la Sicilia, Catania 1993; La Sicilia nella tarda antichità e nell'alto medioevo. Religione e società, ed. R. Barcellona and S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 1999; G. Mammino, Gregorio Magno e la Riforma della Chiesa in Sicilia. Analisi del Registrum Epistularum, Catania 2004; L. Giordano, Itinerari di giustizia gregoriana: Testualità e recezione, Bari 2005; F.P. Rizzo, Gli albori della Sicilia cristiana. Secoli IV, Bari 2005; F.P. Rizzo, Sicilia cristiana dal I al V secolo, 2 vols., Rome 2006.

G. Rapisarda

PALESTINE

I. Palestine I - II. Palestine II - III. Palestine III.

Pompey conquered *Syria in 64/63 BC, establishing it as a Roman province with poorly defined borders, inasmuch as it extended more or less from *Cappadocia to *Egypt, to the Arabian Desert and to the Euphrates. In these various territories, the Romans usually left puppet kings or they formed them into independent cities. After the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70, Judea became an imperial Roman province in and of itself under the legatus and, after the war of 130/131, it assumed the name Syria-Palestine, which from 295 extended to certain territories of *Arabia. From 358, the province was subdivided into Palaestina and Palaestina Salutaris. Around 400, Palestine was subdivided into three parts: two included Palestine properly so-called (Palaestina I and Palaestina II), and the third (Palaestina III) included a few territories E of the Dead Sea. Moreover, the province of Arabia bordering Syria extended toward the N. The capital of Palaestina I was *Jerusalem; Palaestina II, *Scythopolis; Palaestina III, *Petra. For identifying the Roman dioceses, consult F.M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine II, Paris 1938, 200-202; B. Bagatti, The Church from the Gentiles in Palestine, Jerusalem 1971, 92-95.

I. Palestine I. Along the coast, toward the N, one finds Dor (Dora), an episcopal see since the 5th c. Archaeological excavations have revealed remnants of the port, the walls, a temple, the theater and a few churches. An inscription on one of the church's mosaics commemorates Bishop *Acacius (EAEHL 1, 334-337; NEAEHL 1, 357-372). A rock bears within it a piece of rock from Calvary; it is displayed for the veneration of the faithful (Bagatti, Villaggi di Galilea, 111).

Ashkelon and Maiuma of Ashkelon. The archaeological excavations of Barnea, located to the N of the actual medieval enclosure of Ashkelon, now a public park, have shown that this area was primarily inhabited during the Roman-Byzantine period. Two churches have been discovered: one with three aisles; the second, which appears to be an annex to other sacred buildings, bears an inscriptioon of Ps 23:1 on the floor and the name of Bishop Anastasius with the date 493. This fact leads one to surmise that the ancient city of Ashkelon could have been located there. Maiuma is none other than the port of Ashkelon (Bagatti, Ascalon SBF 24 [1974] 227-264; NEAEHL 1, 103-112). The bishop of Maiuma in Ashkelon is mentioned only in the 6th c. Arches taken from churches and other sacred objects are in the park (EAEHL, 125-130).

Gaza* and Maiuma of Gaza. The city had many churches adorned with numerous mosaics (Abel, Gaza). Recently to the N of Gaza, at Jabalya, a church was discovered with surrounding sacred objects, among which was a baptistery, adorned with mosaic flooring from various eras. The mosaic of the diaconicon dates to the middle of the 5th c., and the one in the church comes from the beginning of the 8th (Madaba Map, 216-218). We also know of many sepulchral inscriptions primarily from the 6th c. that commemorate the *faithful, e.g., two deacons: Alexander and Patricius, and a phrase expressing goodwill toward the dead who "rest in Christ among the saints." A Latin inscription recalls the memory of *Juvenal, probably the first patriarch of *Jerusalem (Clermont-Ganneau, Archaeological Researches, 397-429). Also found were buildings, not mentioned in literary texts, decorated with mosaic floors. A few of these possess an artistic interest: the mosaic of birds in the church at Umm Gerar; the mosaics of human figures, a horseman and some portraits in the church at Kissufin (these were among the most beautiful in Palestine); the mosaics of birds, grapes and paintings in the church dedicated to St. Cyriacus at Magen; the church at Shellal had mosaics of four-footed animals, birds, birds, fish and fruit dating to the year 561-562. At Maiuma, in the ruins of a synagogue, archaeologists found a mosaic of various animals and *David playing the harp (Bagatti, Villaggi di Giudea e Neghev, 150-189).

Eleutheropolis/Beit Gebrin. This city was recognized as an episcopal see beginning from the 4th c. Two religious buildings have been preserved from ancient Roman and paleo-Christian periods: the church at Muhatt el-Urdi had mosaics with animals and scenes from *Jonah's life; another church had mosaics with the seasons of the year as well as hunting scenes; it also had a chapel dedicated to Christ, the King of the Universe, originally on the hill of el-Muqarqal but now moved to *Jerusalem (Bagatti, Cristianesimo ad Eleuteropoli). Toward the S lie the remains of a large church called Sanhanna, studied in the 19th c. but deteriorating rapidly (Ovadiah, Corpus, 135-137). Inside the church, archaeologists have found Christian tombs decorated with *crosses and painted birds.

Diospolis-Lydda*. When the Arabs founded the city of Ramle, Lydda was almost abandoned even though it had been an important Jewish center and Roman colony during the time of Septimius Severus. In the 6th c., it was also called Georgiopolis, thanks to a tradition that asserted that the saint's martyrdom and tomb were located here. Nothing remains of the buildings from the Roman period and of the ancient church of St. George, with the exception, perhaps, of remains here or there that have been incorporated into a later crusader church. A half-erased inscription on a column that was later reused for the mosque and was formerly placed in the middle portion of the sanctuary of St. George said that "the most worthy pastors" took care to "adorn this most illustrious temple" (Bagatti, Villaggi di Samaria, 160-169). Because it was a *cemetery church, it probably had to be placed on the outskirts of the city.

Nicopolis/Emmaus, later Amwas. An important city between Jerusalem and Jaffa. It is the location in which the gospel of *Luke places the scene containing the appearance of the risen Christ to Cleopas (Lk 24:13-32). It was reestablished in the 3rd c. with the name Nicopolis and was recognized as an episcopal see from the 4th c. onward. After the complete destruction of the village, nothing remains here but three apses made of giant blocks without bases, built using Roman techniques, and a group of Christian buildings, all in ruins, including a church with three aisles, a baptistery with a pool consisting of four lobes and mosaics containing scenes of wild animals biting domesticated ones. Scholars have demonstrated that the original dating of the mosaic and the building to the 2nd c. is untenable. It seems more reasonable to suggest that the building is a church with three apses and that the style of the mosaics indicate a 5th-c. date. The building was constructed upon existing walls from the Roman period, although some additions were made in the 6th c. (Bagatti, Villaggi di Samaria, 148-52; EAEHL 2, 362-364).

Jericho. Remains of various churches are found here: at Wady-el-Kelt, the church of St. Andrew with 6th-c. inscriptions; in the current town the church of St. George, which is a small oratory constructed by the priest George (d. 566); at Tell Hassan, a church believed to have been the episcopal cathedral; and, to the N toward the fountain, a church belonging to the monk Anthimos, which has floors with birds, four-footed animals, fish and the inscription of the names of three deacons: Daniel, Macarius and John. The church built right on top of the fountain, which one could partially see in previous centuries, can no longer be seen today (Augustinovic, Gerico, 65-92; EAEHL 2, 550-575). Formerly known as Flavia Neapolis but today as Nablus, the city was established by Titus Flavius Vespasian not far from the biblical city of Shechem; it does not preserve the remains of the ancient churches but probably has the proseuchē built as a forum for a group of *Messalians that bears their members' inscriptions on the stone seats (Bagatti, Villaggi di Samaria, 52). To the S, at the well in Samaria, the remains of a mosaic have allowed archaeologists to design a reconstruction of the cross-shaped church, built in the 4th c, when the well had been turned into a baptistery. A *sarcophagus with a shield containing an image of the Amazons and the cross reveals that Christian worship had taken place in that location before the erection of the church. The material that was taken from the well during the reconstruction shows that it had already been in use since the Iron Age.

Sebaste possessed the temple of Augustus, which had a large series of steps that were destroyed by the excavators in their efforts to search for the oldest ones (Bagatti, Villaggi di Samaria, 31-36). On the E side of the hill, as tradition maintains, is the tomb of John the Baptist, which was subsequently enclosed in a church of the 4th c. (partially rediscovered) and therefore placed in the crusader church. To the S of the city, near the fountain that supplied the water, almost at the mouth of the canal, there is an underground chapel dedicated to *Aaron that likewise has Christian graffiti (Ovadiah, Corpus, 157-159; EAEHL 4, 1047-1050).

II. Palestine II. Diocesarea, today Ziporis, was one of the most important centers for *Judaism after the destruction of the temple at *Jerusalem and an episcopal see since the 6th c. A church made of rock near the top of the hill, where the city had been built, was in all likelihood transformed into a basilica in 518 by Bishop *Marcellinus (Ovadiah, Corpus, 182ff.). In the lower part, to the N, there is a Hebrew inscription where the crusaders built the church of St. Anna (EAEHL 4, 1051-1055).

Capernaum. The excavations at the traditional "house of Peter" have revealed that under the floor of the octagonal church built in the 5th c. by Gentile Christians lies an ancient room supported by a giant arc where the *pilgrims wrote names and invocations for prayers in various languages: Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek and Latin, thus attesting that worship was practiced there. At a lower level, one finds small houses joined together near the courtyard dating back to the Hellenistic period. The synagogue built with some white seashells and adorned with decorations and symbols was not constructed earlier than the 4th c.

Et-Tabga is the traditional place where Jesus was also accustomed to speak to the crowd and to perform miracles. Ancient pilgrims commemorated the location with the name Eptapegon "seven fountains" because of its multiple water fountains in the local area. Remnants of 4th- and 5th-c. churches have been preserved, one containing a commemoration of the multiplication of the bread and fish performed by Christ and bearing Nilotic designs in the mosaic floor (S. Loffreda, Scavi di et Tabgha, Jerusalem 1970; EAEHL 2, 497-501).

Scythopolis-Beth-She'an was a city of the Decapolis established by the Ptolemies of Egypt in the 3rd c. BC; it was the metropolis of the province. On top of the hill there was a cathedral, the layout of which was formed by a circular apse with an atrium and cells set around it. Excavators destroyed the cathedral in their attempts to explore the most ancient buildings (Ovadiah, Corpus, 38-40). Not all the details of the cathedral's construction are certain (one does not know, e.g., if the canals discovered by archaeologists functioned as the baptistery). The church dedicated to St. *Procopius had mosaics in geometric shapes. Mosaics with human figures, the zodiac, months and birds are found in the *monastery of Our Lady Mary on the rocky side to the N of the wadi, where there was also a funerary chapel with a mosaic representation of the months (EAEHL, 221-228) and a mosaic with an inscription commemorating a building used as a bathhouse for lepers, which is yet to be found. Ongoing excavations are still bringing to light many of the city's monuments.

Tiberias. A city established by Herod Antipas in AD 18 on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee; it was one of the most important centers for Judaism. Archaeologists discovered some *thermal baths, the ancient aqueduct, a portion of the wall, and a few synagogues and churches. During a break from their work on the aqueduct that redirected the salt water from the region of Et-Tabga, archaeologists discovered a structure containing a small church lower down and a 6th-c. church higher up. The first church, scholars conjectured, displayed a particular form of architecture that was the work of Count Joseph, a Jewish convert during the time of *Constantine (Ovadiah, Corpus, 180). Nothing is now known of the residence of a Jewish-Christian bishop mentioned by St. *Epiphanius. Christian artifacts include a piece of architrave with crosses that were already reused for a small mosque—now a museum—and a now-lost Greek inscription (Bagatti, Villaggi di Galilea, 48-61).

Beth-Yerak/Philoteria. Farther S of Tiberias on the same shore of the lake are the ruins of Bet-Yerak, including a synagogue and a church with a thermal bath and a baptistery that reveals architecture of various periods. One inscription dating to the years 528-529 commemorates the presbyters Elias and Basil (Ovadiah, Corpus, 40ff.; EAEHL, 260-262).

Pella, a city of the Decapolis and a refuge for Christians during the year AD 70; archaeologists have found three churches there. The one to the W had three apses and an atrium resting on the most ancient remains where a *cross and an elaborate *sarcophagus decorated with clusters of grapes were found; in the E part there is a church with three apses. Both can be dated to the end of the 5th c. A third church with three aisles and one sole apse can be traced back, at its most ancient point, to the 1st half of the 5th c. The abandonment of this and, most likely, the other churches should be dated around the late 8th c. (Michel, Les églises, 120-128).

Helenopolis. One must identify this city with the modern-day village of Daburiyya, which is located at that foot of Mt. Tabor on the W side, the episcopal residence of which was moved to the mountain. Ancient Christian artifacts, however, cannot be found here. Instead, they have been rediscovered at Kfar Kama, a modern-day Circassian village at the foot of the mountain, on the E side. Here, in two chapels, connected and placed alongside each other, with upper levels, are mosaic inscriptions that mention a deacon, a presbyter and a bishop named "Eustathius." Mosaics on the floor depict birds, fish and geometric designs. There is even a reliquary. Thanks to this abundance of discoveries, one can reasonably conclude that there was an episcopal see in present-day Kfar Kama (Bagatti, Villaggi di Galilea, 274-280).

Kursi, on the E shore of Lake Tiberias and traditionally the place where the healing of the two demon-possessed Gadarenes occurred (Mt 8:28-34). There is one church and one chapel in which the miracle recorded in the gospel is commemorated.

Hippos/Sussita also lies on the shore of Lake Tiberias set on a hill, which has received its name because of its position. From this city of the Decapolis, aside from the remains of the walls, paved streets, theater and other buildings, scholars know of four churches, none of which, however, have been completely excavated to this day. One has a baptistery on the N side and flooring made acc. to opus sectile; from the inscriptions one gathers that the place was dedicated to Sts. *Cosmas and Damian. The baptismal tank is placed in the center of the apse (Ovadiah, Corpus, 174-178; EAEHL 2, 521-523).

Gadara, today Umm Qeis, once a diocese, preserves the urban Roman setup with classic buildings and a beautiful colonnade. The excavations have brought to light a thermal bath from the Byzantine period with mosaic flooring containing geometric shapes and Greek inscriptions. Archaeologists have discovered two churches: one built with a central layout, having a squared outside and an octagonal inside, with eight columns placed in the center and four apses at the corners of the square; it is preceded on the W side by a columned portico. The other church, only partially excavated, is built acc. to a basilica layout and is set against the S wall of the octagonal church (Michel, Les églises, 128-132).

Al-Salt is part of the diocesan territory of Gadara. A monastery with a church was found there and in it preserved mosaic flooring containing scenes from the Nile River and the image of a boy, which had already been ruined during the 8th c.

Capitolias, today called Beit Ras, preserves some classical monuments. Among the Christian artifacts (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 222) are the ruins of a church of Weli El-Khader. A building with a central layout, an apse and flooring in opus sectile were excavated in 1976-78 near the small W theater. More recently, since 1983, two churches have been excavated. One is found in the N part of the city; the other, perhaps the cathedral, at the center of the same (Piccirillo, Chiese e mosaici, 31-32).

At Abila, today Ain Quweilbeh, the excavations have brought to light the thermal baths, a theater and six churches. Among the ruins are also the remains of a cemetery (see Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 221; Piccirillo, Chiese e mosaici, 5-34; Michel, Les églises, 111-120).

III. Palestine III. The capital of the Negev was the Nabatean city of Elusa or Al-Khalasa; it was plundered already in ancient times to obtain construction materials. Recent excavations, however, have brought to light again a portion of a large basilica, which first had only one apse then three (EAEHL, 359ff.). More fortuitous discoveries in other small towns of the Negev have also brought to light important ruins of churches, two or more in each center, with many inscriptions on mosaic and rock. One should also mention the city of Eboda (or Avdat), in which two churches have been found. At Nitzana, now Haugia el Hafi, were found, in addition to two churches, liturgical and secular MSS, among which was a small Greek-Virgilian dictionary. Also, at Shivta or Sbaita, three churches were found. Mefis, or Kornub, contains three churches. Rehovot, or Betomolachon, contains three churches. Study of the entire complex and comparison of various architectural elements of these sacred buildings has permitted scholars to forward a detailed chronology of the various stylistic-constructive phases of these churches that goes from the 2nd half of the 4th c. to the first years of the 7th (Negev, The Cathedral of Elusa).

Charachmoba, now called Kerak, does not preserve any layout of its Byzantine church; however, it preserves 200 Greek inscriptions, for the most part sepulchral, often reused for the flooring. The inscriptions that have been dated range from the years 375 to 661. In the vicinity, various villages still preserve Christian artifacts, among which are a few hermitages, e.g., El-Habis and another on the Wadi ed-Defali with the remains of religious *paintings (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 229ff.).

Areopolis, now Rabba. In addition to the Nabatean temple, the city preserves the remnants of a church, inscriptions bearing the name of Bishop John (597–598) and the Metropolitan Stephen (687) and on one small shell an invocation of the Theotokos* (R. Canova, Iscrizioni, 198-208; Michel, Les églises, 139).

From Zoara, today called Ghor es Safi, the map of Madaba commemorates the church of *Lot (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 230). The excavations have brought to light this church on the slopes of the towering mountains at the district of Dayr ʻAyn ʻAbata. The church contains three aisles and three apses set against to the wall of the mountain; it had access to the outside world by means of an opening on the N side, which had a grotto containing a tomb. The building must have been built in the 6th c. on a preexisting church and subsequently underwent restoration and remodeling as the two rediscovered inscriptions show: one in the N nave dates to the year 606, the other in front of the presbytery to the year 691 (Piccirillo, Mosaics, 336; Michel, Les églises, 148-152; Madaba Map, 225-227).

At Arindella, today Gharandal, archaeologists have found the remains of a church containing three aisles that are preceded by a vestibule and paved with a mosaic (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 131; Michel, Les églises, 420).

Feinan, a place well known to those condemned to forced labor during the last *persecutions of Christianity, contains the remains of three churches, inscriptions (one with a dedication to the church of Bishop Theodore, which dates to the years 587-588) and sepulchral titles.

Aila, today Aqaba, preserves Christian artifacts among which are two column capitals: one engraved with Sts. Longinus and Theodore and two *angels holding the globe; the other is engraved with Sts. George and Isidore. These individuals are all identified by the inscriptions (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 233; Piccirillo, Mosaics, 337).

Pharan is on *Sinai on Djebel Meharret (Gebel). In the past, capitals with crosses and a praying man, perhaps in commemoration of *Moses, were seen in the garden of the monks of St. Catherine, where a new chapel was erected.

In the basilica of the same monastery-fortress constructed by the emperor *Justinian, one can still admire the splendid mosaic on the wall and on a segment of apse where the scene of the Transfiguration was depicted (Piccirillo, Mosaics, 333-334).

Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 4 vols., Jerusalem 1970; New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land, 5 vols., Jerusalem 1993, C. Clermont-Ganneau, Archaeological Researches in Palestine II, London 1896; F.M. Abel, Gaza au VI siècle d'après le rhéteur Chorikios: RBi 40 (1931) 5-31; Id., Géographie de la Palestine II, Paris 1938; S. Saller - B. Bagatti, The Town of Nebo, Jerusalem 1949; A. Augustinovic, Gerico e dintorni, Jerusalem 1951; G.H. Forsyth - K. Weitzmann, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai: 2, The Church and fortress of Justinian, Ann Arbor, MI 1965; A. Ovadiah, Corpus of the Byzantine Churches in the Holy Land, Berlin 1970; B. Bagatti, Antichi villaggi cristiani di Galilea, Jerusalem 1971; Id., The Church from the Gentiles in Palestine, Jerusalem 1971; Id., Il Cristianesimo ad Eleuteropoli (Beit Gebrin): SBF 22 (1972) 109-129; Id., Ascalon e Maiuma di Ascalon nel VI secolo: SBF 24 (1974) 227-264; Id., Antichi villaggi cristiani di Samaria, Jerusalem 1979; V. Corbo - S. Loffreda - E. Testa - A. Spijkerman, Cafarnao, 4 vols., Jerusalem 1972–1975; R.H. Smith, Pella of Decapolis, Vooster 1973; K. Weitzmann - J. Galey, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai: The Icons, Princeton, NJ 1976; D. Baldi - B. Bagatti, Saint Jean-Baptiste dans les souvenirs de sa patrie, Jerusalem 1980; M. Piccirillo, Chiese e mosaici della Giordania settentrionale, Jerusalem 1981; B. Bagatti, Antichi villaggi di Giudea e Neghev, Jerusalem 1983; A. Ovadiah - C.G. d. Silva, Supplementum to the Corpus of the Byzantine Churches in the Holy Land, Jerusalem 1984; S. Loffreda, Recovering Capharnaum, Jerusalem 1985; C.A.M. Glucker, The City of Gaza in the Roman and Byzantine Periods, Oxford 1987; A. Negev, The Cathedral of Elusa and the New Typology and Chronology of the Byzantine Churches in the Negev: SBF 39 (1989) 129-142; J. Shereshevski, Byzantine Urban Settlements in the Negev Desert, Beer-Sheva 1991; M. Piccirillo, The Mosaics of Jordan, Amman 1993; Y. Tsafrir - L. Di Segni - J. Green, eds., Tabula Imperii Romani Judaea-Palaestina. Eretz Israel in the Hellenistic, Roman and Byzantine Periods – Maps and Gazetteer, Jerusalem 1994; C. Dauphin, La Palestine byzantine. Peuplement et populations, Oxford 1998; M. Piccirillo - E. Alliata, eds., The Madaba Map Centenary 1897-1997, Jerusalem 1999; A. Michel, Les églises d'époque byzantine et umayyade de Jordanie (Provinces d'Arabie et de Palestine) V-VIII siècle, Turnhout 2001; D. Bar, Christianising of Rural Palestine During Late Antiquity: Journal of Ecclesiastical History: 54 (2003) 401-421; Id., Rural Monasticism: A Key Element in the Christianization of Byzantine Palestine: HTR 98 (2005) 49-65 (copious bibl.); I. Greco, La terra santa e le origini cristiane, Naples 2005; R. Canova, Iscrizioni e monumenti protocristiani del paese del Moab. Rome 1954.

G. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

PALIMPSEST. The name for a MS usually made of parchment that preserves traces of writing that has been washed away or erased (scriptio inferior or antiquior) to make room for a new document (scriptio superior or recentior) or for subsequent layers. Hence the definition of the term codex rescriptus, today preferred to the term palimpsest, from the Greek πλινοψάω = "I scrape afresh." The underlying writing was blotted out with milk and oats (a recipe from the 11th c., see W. Wattenbach, Das Schriftwesen im Mittelalter, Graz [4]1958, 303), by means of a so-called spongia deletilis or even by an erasure, i.e., by rubbing it with the dust from pumice stone, after having moistened the parchment with milk and flour. With the first method, traces of the previous writing would resurface; in the second, however, it would be lost forever.

Not unknown to ancient book production even for papyri, this practice became commonplace during the Middle Ages primarily because of the high costs for parchment and the scarcity of this material in face of the demand. The need for writing material forced people to reuse ancient codices (as in the 4th-6th c.) that had already become fragmentary or been intentionally dismantled, as canon 68 of the Council in Trullo implicitly attests (691 or 692), which explicitly prohibits under the pain of a one-year excommunication: "to destroy a volume of the Old or New Testament, as well as the works of our saints and authoritative preachers and doctors, and to dismantle into parts and distribute them, because they are damaged, to booksellers . . . as long as such a volume is not totally damaged by bookworms, water or in any other way" (tr. C. Noce). Initially, in the West the practice spread among the Irish monasteries, from which it then easily passed onto the continent, in *cenobiums that were in turn established by the Irish, such as Luxeuil, San Gaul and Bobbio; these were the authentic protagonists of the process of the reestablishment and recovery of knowledge of which the palimpsest is but one expression. Practical and economic reasons are certainly often intertwined with spiritual and cultural choices. All factors taken together are connected to the idea of erasure as damnatio. The pagan texts would be covered over with the Word of God (of the 241 biblical MSS written in majuscule, 55 are palimpsests); the Vulgate was often written over Old Latin versions, and the writings of heretics erased (an alternative to the bonfire). Writings deemed irrelevant such as out-of-date legal texts, or liturgical texts that became obsolete after a reform, were scrubbed down. Texts written in foreign languages with scripts that had become illegible (as occurred with works written in Greek, Gothic or Hebrew) were also scrubbed down in order to write treatises over them that were small, technical-practical or educational works, within the scope of what had been defined as "the instrumental use of the heritage of the past" (Cavallo). Being recycled material, moreover, an erased parchment was at most destined for the production of an unpretentious book. Starting with the Carolingian era, the use of palimpsests began to become rarer, and among them we find mainly liturgical texts. Liturgical texts were also preferred in Eastern Greek monasticism.

The number of palimpsests (also fragments) known today is significant, and these can be found in the main European libraries. Among the locations: Florence (Cod. Plut. 87.21 of the Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, the most ancient layer of which dates back to the 9th c. and contains *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Historia philothea; the mid-layer dates to the 11th c. and contains Homer's Iliad; the most recent layer dates to the 13th c. and contains various texts among which are works of Aristotle); León, Spain (the palimpsest of the cathedral contains part of the 6th c. Lex Romana-Wisigothorum, along with *Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia ecclesiastica and part of a 7th-c. copy of the Itala); London (in a codex of the British Museum, one finds a work of *Severus of Antioch from the beginning of the 9th c. written over pages of a MS of the Iliad and a MS of the gospel of *Luke, both dating to the 6th c., and Euclid's Elements from the 7th or 8th c.; in another MS of the same collection, a *Syriac translation of John *Chrysostom of the 9th-10th c. covers a 5th-c. treatise of Latin grammar dating to the 6th c., which in its time replaced the Annales of the historian Granius Licinianus: this last one is called the codex bis rescriptus); Madrid (*Eusebius's Historia ecclesiastica from the 9th c. on the Codex Theodosianus for the 6th-7th c., in the Real Biblioteca de San Lorenzo de El Escorial); Milan (at the Biblioteca Ambrosiana, a text of Plautus from the 4th or 5th c. is preserved, written over with biblical passages in the 9th c.); Paris (e.g., the so-called Codex Ephraemi rescriptus: parts of the Old and New Testament in Greek from the 5th c.); Vatican City (Vat. lat. 5757: a MS from Bobbio containing Cicero's Republic; it dates to the 4th/5th c. and is written over with *Augustine's Ennarationes in Psalmos in the 7th c.; this work of Cicero was restored by Cardinal Angelo Mai); Verona (Gaius's Institutiones and some of *Jerome's works). One could list many more examples though. For a complete listing of places in Europe that preserve the actual MSS containing palimpsests see this website: rinascimentovirtuale.eu.

To make faded writing reemerge, paleographers in the past used various methods and possible solutions, keeping in mind the variety of substances used for creating medieval inks that patristic and medieval authors and copyists could have used: (1) a carbon-based ink, extracted from the mixture of a black pigment with glue; (2) gallic-metallic ink, obtained by the chemical reaction between tannin and iron or even copper sulfate. Although in the first case the recovery of the writing was arduous, if not impossible, in the case of the gallic-metallic ink, the base component allowed traces of the vanished writings to reemerge. These two techniques for traditional recovery were adopted by each one of the two greatest Italian palimpsest decipherers of the 19th c., Angelo Mai and Amedeo Peyron. Mai remained consistent in the use of tannin; Peyron, however, used a synthetic reactant made at the end of the 18th c. The use of chemical reactants in many instances had positive results: the increase of legibility and the degree of preservation for the parchment; the reactants, however, caused irreversible damage. Thereafter, in the 20th c. paleographers decided to make use of photography and the illumination provided by ultraviolet rays. Today, scholars use digital technology, multifaceted analysis and electronic reworkings of images; all this prevents damage to books.

Finally, regarding the so-called Palimpsestforschung, although the existence of palimpsests has been known for a long time, only in 1692 was an attempt made to read a rewritten parchment when Jean Boivin discovered the Codex Ephraemi Syri rescriptus. At the beginning of the 18th c., Bernard de Montfaucon published the first facsimile of this codex. Shortly thereafter in 1762, however, Scipione Maffei studied and published the first exhaustive treatment of palimpsests (origin, history and methodology of research) for Franz Anton Knittel of Wolfenbüttel (1721–1702), in the Commentarius that opens his editions of Gothic-Latin fragments discovered in MS Weissemburgensis 64. Discoveries of and the paleographic signs in palimpsests followed for the entire 2nd half of the 18th c., above all in Italy, but transcriptions and editions of palimpsests were few and far between. Starting from the first decades of the 19th c., Cardinal Angelo Mai, a librarian of the Ambrosiana Library of Milan, made a name for himself. Mai is credited with having discovered Marcus Cornelius Fronto's epistolary correspondence and Cicero's De republica; he is also known for his intense editorial and publishing activity of ancient and patristic texts (Greek and Latin). Shortly before World War I, Kögel established the Palimpsestinstitut in the Benedictine Abbey of Beuron and published facsimile reproductions of numerous palimpsests. Finally, mention should be made of the European community's pilot project intended for research in the field of deciphering Greek palimpsests. The project is called "Rinascimento virtuale" and aims to unite more than 50 institutions of 26 European countries. To date, the project has resulted in the creation of a network open to new technological developments.

Fr. Mone, De libris palimpsestis tam Latinis quam Graecis, Carlsruhae 1855; R. Kögel, Die Palimpsestphotographie (Photographie der radierten Schriften) in ihren wissenschaftlichen Grundlagen und praktischen Anwendungen, Halle 1920; Palimpsest-studien I-II, ed. A. Dold, Beuron 1955 and 1957; E.A. Lowe, Codices Rescripti. A List of the Oldest Latin Palimpsests with Stray Observations on Their Origin, in Mélanges Eugène Tisserant, V, Vatican City 1964, 67-112 (= Id., Palaeographical Papers, 1907–1965, Oxford 1972, II, 480-519: a list of Latin palimpsests until the year 800); R. Gryson, Les palimpsestes ariens latins de Bobbio: Contribution à la méthodologie de l'étude des palimpsestes, Turnhout 1983; B. Bischoff, Paläographie des römischen Altertums und des Abendländischen Mittelalters, Berlin [2]1986, 26ff; L. Crisci, I palinsesti di Grottaferrata: studio codicologico e paleografico, Naples 1990; L. Fossier - J. Irigoin, eds., Déchiffrer les écritures effacées: Actes de la Table ronde (Paris, 4-5 mai 1981), Paris 1990; LMA VI, 1993, cols. 1641-1642 (G. Karpp); G. Cavallo, L'immagine ritrovata. In margine ai palinsesti: Quinio 3 (2001) 5-16; G. Declercq, ed., Early Palimpsests: Proceedings of the Workshop Early Medieval Palimpsests (Brussel, 8 February 2002), Turnhout 2007.

V. Milazzo

PALLADIUS of Helenopolis (363/364–before 431). Born in *Galatia around the year 363/364, Palladius appears to have received a good education in the classics. He became a monk around 386 and lived for some time in *Palestine; he then decided to travel to *Egypt, where he was introduced to the lives of the Egyptian *ascetics. In 390 he went to the Egyptian area of Nitria, then traveled in the desert of Cellae, where he lived for nine years and met *Evagrius of *Pontus, who exerted a profound influence upon him (see Hist. Laus. 38). Around 400, he became the bishop of *Helenopolis in Bithynia; in 403 during the period of the Synod of the *Oak, he was involved in the *Origenist controversy.

When *John Chrysostom was sent into exile, Palladius championed his cause in *Rome before Pope *Innocent I. When he returned to *Constantinople in 406, he was arrested and banished to Egypt. When allowed to return from exile, Palladius went back to his homeland, Galatia, and, acc. to *Socrates (HE 7, 36), became the bishop of Aspuna. The date of his death remains unknown; nevertheless, he was no longer alive by 431 because from this point onward Eusebius appears to have been the bishop of Aspuna.

During his exile ca. 408, Palladius composed the Dialogus de vita S. Iohannis Chrysostomi, an important biographical source esp. for the last years of John's life. Palladius was a friend and great admirer of Chrysostom. From a formal point of view, the work uses the model of Plato's Phaedo. He structured this work in the form of a dialogue held at Rome between an Eastern bishop and the Roman deacon Theodore. In the dialogue, Palladius defends Chrysostom from the accusations raised against him by *Theophilus of Alexandria in one of his defamatory booklets (see Facundus, Defens. VI, 5), now lost.

Around 419-420, Palladius wrote the Historia Lausiaca, dedicated to Lausus, chamberlain of the emperor *Theodosius II. This work is a collection of profiles of the lives of various male and female ascetics primarily from Egypt and, to a lesser degree, Palestine.

Palladius drew on personal memories of ascetics he knew directly and stories he had heard from others. He also left plenty of room for legendary elements. He aimed to write a work of edification and wanted to emphasize the spiritual value of life in the *desert, which he knew very well; this is a lifestyle that vigorously withdraws from the world and which, he observes, has strengths but also weaknesses such as pride. From the textual point of view, one should note that the Historia Lausiaca exists in three versions: one short (G), which appears to be the original; the long version (B), which, acc. to E. Honigmann, was written by Heraclidas of Nyssa; and another (A), which turns out to be a contamination of the two preceding versions and is mixed with the Historia monachorum in Aegypto. The Historia Lausiaca, which remains an important source for the history of the beginnings of *monasticism, had great success: people immediately translated it into Latin and numerous eastern languages.

As to the treatise De gentibus Indiae et Bragmanibus, which is preserved under the name of Palladius, only the first part seems to be his work, which contains some stories about India. The author of the second part, however, attributes the work to Annanus; it is a mixture of different ideological tendencies and influences.

CPG III, 6036-6038; Historia Lausiaca: PG 34, 995-1260; C. Butler, TSt VI, 2, Cambridge 1904; G.J.M. Bartelink, Milan 1974. Dialogus de vita S. Iohannis Chrysostomi: PG 47, 5-82; P.R. Coleman Norton, Cambridge [2]1958. De gentibus Indiae et Bragmanibus: J.D.M. Derrett, CM 21 (1960) 100-135; W. Berghoff, Meisenheim am Glan 1967; Dialogus, SC 341-342. Among the numerous translation of Historia Lausiaca in modern languages, we should mention the Fr. tr. of A. Lucot, Paris 1912, and the recent Histoire lausiaque, by N. Molinier, Spiritualité orientale 75, Bégrolles-en-Mauges 1999; the Ger. tr. of St. Krottenthaler, BKV2 5, Kempten Munich 1912, 315-440; the Eng. tr. of R.T. Meyer, ACW 34, London 1965; the It. tr. of G. Gottardi, Siena 1961; and the tr. of M. Barchiesi, Milan 1974, with an introd. by C. Mohrmann and text and comm. by G.J.M. Bartelink. One should also mention the Eng. tr. of the Dialogus by H. Moore, New York-London 1921; the Sp. tr. of D. Ruiz Bueno, BAC 169, Madrid 1958, 125-296; the Ger. tr. of L. Schläpfer, Düsseldorf 1966; the It. tr.: Dialogo sulla vita di Giovanni Crisostomo, ed. L. Dattrino, CTP 125, Rome 1995. For the De gentibus, there is an It. tr. by G. Desantis: Le genti dell'India e i Bramani, CTP 99, Rome 1992.

For an extensive bibl. on Palladius, see Quasten, II, 178-182. Among the numerous studies, one should note: C. Butler, The Lausiac History of Palladius, TSt VI, 1, Cambridge 1898; P. Ubaldi, Appunti sul "Dialogo storico" di Palladio: Mem. Acc. Sc. Tor. 56 (1906) 217-296; C. Butler, Palladiana: JTS 22 (1921) 21-35, 138-155, 222-238; F. Halkin, L'Histoire Lausiaque et les Vies grecques de S. Pachôme: AB 48 (1930) 257-301; E. Schwartz, Palladiana: ZNTW 36 (1937) 161-204; S. Linner, Syntaktische und lexikalische Studien zur Historia Lausiaca des Palladios, Uppsala-Leipzig 1943; R. Draguet, L'Histoire Lausiaque. Une oeuvre écrite dans l'esprit d'Évagre: RHE 41 (1946) 321-364; 42 (1947) 5-49; J. Dumortier, La valeur historique du Dialogue de Palladius et la chronologie de S. Jean Chrysostome: MSR 8 (1951) 51-56; E. Honigmann, Heraclidas of Nyssa (about 440 A.D.), in Patristic Studies, ST 173, Vatican City 1953, 104-122; J.D.M. Derrett, The History of "Palladius on the Races of India and the Brahmams," CM 21 (1960) 64-99; B. Berg, Dandamis: An Early Christian Portrait of Indian Ascetism: CM 31 (1970) 269-305; F. van Ommeslaeghe, Que vaut le témoignage de Pallade sur le procès de saint Jean Chrysostome?: AB 95 (1977) 389-413; P. Devos, Approches de Pallade à travers le Dialogue sur Chrysostome et l'Histoire Lausiaque: AB 107 (1989) 243-266; N. Molinier, Ascèse, contemplation et ministère d'après l'"Histoire Lausiaque" de Pallade d'Hélénopolis, Bégrolles- en-Mauges 1995; A. Isola, Alle fonti del monachesimo cristiano: l'"Historia Lausiaca" tra peccato ed estasi: Siculorum gymnasium 49 (1996) 101-117.

S. ZINCONE

PALLADIUS of Ireland (1st half of the 5th c.). First bishop of *Ireland, little is known about his life. Palladius served as a deacon of the Roman church, but we do not know if he was from *Rome or *Gaul; in 429 he advised Pope *Celestine to confer authority upon *Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, so that he could combat the ideas of the *Pelagians in *Britain, esp. the Pelagian Bishop Agricola (*Prosper of Aquitaine, Chronicon, MGH AA 9,472). Later, *Muirchú, in the Life of St. *Patrick, describes him as an archdeacon (Vita Patricii). Palladius was thus in contact with Germanus and knew of the religious situation on the islands. In 431 he was ordained a bishop and sent on a mission to Ireland primarily to rebut the claims of the Pelagians (Prosper, Chronicon, MGH AA 9,473) and to maintain the Catholic faith of that area: dum romanam insulam studet servare catholicam, fecit etiam barbaram christianam (Prosper, C. Coll. 2: PL 51, 271). The sending of a bishop suggests that a Christian community was already in existence there. Even though Prosper speaks of the *evangelization of the *pagans residing there, Palladius remained there on the island only for a very short time. On the way there, he passed through Auxerre to meet Germanus. Perhaps, after having completed his specific mission, he set out for Rome again and during the trip died in *Britain (was he killed instead in Ireland?); St. *Patrick received the news when he was in Gaul. Patrick was then immediately ordained a bishop by Germanus and sent to Ireland to continue and extend Palladius's mission (432). The advice given to Celestine and his travels among those populations suggests that Palladius had a connection with Germanus and could have been from Gaul because the name Palladius was very common there. His mission territory must have been in S Ireland, where he would have established three churches. His feast day used to be celebrated on 7 October; today it is 7 July.

L. Grosjean, Notes chronologiques sur le séjour de S. Patrice en Gaule: AB 63 (1945) 73-93; 70 (1952) 325; L. Bieler, The Mission of Palladius: A Comparative Study: Traditio 6 (1948) 1-32; Id., Interpretationes Patricianae: Irish Ecclesiastical Record 5th ser., 107 (1967) 1-13; Scriptores Latini Hiberniae X, The Patrician Texts in the Book of Armagh, ed., intr., tr., comm. by L. Bieler, Dublin 1979, 165; J. Carney, The Problem of Saint Patrick, Dublin 1961, 49ff.; T.M. Charles-Edwards, Early Christian Ireland, Cambridge 2000, 202-214.

A. Di Berardino

PALLADIUS of Ratiaria (d. after 383). The leader of the *Arians of Illyricum. Around the year 380, he asked the emperor *Gratian to convoke a council that would also be open to the Eastern bishops. The Council of *Aquileia (381), however, which was limited to Italian bishops guided by *Ambrose, condemned and deposed him because of his adherence to Arianism, along with *Secundianus of Singidunum. In 383, he traveled with *Wulfila to *Constantinople to ask the emperor *Theodosius to lift the Council of Aquileia's sentence, but he did not succeed. The Dissertatio Maximini contra Ambrosium includes one of Palladius's long polemical passages on the council and Ambrose. The attribution of the Sermo Arrianorum and some of the Fragmenta Arriana to Palladius has no solid basis.

M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 85-92, 111-134; Patrologia III, 89.97-98; Y.-M. Duval, La convocation du concile d'Aquilée de 381, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 421-437.

M. Simonetti

PALLADIUS of Saintes (6th c.). Bishop of Saintes (Santonae) in the 1st half of the 6th c. Born into a wealthy family (Greg. Tours, Glor. conf. 60), he ordered the construction of basilicas and dedicated them to Sts. *Martin of Tours, *Eutropius (the first bishop of Saintes), *Stephen, *Peter, *Paul, *Lawrence and *Pancras. *Gregory the Great sent him the relics of these saints (Ep. VI, 48). He was a participant at the 4th Council of *Paris (573). On the order of the Metropolitan Bertram of *Bordeaux, in 584 he consecrated Faustianus bishop of Dax, the candidate favored by the usurper Gondovald (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. VII, 31; VIII, 2). He participated in the 2nd Council of Mâcon, convoked by King Guntram in 585; this conciliar body deposed Faustianus and ordered Palladius, Bertram and another prelate named Orestes to pay an annual salary to Faustianus (ibid. VIII, 20). Palladius was stripped of one of his properties because he had housed the messengers of a woman named Fredegund, an enemy of Guntram (ibid. VIII, 20). His feast day is celebrated locally on 7 October.

BS 10, 59-60; DCB 4, 177; DACL 15, 557-561 (Saintes); Cath 454 (Palais).

E. Malaspina

PALLADIUS of Suedri. Palladius was a politeuomenos, i.e., a citizen (Bürger, acc. to K. Holl) or, more precisely, a magistrate (curialis or senator, acc. to Petau) of this region of Pamphilia; after *Constantine's reign, it regained the right to have its own governor. He was certainly a model citizen acc. to *Epiphanius, having sold all his possessions in order to minister to the poor and the church. He "burned with zeal," Epiphanius writes, "and lived a holy life; he was admirable on account of his faith and adherence to perfect communion." He appealed to the bishop of *Cyprus with a *letter, referring to him as the "leader of his soul and the church," to request his intervention in the questions concerning the *Holy Spirit that were troubling the church in Suedri. Palladius summarized the faith by writing at length on the trinitarian creed acc. to the *orthodox faith. From time immemorial Pamphilia had been in communion with Cyprus, and its own dialect was related to the one spoken on that island. In July of the ninetieth year of the ascension of *Diocletian (374), Epiphanius provided a response with his book titled the Ancoratus, thereby fulfilling the requests of the Christian magistrate and the other individuals who had posed similar questions.

CPG 3744; PG 43, 13-17; GCS 25, 3-5; C. Riggi, Epifanio. L'ancora della fede, Rome 1977, 35-37.

C. Riggi

PALM. In the Old Testament, the use of the palm took on various meanings: first, simply as ornamentation (1 Kgs 6:32; Ezek 40:26, 31, 34). In Ps 92:12, the righteous are said to flourish like the palm tree; Jericho was the city of palms (Dt 34:3). During *Jesus' entry into *Jerusalem, the crowd received him with palms and shouts of joy (Jn 12:13). The book of Revelation describes the saved before the Lamb, clothed in white robes, with palm branches in their hands (7:9). In the Greco-Roman world, palms were the symbol of victory. *Tertullian considers the palm a symbol of *martyrdom: haec palmata vestis (Apol. 50,3); for Christians, the palm became a sign of victory: in the Passio Perpetuae the victress receives a palm branch (10,9 and 12). For *Augustine, palms signify the *martyrs (Civ. Dei 8,27,1), to whom the palm is granted for professing their faith through their death: victoriae debita iustitiae palma reddatur (Civ. Dei 13,7). *Ambrose also affirmed: palma vincentis est (De obitu Valent.; Damasus, Epigrammata damasiana, ed. Ferrua 47,6). In Christian iconography the palm at times had only an ornamental and decorative function (Rep. 34, pl. 11; 200, pl. 47; 638, pl. 96; 675, pl. 103; WK plates 11; 15; 17a-b; 82; 101). One also finds the palm alongside the *phoenix, which was a sign of regeneration, to indicate a setting beyond earth.

LCI 3, 364-365; EC 9, 650; TIP 238-240.

A. Di Berardino

PALMAS of Amastris (2nd c.). Bishop of *Amastris in *Pontus at the end of the 2nd c. *Eusebius of Caesarea informs us that during the same period (at the time of Pope *Victor, 189-199), in addition to the Roman, Palestinian and Gallic *councils, one was also called by the bishops of Pontus to discuss the dating of *Easter; Palmas was its president, "being the most elderly" (HE 5,23,2-3). The Acts of these councils were known during Eusebius's time so that as a result we know that all the bishops set the date for the celebration of Easter on the Sunday after the 14th of Nisan, i.e., they followed the Roman tradition. *Dionysius of Corinth, in a letter to the faithful of *Amastris, mentions Palmas as their bishop (HE 4,23,6).

DHGE 2, 971-274; DCB 4, 177.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PALMYRA

I. History - II. Archaeology.

I. History. Modern-day Tadmor, *Syria (a small village inhabited by sedentary Bedouins), it was a caravan city with ancient origins; it is remembered for its fame even in the Bible (Tadmor: 2 Chr 8:4). Being a large oasis in the Syro-Arabian desert, almost midway between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates (300 km [186 mi.] from the river), large waves of commercial traffic coming from the East passed through it; it was favored by the presence of abundant wellsprings. Embroiled in the long wars between Rome and the Parthians (in AD 41, it ran the risk of being plundered by Mark Antony, but the inhabitants withdrew by taking their possessions and finding refuge beyond the Euphrates), Palmyra owed its extraordinary fortune to its status as a semi-independent, neutral city, in which the two hostile superpowers, Rome and the kingdom of the Parthians, were able to exchange goods. The exchange brought wealth and the construction of an important and splendid city that combined diverse styles: Semitic, Greek, Roman and Parthian, Roman walls and temples, forums, a colonnade street, etc. The upper classes knew Greek, but Aramaic was also used very frequently as the lingua franca. Its religious pantheon, as demonstrated by the presence of numerous temples, united Arabian divinities and the Canaanite Bel (Baal).

The pantheon entered the orbit of Roman influence after *Trajan's victory over the Parthians when Mesopotamia became a province. *Hadrian visited Palmyra ca. 129. *Septimius Severus attempted to make the city a base for military action against the East, but the rise of the *Sassanid dynasty favored the autonomy of the city: after the disastrous defeat of the Romans by *Shapur in 258, the Palmyran Odenathus, who was from the mighty family of Iulii Aurelii Septimii, defeated the king of Persia in battle and received from the emperor *Gallienus the honorific title imperator (restitutor, corrector) totius Orientis. Odenathus then extended his authority to Syria and a large part of the East; he died in 267 as a result of a plot on his life, and his son Septimius Vaballatus succeeded him under the care of his mother *Zenobia (Bath Zabbai). After the death of Claudius in 270, she continued the politics of conquest to the point of rejecting the sovereignty of Rome—the great adventure of Palmyra finished in 272 with its defeat by Aurelian first at *Antioch then at *Emesa (Homs)—the Roman emperor besieged the city of Palmyra and captured Zenobia herself while she was fleeing; she was brought to Rome through the triumph of Aurelian. A few months later, because of an uprising against the Romans, Aurelian destroyed Palmyra, which from that moment would have less importance, even in commerce. Palmyra, at the time of Odenathus and Zenobia, had also become a cultural center to which educated Syrians flocked. Zenobia had protected *Paul of Samosata, the heretical bishop of Antioch, against the Catholic majority of the East, who had condemned him in two councils; Paul was banished from his episcopal see only with the assistance of Aurelian (Eus., HE 7,30,19). There, *Diocletian constructed an encampment, baths and walls. *Justinian rebuilt the walls and the churches; the city came under Arab rule in 634. The ruins of Palmyra were rediscovered in the 17th c. We do not have information on the presence of Christians in Palmyra during the 3rd c.; the first known bishop is Marinus, who was present at the Council of *Nicaea.

M. Rostovtzeff, Città carovaniere, It. tr. Bari 1971; J. Teixidor, Un port romain du désert. Palmyre, Paris 1984; R. Stoneman, Palmyra and Its Empire. Zenobia's Revolt Against Rome, Ann Arbor, MI 1992, 1994; E. Equini Schneider, Septimia Zenobia Sebaste, Rome 1993; L. Dirwin, The Palmyrenes of Dura-Europos. A Study of Religious Interaction in Roman Syria, Leiden 1999; E. Savino, Città di frontiera nell'Impero Romano. Forme della romanizzazione da Augusto ai Severi, Bari 1999; T. Gnoli, Roma, Edessae Palmira nel III sec. d. C. problemi istituzionali. Uno studio sui papiri dell'Eufrate, Pisa-Rome 2000.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Archaeology. Inside the large enclosure of the walls constructed acc. to the Roman layout, to the W of the great temple, are preserved the remains of two churches with three aisles, one of which, however, has a fortified apse of radiating buttresses, as in the church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives. The other two churches lie outside the walls of the city (Lassus, Sanctuaires, 168-231). The most recent excavations have brought to light pagan monuments, with the exception of a depiction of *Jesus Christ. In the Polish excavations of 1960, archaeologists found, inside a small jar, jewels and pendant earrings, one of which was in the form of a *cross; during the excavations of 1962, a seal, a Maltese cross and a Greek inscription were found. Various sepulchral inscriptions mention Christians. For the Jewish and Christian influence, one should consult the study of L.D. Merino.

J. Lassos, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; K. Michalowski, Palmyre. Fouilles polonaises 1960, Paris 1962; L.D. Merino, Influencias judía y cristiana en los signos y inscripciones palmirenas: SBF 21 (1971) 76-148.

B. Bagatti

PALUT (2nd–3rd c.). A Semitic name that means "the ransom." The disciple of the legendary *Addai, with whom he evangelized the city of *Edessa, which became an important Christian center in *Mesopotamia and an axis for the spread of Christianity to the E of the Tigris River. According to the Teaching of Addai, Palut went to *Antioch to receive episcopal orders from the hands of *Serapion (par. 102), around the year 200. This was after Addai had been killed before having had the opportunity to "lay hands" upon him, although Palut had already been ordained a presbyter by Addai (par. 77). The incident reveals the Edessene community's dependence on Antioch. The Martyrium Barsamya presents Palut as the first bishop of Edessa (Cureton - Wright, 63-72). After the death of Palut, acc. to *Ephrem, the orthodox Christians of Edessa came to be called "Palutiani" in opposition to the dissenters. ʿAbshelama then Barsamya succeeded Palut, who died a martyr between 249 and 260.

W. Cureton and W. Wright, Ancient Syriac Documents: Relative to the Earliest Establishment of Christianity in Edessa and the Neighbouring Countries, London 1864, repr. Amsterdam 1967. J.B. Segal, Edessa "The Blessed City," Oxford 1970, 79-81; E. Peretto, Il problema degli inizi del cristianesimo in Siria: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 197-214; Erbetta II, 574-578; A. Desreumaux, Histoire du roi Abgar et de Jésus, Paris 1983; J. Teixidor, Bardesane d'Édesse, la première philosophie syriaque, Paris 1992; J. González Núñez, La leyenda del rey Abgar y Jesús, Madrid 1993.

A. Di Berardino

PAMMACHIUS (d. 410). Senator from the family of the Furii, he was a schoolmate and companion of *Jerome. He married Paulina, the daughter of the Roman matron *Paula, and, when widowed (397), entered the *monastic life; he spent his wealth in aiding the *poor, ordered the construction of a hospice for *pilgrims at Porto and built the church of Sts. *John and *Paul on the Caelian Hill (titulus Pammachii) in Rome. He engaged in the controversies regarding *Jovinian and *Origen, by actively working in opposing *Rufinus. Jerome dedicated some books to him and sent him numerous letters (Ep. 48; 49; 57; 66; 83; 84; 97). He also received a letter from *Paulinus of *Nola (Ep. 13), as soon as the latter was informed of the death of Paula, and a laudatory letter from *Augustine (Ep. 58), for his anti-Donatist activity in *Numidia. He died in 410 during the occupation of Rome by *Alaric's *Goths.

Palladius, Hist. laus. 62; BS 10, 72-74 (bibl.); PLRE I, 663; LTK[3] 7, 1306-1307; PCBE 1576-1581.

A. Pollastri

PAMPHILUS of Caesarea (d. 16 February 310). Born of a noble family of Berytus (Beirut), he accumulated public offices; then, at the Didaskaleion of *Alexandria he became the student of *Pierius (*Photius, Bibl., cod. 118-119), who was called "*Origen the Younger." He relocated to *Caesarea to reinvigorate the school founded by Origen; he was ordained a priest by Bishop Agapius of Caesarea. Eusebius retold his life in De Mart. Pal. His teaching, like Origen's, entailed a spiritual and scriptural approach. He restored and expanded the library attached to the school and organized a workshop of copyists. Arrested in November of 307, he spent two years in prison and was beheaded on 16 February 310 under *Maximinus Daia. Two now-lost biographies were written by his teacher Pierius and his student Eusebius, who asked to be called "Eusebius Pamphili" and spoke of him even in the Historia ecclesiastica and in the De Mart. Pal.

While in prison and with the help of Eusebius, he wrote the Apology for Origen in six books, the sixth of which was written after his death by Eusebius alone (Photius, Bibl. cod. 118). Only book 1 has survived in the Latin translation of *Rufinus. The introduction, which is addressed to the *martyrs of Palestine condemned to the mines (damnatio ad metalla), illustrates the method to be followed for reading and justly assessing Origen's work; it emphasizes the hypothetical and antithetical approach of his speculations that are not intended to be understood as dogmatic affirmations but are often opposed to each other; it also emphasizes the teacher's adherence to *orthodoxy. Citing numerous texts from Origen's writings, some of which are not recognized as his, Pamphilus refutes the charges regarding Origen's thought on the *Trinity, the *incarnation and the historicity of *Scripture, the *resurrection, punishment, the *soul and *metempsychosis. To dissociate such a defense from the over-glorious patronage of a martyr, *Jerome wanted others to accept the idea that this document was the exclusive work of the semi-Arian Eusebius, but he is refuted by others' citations of Pamphilus's Apology.

Apology of Origen: PG 17, 521-616; SC 464-465; Palut van Nuffelen, Two Fragments from the Apology for Origen in the Church History of Socrates Scholasticus: JTS 56 (2005) 103-114.

H. Crouzel

PAMPHILUS of Jerusalem (6th–7th c.). Two documents have come down to us under Pamphilus's name: one dogmatic, the other *hagiographic. The work Capitulorum diversorum seu dubitationum solutio (A. Mai, Nova Patrum Bibliotheca, II, Rome1844, 597-693) treats questions of *Christology and refutes *Severus of Antioch, the *Acephali and the *tritheist monophysites. One finds long citations of this work in the Doctrina Patrum (ed. F. Diekamp, Münster 1907; repr. [2]1982). The author at times used *Leontius of Byzantium verbatim (esp. the Epilysis) and the emperor *Justinian's Confession rectae fidei. The work was composed between 560 and 630. To commemorate the holy *virgin and Roman martyr *Soteris, who was venerated also at *Jerusalem in the 6th c., Pamphilus wrote the Encomium s. Soteridis (P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Hagiographica, ST 19, Rome1908, 113-120). Pamphilus made this female saint out to be a companion of St. *Pancras.

CPG III, 6920ff.; Bardenhewer V, 18ff.; Beck 379 and 465; Altaner 549; M. Richard, Léonce et Pamphile: RSPh 27 (1938) 27-52 (= Opera Minora III, Turnhout 1977, n. 58); Id., Pamphile de Jérusalem: Muséon 90 (1977) 277-28

A. De Nicola

PANCRAS, martyr. Pancras is inscribed in the Mart. hier. after Sts. *Nereus and Achilleus, on 12 May. Pope *Symmachus (498–514) built or enlarged the basilica constructed over his tomb, outside the gate of the same name on the Via Aurelia (Duchesne, LP 1, 262). There, *Gregory the Great delivered Hom. in Ev. 27 (CCL 141, 229-238) and established a *monastery nearby (Reg. epp. 4,18: CCL 140, 236-237). *Honorius I (625–638) added a semicircular crypt and an altar ad corpus in the choir of the church (ICUR 2, 24 and 156). *Gregory of Tours (Glor. mart. 38) mentions the custom by which accused people, through an oath sworn in a church, could be exonerated from accusations. The Gelasian and Gregorian *Sacramentaries record a *Mass in honor of the *martyr on the day of his feast. Pancras's Latin Passio is categorized as an epic and dates back to the 6th-7th c.: Pancras was from a rich Phrygian family and resided at *Rome under *Diocletian and *Valerian; he was baptized and martyred. In the East, Pancras does not have a cult; BHG 1408 is a translation made in S Italy, of which BHG 1409 is a paraphrase, used by *Pamphilus of Jerusalem (BHG 1642).

BHL 6420-6428; BHG 1408-1409; BS 10, 82-89; LCI 8, 110-111; BBKL 6, 1483-1484; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae 3, Vatican City 1971, 154-175; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 251-253; J. Declerck, Les recensions grecques de la Passion de S. Pancrace, martyr à Rome: AB 105 (1987) 65-85; M. Cecchelli, Chiese di Roma illustrate. S. Pancrazio, Rome1972; H.R. Drobner, Der heilige Pankratius, Paderborn 1988; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome [2]1999, 234-237.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PANEGYRIC

I. Eulogy and epideictic speech: Theoretical premises, practical indications - II. Panegyrics of Late Antiquity.

The Latin term panegyricus, which then passed into European languages, is a transliteration of the Greek adjective πανηγυρικός, which derived from the substantive πανήγυρις, "a meeting, solemn assembly," such as the one held on the occasion of the Panathenaic or the Olympic games. As an attribute of the λογός, speech, the term is used—without specific technical rhetorical connotations—by Isocrates, who thus labels the oration he published in 380 BC on the occasion of the gathering of the Greeks at Olympia. For a long time the Greek πανηγυρικός would retain this generic meaning that one finds again in the Ars rhetoricia of ps.-*Dionysius, probably composed toward the end of the 3rd c. AD, where πανηγυρικός refers to speeches delivered in the public celebrations of solemn religious feasts. It is only in the Byzantine period that the meaning of πανηγυρίζειν becomes closer to ἐγκωμιάζειν, until finally becoming its synonym in modern Greek. In the Latin milieu, however, as early as the imperial age, the term panegyricus was used as a synonym of laudatio, in the ancient technical sense of "laudatory speech of a famous person." The first securely datable testimony of such a meaning is in *Lactantius, Div. inst. I, 15,13 (sicut faciunt qui apud reges etiam malos panegyricis mendacibus adulantur), although one finds the use of the term panegyrista to refer to the author of an encomiastic speech for the first time in *Sidonius Appollinaris (Epist. IV, 1,2).

I. Eulogy and epideictic speech: Theoretical premises, practical indications. The ancient corpus of treatises, which catalogs the panegyric among the speech of the epideictic genre, is devoted to the encomium both for theorizing the role and characteristics in the widest context of oratory and for indicating themes and practical rules of composition. Given the sparse and unoriginal contribution to epideictic composition by Latin oratorical treatises, we will limit ourselves here to the most important texts from the Greek milieu for the purposes of our discussion, referring the reader for more in-depth information to the studies cited in the bibl.

The most authoritative and influential voice for Greeks and Latins was Aristotle, whose theorization presupposes an acquaintance with the thought of the Sophist Gorgias (on the latter, see Buchheit, 27-38). In Rhet. I. 3 1358bff., Aristotle distinguishes three genres (εἴδη) of speech: deliberative (συμβουλευτικόν, Lat.: deliberativum), judicial (δικανικόν: Lat. iudiciale) and epideictic (ἐπιδεικτικόν: Lat. demonstrativum). The distinction is based on the role of the hearer, which in the first two cases is the judge, and he must decide on the future (deliberative oratory) or on the past (judicial oratory), although in the epideictic genre, which expresses praise or blame and pertains to the present, he is the spectator (θεωρός) and decides on the ability of the orator. Each one of the three genres has its specific end: the deliberative has as its end the useful and the harmful; the judiciary genre, the just and the unjust; the epideictic, the beautiful and the ugly. Unlike the other two genres that pursue concrete goals, the epideictic genre appears in Aristotle disconnected from immediate practical ends (on the other hand, in Rhet. III, 12,1414a, it is explicitly stated that the epideictic speech is intended for reading and therefore requires a style more suited to writing than to recitation).

Aristotle takes into consideration virtue and vice, the noble and the base, since these are respectively objects of praise or blame, whether one is dealing with a human being, a god, other animate beings or inanimate objects (Rhet. I, 9,1366a). The forms of virtue are *justice, courage, temperance, nobility, magnanimity, generosity, sensibleness and wisdom (Rhet. I, 9,1366a-b), all qualities that we will find again in Late Antiquity. In praising (as well as in blaming), the goal is to take those qualities that might be considered excessive and bring them nearer to what is more acceptable (e.g., the reckless individual who is called courageous), and thus the actions of the person will be interpreted as a manifestation of praised virtues. Aristotle then distinguishes between ἔπαινος (elegy, praise) and encomium. The concept of ἔπαινος emphasizes the greatness of virtue, which is manifested in actions: it will then be important to highlight both the action and the intention with which one acts; the encomium, instead, has as its object the works (ἔργα) that are signs of a moral disposition: circumstances such as nobility of birth and education can increase credibility (Rhet. I, 9, 1367b).

If later on not everyone made the distinction between ἔπαινος and encomium (or not in the same terms articulated by Aristotle), the attention to the virtues, gifts, actions, intentions and achievements of the person praised would establish a constant element in the speech of praise. In praising someone, it is good to repeat many forms of amplification (the one praised did something by himself, or was the first ever to do so, or with few people, etc.); in the event that the subject per se does not offer many cues in this respect, he is contrasted with others. Because it is good to appear better than admirable people, comparisons with famous people are preferred; if this was not possible, the comparison is made with the majority of people (Rhet. I, 9,1368a). Important for the role of amplification (αὔξησις)—which must show how such actions are admirable and useful (Rhet. III, 17,1417b), both because they would be taught in the schools and because they provide a testimony of the current practice for explaining a person's actions (Rhet. III, 16,1416b)—are some practical suggestions offered by the third book of Aristotle's Rhetoric, pertinent to the introduction (Rhet. III, 14,1414b-1415a; see Buchheit, 169-188).

The final outcome of the Sophist tradition is more represented by the Rhetorica ad Alexandrum than by Aristotle (Rhetores Graeci I, II, ed. C. Hammer ex recognitione Leonardi Spengel, Leipzig 1894, 8-104; thereafter, M. Fuhrmann, Anaximenis ars rhetorica quae vulgo fertur Aristotelis ad Alexandrum, Leipzig 1966), an anonymous work (on the possible authorship of Anaximenes, see Buchheit, 189-207) that was chronologically close—we do not know if it was earlier or later—to Aristotle's Rhetoric. From our point of view, this is important because in various ways it anticipates the developments of the epideictic speech of Late Antiquity. The encomiastic genre is here defined as αὔξησις of intentions, actions and glorious words, but also attribution of qualities that the praised subject does not possess (συνοικείωσις μὴ προσόντων). Worthy of praise are things just, legitimate, useful, beautiful, pleasant and those things that (if one supposes they are difficult) the person to be praised has easily accomplished (c. 3, p. 28 Hammer). The positive qualities (τὰ ἀγαθά) are distinguished into two categories: gifts such as nobility, strength, beauty and wealth, which give prestige without being virtues (τὰ ἔξω τῆς ἀρετῆς), and true and properly speaking virtues (ἀρεταί), which are identified with the cardinal virtues of wisdom, justice and courage (c. 35, p. 80 Hammer). For the first category—because they do not depend on the individual but on the circumstances—one must delight in the one who possesses them; the second category, however, one must praise. With respect to the disposition of the topics for discussion, one will begin with the family of the one to be praised, then pass on to what he has accomplished as a child and as an adolescent, and, finally, to his actions as an adult, which are grouped together acc. to the virtues of justice, wisdom and courage (see Buchheit, 208-231).

Since the Hellenistic age, specific books of exercises on the techniques of composition were in use (progymnasmata: see W. Kroll, RE suppl. VII, 1118ff.), which taught one to lay out the various types of speeches. The most ancient progymnasmata that have come down to us are owed to the Alexandrian rhetorician of the 1st-2nd c. AD Aelius Theon (ed. L. Spengel, Rhetores Graeci II, Leipzig 1854, 57-130), who, among other things, emphasizes σύγκρισις (additional points in Russell - Wilson, 26ff. and above all RE V A, 2, cols. 2040-2047, Theon 5). After Theon, between the end of the 3rd and the beginning of the 4th c. a treatment of the art of the epideictic speech is found in four texts, the chronology—absolute and relative—of which is anything but certain: the progymnasmata of the so-called Hermogenes of Tarsus (ed. H. Rabe, Rhetores Graeci VI, Leipzig 1913, repr. Stuttgart 1985: the section on the encomium is at pp. 14-18, followed by a chapter on σύγκρισις), the Ars Rhetorica of ps.-Dionysius of Halicarnassus (in Dionysii Alicarnassei opuscula, ed. H. Usener - L. Radermacher, Leipzig 1904–1929, vol. II: the section on panegyrics, at pp. 255-260, is now translated in English in Russell - Wilson, 362-381), and the two treatises διαίρεσις τῶν ἐπιδεικτικῶν and περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν attributed to the orator Menander of Laodicea. Thereafter, the following orators would allocate a chapter of their progymnasmata to the encomium: Aphthonius of Antioch (ed. H. Rabe, Rhetores Graeci X, Leipzig 1926: on the encomium, ch. VIII, pp. 21-27) and Nicholaus of Myra (ed. I. Felten, Rhetores Graeci XI, Leipzig 1913: the section on the encomium and blame at pp. 47-58), who were active between the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th c., who both devote a separate treatment to σύγκρισις.

Basing themselves on current practice in the Greek milieu at the end of the 3rd c. AD, all four treatises at the end of the 3rd to the beginning of the 4th c. try to systematize epideictic oratory. Rather distant from the practice witnessed by the panegyrics that have come down to us is the Ars Rhetorica of ps.-Dionysius, who claims that the ancient meaning for panegyric is a speech to be delivered on the occasion of solemn feasts: in this setting, one foresees that the culminating part of the oration is the praise of the emperor. The treatise attributed to Hermogenes offers a more vast comparison on the points and the topoi in which the orator articulates the encomium of a person (see Russell - Wilson, 27ff.). Hermogenes's treatise is perhaps the most ancient; however, it does not consider panegyric as an autonomous literary form, but as a genre of discourse that recurs in works pertaining to the most disparate literary genres.

Of great pertinence for the study and understanding of the Late Antique encomia are the two treatises, probably from the age of *Diocletian, passed down to us under the name of Menander, but most likely the work of two different authors (cf.

Pernot 1986). The first of the two (διαίρεσις τῶν ἐπιδεικτικῶν, which is more theoretical and is organized on the basis of the objects of praise, provides a framework applicable to any eulogistic speech. The second (περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν)—which, precisely for this reason, is the most important for us—indicates in detail the points (κεφάλαια) in which the different varieties of epideictic speech must be articulated for recitation during public and private occasions. Of specific interest for our purposes are the precepts regarding the eulogy of the emperor (βασιλικὸς λόγος: ch. I), but encomiastic themes are fixed even for a funeral speech (ἐπιτάφιος λόγος: ch. XI)—which briefly develops the eulogy of the sovereign upon whom the crown is bestowed—and, finally, by the funerary lament (μονῳδία: ch. XVI). For the βασιλικὸς λόγος Menander lays down the rule that, after an introduction characterized by the amplificatio, the orator proceeds to the eulogy of the sovereign's city of birth and the province of which he is a native, if they happen to be famous; if such is not the case he should immediately move on to praising the family. If his family members are little known, he will say that there is no sense in praising them because the ruler has no need of being extolled by the glory of another, or he will instead attribute to him a divine origin. The orator will then recall the wonders tied to his birth, aspects of his nature (τὰ περὶ τῆς φύσεως) such as, e.g., his beauty, his maturity (ἀνατροφή), education (πράξεις)—divided into actions in a time of war and actions carried out in a time of peace—which would be grouped under the label of temperance, justice and wisdom. Lastly, he will mention destiny (τὰ τῆς τύχης) and will make a global comparison between his reign and that of another monarch (e.g., Alexander the Great). At the end, the epilogue will extol the happiness of the present-day state.

Because—as the author himself emphasizes from time to time—many of the directions given (among these, the frequent recourse, even on individual points, to the σύγκρισις) are not exclusive to the βασιλικὸς λόγος but are applied to any discourse of praise, the treatment of Menander on the imperial encomium presents the comparison more closely even for the laudatory speeches that do not have a sovereign as the recipient.

II. Panegyrics of Late Antiquity. Given that encomiastic themes can also be presented in other literary genres (a clear case of which is represented by the epos of Claudius *Claudian), and given that what has survived to our day is only a very small part of the panegyric actually delivered (we use the term panegyric for all laudatory speeches regardless of the title with which they have been handed down to us), we now go on to examine the production of panegyric in Late Antiquity.

1. Secular panegyrics: A. In Greek. In outlining the eulogy of a public person, the Greek-speaking orators were able to take as a model two famous encomiastic-type biographies: the Evagoras of Isocrates and the Agesilaus of Xenophon. In his book Evagoras, composed ca. 365 BC to praise the lord of Salamis, Cyprus, who was assassinated in 374/373 BC, Isocrates sets forward an ideal portrayal of this ruler (hence the various convergences with Menander's suggestions on the βασιλικὸς λόγος); the narration does not follow the chronological order of the events, but he organizes them under the qualities of Evagoras, who illustrates them: courage, wisdom and justice. The other eulogistic text that would serve as a powerful model for the Late Antique encomia was the Agesilaus of Xenophon (ca. 357 BC), which instead follows a chronological order and enumerates secondarily the virtues of the protagonist, providing them ideal exemplification.

Even though a Hellenistic tradition of orations connected to public events existed later, a formal speech in praise of a public personage has not come down to us for the period before Menander's treatise. The most ancient encomium is *Libanius's Oration 59 (on *Constans and *Constantius, delivered probably around AD 348: see Malosse, 7-11), which outlines an image of both political leaders acc. to a schema comparable to those theorized by the panegyric of ps.-Hermogenes and Menander's περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν. The panegyric of the emperor *Julian for Constantius II shows traces of Libanius's teaching (Or. I, probably delivered after January 357; see Tantillo, 36-40), in which the young caesar compares himself with the subject of Themistius's oration for and on Constantius (on the issue, see Tantillo, 33-36). Julian also follows a panegyric schema in the contemporary encomium of the empress Eusebia (Or. II), where, however, he introduces some more personal touches such as gratitude for having allowed him to dedicate himself to the study of philosophy (Or. II, 12ff.). After 1 January 362 (see Guida, 73ff.) there is a panegyric in honor of Julian: a few fragments have been added (ed. A. Guida).

The various orations of *Themistius are also encomia (ca. AD 317–388): in particular Or. 1 (Constantius or the humanness of the ruler); Or. 11—directed to *Valens for the tenth anniversary of his reign in 373—in which the orator dwells on the political leader and his actions on behalf of the army and the civilians; Or. 18, dedicated to Theodosius in 384, is of great ideological weight because Themistius therein elaborates a theory about the collaboration between philosophy and royalty. Themistius's encomia—as do his extensively eulogistic speeches—go beyond praise to become an instrument for a political and philosophical proposition and establish an occasion for advising and disagreeing, as one sees, e.g., in his Or. 7, dedicated to Valens in the winter of 366/367, after the bloody suppression of the revolt led by *Procopius the Usurper: In this oration Themistius—in outlining the conduct of the perfect ruler—in fact counsels the sovereign to act with moderation and leniency. Finally, one should remember that *Procopius of Gaza's panegyric for *Anastasius has a secular quality about it despite the author's attested Christian faith.

B. In Latin. (1) In prose. *Latin Panegyrics is the name of a collection of eleven official speeches, scattered over the period between AD 289 and 389, which name was placed before the text—reworked and considerably expanded—of the panegyric (the most ancient attestation of this title is in Sidonius Appollinaris—Epist. VII, 10) for Trajan, delivered by *Pliny the Younger in AD 100. With the exception of the Ambrosiana *palimpsest (E 147 sup. of the 6th c., originating from Bobbio and discovered by Angelo Mai), which, however, only preserves fragments of Pliny's speech, the codices that have handed down to us the Latin Panegyrics all derive from the copy discovered at Mainz in 1433 by Giovanni Aurispa. The editio princeps was the work of Cuspinianus, Vienna 1513, and the first modern critical edition was edited by Emil Baehrens (Leipzig 1874).

After the panegyric of Pliny, there follows in the collection the most recent panegyric (II), which is the one recited in 389 in honor of Theodosius by Latinius Drepanius Pacatus, friend and colleague of *Ausonius. We then have Mamertinus's gratiarum actio to Julian in 362 (III), Nazarius's panegyric for Constantine (IV, delivered at Rome in 321), the panegyrici diversorum septem (V-XI) and, lastly, the panegyric of 313 in honor of Constantine (XII). Of the eleven speeches, the majority delivered at *Trier (V, VI, VII, VIII, X, XI, XII), five are anonymous (i.e., V, VI, VII, VIII, XII). The speech for the reconstruction of the school held in 298 at Autun by Eumenius before the prefect of *Lyons, *Gaul (IX), and the oration delivered in 362 at Constantinople by Claudius Mamertinus to thank Julian for the consulship (III) cannot be defined, properly speaking, as βασιλικοὶ λόγοι. (Readers are cautioned that the numbering of the Latin Panegyrics is inconsistent; here Roman numerals indicate the MS order of the panegyrics and not their chronological order. See *panegyrics, Latin.) The various authors—all orators active in the most important schools of Gaul (Autun, *Bordeaux, Trier)—were *pagan, but they spoke of the divinity in very generic terms that could also be adapted to the God of Christianity. The eleven speeches, which seem to have been chosen for their literary quality, in setting forth an idealized depiction of the political leader, have this famous example (evidently considered such even by the individual who placed it at the beginning of the collection): Pliny's gratiarum actio to the emperor who desired to confer upon him the consulship and for whom he delivers the encomium. Cicero's influence was also very strong, particularly in these following orations in which he defines the qualities required for the exercise of command: De imperio Cn. Pompei, Pro lege Manilia, De provinciis consularibus and Pro Marcello.

Aside from the Latin Panegyrics, we have information about four panegyrics composed by Quintus Aurelius *Symmachus: those for *Valentinian I (Or. I and II, delivered 368-369 and 370) and for *Gratian (369), which are partially preserved by a palimpsest of the Ambrosiana Library (all commented upon by A. Pabst, Darmstadt 1989; Or. I also by F. Del Chicca, Rome 1984), and one lost for the usurper Maximus (probably from January 388). Ausonius's gratiarum actio dates to the year 379 by his former student, the emperor Gratian, who appointed him consul. *Merobaudes I's panegyric is also a gratiarum actio for the conferral of a high office. After the fall of the W portion of the empire, the tradition of the imperial panegyric would be taken up again by *Ennodius in his panegyric for *Theodoric.

(2) In verse. Alongside those in prose, panegyrics in verse from late Latin Antiquity have also come down to us. Their composition was not an utter novelty because the practice of using an encomium in verse was already very likely in use at the Hellenistic courts (a confirmation in this regard could be the 17th Idyll of Theocritus), and its use was taken up again in the Latin-speaking world. From Servius (Ecl. IX, 36) we learn that the poet Anser wrote the laudes of Anthony, whereas the commentaries of Pomponius Porphyrion and ps.-Acron on Hor. Ep. I, 16,25 provide information on the laudes (Porphyrion uses the term panegyricus) composed in honor of Octavian Augustus. We have the Laudes Messalae or the Panegyricus Messalae (the coining of the term panegyricus must be after the 3rd c. AD), a poem of 211 hexameters passed down by the Corpus Tibullianum (III, 7 = IV, 1) which eulogizes the military and oratorical gifts of Messala and the Laus Pisonis, an anonymous short poem written in 261 hexameters, the dedicatee of which is perhaps to be identified with Gaius Calpurnius Piso, who headed the plot against *Nero in AD 65. Lastly, we know that in AD 60 Marcus Annaeus Lucanus composed the Laudes Neronis, which have not survived. Encomiastic tones characterize even the various Silvae of Publius Painius Statius (we note in particular Silv. IV, 1, where Janus delivers a brief eulogy of *Domitian, who begins his seventeenth consulate) and, during the Constantinian age, Publilius *Optatianus Porfyrius composed many songs in praise of Constantine. The first panegyrics in the full sense of the term are nonetheless owed to Claudius Claudian, in whose line Merobaudes and Sidonius Apollinaris would later place themselves. Common features of these three poets are the use of the hexameter, the adoption of pretentious and epical language, the presence of mythological scenery and the absence of reference to Christianity.

C. Credibility of the panegyric and the role of panegyrist. In a famous passage from the Confessiones, *Augustine recalls the anguish that he experienced as a young orator at the court of Milan: cum pararem recitare imperatori laudes, quibus plura mentirer et mentienti faveretur ab scientibus (Conf. VI, 6,9). The falsehood, however, of the panegyric was a commonplace for Greek and Latin orators (see Giardina, 604-607) and came to be part of the definition that *Isidore of Seville would assign to it: Panegyricum est licentiosum et lasciviosum genus dicendi in laudibus regum, in cuius compositione homines multis mendaciis adulantur (Orig. VI, 8,7). Regardless of the veracity of their claims, it is nonetheless difficult to deny that the panegyric has value as a historical witness, if for no other reason than the presence of recurring themes that reveal the existence of burning issues (e.g., the repeated praises for exemption from taxes and the insistence on military success of the ruler derive justification and cogency from the existence of high taxation and ever more precarious borders.)

Certainly more problematic is the question of whether the panegyrists had actual political influence. In their speeches scholars have seen an expression of imperial politics (see esp. MacCormack) and have attributed to them a role of mediation between the ideology of the court and the demands of a public needing answers that had the support of an imperial guarantee (Sabbah, 371). It seems, however, hardly believable that simple professors of rhetoric could have had the prestige, the power and the competence for a such a demanding role, and it is very likely that in a great number of cases the recital of a panegyric was an occasion for the orator to climb the social ladder, which phenomenon, however, was witnessed in quite a few cases. It is absolutely certain that the success of a career—Augustine was aware of this—could depend upon a good oratorical "performance"; nevertheless, it would not be advisable to put all the panegyrists on the same plane, because it is clear that their ability for suggesting or offering a more or less manipulated interpretation of the facts must have been as great as the extent to which they were within the life of the court. In sum, one must distinguish a Themistius, who indulged himself in writing a program for the ruler, or even a Claudian, tribunus et notarius, who was at the source of the facts and who forced himself to present them in the most favorable light to Flavius *Stilicho, from the professors of rhetoric such as Augustine or the authors of the Latin Panegyrics, whose utmost aspiration would have been to make a good impression so as to guarantee themselves a prestigious career in the public administration.

2. Christian panegyrics: A. In Greek. We can consider the speech by which *Eusebius of Caesarea in 335/336 praises the thirtieth anniversary of Constantine's reign (Triakontaeterikos or the Laudes Constantini) as an encomium, even if it is sui generis centering on the relationship between the sovereign and God and not developing points pertinent to the emperor's family and his actions (see Drake, 36-38). The speech extols above all the sovereign's Christian virtues, giving his actions a preferential interpretation as manifestations of pietas (εὐσέβεια = godliness). For the most part, however, Christian panegyrics have as their objects *martyrs and *saints (see Payr, 338-342). A great contribution in this sense is supplied in a special way by the speeches of *Basil the Great, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa and *John Chrysostom. From the moment that the eulogized are already dead, their encomia appear acc. to the schema proposed by ps.-Hermogenes (see above), who had placed death and the glory that follows among the points on which the orator must insist (for saints and martyrs it is obviously a heavenly glory). In this genre of texts, moreover, the limits between panegyric ἐπιτάφιος λόγος and *hagiography are extremely uncertain.

B. In Latin. (1) in prose (see *Gennadius, Vir. ill. 49 and Pricocus), an example of this must have also been the lost panegyric for Theodosius composed by *Paulinus of Nola, who lauded his victory over the usurpers, praising in him—as Paulinus himself says (Ep. 28.6)—non tam imperatorem quam Christi servum, non dominandi superbia sed humilitate famulandi potentem, nec regno, sed fide principem ("not so much the emperor as much as the servant of Christ; not a powerful person with the pride of domineering but a powerful person with the lowliness of serving, and a ruler not with a kingdom, but with faith").

(2) In verse. The following panegyrics bear a Christian character: the imperial panegyric De laude imperatoris Anastasii (delivered at the end of 513–beginning of 514; see Chauvot, 98-107) of *Priscian in 312 hexameters with a preface of 22 trimetric iambs, the four books in hexameters with a preface in the same meter In laudem Iustini Augustii minoris of Flavius Cresconius Corripus recited in 567, and, lastly, of the same Corripus, the 51 hexameters of the Panegyricus in laudem Anastasii quaestoris et magistri (565–566). One could also classify as a Christian panegyric Ennodius's dictio composed in hexameters for celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of the consecration of Epiphanius as bishop (XLIII ed. Vogel = Carm. I, 9 ed. Hartel). The tradition of the late imperial poetic encomium would then be taken up again by *Venantius Fortunatus for the benefit of the Merovingian kings (partially in Carm. VI, 1; VI, 2; and IX, 1, respectively in praise of Sigebert III, Charibert I and Chilperic I: see Reydellet, 321-331; for a general treatment of Venantius as a panegyrist, see J. George in Whitby, 225-246).

On the epedeictic speech and the encomium: V. Buchheit, Untersuchungen zur Theorie des Genos Epideiktikon von Gorgias bis Aristoteles, Munich 1960; H. Lausberg, Handbuch der literarischen Rhetorik I, Munich [2]1973 (on the genus demonstrativum §§ 239-254, pp. 129-138) [Eng. tr. Leiden 1998, 102-111]; J. Martin, Antike Rhetorik, 1974 (on the epideictic speech pp. 177-210); M. Mause, Panegyrik: Historisches Wörterbuch der Rhetorik, ed. G. Üding, VI, Tübingen 2003, 495-502; Th. Payr, Enkomion: RAC V, 332-343; L. Pernot, La rhétorique de l'éloge dans le monde gréco-romain, I-II, Paris 1993; M. Whitby, ed., The Propaganda of Power: The Role of Panegyric in Late Antiquity, Mnemosyne Suppl. 183, Leiden 1998; K. Ziegler, Panegyrikos: RE 36, 559-581. On Menander: D. A. Russel - N.G. Wilson, eds., Menander Rhetor, edited with Translation and Commentary, Oxford 1981; L. Pernot, Les topoi de l'éloge chez Ménandros le Rhéteur: REG 99 (1986) 33-53.

On the Latin Panegyrics: C.E.V. Nixon - B.S. Rodgers, In Praise of Later Roman Emperors: The Panegyrici Latini, Introduction, Translation, and Historical Commentary, with the Latin text of R.A.B. Mynors, Berkeley 1994; P. Fedeli, Il 'Panegirico' di Plinio nella critica moderna: ANRW II 33,1 (1989) 387-514; D. Lassandro - R. Divaccaro, Rassegna generale di edizioni e studi sui XII Panegirici latini: BStudLat 28/1 (1998) 132-204; S. MacCormack, Latin Prose Panegyrics, in Empire and Aftermath. Silver Latin II, ed. T.A. Dorey, London 1975, 143-205 (not limited to the Latin Panegyrics); G. Sabbah, De la rhétorique à la communication politique: Les Panégyriques Latins: BAGB 4 (1984) 363-388; P.L. Schmidt, Die Panegyrik: Herzog, 161-172.

General Studies: A. Chauvot, Procope de Gaza, Priscien de Césarée. Panegyriques de l'empereur Athanase I[er], textes traduits et commentés, Bonn 1986; H.A. Drake, In Praise of Constantine: A Historical Study and New Translation of Eusebius' Tricennial Orations, Berkeley 1976; A. Giardina - M. Silvestrini, Il principe e il testo, in Lo spazio letterario di Roma antica. II. La circolazione del testo, Rome [2]1993, 579-613; A. Guida, Un anonimo panegirico per l'imperatore Giuliano (Anon. Paneg. Iul. Imp.), Introduzione, testo critico, commento, Florence 1990; P.-L. Malosse, Libanios, Discours. Tome IV, Discours LIX, texte établi et traduit, Paris 2003; S. Pricoco, Non regno sed fide princeps. L'imperatore Teodosio, Ambrogio e Paolino di Nola, in R. Teja - C. Pérez (eds.), La Hispania de Teodosio. Congreso Internacional (Segovia-Coca, Octubre 1995), 1, Salamanca 1997, 207-215; S. Pricoco, Ancora sul panegirico di Paolino di Nola per Teodosio e il nuovo concetto cristiano del potere imperiale: Cassiodorus 4 (1998) 225-246; M. Reydellet, La Royauté dans la littérature latine de Sidoine Apollinaire à Isidore de Séville, Rome1987, 320-331; I. Tantillo, La prima orazione di Giuliano a Costanzo, Introduzione, traduzione e commento, Rome1997.

F.E. Consolino

PANEGYRICS, LATIN (4th c.). The Latin Panegyrics are found within a vast encomiastic literature, which, to cite only contemporaneous examples, included the orations of *Themistius to *Constantius II, *Valens and *Theodosius, or the speech of thanksgiving of *Ausonius to *Gratian; then followed the *panegyrics of *Merobaudes to Flavius *Aetius and the panegyrics of *Ennodius to *Theodoric. To the corpus of Latin panegyrics—to the panegyric of *Pliny the Younger that was dedicated to *Trajan in the year 100 and reworked for publication in 103, which first comes in the codices and which is, properly speaking, a gratiarum actio—can be added the so-called eleven minor Latin panegyrics, all much later, which can be dated from 289 to 389. These encomiastic speeches were given by well-noted Gauls, professors of *rhetoric or high officials of the imperial administration, in the presence of the emperors in command, with the intention of idealizing his image and creating and consolidating a political and social consensus about it.

They accomplished this by exalting the ethical, civil and military virtues of the emperor who often, both at the beginning of the panegyrics and in its middle, was called sacratissimus imperator. Also, he was often Christian, and his virtues were exalted by supplying even biographical and historical details such as Constantine's victory at the Milvian bridge, a victory invoked by the two panegyrics of 313 and 321, and the testimony of widespread public opinion in the cities of *Gaul in the 3rd-4th c. The sovereign who emerges from these speeches is merciful, just and generous, invincible in war, godly; the divinity sanctions his power; he is presented with manners at times clearly pagan, and at other times compatible with Christianity. The orators directed to the emperor both praises of thanksgiving and invocations for aid, which was sometimes military but above all economic and fiscal. During the celebratory speeches of the emperor, acc. to the imperial ideological positions of the 4th c., the orator balanced his speech by demonizing enemies—political adversaries as well as barbarians and usurpers and also insurgents such as the Bagaudae (see F. Del Chicca, Panegiristi e barbari: RomBarb 11 [1991] 109-128; D. Lassandro, L'integrazione romanobarbarica nei Panegirici Latini: CISA 12 [1986] 153-159; Id., Sacratissimus imperator, Bari 2000, 33-81; 105-144). Rome, whose aeternitas is praised, is presented as the civilizer of the world in speeches whose prose is solemn and conforms to Cicero's, with other classical references such as Virgil and Horace, and in which emerges the pride of these prominent Gauls for having obtained for a long time the honorable name fratres populi Romani, a name already attested by Julius Caesar's Gallic Wars I, 33, and by *Tacitus, Ann. XI, 25.

The order in which the codices hand down the Latin Panegyrics is not chronological; therefore, they are numbered there in two ways: with a Roman numeral for the chronological order, often followed in the translations and commentaries (e.g., Panegirici Latini, It. tr. D. Lassandro and G. Micunco, Turin 2000), and with Arabic numbers for the order of the MSS, which is generally followed in the critical editions such as the XII Panegyrici Latini, ed. D. Lassandro, Turin 1992. (Readers are cautioned that the reverse system is used in some standard English-language sources such as Rees and Nixon - Rodgers; i.e., III/11 might need to be read as XI/3, as is the case in the preceding article in the subsection on the Latin Panegyrics.) Accepting the Plinian panegyrics to be the first, the others are as follows: II/10, the panegyrics of Mamertinus, Gallic orator, for Maximinian and Diocletian, delivered in 289 at *Trier, one of the new imperial residences; III/11, the speech of the same orator for the birthday of Maximian Augustus, delivered at Trier in 291; in these two orations he praises Maximian's victories over the Bagaudae, the Germans and pirates, and his peace with *Diocletian and his felicitas; IV/8, panegyric of an unknown author from the city of Augustodunum (i.e., *Autun), to Caesar *Constantius Chlorus, delivered at Trier in 297, on the occasion of Constantius's Quinquennalia (i.e., games celebrated every five years), along with a thanksgiving for the emperor's visit to Gaul, a commemoration of the emperor's military campaign against *Britain, and his victories over the usurper Carausius and Allectus, thanks to which omnibus nationibus securitas restituta [est] (18,4), and with a description of Trier, rich in porticos and markets, where the barbarians have been included in various humiliating activities (9,1-4); V/9, Eumenius's speech, a professor of Autun who had Greek origins, for the rebirth of the "Maenianae" schools after the destruction caused by the Bagaudae, delivered in the city of Augustodunum in 298: in ch. 5 the history of such schools is recounted, already noted by Tacitus, Ann. III, 43,1, where prominent professors taught, guaranteeing the formation of a youth that would then complete important functions in the imperial bureaucracy: for this reason the emperors supported these schools and appointed their directors. Eumenius in ch. 14 preserves the imperial letter that appointed him such, and in chs. 20-21 he explains the didactic importance of geographical maps painted on walls and urban porticos, which assisted in learning the history, geography and greatness of Rome. This is the only speech not directed to an emperor, in this case Constantius Chlorus, but to a vir perfectissimus, the governor of the province of Lyons.

We still have the following: VI/7, a panegyric of an unknown author, perhaps the disciple of Mamertinus, for Maximian and Constantine, delivered at Trier in 307: in it is celebrated Constantine's wedding, as soon as he was proclaimed Augustus, with Fausta, daughter of Maximian, and the peace between son-in-law and mother-in-law, both praised; VII/6, a panegyric of an unknown author, a native of Augustodunum to the emperor Constantine, at Trier in 310: in it Constantine is extolled at the beginning of his reign, while Maximian is vilified, who in the meanwhile died in disgrace, and in ch. 22 the bond of brotherhood between Augustodunum and Rome is recalled (tr. and comm. in B. Mueller-Rettig, Der Panegyricus des Jahres 310 auf Konstantin den Grossen, Stuttgart 1990); VIII/5, a speech of thanksgiving by an unknown author, a native of Augustodunum to the emperor Constantine, at Trier in 312: delivered during the Quinquennalia of Constantine, it commends the emperor's generosity, who has reduced the taxes on Augustodunum, the city of the Aedui, whose fidelity to Rome harks back all the way to the time of Julius Caesar, with reference to his Gallic Wars VI, 12,5, and their title fratres populi Romani expresses, acc. to the author, the communitas amoris and the dignitatis aequalitas; IX/12, a panegyric of an uncertain author of Augustodunum to Constantine, son of Constantius, to whom we shall return, delivered at Trier in 313; X/4, a panegyric of the famous orator Nazarius of Bordeaux, remembered also by Ausonius and by *Jerome, to the emperor Constantine, at Rome in 321: the last two panegyrics (IX and X) praise both Constantine's incursion into Italy and his victory over Maxentius at the Milvian bridge, which, acc. to *Lactantius and Eusebius, was owed to a divine sign that caused Constantine's "conversion" to Christianity; XI/3, speech of thanksgiving of Claudius Mamertinus to the emperor *Julian, at *Constantinople in 362: the author is perhaps a descendant of the previously mentioned Mamertinus and a supporter of Julian, and for this reason, the minister of the treasury, prefect of Illyricum and then consul, who describes Julian's good governance both in Gaul and in the Danube regions, also praising his military and moral virtues; XII/2, a panegyric of Latinus Pacatus Drepanius, a native orator of Bordeaux, to the emperor Theodosius, at Rome in 389: delivered before the emperor and the senate, it praises Theodosius's civil and military virtues and his victory over the usurper Maximus, without hesitating to call the emperor "god."

In the first of the Latin Panegyrics, Pliny even set forward, as does Dio Chrysostom in his orations 1-4 Peri basileias, a stern warning to the emperor, that he does not consider him a god or divine but a being gifted with great virtues that are placed at the service of the empire: his role is not a laboriosa statio (86,3). The sovereign is diis simillimus (1,3), but he is not a god—as *Domitian demanded to be called—even if his ascent to the throne was willed by the providentia deorum; he is a fellow citizen and a father, not a master; he must respect the laws, guarantee senatorial libertas and refuse to govern with compulsion, otherwise he will be a tyrant, where principality and tyranny are opposites by nature. The good emperors were exemplified by *Augustus, *Titus and Nerva, the evil by *Tiberius, *Nero and *Domitian, and Pliny admonishes Trajan that to merit the love of the gods, it is first necessary to merit the love of men, otherwise there is the risk of meeting the same tragic end of the other evil emperors who were eliminated (see G. Zecchini, Il pensiero politico romano, Rome 1997, 101-102; my Divus e Deus negli autori del I sec. d. C.: Seneca, Lucano e Plinio il Giovane di fronte al culto imperiale: RIL 134 [2000] 125-149).

The panegyrics in this collection were dedicated to imperial propaganda, but not one of these is lacking certain parenetic and admonitory elements as well (C. Odahl, Propaganda política y opinión pública en los Panegíricos latinos, Salamanca 1991; M. Mause, Die Darstellung des Kaisers in der l.P., Stuttgart 1994; my Il concetto di res publica nei panegirici latini: RIL 133 [1999] 177-197; K. Enenkel, Panegyrische Geschichtsmythologisierung und Propaganda: Hermes 128 [2000] 91-126). In general, scholarship has come to a greater appreciation of these documents, which in the past have felt the effect of a judgment such as that of E. Gibbon in Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire: theirs is a "language of adulation" (It. tr. Turin 1967, 320 n.3). The collection of these documents is perhaps owed to the last author of the Latin Panegyrics, *Pacatus, who chose the most significant ones of that time, including even his own panegyrics, in a collection that also had an educational purpose but then disappeared only to be found in 1433 at Mainz by the humanist Giovanni Aurispa.

Among these panegyrics, the one for Constantine of 313 has special prominence from the religious point of view: the author praises the victory over Maxentius, which is considered to be of and obtained by divine origin despite the official responses of the haruspices (diviners). The orator speaks of one divinity, of one divina mens (2,5; 16,2), of one maiestas, of the merciful deus ille mundi creator et dominus (13,2), of the summus rerum sator, who has willed to have as many names as there are languages of peoples and of whom we cannot know how he himself wishes to be called and can be both immanent to the world and transcendent (26). The gods of polytheism are never named; they are called dii minores whose responsibility is the care of common mortals, while the supreme God deigns to reveal himself only to Constantine (2,5). It seems that the way in which the pagan orator, by taking recourse to henotheistic formulas already present in Stoic and Platonic philosophy, takes part in the new religious approach shown by Constantine from that moment onward: see M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]2004, 174-176. In effect, one finds a difference in comparison to the preceding panegyrics dedicated to Constantine in 307 and 311, where, instead, the traditional gods were repeatedly named: Ceres, Liber, Mercury, Capitoline Jupiter, Apollo, Victory and Hercules. Constantine's devotion toward these gods and their temples was admired.

The application of the concept of divinity to the emperor himself in the Latin Panegyrics seems interesting: he is described as a deus praesens in the panegyric II, for pagan emperors, at 2,11; in III, even for a pagan, at 10,5; in VII, for Constantine before his conversion, at 22,1; as a praesens numen in panegyric IX, of a pagan for Constantine barely "converted" to Christianity, at 4,4. Similarly, the emperor is called deus or magis quam deus almost exclusively in the panegyrics of pagans for pagan emperors: deus in II, 2,1 and 5,1; III, 10,4-5; VII, 4,2; 17,4; 21,5; 22,1; IX, 2,4 and 25,4; XI, 22,1. But there is a considerable difference. In the panegyrics of Pacatus for Theodosius, who was truly Christian and who made Christianity the religion of the state, the emperor is assimilated to a divinity and called deus repeatedly and without any difficulty. Pacatus recalls the imperial cult given to Theodosius, who, inasmuch as he was a Christian, would have had to reject it (2,1: ad contuendum te adorandumque; 6,4: qui gentibus adoratur, cui toto orbe terrarum privata vel publica vota redduntur, a quo petit navigaturus serenum, peregrinaturus reditum, pugnaturus auspicium); he calls him deus two times (4,5: deum quem videmus; 30,1: in nos oculos deus rettulit), and he likens him to the gods (10,1: gaudent profecto perpetuo divina moto, et iugi agitatione se vegetat aeternitas, et quidquid homines vocamus laborem vestra natura est . . . si fas piumque mortalibus aestimare caelestia, where caelestia refers to the sovereign), in addition to stating that Theodosius's beauty is derived from heaven (6,3), and to affirming that God helps the emperor (6,4) and that he participates in his majesty (18,4). Theodosius's kiss sanctifies (20,2: ille osculo consecratus est), and in 21,2 Theodosius is called a numen, the sight of whom makes the viewers blessed, just as in 47,2. It is common knowledge that Theodosius is called a "human sovereign and god," theos, even in an unpublished text of Themistius, Pros basilea, probably dedicated to the same Theodosius and to be considered one of the last works of the author, as I seek to demonstrate in The Unpublished "Pros basilea" of Themistius, ed., tr. and comm., in collaboration with E. Amato: ByzZ 99 (2006) 1-67, to which I also refer the reader for documentation on its influence on the political theology of *Eusebius of Caesarea, to which I here add B. Studer's, Dio salvatore nei Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1986, 184-185, and J.M. Sansterre's, Eusèbe de Césarée et la naissance de la théologie "Césaropapiste": Byzantion 42 (1972) 131-195; 532-594. The Latin Panegyrics, therefore, prove to be of great interest even for religious thought during their period and culture.

M.J. Rodríguez, Las virtudes del emperador Constantino: SHHA 2-3 (1984-5) 239-247; Id., Aspectos ideológicos de las relaciones de dependencia: SHHA 6 (1988) 189-195; D. Lassandro, Terra mater frugum da Orazio ai Panegirici Latini, in Orazio in colloquio, ed. P. Fedeli, Venosa 1988, 123-128; Id., Bibliografia dei P.L.: Invigilata lucernis 11 (1989) 219-259; I. Lana, La storiografia latina del IV sec. d. C., Turin 1990; R. Ferorelli, Un manoscritto dei P.L.: il cod. Oxoniensis Balliol College 315: Invigilata lucernis 12 (1990) 161-180; A. Lovino, Un manoscritto dei P.L.: il cod. Matritensis 8251 (V 210), ibid. 261-296; C. Odahl, A Pagan's Reaction to Constantine's Conversion: The Ancient World 21 (1990) 45-63; M.-C. L'Huillier, L'empire des mots: Orateurs gaulois et empereurs romains, 3e et 4e siècles, Paris 1992; C. Zink, La vision de Constantin d'après le Panégyrique VII: REL 12 (1992) 21; D. Lassandro, Aedui, fratres populi Romani: CISA 18 (1992), 261-265; C. Nixon, Constantinus oriens imperator: Historia 42 (1993), 229-246; K. Rosen, Constantins Weg zum Christentum und die P.L., in Costantino il Grande, II, Macerata 1993, 853-863; A. Foulon, Du nouveau sur la datation du Panégyrique de Messalla? Kentron 8 (1992) 17-24; I. Hajdú, Beiträge aus der Thésaurus-Arbeit, XXVI: MH 50 (1993) 181-182; T. Kotula, Autour de Claude II le Gothique: REA 96 (1994) 499-509; M. Mause, Der Kaiser als Fachmann in ökonomischen Fragen? MBAH 13 (1994) 89-101; A. Taldone, Repertorio delle cose notevoli nell'orazione di Latino Pacato Drepanio a Teodosio: Invigilata lucernis 15-16 (1993-94) 291-311; D. Lassandro, Storia e ideologia nei P.L., in Sermione mansio, ed. N. Criniti, Brescia 1995, 111-121; A. Manfredi, Un'editio umanistica dei P.l. minores, in Studi G. Tarditi, Milan 1995, 1313-1325; P. Kos, Sub principe Gallieno . . . amissa Raetia? Germania 73 (1995) 131-144; C.E.V. Nixon - B.S. Rodgers, eds., In Praise of Later Roman Emperors, Berkeley, CA 1994; R. Orihuela, Consideraciones sobre el Panegírico XI(3) del Corpus P.L.: Myrtia 11 (1996) 47-60; G. D'Alessandro, Sulla contrapposizione tra Costantino e Massenzio nei P.L.: Invigilata lucernis 18-19 (1996-97) 131-138; D. Lassandro, Exhaustae provinciae . . . praesidentium rapinis: VetChr 34 (1997) 251-261; M. Lolli, Il lascito degli anelli: MH 54 (1997) 226-229; Id., La celeritas principis fra tattica militare e necessità politica nei P.L.: Latomus 58 (1999) 620-625; D. Lassandro, Rassegna generale di edizioni e studi sui XII P.l.: BStudLat 28 (1998) 132-204; Id., I P.L. del III-IV secolo, in Storia della civiltà letteraria greca e latina, III, Turin 1998, 476-483; M. Christol, Le métier d'empereur et ses représentations à la fin du IIIe et au début du IVe siècle: CCG 10 (1999) 355-368; N. Baglivi, Su Paneg. 4,5,1: BStudLat 30 (2000) 134-142; Id., Su Paneg. 4,33,4: ibid. 554-560; Id., Su Paneg. 4,30,3: BStudLat 31 (2001) 538-542; Id., Su Paneg. 4,33,6: Vichiana 4 (2002) 73-81; Id., A proposito di impero, imperatori e P.L.: ibid. 107-115; Id., Su Paneg. 6,2,5: BStudLat 32 (2002) 102-110; A. Bruzzone, Due recenti studi sui P.l.: RFIC 129 (2001) 110-120; J.J. Cienfuegos, El carisma: ExcPhilol 10-12 (2000-2) 199-213; R. Cicatello, Il VII capitolo del De mortibus persecutorum di Lattanzio: Seia 6-7 (2001-2) 211-234; F. Paschoud, Les P.l. et l'Histoire Auguste, in Mélanges C. Deroux, II, Brussels 2002, 347-356; A. Chauvot, Défaites militaires et problèmes internes dans les p. d'époque tardive (289–313): Ktèma 27 (2002) 271-279; M. Lolli, Un singolare caso di aduentus principis: ibid. 256-263; Id., Massenziobis in Pan. IV (X): Historia 51 (2002) 502-508; R. Rees, Layers of Loyalty in L.p., AD 289-307, Oxford 2002; D. Lassandro, Il concentus omnium laudum in onore dell'imperatore nel Panegirico di Plinio e nei P.L., in Plinius der Jüngere und seine Zeit, Munich-Leipzig 2003, 243-255; C. Epplett, Winter Warfare in Antiquity: Mouseion 3 (2003) 269-283; D. Pérez - M.J. Rodríguez, Panegírico y ciudad: SHHA 21 (2003) 223-245; M. Sordi, Fiducia nella propria forza e paura del nemico nella punizione dei vinti: BStudLat 33 (2003) 100-103; A. Hostein, Le corpus des P.L. dans deux ouvrages récents: AntTard 12 (2004) 373-385; B. Leadbetter, Best of Brothers: CPh 99 (2004) 257-266; C. Macías, Referencias a los astros en el panegírico latino: Mene 4 (2004) 141-171.

I. Ramelli

PANNONIA PRIMA

I. History - II Archaeology.

I. History. Corresponding to modern-day Hungary in the stretches of land included between the Danube River, the Drava River, the Sava River and the border of *Noricum, Pannonia was divided during the Roman Empire into administrative dioceses of Pannonia Prima, which included, among others, the territories of Vindobona, Carnuntum, Scarbantia and Savaria—homeland of St. *Martin of Tours (Sulp. Sev. Mart. 2,1)—and Pannonia Secunda*, situated between the Danube and the lower course of the Drava and the Sava Rivers, which had its center in *Sirmium: it is remembered as a civitas Valeria, the homeland, acc. to *Ennodius, of Anthony of *Lérins (Opusc. 4,7).

The first certain testimony to the existence of Christianity in Pannonia can be gathered from the martyrdom of *Victorinus (304), bishop of Petovium (Ptuj/Petau); it is always maintained that this city did not belong to Noricum (Jerome, De vir. ill. 74). The presence of this valiant Christian author—Jerome considers him such—can in a certain sense verify that Christianity had been in Pannonia for a long time and that it had already pushed itself to reach mature stages. This fact, moreover, later signified by some authentic elements present in the accounts of other various passiones such as that of *Quirinus of Siscia (AASS Jun. 1, 372ff.) and, for Pannonia Secunda, of Pollio, primicerius lectorum of the church of Cibali (AASS Apr. 3, 571-573), and of *Irenaeus of Sirmium (AASS Mar. 3, 553-555); for information on these passiones, see M. Simonetti, Studi, 55-79. Moreover, alongside these individuals, one recalls the martyrdom of the so-called *Four Crowned Martyrs and their companion Simplicius (AASS Nov. 3, 748ff.). A full and vivid depiction of the church of Pannonia becomes evident therefore already at the end of the 3rd c., which is confirmed for the subsequent period by the repeated convocation of councils and synods by various representatives of that church.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain, Paris 1918 (repr. Rome 1967); H. Leclercq, Illyricum: DACL 7,1, 99-104.114; Id., Pannonie: DACL 13,1, 1046-1063; M. Simonetti, Studi Agiografici, Rome1955; A. Lippold - E. Kirsten, Donauprovinzen: RAC 4, 166ff.; L. Várady, Das letzte Jahrhundert Pannoniens (376–476), Amsterdam 1969; M. Pavan, Romanesimo, cristianesimo e immigrazioni nei territori pannonici: RomBarb 9 (1986–1987), 161-227; Z. Kádár, A. Alföldi sul cristianesimo primitivo: Acta class. Univ. Scient. Debr. 33 (1997) 15-218.

V. Pavan

II. Archaeology. Pannonia Prima was founded as a province in the former territory of Pannonia Superior in 293, when *Diocletian reformed the organization of the provinces, and it had the following borders: to the N, the Danube River; to the E, the ancient border with Pannonia Inferior; to the West, Noricum (i.e., a line between the Drava and the Sava Rivers slightly to the E of the cities of Noricum Celeia and Flavia Solva); to the S, the Sava River. The administrative center of the province was Savaria (Szombathely). The bishop of Siscia, Quirinus, was martyred at Savaria. The other dioceses remain unknown. Very few paleo-Christian buildings have been preserved in the province. The location of the basilica of Savaria is unknown. The building in the garden of Romkert, however, is not a basilica but an imperial palace, acc. to E. Tóth. Many small Christian artifacts were found at Savaria such as an altar pillar decorated with roses, ivy, the *monogram of Christ and a dolphin with a cuttlefish. At Kekkut, in the vicinity of Lake Balaton, two churches were discovered, one of which is of a common type, whereas the other has a layout containing three apses and a bench for the clergy. At Fénékpuszta, near Balaton, two churches were excavated, the second constructed upon an older building. Aside from the basilicas, many smaller buildings were preserved at Kisdiospuszta.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain, Paris 1918 (repr. Rome1967); T. Nagy, [The history of Christianity in Pannonia until the fall of the Roman border protection], Budapest 1939 (in Hungarian, with a German summary); Z. Kádár, Lineamenti dell'arte romana della Pannonia nell'epoca dell'antichità tarda e paleocristiana: CCAB 16 (1969) 177ff.; H. Buschhausen, Die spätrömischen Metallscrinia und frühchristlichen Reliquiare, Vienna 1971; E. Tóth, Late Antique Imperial Palace in Savaria: Acta Antiqua Archaeologica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 25 (1973) 117ff.; A. Móczy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London 1974, 297ff.; F. Fülep - G. Török, Ungarn, in Spätantike und Frühes Christentum, Propyläen Kunstgeschichte Supplementband I, ed. B. Brenk, Berlin 1977, 310ff.; E. Thomas, Das frühe Christentum in Pannonien im Lichte der archäologischen Funde, in Zwischen Römerzeit und Völkerwanderung. Ausstellung im Stadtmuseum Enns, ed. H.G. Severin, Linz 1982, 255ff.; E. Thomas, Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Silbergegenstände im mittleren Donaugebiet, innerhalb und ausserhalb der Grenzen des Römmerreich, in Argenterie romaine et byzantine, ed. N. Duval - Fr. Baratte, Paris 1986, 135ff.; D. Gaspar, Römische Kästchen aus Pannonien, Budapest 1986; L. Barkóczi, Pannonische Glassfunde in Ungarn, Budapest 1988; E. Tóth, Das Christentum in Pannonien bis zum 7. Jahrhundert nach dem archäologischen Zeugnissen: Christentum 1994, 242ff.; D. Gaspar, Christianity in Roman Pannonia. An Evaluation of Early Christian Finds and Sites from Hungary, Oxford 2002.

N. Cambi

PANNONIA SECUNDA. Established as a province in the former territory of Pannonia Inferior in 293, Pannonia Secunda stretched to the S up to the border of *Dalmatia, i.e., to the Dinaric Alps; to the E up to the Danube River; to the N it crossed slightly into the Drava River. The border to the W converged with *Savia, i.e., the ancient border with Pannonia Superior. The episcopal centers of Pannonia Secunda were large cities such as *Sirmium, capital of the province, Mursa (modern-day Osijek) and Cibalae (modern-day Vinkovci). Bishop *Valens of Mursa was one of the strongest supporters of *Arianism in Pannonia. With the exception of Sirmium, buildings of worship have not been found in Pannonia Secunda. At Mursa, the basilica has still not been found, but it is possible to conjecture that one could be found in the heart of the ancient city and another outside the military walls of defense. At Cibalae a building in the necropolis called Kamenice has not yet been excavated, at 1.5 km (= .93 mi.) from the city, where the martyr Pollio was most likely buried; he was the lector of church of this city. Purportedly, another basilica was in the center of Cibalae. At Mursa the following were found: a *monogram of Christ, numerous inscriptions, oil lamps and many other small objects. At Certissia (modern-day Štrbinci, near Đadkovo) Christian tombs were found painted with frescoes. In this necropolis, archaeologists found two chests of gold with the depiction of familial images and with votive inscriptions. Also found at Cibalae was a *sarcophagus with a handle without an inscription but with the figures of fish and bread.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain, Paris 1918 (repr. Rome1967); T. Nagy, [The history of Christianity in Pannonia until the fall of the Roman border protection], Budapest 1939 (in Hungarian, with a German summary); A. Mocsy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London 1974; R. Košcevic - R. Makjanic, Siscia-Pannonia Superior, Oxford 1995; B. Migotti, Evidence for the Christianity in Roman Southern Pannonia (Northern Croatia). A Catalogue of Finds and Sites, Oxford 1997; B. Migotti - M. Šlaus - Z. Dukat - Lj. Perinic, Accede ad Certissiam. Anticki i ranokršcanski horizont arheološkog nalazišta Štrbinci kod Đakova, Zagreb 1998; D. Gaspar, Christianity in Roman Pannonia. An Evaluation of Early Christian Finds and Sites from Hungary, Oxford 2002. B. Migotti, Two Gold-sandwich Glasses from Štrbinci (Đakovo, Northern Croatia), Zagreb 2002.

N. Cambi

PANODORUS. Egyptian monk, flourished between 395 and 408, author of a Chronography now lost, continuator of the work of Sixtus *Julius Africanus and *Eusebius of Caesarea; he is known only for a few excerpts mentioned by Syncellus, of which he is the principal source. His work, which was completed by another Egyptian monk, *Annianus (CPG 5537), was written in 412; it began from the creation of the world, which he dated 5493 years before the birth of *Jesus Christ, and was framed within a chronological scheme established upon the biblical tradition and in which, from to time to time, he inserted secular history. He introduced into Christian *chronology Ptolemy's Kanon basileion, Manetho's canon, the book of Soti and the "list of the Theban Kings" of Erastosthenes and Apollodorus. His primary sources were Dexippus, Julius Africanus and Eusebius, whom Syncellus knew through his work. His influence on George Syncellus was decisive. H. Gelzen (Sextus Iulius Africanus und die byzantinische Chronographie, 3 vols., Leipzig 1880-1898) denied any originality to this 9th-c. chronographer and attributed all credit to the Egyptian monk, who was tied to the official church but enmeshed in 4th- to 5th-c. *Neoplatonist culture, which made it easier to reconcile Christian and *pagan history: this thesis was partially reevaluated by R. Laqueur (Synkellos: PWK 11,4, 1388-1410).

CPG 5535; G. Dindorf, Georgius Syncellus et Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus (CSHB), I, Bonn 1829, 61[3-5] - 62[2-5] - 63[11] - 66[3]; J. Van der Hagen, De cyclo magno paschali seu de periodo DXXXII annorum Panodori, monachi Aegyptii, in Dissertationes de cyclis paschalibus, Amsterdam 1736, 93-106; Krumbacher 340-342; O. Seel, Panodoros: PWK 18, 632-635; Altaner 236; V. Grumel, Chronologie, Paris 1958, 86-92; W. Adler, Time Immemorial: Archaic History and Its Sources in Christian Chronography from Julius Africanus to George Syncellus, Washington DC 1989, 72-105.

A. Labate

PANTAENUS. All the pertinent testimonies (preserved by *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Jerome, *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen, *Alexander of Jerusalem, *Pamphilus of Caesarea, *Anastasius the Sinaite, *Maximus the Confessor) were collected and cited at full-length by A. Harnack in his Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, I, Leipzig 1893, 291-296). Eusebius (HE 5, 11,1 [II, 452,10-12 Schwartz]) was correct in maintaining that Clement (Strom. I, 11,2 [II, 8,22-9,3]), when speaking of the teacher he found "hidden in Egypt," alluded specifically to Pantaenus; this same text of Clement informs us about the Sicilian origins of Pantaenus: Σικελικὴ τῷ ὄντι ἦν μέλιττα (see T. Zahn, Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons, III, Erlangen 1884, 161); and the words δυνάμει δὲ οὗτος πρῶτος (Strom. I, 11,2 [II, 8,23-24]) demonstrate that Clement held him in higher regard than all other teachers, the "*presbyters," guardians of the apostolic *tradition, whose oral teaching Clement himself claims to have heard (Strom. I, 11,1 and 11,3). Eusebius (HE 5, 10,1-4 [II, 450,12-452,5]) tells us that Pantaenus, after having been a *Stoic philosopher, led the catechetical *school of Alexandria (see *Didaskaleion) with great zeal during the reign of *Commodus and traveled to India to announce to those faraway peoples the Christian message. According to Zahn (p. 176), his death should be placed around the year 200. In his exegetical writings and above all in his work Hypotyposeis, Clement appealed to the rule of the teaching of the presbyters—

the most authoritative of which was without a doubt Pantaenus—or, simply, the presbyter par excellence, who should undoubtedly be identified with Pantaenus (see the various citations in Harnack, 292-293, and Zahn, 157-161). Pantaenus's name, nonetheless, is explicitly mentioned in only two passages, which are cited in full as the only two certain fragments by M.J. Routh (Reliquiae sacrae, 378-379: Clem. Alex., Ecl. proph. 56,2 [III, 152,28-153,4 = fr. I Routh p. 378], one that, with regard to Ps 18:6, said that the prophets generally used the present tense in place of the future [it is arbitrary, however, to attempt to attribute to Pantaenus a much broader intellectual context including that shown in a good part of the Eclogae propheticae and the Excerpta ex Theodoto, as done by W. Bousset in his book Jüdischchristlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandria und Rom, Göttingen 1914, 156ff., 174ff., 263]; and the other in Maximus the Confessor, De variis difficilibus locis Dionysii et Gregorii: PG 91, 1085 A10-B12 [= fr. II Routh, 378-379; Clem. Alex., fr. 48 Stählin, III p. 224], where he emphasizes the will of God as the creative principle). This last passage, to which H. Langerbeck has rightly called attention (JHS 77 [1957] 71 and AAWG phil. hist. Kl. 69 [1967] 157), demonstrates a close affinity to the two texts of *Photius (Bibl., cod. 214, 172a [III, 126,25-26 Henry] and 251, 461b [VII, 192,8-9]) pertaining to *Hierocles and mirroring in all likelihood the teaching of *Ammonius Saccas.

The title "*Stoic philosopher" attributed to Pantaenus by Eusebius (HE 5, 10,1 [II 450,18-19]) is understood too literally by Pohlenz (NAWG phil. hist. Kl. 1943, p. 166 n.3), given the syncretist character of Greek philosophy at the end of the 2nd c. AD. It is not rash to suppose that Clement inherited from Pantaenus the tendency to combine into one system, reflecting upon the truth, the best teachings of the various philosophies (see Strom. I, 37,6 and I, 57,6): the image of the bee used by Clement (Strom. I, 33,6 e IV, 9,2) in support of polymathia is always applied by Clement even to Pantaenus (Strom. I, 11,2); one finds the same "eclectic" tendency, moreover, in Ammonius Saccas, who taught at Alexandria during the same period and aimed to harmonize the thought of Plato and Aristotle. R.E. Witt formulated a very similar hypothesis (CQ 25 [1931] 195) on the existence of tight connections between Ammonius Saccas and the Christian community in Alexandria at the tail end of the 2nd c. AD: the existence of these ties seem to be confirmed not only by the aforementioned correspondence between Pantaenus and Ammonius in the doctrine of the will of God as the creative principle but also by the parallels between Clement and *Plotinus noted by Witt (CQ 25 [1931] 195-204); to these parallels one could add the parallel pertaining to God's infinity; compare Strom. V, 81,6 (II, 380,22-23) οὐ κατὰ τὸ ἀδιεξίτητον νοούμενον with Enn. VI, IX, 6 (III, 310,10 Henry-Schwyzer) οὐ τῷ ἀδιεξιτήτῳ (cf. S. Lilla, JTS 31 [1980] 100 n.2). Lastly, because Pantaenus is presented by Clement (Strom. I, 11,2-3) as one of the recipients of the esoteric tradition going back to the *apostles, it is legitimate to maintain that even Pantaenus, on par with Clement, was a supporter of the existence of a secret tradition, an idea characteristic of the Christian *gnosticism that flourished in 2nd-c. *Egypt (see Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 234).

M.J. Routh, Reliquiae Sacrae, I, Oxonii 1846, 375-379; T. Zahn, Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons und der altkirchlichen Literatur, III, Supplementum Clementinum, Erlangen 1884, 156-176; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, I, Leipzig 1893, 291-296; G. Bardy, Aux origines de l'école d'Alexandrie: RecSR 27 (1937) 65-90; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 233-234; A. Van Den Hoek, How Alexandrian Was Clement of Alexandria? Reflections on Clement and His Alexandrian Background: Heythrop Journal 31 (1990) 179-194; G. D'Ippolito, Una testimonianza di Panteno scrittore recuperata in Teodoro Metochite, in Scritti classici e cristiani offerti a F. Corsaro, ed. C. Curti - C. Crimi, Catania 1994, I, 227-233; Cath 10, 510ff.; B. Pouderon, Réflexions sur la formation d'une élite intellectuelle chrétienne au IIe s.: Les "écoles" d'Athènes, de Rome et d'Alexandrie, in Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, sous la dir. de B. Pouderon et J. Doré, Paris 1998, 237-269.

S. Lilla

PANTALEON MEGALOMARTYR. Pantaleon Megalomartyr is the Latinized form of the Greek name Panteleimon, "all-merciful." Pantaleon Megalomartyr is inscribed in the Mart. hier. for 27 July. One does not find the same information in the Mart. syr. because it is incomplete at this point. The Eastern synaxaria record Pantaleon Megalomartyr's name for different dates. Perhaps *Theodoret in his work Graecarum affectionum curatio already knew of the feast (but not the most trustworthy MSS of his work; SC 57, 335). According to the 5th-6th-c. passion and the panegyrics about his life, Pantaleon Megalomartyr, born at *Nicomedia, was the personal physician of Maximinus; he was an "unmercenary" physician who had the ability to "cure all sicknesses" (the epithet comes from the etiological legend derived from his name). The numerous versions of the legend also attest to his popularity. The *martyrology of Florus of Lyons follows the Latin version of the legend. The following locations have a local cult for Pantaleon Megalomartyr: *Constantinople (a church built by *Justinian), *Jerusalem, the monastery of Pantaleon Megalomartyr in the Jordan Desert (Procop. De aed. 1,9,11; 5,9,3), *Rome (four churches built in his honor) and Cologne (the Benedictine *monastery possesses the tomb of the empress Theophano). The oldest depiction of Pantaleon Megalomartyr is a N African relief of clay from the 5th-6th c.; there is a fresco of him dating to the year 708 together with *Cosmas and Damian in the church of S. Maria Antiqua in Rome.

BHG 1412-1418; BHO 835-837; BHL 6429-6448; BS 10, 108-118; LCI 8, 112-115; BBKL 6, 1485-1486; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926, repr. Rome 2000, 410-412; A. Pazzini, I santi nella storia della medicina, Rome 1937, 178-182; J. Zandee, Some Coptic Fragments from the Martyrdom of St. Pantoleon: VChr 16 (1962) 42-52; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae 2, Rome 1982, 665-666.

V. Saxer – S. Heid

PANTHEISM. Pantheistic conceptions of reality can be seen in *Heraclitus (the divinity is represented by the universal fire, which is transformed into all things, text 8 and fr. 90 Diels, Die Fragm. der Vors. I[6], 1951, 145 and 171), in Diogenes of Apollonia (God is identical with the air that reaches everywhere, fr. 5 Diels, II[6], 1952, 61), in Aeschylus (Zeus is identical with all things found in nature, fr. 70 Nauck, Trag. graec. fragm., Leipzig 1889, 24) and in Euripides (Zeus is identified with the "chariot" of the world and fate, Trojan Women 884-886).

"Pantheistic" tendencies also appear in the writings of the young Aristotle, in the Peripatetic school and in the 10th book of Plato's Laws (where, however, still above the anima mundi* is the nous*, a principle distinct from it: see Plato, Laws X, 897b 1) and in his Epinomides; for the young Aristotle, see On Philosophy, fr. 26 Walzer (= Cicero, De nat. deor. I, 13,33): Aristotelesque . . . modo mundum ipsum deum dicit esse *Clement of Alex., Protr. 66,4 (I, 51,1-2) and Plutarch, Plac. philos. V, 20,908F (cited by R. Walzer, Aristotelis dialogorum fragmenta, Florence 1934, p. 92 n.2); for the peripatetic school, see Cicero, De nat. deor. I, 13,35: nec audiendus eius [Theophrastus] auditor Strato . . . qui omnem vim divinam in natura sitam esse censet, and Clement of Alex., Protr. 66,5 (I, 5 1,6-7); for the 10th book of Plato's Laws and the Epinomides, see the two passages offered above by R. Walzer, p. 92, nos. 2 and 3.

But a pantheistic outlook above all characterizes *Stoic philosophy in which Heraclitus's influence is esp. apparent. According to Heraclitus, the divine principle is none other than a spirit (pneuma) identical to the ether, fire, the logos, fate and *providence; this spirit is immanent in the universe, permeating it with itself, crossing it from part to part and proceeding from the center to the periphery and from the periphery to the center; it governs and serves it inasmuch as it is its supreme law: see SVF I, 153-177, II, 1021-1056 (*Stoicism affirms a strong affinity exists between the concepts of physis, nomos, logos, kosmos, pneuma, aithēr, pyr, heimarmenē and pronoia). Patristic authors, although generally accepting the understanding of the Stoics and *Philo on the divine logos immanent in the universe, certainly could not accept—on an equal par with Philo and contemporaneous Platonic philosophers—the Stoic identification between the material universe and the first creative principle, which in this sense comes to be material, corporeal and corruptible, and they constantly argue against it (in fact, for them, as for Philo, the logos is no longer the first principle but the Son of God generated by the Father, his power, the instrument in the creation of the material universe and the soul and law of the latter). One can see, e.g., the refutation of Stoic pantheism in *Justin Martyr's writings (1 Apol. 20 [I, 180, 7-11 Otto], 2 Apol. 7 [I, 300,6-7 and 9-12]), in Clement of Alex. (Protr. 66,3 [I, 50,24-27 = SVF II, 1039], Strom. I, 51,1 [II, 33,12-14 = SVF II, 1040], V, 89,2 [II, 384,18-19 = SVF II, 1035] and V, 89,3 [II, 384,22–385,1]) and in certain passages of *Origen's Contra Celsum and the Commentary on John, cited in SVF II, 1051, 1052, 1053 and 1054. Texts of *Theodoret, *Hippolytus, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Tertullian, *Lactantius and *Salvian of Marseille in which this Stoic doctrine is mentioned and often even rejected can be found in SVF II, 1029-1043.

A. Rodríguez Bachiller, El problema de Dios en la filosofía de Séneca, Madrid 1965; M. Simon, Early Christianity and Pagan Thought. Confluences and Conflicts: Religious Studies 9 (1973) 385-399; U. Pizzani, Lucrezio, il panteismo, la zoogonia e . . . Pietro Gassendi, in Lingue tecniche del greco e del latino, ed. S. Sconocchia - L. Toneatto, Bologna 1997, II, 105-126; Cath 10, 515ff.; TRE 25, 611-615.

S. Lilla

PANTOCRATOR. The title Pantocrator refers to the creative omnipotence and universal sovereignty of God. Pantocrator occurs 180 times in the LXX; for this reason, O. Montevecchi aptly stresses that it is not a wooden-literal translation of the concept of YHWH Sebaoth, as much as it is one of its theological interpretations from a universalistic view; it is the culminating point in the semantic evolution of the term already recognizable in the Hebrew Scriptures. In the NT one finds ten occurrences of the term, nine of which are found in the book of Revelation, almost always in a doxological context and against the backdrop of citations or echoes of OT religious language. The novelty of Revelation is that some of these texts place this title traditionally reserved for God in a christological backdrop, which serves as a prelude to the direct attribution of Pantocrator to Jesus Christ himself: thus, esp., Rev 1:8 (often understood in this sense by later interpreters), but also Rev 19:6, 15. Patristic texts allow one to observe the gradual expansion of this concept: it begins with the initial exclusive reference to God the Father, distinct from *Jesus the Κύριος (thus again in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan *Creed) and is later applied to the *hypostasis of the Son-Logos, in whom all things subsist. In this respect, the insights of the Alexandrians seem to have been decisive: already *Clement of Alex. (e.g., Paed. 1,9, 84,1; 3,7,39,4), then, above all, *Origen, both in Latin translation (repeatedly in his De princ. 1,2,9-10, at the center of which one finds a fragment from *Justinian which preserves the term Pantocrator in the original) and in Greek (Fr. Io. 45 and 46) use the title Pantocrator in this christological sense and defend its relevance. Among the most ancient attestations of this usage, moreover, are *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. 1,4 et passim) and *Hippolytus (Adv. Noetum 6,18). Among the Latin Fathers, realizing that the current translation of Pantocrator with omnipotens was not completely satisfying, *Augustine (Tr. in Io. 106,5) proposes as an alternative omnitenens.

Inspired by the portrayals of the emperor, the iconographic model of the Pantocrator moreover combines those distinguishing and specific physiognomic characteristics (beard, thick hair, intense look, etc.) that, being acquired from the 4th c. onward, end up replacing the typical representations prevailing in the previous period such as the Apollonian Christ, the teacher, philosopher and thaumaturge. On the basis of the inclusion of this physiognomic characterization, Grabar distinguishes the *iconography of Pantocrator—as one can find completely affirmed in the Byzantine milieu between the 8th and 9th c.—by the portrayals of the Cosmocrator, likewise on the throne just as the Roman sovereigns, present on the *sarcophagi of the Late Roman Empire. Moreover, they characterize the iconography of Pantocrator with the following: Christ is facing the viewer and blessing with his right hand; there are also symbolic attributes such as the scroll embedded with precious gems on the left, sometimes completed by the inscription A – Ω (which refers to Rev 1:8) or analogous texts.

Having survived the two phases of the iconoclastic controversy of the 8th and 9th c., the icon on an encaustic board portraying the bust of Pantocrator preserved at St. Catherine's Monastery, Mount Sinai, made in *Constantinople and dated by Weitzmann to the 1st half of the 6th c., is considered by many to be the ancestor of every subsequent representation of Christ Pantocrator in Byzantine art, and also because this icon was in turn derived from the lost image of Christ hanging over the bronze door or Χαλκή; it was removed from the Eastern capital by decree of the emperor *Leo III the Isaurian to be replaced with a noniconic symbol of the *cross. At *Ravenna (the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo, S nave) there dates back to the *Arian commission of *Theodoric an analogous majestic image of Christ on the throne, having a beard and dressed in imperial clothes, holding in the original an open scroll containing the words Ego sum rex gloriae. Slightly later is the representation of the Pantocrator (the entire figure is on the throne but having the most ancient and harsh characteristics) on the ivory diptych, of Constantinopolitan origin, now preserved at Berlin. It is believed that the presence of this Pantocrator on the coinage of the emperor *Justinian II (565–578) had a decisive influence on the spread and the preponderance of this iconographic portrayal of Christ. Lastly, thereafter the bust of Pantocrator appears frequently on apses as on the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna (7th c.), and subsequently (from the 9th c.) on the domes.

Cath 10, 522ff.; LCI 1, 392-394; ODB 3, 1374; O. Montevecchi, Pantokrator, in Studi in onore di Aristide Calderini e Roberto Paribeni, 2, Milan 1957, 401-432; C. Capizzi, Παντοκράτωρ. Saggio d'esegesi letterario-iconografica, Rome 1964; F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna. Hauptstadt des spätantiken Abendlandes, Bd. 2.1, Wiesbaden 1974, 146-149; J. Matthews Timken, The Pantocrator. Title and Image, Diss. Univ. New York 1976; K. Weitzmann, The Monastery of Saint Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons, 1, Princeton, NJ 1976, 13-15; Id., ed., Age of Spirituality. Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century, Princeton, NJ 1979, 527-530; A. Grabar, Le vie della creazione nell'iconografia cristiana. Antichità e Medioevo, Milan 1983, 198ff. [It. tr. of Christian Iconography: A Study of Its Origins, Princeton 1968]; S. Barbagallo, Iconografia liturgica del Pantokrator, SA 122, Rome 1996 (the extensive classification is important, pp. 179-213).

F. Pieri

PANTOLEON (7th–8th c.). *Presbyter of a *monastery "of the Byzantines" probably at *Jerusalem. He is the author of the Homilia in exaltationem crucis (BHG 430). Scholars used to date this homily between the 5th and 12th c. The latter date was refuted by the discovery of two Greek MSS (Marc. II, 17 and Vat. Palat. 205), dating back to the 9th c. and containing the Homilia and a codex (Berolin. syr. 28) with the *Syriac translation of the work, datable to the 8th-9th c. Honigmann, after having solved the problem of the time of the institution of the feast of ὕψωσις (the "Exaltation" of the *Cross) and after he had established that the monastery "of the Byzantines" was probably the one founded by *Abraham of Ephesus in Jerusalem, recently indicated that the time of Pantoleon's composition of the Homilia was the period between 650 and 750. This dating excludes the identification of our author with Pantoleon (or Pantaleon) the *deacon and chartophylax of the Great Church of *Constantinople and author of several homilies (V. Grumel, Pantaléon: DTC 11, 1855; H.G. Beck, Pantoleon: LTK² 8, 31). Perhaps the presbyter Pantoleon is the same person to whom Pope *Martin I sent a letter (Jaffé 2068) the day after the Lateran *Council upbraiding him for opposing his decisions. A lack of evidence precludes us from attributing to him the unpublished Homilia de exaltatione crucis (BHG 427 p) found in Messan. gr. S. Salv. 4 (7th c.); and he is certainly not the author of the Tractatus contra errores Graecorum (PG 140, 487-574), written in 1252 by another author with the same name. Sachot has recently argued that Pantoleon the presbyter and *archimandrite of the Constantinopolitan monastery ta Benantiou was one of the signatories of the 518 petition against *Severus of Antioch (see ACO V, 7, 37) and, moreover, also the author of the homily on the Transfiguration BHG 1978 (PG 98, 1253-1260).

CPG 7915-7918; PG 98, 1265-1269; Krumbacher 167; Baumstark 264; E. Honigmann, La date de l'homélie du prêtre Pantoléon sur la fête de l'Exaltation de la Croix (VII^e siècle) et l'origine des collections homiliaires: Bull. de l'Acad. royale de Belgique 36 (1950) 547-559; Beck 457-458; Patrologia V, 299; M. Sachot, L'homélie pseudochrysostomienne sur la Transfiguration CPG 4724, BHG 1975: Contextes liturgiques, restitution à Léonce, prêtre de Constantinople, édition critique et commentée, traduction et études connexes, Frankfurt a.M.-Bern 1981, 451-463.

A. Labate

PAPA BAR AGGAI (d. 329). The first patriarch of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon, ordained ca. 291, died in 329; the Chronicon of Arbela, 43, 46-47 and 52 (Kawerau), refers to him as "Papa the Aramean, a wise and prudent man," ordained by the bishop of Arbela Aha-d-Abuhi (273–291) and Hai-Bel, the bishop of Susa. Papa bar Aggai was backed by the prayers and support of the inhabitants of Ctesiphon and "the consent of all the people." But after 313, he wanted to impose the primacy of Seleucia-Ctesiphon on the other episcopates of the Near East and met opposition from the *presbyters and people of Seleucia, who wanted to depose him. He was even denounced by his archdeacon *Simeon bar Sabba, whose parents were close to the king. Papa bar Aggai then wrote to the bishops of *Edessa, Sa'da and the others of the "West," who sent a letter to *Constantine on his behalf, recalling the fact that in the Roman Empire there existed patriarchs of *Antioch, *Rome, *Alexandria and *Constantinople, so too in the kingdom of the East it was right for there to be at least one patriarch. Papa bar Aggai was regarded as "the universal prelate for all the bishops and Christians of the East: all the bishops acknowledged what had been defined by the West," and he succeeded in convincing his archdeacon Simon by promising him that he would be named as his successor. Many of the bishops with whom he clashed would become martyrs in the persecutions that followed. Papa bar Aggai worked to create a center for the Christian community in the *Sassanids' capital. A letter on ecclesiastical hierarchy was attributed to him, which, it argued, was a mirror of the heavenly hierarchy, acc. to ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite's line of thought, and was sent to his disciple Aggor. This text, however, is a later pseudepigraphal work.

EC 9, 777; Baumstark 29-30; DTC 11, 164-165; P. Kawerau, Die Chronik von Arbela, Louvain 1985, CSCO 468, Syri 200, p. 65 n.35; I. Ramelli, Il Chronicon di Arbela: Presentazione, traduzione e note, Madrid 2002, 'Ilū Anejos VIII, 50, 52-53, 55.

I. Ramelli

PAPACY

I. The Christian community of Rome in the first 3. c. - II. The emergence of the papacy in the 4th-5th c. - III. The transition to the medieval papacy (6th–8th c.) - IV. Elements of historical evaluation - V. Historiography of the papacy - VI. Letters of the popes.

I. The Christian community of Rome in the first 3 c. For the period before the Constantinian era, little precise information on the bishops of *Rome remains. The documentation collected esp. by *Eusebius of Caesarea in his Ecclesiastical History is sparse and unreliable. Thus, the various lists of *popes composed to defend apostolic succession are very problematic. *Irenaeus's list (Haer. III, 3,3) deserves some credit for the names he took from credible traditions. The list, however, does not permit one to establish the moment at which the collegial rule of the Roman community changed to the monarchical episcopate. Even more uncertain is the chronology that Eusebius (d. 339) and after him the so-called Catalogus liberianus (336 or 354) attempted to establish by synchronizing the individual pontificates with the dates of the reigns of specific emperors.

Despite the fragmentary character of the established historical information, one can argue that already from the beginning, Christianity spread rapidly to the capital of the empire (Acts 2:10). The most ancient historical data on the Christian presence at Rome is found in Suetonius's *Life of Claudius (41-54) in the 2nd c. (Mirbt n. 3; cf. Acts 18:2). But one cannot hold that either *Peter or *Paul were the founders of the Roman community, as the tradition mentioned for the first time by Irenaeus maintains (Haer, III, 1,1; III, 2,3). Instead, unknown Jewish-Christians established the community. Its importance, however, was clearly attested early on by the epistle Paul wrote to the Romans around the year 57 to 58. The testimony of the 1 Clement (Prima Clementis, ca. 96) is much clearer. With this letter, the Roman community intervened during the discord that had emerged in the church in *Corinth. The way in which this document refers to the *martyrdom of Peter and Paul (ch. 5), and the way in which it insists on the beginning of the succession, the guarantee of order in the community (chs. 40-44), somewhat foreshadows the care that the Roman church would later show toward other churches. In addition to the testimony of the Prima Petri (written after 94), Ignatius's Letter to the Romans (around the year 110), with its very solemn address and its reference to Peter and Paul (ch. 4,2a), is striking because it already contains several elements of later papal theory: the importance of the capital, the presence of the two *apostles, the primacy in faith and in love (praef.). Toward the end of the 2nd c., Irenaeus offered the most famous testimony concerning Rome; he not only dates the Roman community back to Peter and Paul, but also believes that *communion with this community is a more certain way to determine if one is in the doctrinal *tradition deriving from the apostles (Haer, III, 3, 2). This witness was confirmed, even though less explicitly, by other authors such as *Tertullian (Praescr. 32.36), *Origen (Eus., HE 6, 14,10) and even the so-called inscription of *Abercius.

This witness proved to be true esp. by the fascination the community of Rome exerted upon early Christians. As Eusebius reports, not a few Christians went to the capital to find greater security in their faith or to belong to such a famous community: *Polycarp of *Smyrna, *Justin, the philosopher and martyr, *Hegessipus, *Marcion (139), *Montanus, Irenaeus and Origen. The epigraphic testimony of the trip made by Abercius during the reign of Marcus Aurelius is striking. This fascination is not due to the mere fact that the Roman community found itself at the center of the empire. Nevertheless, certain facts about the history of the so-called Apostles' Creed, the formation of the New Testament canon, and the first outline of the liturgical traditions in the Apostolic Tradition (Traditio Apostolica) attributed to *Hippolytus all demonstrate beyond a shadow of a doubt that around the year 200 the community of Rome, whatever the exact explanation may be, exerted an incomparable and de facto authority that no other community possessed.

One cannot understand the importance of the Roman community without keeping in mind the concrete initiatives taken by certain popes. Around the year 200, one finds more precise information on not only the monarchical organization, which until this time was ambiguous, but also on the individual bishops. *Cornelius (251–253) provides us the first description of the Roman *clergy, guided by one bishop alone (Eus., HE 6, 43,11-12; see the testimonies shortly thereafter provided by *Hippolytus of Rome). We do not know whether the bishop of Rome at that time had a fixed residence. We do know, however, that from *Callistus (217–222) onward, the popes were buried in a cemetery of the community. The first certain biographical date is *Pontianus's resignation (230–235), 28 September 235. Before this date we know of *Victor I's intervention around 190, in which he *excommunicated *Polycrates of Ephesus and other bishops of Asia Minor, because they did not want to permit the celebration of *Easter on the *Sunday after the 14th of Nisan, an intervention criticized, although accepted, by Irenaeus (Eus., HE 5, 23ff.). Likewise, Victor banned *Theodotus for trying to spread his views in favor of *adoptionism in Rome. According to the tendentious information provided in the Philosophumena, Zephyrinus (199–217?) and Callistus defended a trinitarian teaching that was too unitarian. The second, moreover, was accused of moral laxity.

After 250, Cornelius was involved, along with *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258), in the controversy on the readmission of those who during the Decian persecution had denied the Christian faith in some way (i.e., the lapsi) and who, acc. to *Novatian and *Novatus, were therefore to be excluded forever from the community, which was seen as the church of the saints. During this situation, Cyprian wrote his most famous work, De unitate catholicae ecclesiae, in which he presents Peter's confession of faith, narrated in Mt 16, as a symbol of the church's unity. At another time, however, setting himself against the position of *Stephen I (254–257), concerning the validity of baptism administered by *heretics, Cyprian made it known that in his view the primacy of Peter did not extend to his successors. He even explicitly rejected the Roman claims that Stephen seems to have established upon Mt 16, while emphasizing the responsibility of the entire episcopal college for the unity of the church (Ep. 68,3). The disagreement in which even *Firmilian of Caesarea was involved ended with the new persecution in which the two protagonists died as *martyrs. After *Gallienus revoked the anti-Christian edict of his father, the church enjoyed a period of peace for about 40 years. *Dionysius of Rome (260–268) took advantage of the opportunity to reorganize the communities, which had been heavily tested by *persecutions for nearly ten years. Having been called upon by the *presbyters of Alexandria concerning the trinitarian controversy that had broken out in *Egypt, he took a position against *Sabellian and *tritheist movements in a synod and communicated to *Dionysius of *Alexandria the accusations that had been brought against him. The latter defended himself, as Eusebius (HE 7, 26) and Athanasius report. Dionysius of Rome even helped the community of *Caesarea in Cappadocia, which was suffering due to the barbarian invasions (see Basil, Ep. 70). Precise information on subsequent pontificates is lacking. *Marcellus I (307/308) and Eusebius I (308-310?) died in exile.

From this sparse and at times unreliable information on the Roman community and its bishops, it appears that during the first centuries the church in Rome took the initiative, as soon as it had the opportunity, to maintain peace in other communities or to establish the unity of Christians. In particular, it defended the *apostolicity of the faith, recalling the succession of those who were responsible for it. Roman theology, however, was hardly original, and the same would be true later. Rome would always stand for the protection of the faith and discipline (custodia fidei et disciplinae), but almost never took new theological initiatives. On the other hand, one finds testimonies that the other churches accepted these interventions in favor of the harmonious communion in the one apostolic faith. Thus, the Prima Clementis continued to enjoy great authority as its virtually canonical transmission and a letter of *Dionysius of Corinth attest (Eus., HE 4, 23). Irenaeus, who admonished Victor I, recognized his authority nonetheless (HE 5, 24). Dionysius of Alexandria, lastly, though defending himself against the accusations raised against his supposed tritheism, did not call into question the intervention of the Roman synod under the leadership of Dionysius of Rome, whom, in an earlier letter, he regarded as a learned and admirable man (HE 7, 6). Finally, one should note how Ignatius and, later, Basil praised the charitable actions of the Roman church.

II. The emergence of the papacy in the 4th-5th c. *Galerius's edict (311) officially introduced a new political situation for Christianity. This period, which has been called the "time of the imperial church" or the "Constantinian age," was decisive for the history of the papacy. At the beginning of these tempora christiana, however, the papacy begins to emerge. *Constantine gave *Miltiades (310–314) the Lateran palace as a residence; he was commissioned by the same emperor to resolve the *Donatist problem, which had come about after the persecutions, when at *Carthage a minority had contested the episcopal election of Bishop Caecilian, because he was accused of being a traditor. But Miltiades's arbitration failed. Constantine himself became involved in the matter, calling together a synod at *Arles (314), at which neither Miltiades nor *Sylvester was present (314–335). The latter had no role at the Council of *Nicaea (325), which was convoked by Constantine to put an end to the *Arian crisis. Though recognizing the privileges of the See of *Alexandria on the model of those enjoyed by *Rome, this synod established the basis of ecclesiastical hierarchy acc. to the civil division of the empire. This decision (cans. 6-7) was very important because Constantine transferred his residence to *Constantinople, the episcopal see of which would enter the lists not only with the major sees of the East, but also with the ancient See of Rome.

During the Arian controversy, which became worse after the death of Constantine (337), *Julius I (337–352) with his synod (341) defended *Athanasius and *Marcellus of Ancyra, asserting the priority of his decision in such matters (DS 132). The Western *Fathers of the Council of *Serdica (343) justified this decision and sanctioned the right of appeal to the Roman See; they did not, however, obtain the consensus of all Eastern bishops (DS 133ff.). Ten years later, *Liberius (352–366) obtained even less. Buckling under political pressure, he signed the so-called Third Formula of *Sirmium (DS 139-140), thus compromising his commitment to the Council of Nicaea, without however breaking ties with Athanasius, and thus causing a grave crisis in the community of Rome.

Only with *Damasus (366–384) did papal political strategy begin to achieve success. This "shift" (as Pietri calls it) is certainly owed to the ingenious figure of Damasus and his successors. Nevertheless, the shift was supported by the political and ecclesiastical situation and succeeded above all due to the *conversion of the Roman aristocracy, which by this time financially supported the Roman community and esp. contributed to the formation of the ideology of Roma aeterna, without which the papacy would not have been able to establish itself in the 5th. c. After having overcome the difficulties that arose from the moment of his election, and that not without the help of the emperor *Gratian (375–383), who approved his jurisdiction with respect to all the metropolitan sees of the West (Mirbt n. 305), Damasus through his synods intervened in the doctrinal controversies of his time (see the Tomus Damasi, from 377: DS 152-161). Called upon at the same time by Eastern churchmen to address the Antiochene *schism, in 380 Damasus received a solemn confirmation of his political primacy by *Theodosius I in the so-called Edict of the Three Emperors (Mirbt n. 310). A year later, however, the Council of Constantinople (381), with its decision concerning its second place with respect to the New Rome (can. 2: Mirbt n. 312), showed that Theodosius no longer had need of Rome's support.

In his protest against this council's decision (Mirbt n. 310) and on several other occasions, Damasus revealed that behind his interventions were very clear ideas on the role of the Sedes Apostolica, which from the 5th c. onward became a distinct title for the Roman See. Appealing to Mt 16:18-19 in a context that by this time had become legal, a passage which had served the African tradition for emphasizing the church's unity, symbolized by the chair of Peter, the new *Moses, and basing himself above all upon the *authority of Peter and Paul, venerated at Rome as the princes of the apostles, he established a theory of the Roman primacy later developed by his successors. *Siricius (384–399) applied for the first time Paul's statement sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum (2 Cor 11:28) to the apostolic ministry of the popes. *Anastasius I (399–402) and *Innocent I (402–417) used it in their "decretal" letters answering the disciplinary questions raised by bishops of missionary countries such as *Gaul and *Spain, or communicated the decisions of synods to bishops who could not be present (see below, VI. Letters of the popes).

Considering not only the recipients who were for the most part bishops of *Italy or other countries in which the metropolitan's governance was not yet sufficiently established, but also observing the relatively restricted fields known as the causae maiores i.e., interventions in contested elections of bishops, we note a striking contrast between the limited jurisdiction practically speaking of the sole W regions—of which N *Africa was still an exception—and the jurisdiction concerning disciplinary questions, and the theory with which it seemed to extend its cura, onera and principatus to the churches of the entire Roman Empire. No less remarkable is the fact that these popes, though calling upon the apostolic origin of their universal authority, sought to confirm it not only with consuetudo, but also with synodal right. In this regard, Siricius seems to have been the first to appeal to the so-called corpus romanum, i.e., to that MS tradition that had confused the canons of *Nicaea with those of Serdica (Ep. 5,2). Even if one can account for the pope's appeal to the canons by the urgent need to support his interventions even with a law that was still in force in the civic sphere (Speigl), it is striking, nonetheless, how much these popes were concerned about emphasizing the conformity of decretal to synodal law. Their attitude illustrates, however, the historical importance of the synods, which for a long time were the primary guarantors of ecclesial unity (Schwaiger, TRE 650).

The contrast between the relatively limited practice and the apparently universal theory is even more apparent if one considers that the interlocutors of the popes did not always attribute the same importance to their interventions; in fact, they even challenged them outright. This is esp. true in the case of *Zosimus (417–418), who favored *Pelagius and *Celestius (417), but also in the case of *Apiarius, presbyter of Sicca, who appealed to this same pope and later to *Celestine I (422–432). *Boniface I (418–422), who expressed with great vigor the necessity of *communion with the Roman Church, head of all the churches (Ep. 14,1), must have recognized the limits of Roman jurisdiction, which had been disregarded by an African synod (419) and contested by the claims of Constantinople, which were expressed in the edict of *Theodosius II (421) (Ep. 13ff.). His successor Celestine, who had been asked by the Sees of Constantinople and Alexandria, offered a decision together with his synod on the question of Christ, God born from the Virgin; he also commissioned *Cyril of Alexandria, as his representative, to take necessary measures against *Nestorius (Ep. 11-14). But he must have noticed not only that the Council of *Ephesus, convoked by Theodosius II (431), reopened discussion on a question he believed he had already resolved, but also that Cyril cared little about the legal style with which the Roman Church pursued its own interests. One should note that, like his predecessors, Celestine was not very interested in theological discussion. Instead, he was content with rejecting Nestorius's errors on the basis of authority, as he had already done when he confirmed the condemnation of the Pelagians (Ep. 21). When *Sixtus III (432–440) was informed of the reconciliation achieved in 433 between *John of Antioch and Cyril of Alexandria, he rejoiced with the two reconciled bishops for the reestablished ecclesiastical peace, thereafter approving the creed of union and attributing the success to the presence of Peter, guarantor of the true faith (Ep. 5-6). He certainly collaborated from the very beginning for the reconciliation of the two chief sees of the East (Ep. 1-2). But it is obvious that that union was an Eastern matter.

All this history of the papacy, with its progress and regress, reached its apex in the pontificate of *Leo the Great (440–461). Well prepared for his position (though living during a difficult political and ecclesiastical situation), not only by his solid literary education, but also by his activity in service of the Roman Church, this pope earned the right to be called "the Great," esp. for his great contribution to the development of the papacy, bringing to completion the work Damasus and his successors had begun. Thanks to his numerous letters and, in part, also to his sermons, there is sufficient information about the ministry he exercised in the Roman community as well as his interventions in favor of the orthodox faith and discipline in the West, esp. in Italy and in Gaul, but also his relations with the Eastern churches, in particular his contributions to the definition and defense of the Chalcedonian faith. Committing himself with great care, but also with sophisticated moderation, to the custodia fidei et canonum (Ep. 115, 1) in favor of the unity of all the churches, he always recognized the political implications of his pastoral actions, as the situation of the "imperial church" demanded at that time. He collaborated for the communion of faith—the foundation of the political unity of the empire. He even put himself at the disposal of the people of Italy, who had been invaded by the *Huns and the *Vandals. Nor did he hesitate to accord a certain priestly dignity to the emperor, i.e., the duty to work for the *peace of the churches in the interest of the same empire. His very open attitude toward the salus rei publicae, emphasized by a certain amount of Roman patriotism, did not prevent him from rejecting canon 28 of the Council of *Chalcedon, in which the order of the great churches was entirely set acc. to political criteria. Accordingly, he did not fail to remind the emperor Marcian of the distinction between church and state, thus demanding freedom of action for the churches and vigorously affirming the primacy of the Apostolic See, but he did not find much reciprocity in this regard from the court of Constantinople.

In all his pastoral activity, with more or less universal scope, Leo adhered to very clear ideas about the primacy of Rome, which he expressed in his letters, esp. in their introductions and conclusions, as well as in the sermons he delivered on the anniversary of his episcopal ordination. One can summarize these ideas with this trilogy: Christ-Peter-Pope. Therefore, the role of the Apostolic See's primacy was founded upon two facts: the intimate union between Christ and Peter, the prince of the apostles, and the enduring apostolic inheritance in the bishops of Rome, the successors and vicars of Peter, who is always present in his church. Like his predecessors, Leo relies primarily upon Petrine succession, also established, he believed, by the order of the Lord himself (Mt 16:18; Lk 22:32; Jn 21:15-19). Moreover, he applies this principle even to the Sees of Alexandria and Antioch, which therefore must have precedence over the See of Constantinople (Ep. 106, 5).

His reinterpretation, however, of the apostolic authority that Christ granted to Peter and his heirs reflects a more keen political orientation than even that shown by his predecessors. When justifying his claims, Leo not only used, as did his predecessors, political-legal categories such as principatus, dignitas, haeres, vices, ius potestatis, consortium potestatis, but used more often the outlook of Roma aeterna, caput orbis and source of peace. In his sermon on Peter and Paul (Serm. 82), he not only takes up the traditional theme of the providential role of pagan Rome for the evangelization of the world, but he insists, with an emphasis not found before him, on the even more glorious action of pacification effected by Christian Rome, which has been renewed by now on the foundation of the apostles. It is true that one finds in Leo's writings the contrast between the theory of universal need and the obviously limited practice of the ecclesiastical-political milieu of that time, esp. if one compares the pyramid-like description of the ecclesiastical hierarchy in his letter to *Anastasius of Thessalonica (Ep. 14 or 11) with the concrete exercise of the sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, esp. when dealing with the Eastern churches. It is also striking to see the delicacy with which Leo respected custom consuetudo, the canons of the synods and above all the rights of other bishops who along with him establish the college of charity collegium caritatis, (Ep. 5, 2; 6,1; 12,2). The fact remains that with a theological precision unknown until that time, he formulated the Roman doctrine on the primacy of Peter's successors with respect to the custodia fidei et disciplinae.

Although *Hilarus (461–468) limited his actions to a few interventions in the jurisdictional controversies in Gaul and *Spain, *Simplicius (468–483) and *Felix III (483–492) were faced with the religious politics of the court of Constantinople, which, in the post-Chalcedonian discussions, favored the *monophysite movement. This difference became more serious in the meantime because the W part of the empire came under the control of the Germanic peoples, who adhered to *Arianism. The protests of *Felix III against the so-called Henotikon, promulgated in 482 by the emperor *Basiliscus, led to a break between him and *Acacius, bishop of Constantinople. This first great *schism between East and West, called the "Acacian schism," lasted until 519, bringing it about that by 490, all the patriarchal sees of the East were occupied by monophysites. Meanwhile, *Gelasius I (492–496), also involved in the controversy with the New Rome, in his letter to the emperor *Anastasius, formulated the doctrine of the two powers, which would determine the political thought of the medieval West for a millennium (DS 347). Reusing Leo's distinction between the auctoritas of the bishops and imperial potestas, he affirmed the independence of the two sectors, civil and ecclesiastical, without, however, desiring to separate them. In his letters and treatises he later vigorously defended his position against all imperial interference into ecclesiastical matters. At the same time, he sought to impose the rights of his primacy onto the Latin churches.

III. The transition to the medieval papacy (6th–8th c.). During the pontificates of the 2nd half of the 5th c., the difficulties were already evident that would characterize the Byzantine era, the period in which the papacy still depended more or less on the imperial court of Constantinople, partially represented by the exarch of *Ravenna, up to the period when the popes closely collaborated with the kingdom of the *Franks: the rivalry between the Sees of Rome and Constantinople, the popes' fight for the church's freedom, the growing inclination of the Apostolic See toward the Germanic kingdoms. After the short pontificate of *Anastasius II (496–498), who was viewed as too favorable to Byzantine politics and even toward monophysitism, the majority, contrary to this pro-Byzantine attitude, chose *Symmachus (498–514); the minority, however, chose *Laurentius (498–506). Though supported by *Theodoric, king of the *Goths, and even thereafter by a synod held in 501, Symmachus ran into problems imposing his authority. This sad situation explains why Gelasius insisted on the distinction between the two powers and even explains the aspirations that were behind the so-called Symmachian forgeries, in which an assertion is made about papal prerogatives on the basis of forged documents, namely, the principle that would be repeatedly called upon during the Middle Ages: prima sedes a nemine iudicatur (Mirbt n. 468). Still tied to "Roman patriotism," Symmachus immediately became interested in the spread of Catholic Christianity in the kingdom of the Franks and the *Burgundians.

Only from *Hormisdas (514–523) onward was a reconciliation between East and West made possible, because the emperor *Justin I (518–527) and his nephew *Justinian I (527–565) became involved in pro-Chalcedonian politics in the interest of the empire's unity. In 519, the imperial court accepted the Regula fidei Hormisdae, which not only insists on the faith of *Chalcedon but even affirms that the Apostolic See is the only guarantee of true Christian faith. Although Justin and, after him, Justinian understood this affirmation of primacy established on Mt 16:18 in a different way, holding another view on the coexistence of the church and the state, Hormisdas's formula entered canon law as one of the bases for the development of papal primacy.

The rapprochement of the Apostolic See and the court of Constantinople, however, created difficulties in the East and the West. Theodoric, king of the Goths, looked at the situation with growing suspicion. *Boethius and *John I (523–526) became victims of the political differences between the Germans and the Byzantines: a sign of the future situation in which the papacy would suffer because of its political activities. Popes *Felix III (526–530) and *Boniface II (530–532) were favorable to the Goths, though challenged by *Dioscorus (530). Subsequent popes, such as *John II (533–535) and *Agapitus I (535–536), were more open to Byzantine politics. After *Silverius (536–537), supported by the Goths and therefore sentenced, by a court martial of the Byzantines, who in 536 captured Rome, *Vigilius was elected pope (537–555) and was completely overpowered by Byzantine ecclesiastical-political strategies. This occurred first in 548, and then, after a certain amount of resistance, a second time in 554; he accepted the so-called Condemnation of the *Three Chapters, which was imposed in 543/544 by Justinian in the interests of reconciliation with the monophysites, and even recognized the Council of *Constantinople II (553), in which he did not want to participate and in which he was excommunicated. It was a disaster. A large portion of the Western episcopate, in particular the Sees of *Milan and *Aquileia, separated from Rome. Though professing his fidelity to Chalcedon, his successor *Pelagius I (556–561) also relied upon Justinian and therefore was not in the position—not even by helping the Roman population which was suffering from an economic recession—to overcome the schism in the West. *John III (561–574), who was finally approved by Justinian, reestablished peace for the most part. After his death (565), the invasions of the *pagan *Longobards (Lombards) created new difficulties in the face of which *Benedict I (575–579) and *Pelagius II (579–590) found themselves powerless.

There was need for new a political policy, an openness toward the German peoples, who for some time had been more open to Catholicism. This shift, which for the West included the transition from Late Antiquity to the Middle Ages, occurred under Gregory the Great (590–604). Born around 540 from a senatorial family, he was profoundly Roman. But that did not stop him from recognizing the call of the Roman Church to convert the nations and to integrate them into the universal church. Thanks to his numerous *letters (854 preserved) scholars are well acquainted not only with his winsome personality, but also his political and pastoral ideals. Though accepting the imperial power of *Byzantium, he sought to reach an agreement with the Longobards and even began to approach the Franks. The new political approach and even the defense of the primacy of Rome were not the hallmark of his greatness, though. His greatness emerged more in his charitable action in the reorganization of the patrimonium Petri, the property of the Roman Church; in his pastoral ministry (formation of the clergy and tireless preaching); in his interest in monastic life, understood in an Augustinian sense as actio and contemplatio; and in his missionary efforts, stimulated by a certain eschatological mindset toward the Anglo-Saxons, i.e., beyond the frontiers of Roman civilization.

His successors, who for the most part governed for a short time, were unable to maintain the papacy at this level. Despite the gradual separation between East and West, these popes remained favorably disposed toward the Byzantine court such that one can say that the Western Middle Ages began at Rome only toward the middle of the 8th c. In the long series of those still "Byzantine" popes, there are a few noteworthy events to record. In 607 a Roman synod provided better regulations for the election of the bishop of Rome. The pontificate of *Honorius I (625–638) became famous for the Honorius question, which was much discussed in the modern controversies over papal infallibility. The ambiguous position Honorius took on the question of *monoenergism led the Council of *Constantinople III (680) to include even Honorius in its condemnation of *monothelitism. *Leo II (682–683) accepted the decision, rebuking his predecessor for having betrayed the apostolic tradition, which had always been preserved intact by the Roman See. Though he was certainly not up to the theological demands of that time, Honorius made a name for himself in his earnest administration of ecclesiastical *property. This action permitted him to exert a great influence on the political situation in *Italy, as well as in his missionary activity for the Anglo-Saxons and Longobards. His successors *Severinus (640), *John IV (640–642) and above all *Theodore I (642–649) clearly took a stance against monophysitism. During this difficult political situation for the empire, this question of faith became a political matter. With the help of *Maximus the Confessor, *Martin I (649–653) succeeded in having monothelitism condemned with his synod (649); nevertheless, in 653 he was deported to Constantinople, where he was condemned and exiled. He died in 655 as a martyr for the church's freedom. His successors *Eugenius I (654–657) and *Vitalian (657–672) succumbed to Byzantine influence. In 666, the emperor even established Ravenna as an autocephalous church, boorishly imposing on the rights of the Western patriarchate.

Because Byzantine power was seen as foreign in Italy and because at the same time relations between the Apostolic See with the West, esp. with England, became stronger, the definitive shift toward the Germanic kingdoms was only a matter of time. The shift was not blocked by the restoration of ecclesiastical communion between Rome and Byzantium on the occasion of the Council of Constantinople IV (680–681), under *Agatho (678–681), nor by the rather favorable attitude of the Sicilian, Greek and Syrian popes, who occupied the Apostolic See between 678 and 752. The growing separation between Rome and Byzantium and Rome's ever-increasing union with the West, which was coming under the Frankish domain, was instead increased by the following factors: (1) the imperial intervention against *Sergius (687–701), whom the Roman people protected against Byzantine soldiers (692: after the so-called Council in Trullo II); (2) the political and military difficulties of the Byzantine Empire itself, esp. in Italy, which was dominated by the *Longobards; (3) the iconoclastic controversy that was dividing the East (from 726 onward); (4) the Roman interest in missions undertaken above all by *Boniface, in Friesland Saxony (719–754); (5) the reconciliation of the papacy and the Longobards under Zacharias (741–752), who commissioned the Frankish metropolitan to consecrate Pepin the Short as king of the Franks. Under Stephen II (752–757), the union between the Apostolic See and the Frankish kingdom, which was conditioned by the hostile attitude of both the Byzantines and the Longobards, definitively began a new era in papal history.

IV. Elements of historical evaluation. There is no doubt that the awareness of the bishop of Rome of responsibility for the cura ecclesiae universalis, as successors of Peter, grew slowly during the first Christian centuries. It is also no less certain that their increasing commitment to the sollecitudo omnium ecclesiarum, a decisive contribution to the defense of the church's freedom, constitutes a complex history of assertions on the one hand and rejections on the other, moments of advance or of stagnancy or even rapid progress (*Stephen I, *Damasus, *Leo I, *Gelasius, *Gregory I); at times the process was slow, but it foreshadowed what was to come (*Liberius, *Zosimus, *Julius). It is worth mentioning that, under many aspects, papal theory preceded the actual exercise of universal primacy (a distinction in the areas of influence). The fact that this tortuous history, characterized by many human vicissitudes, corresponds to an innate dynamic in the apostolic church cannot be discussed at this time. Such a discussion would require not only an introduction to systematic theology, but also to later papal historiography extending beyond the patristic era. While we think of the Petrine ministry as an integral part of the mission entrusted by Jesus to the apostles, we have here limited our horizon to the history of the ancient church. One should remember Leo's famous statement on this matter: Si quid itaque a nobis recte agitur recteque decernitur, si quid a misericordia Dei cotidianis supplicationibus obtinetur, illius est operum atque meritorum cuius in sede sua vivit potestas, excellit auctoritas. With these words Leo I, the greatest ancient theorist of the papacy, simultaneously indicated the ideal excellence and the concrete limits of the Petrine ministry (Serm. 3,3). Nonetheless, we cannot understand the history of the papacy except as a long and complex evolution.

In this historical development, favorable and unfavorable contrasting factors interacted. However, it is not easy to reach a judgment. In hindsight, actions that appeared to be obstacles became the cause of progress and vice versa. On the civil level, it was advantageous for the papacy to be tied to the historical destiny of the city of Rome, the governmental center of the empire until the end of the 3rd c. The privileged condition that this city owed to the political situation was put in question, however, when the imperial residence was moved to another city. Nevertheless, the political degradation of Rome and the rise of Constantinople during tempora christiana became a blessing, because the papacy took advantage of its greater independence from the emperors, who increasingly meddled in church matters, but by that time they resided far from the city of Rome.

On the level of ecclesiastical politics, the emergence of the great episcopal sees, later called patriarchates, certainly favored the development of the papacy. On the one hand, the jurisdiction of the papacy over the West was recognized without many difficulties by the Eastern sees, it was even favored at Nicaea as the model for Alexandria's jurisdiction over Egypt; on the other hand, the rivalries that the See of Egypt posed to that of the New Rome allowed the Apostolic See to acquire a new role as the mediator between the two rival sees and thus to enforce its own position. In the W part of the empire, Rome slowly overcame the resistance of other important sees. Milan, and above all Carthage, and later Ravenna, were forced to acknowledge, in addition to Rome's always-acknowledged status as caput et origo, a wider jurisdiction of the Apostolic See, because these cities had lost their political importance.

On the theoretical level, we also find a disagreement of political ideas and theological premises. The idea of the Urbs aeterna, after the conversion of the Roman aristocracy, taken up again with a Christian spirit by the popes of the 5th c., certainly provided an ideological foundation for papal claims. Similar aspirations, however, could also animate the attitude of the bishops of the New Rome, esp. after the romanitas, not to mention graecitas, was compromised in the West (note the title "imperial ecumenical patriarch"). The principle of *apostolicity was above all in favor of Rome, founded on Peter and Paul, the princes of the apostles. Nevertheless, even Alexandria and Antioch could boast of being Apostolic Sees, as the same popes emphasized in their arguments against the claims of Constantinople, which later did not hesitate to present itself as the See of the Apostle Andrew. Furthermore, as *Tertullian and *Cyprian showed, the principle of the apostolicity of all the bishops was more ancient. It took, therefore, a series of other factors for the Roman See to lay sole claim to the title Sedes apostolica. Among them was the development of the cult of Peter and Paul; special visits to their tombs also earned Rome a special place. One must not forget that the same phenomenon, i.e., the veneration of the relics and the pilgrimages to other sanctuaries contributed much to a kind of "Christian nationalism" that intensified centrifugal forces, diverse languages and mentalities.

Finally, a conflict of *ecclesiologies was also vastly significant. The Roman See had the advantage of representing the Una sancta. This role must have been esp. felt from the moment Christianity was recognized as the official religion of the empire, and Christians became so identified with it that the idea of extra ecclesiasiam nulla salus* meant, practically speaking, extra ecclesiam imperii nulla salus—consider Ambrose's attitude and many others toward the barbarians. Moreover, the origo unitatis, symbolized by the special calling of Peter, included a special regard for the Western churches, the privilege of antiquitatis, even in a chronological sense. In the face of the Eastern churches, this prerogative could also be understood at least in the sense that the church of Rome had always remained faithful to the apostolic tradition, esp. because it did not abandon the faith of Nicaea.

Nevertheless, the principle of the sole apostolic church was opposed to the principle of the catholica and the koinonia* of all the apostolic churches, a principle no less felt in the historical context of the imperial church. This opposition was even more crucial because the idea of catholicity included the idea of consensus, no less cherished by the ancients than the idea of antiquitas. It was certainly easier to affirm one's agreement with all the churches, demonstrating that communion with that church which possessed the principalitas of all the apostolic churches (Irenaeus). Nonetheless, was communion with all the churches no longer convincing?

Finally, the personal level. There is no doubt that the Roman church largely owed its ascent to its strong leaders: Victor I, Stephen I, Dionysius, Damasus, Innocent I, Leo I, Gelasius and Gregory I. Nevertheless, other important figures in the early church challenged this ascent, such as Cyprian, Basil of Caesarea, Ambrose, *Patroclus of Arles and Cyril of Alexandria. On the other hand, certain losses, even utter obfuscations, of Roman primacy were owed primarily to weak popes who lacked circumspection or were too compliant: Liberius, Zosimus, Vigilius, Honorius and Eugenius I. However, it is also true that the necessities and difficulties of certain bishops, which were caused by the shortcomings of other people, whether in the government or in the church, provided the Apostolic See the opportunity to intervene on behalf of oppressed bishops and, thus, to increase its own prestige, as is demonstrated in the appeals of Athanasius, Chrysostom, Nestorius, *Flavian and in a certain sense even Basil. In view of all these different and, in large measure, even opposing factors, it is not easy, therefore, to arrive at a just and even-handed explanation of the ancient history of the papacy (see V. Historiography of the papacy). When considering all these human phenomena, which at times seem to be too human, it does not mean that a Catholic can maintain that the church no longer has need for the Petrine ministry. It simply means that one is taking history seriously, i.e., the incarnational structure of Christ's church.

Bibliographies: see the studies on individual popes contained in the manuals of church history, and above all the Gregorian University's annual journal: Archivum historiae pontificiae, Rome 1963ff.; P. Levillain, ed., Dictionnaire historique de la Papauté, Paris 1994, It. tr. Milan 1997; EPapi.

Sources: see the edition of the popes' writings and the letters sents to them, indicated by the CPL and the CPG; Ph. Jaffé - G. Wattenbach, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, I, Leipzig 1885, repr. 1956; C. Vogel (L. Duchesne), Le Liber pontificalis, Paris ²1955; H. Foerster, Liber diurnus Romanorum Pontificum, Bern 1958; C. Mirbt - K. Aland, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des römischen Katholizismus, I: Von den Anfängen bis zum Tridentinum, Tübingen ⁶1967.

General Studies: see the manuals of the history of the church edited by A. Fliche - V. Martin, H. Jedin, L.J. Rogier, etc., C. Andresen, K.D. Schmidt - E. Wolf; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft, Tübingen 1930–1933; P. Batiffol, Cathedra Petri, Paris 1938; J. Haller, Das Papsttum, I, Stuttgart ²1950; F.X. Seppelt, Geschichte der Päpste, I-II, Munich ²1954-1955; V. Monachino, I papi nella storia I, Rome 1961; G. Schwaiger, Geschichte der Päpste, Munich 1964; C. Falconi, Storia del papato e dei papi, Rome 1967ff.; A. Franzen - R. Bäumer, Papstgeschichte, Freiburg ²1980; J.M.R. Tillard, The Bishop of Rome, London 1983; K. Schatz, Der päpstliche Primat. Seine Geschichte von den Ursprüngen bis zur Gegenwart, Würzburg 1990; H. Fuhrmann, Storia dei papi da Pietro a Giovanni Paolo II, Bari 1992; K. Schatz, Papst, Papsttum, I. Alte Kirche: LTK³ 7, 1328-1331; G. Schwaiger, Papsttum I,3. Im römischen Reich: TRE 25 (1998) 648-651.

Studies on individual periods or particular aspects: P. Batiffol, Le siège apostolique, Paris ²1924; G.B. Ladner, Die Papstbildnisse des Altertums und des Mittelalters, I, Vatican City 1941; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941; J. Ludwig, Die Primatsworte Mt 16,18-19 in der altkirchlichen Exegese, Münster 1952; M. Maccarrone, Vicarius Christi. Storia del titolo papale, Rome 1952; G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste im V. und VI. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1964; M. Maccarrone, S. Pietro in rapporto a Cristo nelle più antiche testimonianze: StudRom 15 (1967) 397-420; W. Ullmann, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages, London ³1970; W. Marschall, Karthago und Rom, Die Stellung der nordafrikanischen Kirche zum apostolischen Stuhl in Rom, Stuttgart 1971; P.P. Joannou, Die Ostkirche und die Cathedra Petri im 4. Jahrhundert, Stuttgart 1972; L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome 1972; J. Hennig, Zur Stellung der Päpste in der martyrologischen Tradition: AHP 12 (1974) 7-32; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart 1975; J. Speigl, Das entstehende Papsttum, die Kanones v. Nizäa und die Bischofseinsetzungen in Gallien: Festschrift H. Tüchle, Paderborn 1975, 43-61; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana (311–440), Rome 1976; P. Stockmeier, Römische Kirche und Petrusamt im Licht frühchristlicher Zeugnisse: AHC 14 (1976) 357-372; P. Conte, Il significato del primato papale nei padri del VI concilio ecumenico: AHC 15 (1977) 7-111; J. Roloff, Apostolat: TRE 3 (1978) 458-462; V. Monachino, Il canone 28 di Calcedonia, Genesi storica, L'Aquila 1979; M. Wojtowych, Papsttum und Konzile von den Anfängen bis zu Leo I., Stuttgart 1981 (cf. AHC 17 [1985] 9-17); B. Schimmelpfennig, Das Papsttum. Von der Antike bis zur Renaissance, Darmstadt [3]1988; J. Hofmann, Die amtliche Stellung der in der ältesten römischen Bischofsliste überlieferten Männer in der Kirche von Rom: HJ 109 (1989) 1-23; A. Garuti, Il papa patriarca d'Occidente, Bologna 1990; M. Maccarone, ed., Il primato del vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio, Vatican City 1991; M. Maccarone, Romana Ecclesia – Cathedra Petri, ed. P. Zerbi et al., Rome 1991; R. Minnerath, De Jérusalem à Rome. Pierre et l'unité de l'église apostolique, Paris 1994; H. Feichtinger, Christus praesens in Ecclesia, Tesi Augustinianum, Rome 2005.

V. Historiography of the papacy. Historical interest in the papacy appears for the first time in the catalogs of the bishops of Rome. To emphasize the apostolicity of authentic Christian tradition, *Hegessipus and Irenaeus of Lyons, already in the 2nd c., and, following in their footsteps, Eusebius of Caesarea (d. 339) composed, among other things, these chronological lists. Driven by the sole desire to compose a chronography, the author of the so-called Chronography of 354 harmonized the Liberian Catalog with Roman consular fasti. Certain chronicles of the 5th c. as well as the histories of *Theodoret and *Socrates, both continuators of Eusebius of Caesarea's Ecclesiastical History, completed the earlier extant catalogs that were available at their time. Furthermore, a series of early portraits depicting Roman pontiffs on the walls of the basilica of St. Paul (Rome) attests the concern certain people had at that time for the history of the papacy.

The chronographical attempts of the 4th to 7th c. were continued in the Liber pontificalis*, the first two recensions of which (until the year 530 and until the end of the 7th c.) pertain to the patristic age. The Liber is a collection of *biographies on Roman bishops; the first set of biographies are brief and extend only to the year 400; the subsequent sets of biographical accounts are more extensive. All the biographies are written acc. to the same methodical layout (name, origin, duration of pontificate, decrees, liturgical institutions, ordinations, date of funeral and the vacancy of chair after the pope's death). The first redaction contains little reliable information. The second, however, includes precise facts. During the Middle Ages, historians inserted papal historiography within the ecclesiastical historiography of the time, which was marked by its rather edifying schema of the ages of the world; the same historiography of the 16th c., however, was too influenced by the polemical confessions of that era.

From the beginning of the 1700s, however, a more critical and objective historiography begins to emerge thanks to the efforts of Panvinio, Baronius, Tillemont and others. The new methods devised by the *Maurists (Coustant) and by the Bollandists and finally by the historical criticism of the 19th c., allowed scholars to make enormous progress in researching the papacy (see Schwaiger, 1337-38). The opening of the Vatican archives and the establishment of the national institutes of history in Rome, while causing medieval and modern historiography to make great progress, could not but also stimulate the study of the discipline's own beginnings (see Schwaiger, 1338). Thus, Duchesne, the editor of the Liber pontificalis (1886–1892), Caspar (1930–1937), Haller (1934–1945) and Seppelt (1931–1941), as well as several Italian scholars, esp. on the history of Rome, such as Brezzi, devoted many years to studying the origins of the papacy. As one can see from Pietri's recent work on the question at hand, which, unfortunately, is limited to the 4th and the 1st half of the 5th c., even pontifical historiography must examine a wider spectrum of data, i.e., not only papal documents and ancient writings, but also the development of the city of Rome, the various forms of pastoral ministry, the social conditions, as they continue to emerge even from archaeological discoveries. Nevertheless, it is obvious that such undertakings still suffer from the dearth of preparatory monographs, as is shown, e.g., by the case of the still-limited list of the popes.

Sources: in addition to the letters of the popes (CPL 1627-1744) and the historical works of the ancient authors already mentioned, see esp. the Liber Pontificalis: ed. L. Duchesne, Paris 1886-92, repr. 1955.

Studies: C. Schmidt, Studien zu den pseudo-Clementinen: nebst einem Anhange, Die älteste römische Bischofsliste und die pseudo-Clementinen (TU 46, 1), Leipzig 1929; A. Mercati, La serie dei papi nell'Annuario pontificio per l'anno 1947: Oss. Rom. 19 gennaio 1947 (Eng. vers. Mediaeval Stud. 9 [1947] 71-80); A. Frutaz, Papa: IV, La cronotassi papale: EC 9, 756-765; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976; M. Wojtowytsch, Papsttum und Konzile von den Anfängen bis zu Leo I. (440–461), Stuttgart 1981; W. Ullmann, Gelasius I (492–496), Stuttgart 1981; G. Schwaiger, Papstgeschichtsschreibung: LTK[3] 7, 1336-1339; Id., Papstliste: LTK[3] 7, 1345ff.

VI. Letters of the popes. Ecclesiastical historians use the generic phrase "Letters of the popes" (epistulae pontificiae) to refer to all the documents attributed to the bishops of Rome without distinction of form, such as the decretals dating back to the end of the 4th c., the encyclicals, which were used for the first time by *Martin I (649–653), chirographs, apostolic letters, etc., with the exception of the so-called papal privileges. With regard to these documents, which are certainly early sources for the history of the papacy and, actually for the history of the entire church, it is fitting to distinguish those of the first three centuries from those that came after.

The scarcity of extant documents for the first period is striking. Aside from the 1 Clement (Prima Clementis), which presents itself as a letter from the community of Rome, we possess only a few letters from *Cornelius I (251–253), preserved in the collection of Cyprian's letters (CPL 5050). As is the case for many other writings of the first centuries, fragments from several other popes (Soter, Eleuterius, Victor I, Pontianus, Lucius I, Stephen I and Dionysius) have been transmitted by Eusebius of Caesarea. Among these, the most important are those written by the following pontiffs: Victor I on the question of Easter, Stephen I on baptism administered by heretics (DS 110-111) and Dionysius on trinitarian theology (DS 112-115). Other letters, however, were mentioned or have been partially preserved by other ecclesiastical authors such as the two letters of Julius I (337–352) in Athanasius's writings (CPL 1627) and Liberius's Letters (352–366) in the works of Hilary and Socrates (CPL 1628ff.).

Damasus I (366–384) marks the beginning of the second period, for which much more documentation has been preserved. Thanks to the pontifical registers (regesta, registri) in which, from the 4th c. onward, acc. to Roman usage, the copies of the documents that left the apostolic chancery were inserted, as well as transmitted only in a fragmentary state, and above all, thanks to the ecclesiastical-political collections, both canonical (decretal law), of which the Avellana is the most famous, we have a very good understanding of the pontifical correspondence for the second period, esp. for what pertains to *Innocent I (401–417; CPL 1641), Leo I (440–461; CPL 1656: more than 170 letters), Hilarus (461–468; CPL 1662-63), Gelasius I (492–496; CPL 1667-68), Symmachus (498–514; CPL 1678) and Gregory I (590–604; CPL 1714). Even if these writings should be attributed more to the anonymous activity of the apostolic chancery than to the literary initiative of individual authors, with the exception perhaps of several letters of Leo and Gregory, nonetheless, they deserve to be considered not merely as sources of the history of the Roman church, but also as testimonies to the history of ancient Christian literature. In fact, pontifical letters, esp. those composed during the heated moments of papal history, have a great deal of importance for the history of Christian doctrine, canon law and liturgy, and esp. for the Augustinian theology of *grace, several questions about *sacramentaries, *Christology, the ecclesiological positions of the Roman curia in comparison to those of the imperial court and other bishops. At the same time, these allow us to understand better the theological and ecclesiological situation of various fathers of the church: Ambrose, *John Chrysostom, Augustine, John Cassian, Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret and, of course, the popes themselves, who like Leo and Gregory are numbered among the *fathers of the church.

Even with respect to the literary aspect, these letters are not devoid of interest because they allow us to trace the development of rhythmic prose, the transition, i.e., from quantitative rhythm to accentuated rhythm in the final clauses (see clausula and cursus). They demonstrate, moreover, the influences of the political-juridical Roman mentality on the *Latin language used by the Christians, as one sees esp. in Leo and in his immediate successors. They even establish a textbook case of Christian adaptation to a secular literary *genre, i.e., the reuse of the form of imperial legislation in the decretal legislation of the Apostolic See. Lastly, the later letters of Gregory and others also attest to the transition from the ancient to the medieval mentality.

Therefore, a study of all this documentation on the popes not only pertains to the history of the Roman church, *patrology, the history of later Latin literature and even the history of the end of the Roman Empire, the beginning of the Byzantine Empire and the Germanic kingdoms; it also requires a much broader familiarity with the editions, tools and studies than the training normally required for patristic research.

On the editions: CPL 1568-1774, and in particular. Ph. Jaffé - G. Wattenbach, Regesta Romanorum Pontificum ab condita Ecclesia ad a. 1198, Leipzig ²1885-1888; C. Silva-Tarouca, Le antiche lettere dei Papi e le loro edizioni (sec. IV-VI): CivCatt 72 (1921) 13-22, 323-336; Id., Nuovi studi sulle antiche lettere dei Papi: Gregorianum 12 (1931) 3-56, 349-425, 547-598.

Editions: in addition to the PL, MGH, CSEL, CCL, see A. Thiel, Epistulae Romanorum Pontificum genuinae et quae ad eos scriptae sunt, Braunsberg 1867/8 (repr. Hildesheim 1974); C. Mirbt - K. Aland, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des römischen Katholizismus, I, Tübingen ⁷1967.

Studies: in addition to the histories of the church, see in particular E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft, I-II, Tübingen 1930, 1933; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei Papi e nei documenti della cancelleria romana dal IV al XIV sec., Rome 1937-39; C. Andresen, Die Kirchen der alten Christenheit, Stuttgart 1971, esp. pp. 579-601; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana (311–440), Rome 1976; Patrologia III, 346ff. (bibl.); P.A. McShane, La Romanitas et le Pape Léon le Grand, Paris 1979 (bibl.); LTK³ 7, 1335ff.; Patrologia IV, 1-15, 123-189 (bibl.).

B. Studer

PAPHNUTIUS. The name of various Egyptian *ascetics and hermits. *Rufinus and *Sozomen noted that the first Paphnutius was a bishop, a *confessor of the faith, a member of the Council of *Nicaea (325), where he sided against clerical *celibacy. The second Paphnutius (d. before 394) is known from the Historia monachorum in Aegypto. A contemporary bearing the same name, nicknamed Bubalo (wild ox), appears in the apophthegmata in the writings of *Cassian and *Palladius. Last, the most famous and entirely legendary Paphnutius was the disciple and supposed biographer of St. *Onuphrius.

BS 10, 35-37 and 26-28; BBKL 21,1113-1114

J. Gribomont

PAPIAS of Hierapolis (2nd c.). Born at Hierapolis in *Phrygia, where he was also *bishop, Papias wrote An Explanation of the Sayings [λόγια] of the Lord around the year 130/140, which heavily influenced *Irenaeus of Lyons, *Hippolytus of Rome and *Victorinus of Petovium. The extant fragments have been preserved by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., V, 33, 4) and *Eusebius of Caesarea, HE II,15,2; III, 36, 2; 39, 13-17. Today we have various editions and even recent translations. The work is an interpretation of what the Lord said and did, as the title itself indicates.

According to Eusebius, HE 3, 39, 15ff., Papias was a follower of one of the seven disciples of *John, among whom were the *presbyters *Aristion and *John, though modern scholars often maintain that only the latter two are historical figures, on the supposition that the seven disciples represent a widespread literary device used during that period (e.g., for the discussion of the supposed John of Papias, see M.L. Rigato, La testimonianza di Papia di Gerapoli sul "secondo" Giovanni e il contesto eusebiano, in Atti del VI Simposio di Efeso su S. Giovanni Apostolo, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 1996, 237-272). Papias was considered to have had close ties to the apostolic age: acc. to Irenaeus (Haer. V, 33,4), Papias was "very old," a follower of John and a contemporary of *Polycarp. With regard to the direct transmission of the apostolic message, Papias's insistence on παράδοσις/traditio is very important, because through it one finds the "living voice" (ζώση φονή, viva vox), as seen in A.D. Baum's study Papias, der Vorzug der Viva Vox und die Evangelienschriften: NTS 44 (1998) 144-151. Eusebius did not consider Papias a very rigorous thinker and thus inserted him within the Jewish Christian tradition (HE 3, 39, 13).

The most famous fragment, already discussed during antiquity (HE 3, 39, 15), reports a πρεσβύτερος, acc. to whom the gospel of Mark was written on the basis of *Peter's preaching at *Rome and indicates that *Mark was an "interpreter" of Peter. The question has been studied (e.g., by T.Y. Mullins, Papias and Clement and Mark's Two Gospels: VChr 30 [1976] 189-192; J. Kürzinger, Die Aussage des Papias von Hierapolis zur literarischen Form des Markusevangeliums: Biblische Zeitschrift 21 [1977] 245-264; A. Delaux, Deux témoignages de Papias sur la composition de Marc: NTS 26 [1981] 401-411; M. Sordi, L'ambiente storico-culturale greco-romano e la missione cristiana nel I sec.: Ricerche Storico-Bibliche 10 [1998] 217-229; A.D. Baum, Der Presbyter des Papias über einen Hermeneuten des Petrus: TZ 56 [2000] 21-35).

Matthew, acc. to Papias, wrote his gospel ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ, i.e., in Hebrew or in Aramaic dialect; he collected the λόγια (sayings) of Jesus in this language and ἡρμήνευσε them, i.e., he "interpreted" them, or "translated" them, evidently in Greek, even if *Jerome (Vir. ill., s.v. Matthaeus) claims that he does not know who translated the Greek of "the Hebrew version of Matthew." One such gospel was then used by a group of Jewish-Christians such as the *Nazareans and, acc. to *Pantaenus, the teacher of *Clement of Alexandria, was actually in the possession of certain Christian groups in India, who obtained it from *Bartholomew (documentation for this is found in ch. 3 of my work: Gli Apostoli in India nella tradizione patristica e nella letteratura sanscrita, in collaboration with C. Dognini, Milan 2001, 45-59). The question has been raised if what Matthew wrote in "the Hebrew language" acc. to Papias was a collection of the sayings of Jesus that Irenaeus and Origen speak of as the text of "Matthew in Hebrew." Scholars have debated this issue at length, and the literature on this question is voluminous. See, at least, C.B. Amphoux, L'évangile selon les Hébreux: Apocrypha 6 (1995) 67-77; A.D. Baum, Ein aramäischer Urmatthäus im kleinasiatischen Gottesdienst: ZNTW 12 (2001) 257-272; further information can be found in the bibl.

RGG[3] V, 47-48; J.F. Bligh, The Prologue of Papias: ThS 13 (1952) 234-240; J. Munck, Presbyters and Disciples of the Lord in Papias: HTR 52 (1959) 223-243; W. Bauer, Rechtgläubigkeit und Ketzerei im ältesten Christentum, Tübingen ²1968, 187ff.; G.M. Lee, Eusebius, HE 3,39,4: Biblica 53 (1972) 412; C.M. Nielsen, Papias. Polemicist Against Whom?: ThS 35 (1974) 529-535; Altaner 54-55; E. Güttgemanns, In welchem Sinne ist Lukas "Historiker"? Die Beziehung von Luk 1,1-4 und Papias zur antiken Rhetorik: LingBibl 54 (1983) 9-26; U.H.J. Koertner, Papias von Hierapolis. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums, Göttingen 1983; J. Kürzinger, Papias von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des NT, Regensburg 1983; L. Cirillo, Un recente volume su Papia: Cristianesimo nella Storia 7 (1986) 553-563; H.H. Schmidt, Semitismen bei Papias: TZ 44 (1988) 135-146; J.-D. Dubois, Remarques sur le fragment de Papias cité par Irénée: RHPhR 71 (1991) 3-10; G. Zuntz, Papiana: ZNTW 82 (1991) 242-263; R. Bauckham, Papias and Polycrates on the Origin of the Fourth Gospel: JTS 44 (1993) 24-69; W.R. Schoedel, Papias, in ANRW II, 27, 1, Berlin-New York 1993, 235-270; W.A. Löhr, Kanonsgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zum Verhältnis von mündlicher und schriftlicher Tradition im zweiten Jahrhundert: ZNTW 85 (1994) 234-258; A. Stewart-Sykes, Taxei in Papias: JECS 3 (1995) 487-492; P. Bruns, Papias: LTK³ 7, 1325-1326; C.E. Hill, What Papias Said About John (and Luke): JTS 49 (1998) 582-629; C.P. Thiede, Der Petrus Report, Augsburg 2002, 153-170; I. Ramelli, I romanzi antichi e il Cristianesimo. Contesto e contatti, Madrid 2001, 163-192, part. 167; Id., The Ancient Novels and Possible Contacts with the New Testament, in Annual Meeting of the American Academy of Religion and the Society of Biblical Literature, Atlanta, GA, November 22-25, 2003, section Ancient Fiction and Early Christian and Jewish Narrative Group; H. Clarke, The Gospel of Matthew and Its Readers: A Historical Introduction to the First Gospel, Bloomington, IN 2003; B. Ehrman, The Apostolic Fathers, Cambridge 2003; M.-L. Rigato, Il titolo della Croce di Gesù, Rome 2003, 134-144; I. Ramelli, Indizi della conoscenza del Nuovo Testamento nei romanzieri antichi e in altri autori pagani del I sec. d. C., in Atti del Convegno Il Contributo delle scienze storiche alla interpretazione del Nuovo Testamento (Rome, 2-6 ottobre 2002), ed. Pontificio Comitato di Scienze Storiche, Vatican City 2005; Papia di Hierapolis, Esposizione degli oracoli del Signore: i frammenti, intr., text, tr. and notes by E. Norelli, Milan 2005.

I. Ramelli

PAPISCUS and PHILO, Dialogue of. In 1889 Arthur McGiffert published the editio princeps of an anonymous dialogue between a Christian monk and two Jews, Papiscus and Philo (Papisci et Philonis Iudaeorum cum monacho colloquium), placing the work's composition in 7th-c. Egypt. In the decades following, but esp. in recent years, numerous other MSS have been found, and it has been noted that the text in many codices differed from the edited text. The analysis of the MS tradition of the Dialogue of Papiscus and Philo—which is much more rich than once thought, but also much more complex and characterized by numerous processes of contamination and manipulation of the text—allows one to conclude that the work is actually a heap of textual units of different provenance; the precise parallels that one finds with other anti-Jewish works of the same period (Trophies of Damascus, Question 137 to Antiochus, but also Leontius of Neapolis's Apology containing one section on the veneration of images) depend in all likelihood on the use of the same repertoire of sources. The genesis of the Dialogue cannot be ascribed to an individual creative act, but should be viewed as a process that is developed over time as a result of work carried out by several authors at different times. One can situate the genesis of the most ancient and original nucleus of the Dialogue around the 2nd half of the 7th c., to which nucleus new textual units were gradually added. The use of the original title, The Dialogue of Papiscus and Philo, is open to discussion. Scholars have continued to use it for the sake of clarity and out of respect for a consolidated tradition. In essence, the work was open and flexible and was probably composed in an E region subjected to Arab domination: in *Palestine or *Syria.

The reconstruction of the work's original nucleus and its progressive development should be placed within the literary genre of polemical, anti-Jewish dialogue. The work primarily sets forth again the then-traditional themes of the longstanding debate between Jews and Christians, but also reflects the conflict on the veneration of images that deeply troubled the period between the 7th and 8th c., even though the textual units in which reference to such a question appears autonomous and strongly suspect of being written much later than the original nucleus of the work. The work does not contain exegetical insights of particular originality in comparison to the preexisting tradition, except for the question on the veneration of the images, which, however, the Dialogue shares with anti-Jewish writings of the same period: the Jew accuses the Christian of attributing to the *cross and the images of Christ and the saints, or rather to manmade objects, the veneration due to God alone; the Christian responds by asserting that he does not venerate images but instead venerates God through such images. The references to the conquests of the E areas of the Byzantine Empire by the Persian and Arabic-Islamic peoples contextualize the Dialogue with a certain precision and provide clues about the work's historical context. In the work, the Persians and Arabs appear as a third interlocutor, lacking a definite dialectical structure, and are more perceived as an impending and threatening presence, and therefore liable of being associated with the Hebrews as a subversive element in the empire. On the whole, the exegesis is also traditional: typological, christological, Christocentric and bent on interpreting every figure and event of the OT as a prefiguration of the NT in a line of historical continuity.

Precisely because the dialogue has known various traditional phases and its genesis cannot be reduced to a coherent and unifying project, we cannot delineate with precision the historical moment in which it was composed: but its wide dissemination and its gradual growth are in all likelihood the effect of the encounter and the clash between the Jewish and Christian communities, a factor always present in the first period of the elaboration of the work (7th c.) and for all phases of its transmission. Another very important point to note for understanding the history of the Dialogue is that it was translated many times: not only into Latin, as has been known for some time, but also into Slavic (with different versions: Middle Bulgarian, Russian and Ruthenian) and into Middle High German.

CPG 7796. Editions: A.C. McGiffert, Dialogue Between a Christian and a Jew, the Greek Text Edited with Introduction and Notes, Together with a Discussion of Christian Polemics Against the Jews, Marburg 1889; I. Aulisa - C.Schiano, Dialogo di Papisco e Filone giudei con un monaco, Bari 2005, 177-210.

Studies: V. Déroche, La polémique anti-judaïque au VI^e^ et au VII^e^ siècle. Un mémento inédit, les Képhalaia: Travaux et Mémoires 11 (1991) 275-311; H.G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, Berlin 1992; A. Cameron, The Jews in Seventh-Century Palestine: Scripta Classica Israelica 13 (1994) 75-93; D.M. Olster, Roman Defeat, Christian Response and the Literary Construction of the Jew, Philadelphia 1994; A. Külzer, Disputationes Graecae contra Iudaeos. Untersuchungen zur byzantinischen antijüdischen Dialogliteratur und ihrem Judenbild, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1999; P. Andrist, Pour un répertoire des manuscrits de polémique antijudaïque: Byzantion 70 (2000) 270-306; I. Aulisa, "Papisci et Philonis Iudaeorum cum monacho colloquium": Note per una ricostruzione del confronto tra giudei e cristiani in epoca altomedievale: VetChr 40 (2003) 17-41; C. Schiano, Dal dialogo al trattato nella polemica antigiudaica. Il "Dialogo di Papisco e Filone" e la "Disputa contro i giudei" di Anastasio abate: VetChr 41 (2004) 121-150; P. Andrist, Trois témoins athonites mal connus des Anastasiana Antiiudaica (et du Dialogus Timothei et Aquilae): Lavra K 113; Vatopedi 555; Karakallou 60. Essais sur la tradition des Anastasiana Antiiudaica*, notamment du* Dialogus Papisci et Philonis cum monacho: Byzantion 76 (2006) 402-422.

I. Aulisa

PAPYRUS - PAPYROLOGY

I. Literary papyri - II. Documentary papyri.

Papyrus, as a writing material taken from the plant and bearing the same name (cyperus papyrus), produced by a meticulous treatment of the stem, began in *Egypt, where as early as in the 3rd millennium BC it was in current use. The technique adopted for the making of papyrus paper was described in detail by *Pliny the Elder, although with a few inaccuracies (Nat. Hist. XIII, 74-77; 81-82).

Papyrus paper was used throughout the entire ancient world. Remnants of papyrus have been preserved thanks to the favorable climate conditions above all in the valley of the Nile, on the outskirts of the area subject to flooding, as well as in other places with a dry climate, though to a lesser extent also in *Dura Europos and Phouraia on the Euphrates River, Nessana and the caves near the Dead Sea in *Palestine, *Petra in *Arabia, and Nbu-Ndjem in *Libya. Sporadically they are also found elsewhere, but in these rare instances they usually disintegrate completely at the moment they are removed from the earth. One particular example involves the numerous scrolls of carbonized papyrus that were found at Herculaneum in the 2nd half of the 17th c., some of which are still waiting to be unfolded and read. The majority of papyri that we possess come from ordinary excavations, but there are also many other papyri that have been found by private individuals and have entered museums or libraries by means of the antiquarian market; in these latter instances, it is difficult to be certain of a papyrus's provenance.

In addition to papyrus, writers in the ancient world used other materials to compose (in this entry we are not going to discuss the materials used for inscriptions, which were intended to be read by anyone); more specifically, they used different types of animal skin (the best of which was parchment) as well as materials that cost little or nothing: waxed-wooden tablets, limestone clay tablets (ostraka). Text written on such materials, esp. if they have been found in Egypt, are usually studied and published by the same specialists who are committed to investigating papyri; therefore, the term "papyrus" is often applied—improperly, but conveniently—also to these.

For many centuries, papyrus paper was the primary material for book production, documents, letters and the administrative acts of the state.

In Egypt, papyrus paper was still in use in the 8th-9th c. AD, even though the use of paper made from cloth had already begun to spread. The latter definitively supplanted the former during the course of the 11th-12th c. Scholars usually divide papyri into two large groups: literary papyri and documentary papyri. Even though superficial and imprecise, this division is convenient. Even paraliterary texts are assigned to the first group, e.g., scholastic exercises, horoscopes and formulas of written prayers for private use. The second group includes not only documents deriving from the state's chancery and documents relating to actions completed by individuals (e.g., loans, receipts, rent contracts and acts of commerce), but also private letters.

The term "papyrology" refers to a discipline that began between the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th c. It analyzes both literary and documentary papyri.

For the papyri pertaining to the period of interest to this Encyclopedia, the overwhelming majority were written in Greek; those written in Latin are rare, and those in the Egyptian language are rather numerous. They were written until the 2nd c. AD by means of the demotic script later used for the *Coptic alphabet. Rare at the beginning, the extant Coptic papyri became increasingly numerous over time. We also possess a certain number of documentary papyri in *Arabic and Persian.

I. Literary papyri. The original form of the book in the ancient world was a scroll made from a certain number of pages of papyrus that were glued together so that they formed a unit of varying length, that wrapped around in such a way that the writing was on the inside, which was usually smoother. Beginning from the 2nd c. AD the use of the codex gradually increased. In the course of the 4th c., the codex supplanted the scroll. For a long time codices were made with folia of a papyrus folded together, even though this material easily ruined at the folds. Only gradually was the papyrus replaced in this area with parchment—material much more durable and convenient, but also more costly.

It did not take long for Christians to adopt the codex as their form of the book. Being less bound by a literary tradition than either pagans or Jews, they could more easily abandon the scroll form of the book. For Jews, however, the scroll remained the typical book form for the Bible.

Among the Christian Greek and Coptic literary papyri, the biblical texts of both the OT and NT constitute the majority of papyri. The quantity and the characteristics of the biblical Christian papyri discovered in Egypt confirm and enrich the witnesses to the daily use and diffusion of sacred *Scripture within all levels of the Christian communities of the first centuries. From these papyri, the most ancient are the P.Yale I, 1 (end of the 1st c.), a papyrus fragment of a codex of Genesis; the most notable is P.Ryl. III 457, a fragment of a papyrus codex perhaps originating from Faym or Oxyrhynchus, which is *paleographically datable to the first decades of the 2nd c. and contains John 18:31-32, 37-38; and the noteworthy complex of the P.Chester-Beatty, some of which are datable to the 2nd c. Following in age and importance is the P.Bodm. II (2nd-3rd c.) found in Upper Egypt (Panopolis), a papyrus codex with an accurate edition of the entire gospel of *John.

Among the New Testament apocryphal texts, the most attested is the Protevangelium of James, of which the P.Bodm. V (3rd c.), originating from Upper Egypt with the title The Nativity of Mary, contains the most ancient redaction.

Even though inferior to the biblical papyri, the contributions of papyri in the area of patristics are noteworthy, for which the New Testament text already establishes the basis and a constant point of reference for patristic authors. Contemporary patristics, in addition to extending its interests beyond its traditional borders, has increasingly taken historical-philological aspects into its own theological field (K. Treu), and the same papyri, both for the peculiarity of the documentation and for this fruitful convergence, has indicated the connection between specifically philological data with the contents of theological thought, and thus remains influenced by it.

P.Oxy. XV 1782 (end of the 4th c.), which belonged to a small parchment codex, contains a fragment of the Didache 1,4, with two interesting readings that differ from the text that we know from other sources.

The Shepherd of *Hermas has the following primary papyrological witnesses: P.Mich. 130, a fragment of a papyrus scroll from the end of the 2nd c. (Faym), containing Mand. II, 6–III, 1; and P.Mich. 129 of the 2nd half of the 3rd c. (Theadelphia or Lycopolis?), long fragments of a papyrus codex that restore large portions of the Mandates and the Similitudes and confirm the hypotheses that the work was not published just once and that the original redaction began with the fifth Vision.

*Melito of Sardis's De Pascha has been transmitted in two series of folios of a papyrus codex: P. Chester-Beatty XII and P.Bodm. XIII, respectively datable to 3rd-4th c. The connections of this famous document to the *apocryphal texts known as the Acta Ioannis (2nd c.) has caused some to suspect a common theological tradition on the central theme concerning trinitarian and christological doctrine.

The most ancient and direct witness to *Irenaeus's Adversus haereses is the P.Oxy. III 405, which contains seven fragments of a papyrus scroll almost contemporaneous to the author. One of the fragments contains a citation of Mt 3:6-7 that conforms to MS D of the NT, thus leading one to conclude that Irenaeus must have known of the text today found in Codex Bezae.

Among the numerous papyrus finds that have enriched scholarly understanding of *Origen's texts is the codex of Tura (6th-7th c.), published by J. Scherer in 1949: the codex reports Origen's interesting christological discussion with Heraclides, in which it becomes evident that laypeople were actively involved in the debate. Also surviving from *Tura is a papyrus codex datable to the 6th-7th c. and containing Origen's De Pascha (published by O. Guéraud and P. Nautin), a text in which one finds helpful comparisons in the exegetical catenae*.

The various commentaries of *Didymus the Blind, originating from the Monastery of St. Arsenius of Tura, believed to contain Origenist tendencies, possess much value for patristic research.

There are papyri for the texts of *Basil the Great, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *John Chrysostom and *Cyril of Alexandria. Also of much interest in this respect is a group of patristic fragments unidentified or anonymous (more than a hundred in the catalog of van Haelst), which make a sizeable contribution to our collection of patristic texts.

Among the few Latin papyri, we should mention four parchment sheets from the 4th c. with sections of *Augustine's Sermons 34 and 38, and a Psalmus responsorius (P.Barc.Inv. 149-153), which an editor improperly titled A Hymn to the Virgin Mary, the primary source of which is the Protevangelium of James.

Among the literary papyri found in Egypt, a large collection of Coptic codices discovered in 1945 at *Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt deserves separate consideration. This is a collection of Coptic translations made in the 4th c. composed of religious-philosophical writings, the Greek text of which has not been preserved. For the most part, they are *gnostic and hermetic works, but a sapiential text is also present, The Teachings of Silvanus. The so-called library of Nag Hammadi has attracted and continues to attract the attention of many scholars. Catalogs of Christian literary papyri can be found in K. Aland, Repertorium der griechischen christlichen Papyri, I: Biblische Papyri, Berlin 1976, and in J. van Haelst, Catalogue des papyrus littéraires juifs et chrétiens, Paris 1976, as well as in some electronic programs, among the most important and convenient of which is the Leuven Database of Ancient Books (LDAB), which is available online: www.trismegistos.org/ldab/.

II. Documentary papyri. Scholars who study various aspects of church history, and esp. the Egyptian church, can find interesting pieces of information within the enormous mass of Greek and Coptic documentary papyri—a mass that continually grows thanks to new publications.

The chance of finding useful information is all the more likely when one deals not only with an isolated text but also with collections (improperly called "archives"), i.e., with groups of documents written by or related to a single person or institution or deriving from a person or an institution's archive (e.g., of a church or of a monastic center). Particularly valuable are two collections of Coptic texts that are the remains of the archives of two bishops from Upper Egypt who lived during the 1st half of the 7th c., Abraham and *Pisenthios.

The "Christian" documentary papyri begin to appear at the outset of the 3rd c. Their number increases over the course of the century and then much more rapidly in the 4th c. These provide us plenty of information on the lives of the Christian communities of Egypt (unfortunately, not *Alexandria's: not one papyrus has been preserved at either Alexandria or the Delta). They make it possible for one to gain a more precise knowledge of some regions than others in the world of Late Antiquity, the network of churches and income, their expenses, those who made up the clergy, and the behavior of some bishops.

Documents originating in monastic centers are very important. They may allow scholars to correct and complete the information supplied by other literary sources (The History of Monks in Egypt, The Lausiac History, the documentation provided by *Pachomius, the Apothegmata Patrum, etc.). It was the documentary papyri, e.g., that convinced scholars of the coexistence of various types of *monasticism—eremitism, semi-anchorite laurae, cenobitism—this was the normal situation in Egypt down through the centuries until the Arab conquest. Analogously, the documentary papyri have shown us that the obligation of renouncing one's possessions the moment one entered monastic life was the exception, not the rule, for Egyptian monasticism.

The so-called private letters provide a case of their own. Note that papyrologists apply this term to any letter preserved by a papyrus with the exception of letters written by or sent to any office of the state. According to this terminological convention, a letter, for instance, sent by the head of a Christian community to the head of another Christian community vouching for one of his traveling lay faithful is classified as a "private letter." Private Christian letters supply an enormous amount of information not found in other sources. These are written in language very close to the spoken language of the day, more or less uninfluenced by literary customs. They allow us to see and observe in concrete detail ordinary Christians immersed in their daily activities and their daily interactions with pagans.

For the history of doctrinal conflicts, documentary papyri are less important (they hardly need to be taken into consideration).

A helpful list of papyrological editions, which pertains to Greek documents, is supplied by J.F. Oates - R.S. Bagnall - W.H. Willis - K.A. Worp, Checklist of Editions of Greek Papyri and Ostraka, 4th ed., Atlanta 1992; and for Coptic documents by A.A. Schiller, A Checklist of Coptic Documents and Letters: Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrology 13 (1976) 99-123. Documentary papyri published in journals are systematically republished in two special collections: for Greek documentary papyri we have the Sammelbuch griechischer Urkunden aus Ägypten, in many volumes since 1915 on, edited by F. Bilabel, then by E. Kiessling, then by H.-A. Rupprecht; for Coptic documentary papyri Koptisches Sammelbuch, of which vol. I, edited by M.R.M. Hasitzka, was released in 1993. Another edition of all Coptic documents ordered acc. to category is underway at the Journal of Juristic Papyrology, since vol. 29 (1999), and is being edited by T.S. Richter. See too, K. Aland - H.-U. Rosenbaum, Repertorium des griechischen christlichen Papyri, vols. I-II, Berlin-New York 1976–95; K. Treu - J. Diethart, Griechische literarische Papyri christlichen Inhalts. II: Textband, Vienna 1993.

Two excellent introductions to papyrology are E.G. Turner, Greek Papyri. An Introduction, Oxford [2]1980, [1]1968, It. tr. (with supplementary annotations by M. Manfredi) Papiri greci, Florence 1984; O. Montevecchi, La papirologia, repr. rev. and corrected with addenda, Milan 1988 ([1]1973).

Reviews of editions of papyri: E.A. Judge - S.R. Pickering, Papyrus Documentation of Church and Community in Egypt to the Mid-Fourth Century: JbAC 20 (1977) 47-71; O. Montevecchi, La documentazione papiracea del III secolo d. C. Aspetti e problemi: Aegyptus 73 (1993) 57-69; M. Naldini, Egitto cristiano: testimonianze papirologiche, in A. Camplani (ed.), L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica, Rome 1997, 273-289; E. Wipszycka, Les papyrus documentaires concernant l'Église d'avant le tournant constantinien. Un bilan des vingt dernières années, in Atti del XXII Congr. Int. di Papirologia, Florence 2001, 1307-1330.

M. Naldini - E. Wipszycka

PARABALANI (Parabolani). According to the Codex Theodosianus (hereafter CTh), the parabalani were qui ad curanda debilium aegra corpora deputantur (CTh 16,2,43) at Alexandria: accordingly, they established the nursing personnel of the church at *Alexandria, but we do not know exactly the nature of their work. Likewise, we do not know when they began, but as early as the beginning of the 5th c. they constituted a powerful organization, which at times caused chaos in cities. Therefore, after the death of *Hypatia—we do not know if they were involved—*Theodosius released a law in 416 restricting their privileges and their activities that were not specifically intended to provide humanitarian aid. Moreover, he ordered that their members be of a poor background—the honorati and the curiales could not be parabalani—their number should not exceed 500 (CTh 16, 2, 42), a number that two years later was increased to 600 (CTh 16, 2, 43). They should not meddle in public affairs (shows, city governance and tribunals, for fear that they might interfere with the judicial decisions). The parabalani, acc. to this law of 418, were under the authority of the bishop of Alexandria (for a brief period they were under the augustalis prefect); on certain occasions they could be his right-hand man, as in the case of the Latrocinium *Ephesus in 449 (Mansi 6, 828). The parabalani enjoyed a certain amount of the clergy's privileges, but even though they were named in the CTh under the title de clericis, we are unsure if they belonged to the clergy. The legislation of the CTh partially passed into the CJ (CTh 16, 2, 42 = CJ 1, 3, 17; CTh 16, 2, 43 = CJ 1, 3, 18).

DACL 13, 1574-1578. F. Martroye, Les parabalani d'Alexandrie: Bulletin de la Société nationale des Ant. de France (1923) 275-281; H. Grégoire, Sur le personnel hospitalier des Églises. "Parabalani et Privatarii": Byzantion 13 (1938) 283-285; A. Philipsborn, La compagnie d'ambulanciers "parabalani" d'Alexandrie: Byzantion 20 (1950) 185-190; W. Schubart, Parabalani: JEA 40 (1954) 97-101; J. Rougé, La politique de Cyrille d'Alexandrie et le meurtre d'Hypatie: Cristianesimo nella storia 11 (1990) 485-504 (esp. 500-501); Cyrille de Alexandrie, Lettres festales, SC 372, Paris 1991, 57ff., 69 n.1.

A. Di Berardino

PARABLE. In the technical language of ancient *rhetoric, the term παραβολή (Lat. conlatio, similitudo; see Cicero, De invent. 1, 30, 49) indicates a more or less broad and detailed comparison between two terms pertaining to different contexts. Aristotle (Rhet. 11, 20), though distinguishing parable from a story occurring outside reality, numbers the former among the examples that supply the orator generally accepted proofs. In the NT, in addition to Heb 9:9; 11:19, where it acquires the meaning of *symbol, the term παραβολή is found numerous times in the synoptic gospels and is used in the vast gamut of meanings contained in the Hebrew term mashal (Aramaic mathla): from time to time it can mean a solemn and enigmatic statement, a piece of advice for knowing how to live, a typical case, a metaphor, a brief image, a comparison, an analogy or a story. In other NT passages we find the term παροιμία, the sense of which fluctuates between similitude (Jn 10:6), proverb (2 Pet 2:22) and an enigmatic speech (Jn 16:25, 29). As C.H. Dodd observed (The Parables of the Kingdom, New York [2]1961, 5): "At its simplest the parable is a metaphor or simile drawn from nature or common life, arresting the hearer by its vividness or strangeness, and leaving the mind in sufficient doubt about its precise application to tease it into active thought." The simple metaphor can be enriched by particular details and can become a complete image and subsequently a story and a true and proper account. And in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, the term παραβολή is found in the so-called *Letter of Barnabas and in the Shepherd of *Hermas. In Barnabas 6,10, with respect to Ex 33:3, this term indicates an enigmatic affirmation that should be interpreted allegorically (see also Barn. 17, 2). The third part of the Shepherd of Hermas is designated as the παραβολαί, which, with regard to the first five, are similar to the synoptic parables; a parable requires explanation (see Sim. V,3,1; 4,1), acc. to a conception analogous to that present in Mk 4:34 (one should note that the same term ἐπιλύω appears with the reference to the explanation of the parable).

According to *Clement of Alexandria, a parable is a speech that leads the hearer from what is similar to the proper sense—to what is true and proper—or it is an expression that in another way powerfully shows what is said in the proper sense (Strom. VI, 15,126). *Origen, who also had in mind this type of definition for parable, adds another: the parable is a speech relating to a fact presented as if it had already occurred, but it has not really occurred, but it could occur; such a discourse indicates, in a figurative sense, some transfer of meaning inasmuch as it is said in a parable (In Ps. 77,2: Analecta Sacra III, p. 111; see also Fragm. in Pr. 1,6: PG 13, 20C). He distinguishes the parable from the αἴνιγμα that consists in the exposition of events that have not been verified and cannot occur and that express an arcane meaning in a hidden way (Fragm. in Pr. 1,6: PG 13, 25B; see Jerome, Tract. de Ps. 77,2: CCL 78, 65); the fact recounted by the enigma is therefore unlikely in comparison to the parable. On the other hand, Origen also appears to distinguish the parable from the similitude, on the basis of Mk 4:30, emphasizing that the former is specific and the latter generic (Comm. in Matt. X, 4), but further along he seems to call into question such a distinction (ibid. 16 and also 11). In any case, for Origen the hidden teaching expressed by the parable is intended to stimulate the human spirit toward investigation, the condition of every discovery of the truth (see M. Harl, Origène et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe incarné, Paris 1958, 245); the Logos, in order to exercise the understanding of the hearers, has indicated some truths under the form of enigmas, others in obscure speeches, others in parables and others in difficult questions (C. Cels. III, 45). *John Chrysostom, who seems to associate the term παραβολή with αἴνιγμα (In Jo. hom. 47, 1), observes with regard to Mt 13:15 that had not the Lord desired the salvation of his hearers, he would have remained silent and would not have spoken in parables, but precisely this parabolic language, with its manner of expressing itself in a veiled way, invites their attention (In Matt. hom. 45, 2). For *Cyril of Alexandria, the parables are images of things not visible, but rather intelligible and spiritual; what one cannot see with the eyes of the body, the parable makes visible with the eyes of the mind, bestowing a beautiful form to the subtlety of intelligible things through sensible and almost tangible things (Comm. in Lc. VIII: PG 72, 624 CD).

With regard to the Latin Christian authors, *Tertullian, in reference to the parables found in the gospels, uses the term parabola interchangeably with similitudo (see De praescr. haer. 26,3; De paen. 8,4); *Hilary usually considers the parables of the NT similitudines (In Matt. 13,7; 21,8) and comparationes (In Matt. 6,6; 20,5; 21,13). For the term parabola meaning comparatio, see also *Cassiodorus (Exp. in Ps. 56,2 with regard to Mt 23:37). The association of the concept of the parable to those of similitudo and comparatio is found in the writings of *Gaudentius of Brescia, who shows how it is the characteristic of the perfect teacher to make use of parabolic language for instructing his disciples and stimulating them to action (Tract. 18: CSEL 68, 153). *Jerome notes that it was the custom of the Syrians and esp. the Palestinians to insert parables in all their speeches because what the listeners could not understand by means of simple teaching becomes understandable through similitude and examples (Comm. in Matt. 18,23). He also considers the parable a similitude: quae ab eo vocatur, quod alteri παραβάλλεται, hoc est adsimilatur, et quasi umbra proemiumve veritatis est (Ep. 121,6: CSEL 56, 23. For the contrast parabola-veritas, see Ep. 49,13: CSEL 54, 370; see also *Theodoret, In Ez. 20,49: PG 81, 1008A). He emphasizes that the Lord spoke in many parables to the crowds so that his various teachings might be accepted acc. to the disposition of each individual's *soul, and united clear things with obscure things in order to stimulate his audience to an understanding of what they did not understand by means of things they did understand (Comm. in Matt. 13, 3). *Ambrose considered the parable a figure demanding a solution (Expl. Ps. 43, 56) and distinguished the *narratio from the parabola, as in the case of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, a parable that even uses the name of one of the figures (Expos. ev. sec. Lc. VIII, 13; see also Jerome, Hom. de Lazaro et divite. CCL 78, 507). In *Augustine's writings, one finds the concept of parabola associated with that of similitudo and aenigma (see Enarr. in Ps. 68, Serm. 1,15; In Ps. 48, Serm. 1,5, where he affirms: Aenigma est obscura parabola quae difficile intelligitur; Serm. 93,1); in the parables and in the figures that are not understood in the proper sense (aliud ex alio est intellegendum; Contra mend. 24). Augustine divides the parables found in the gospels into groups, the first of which conforms secundum similitudinem aliquam, such as Mt 18:23-35; Lk 7:41-43; 15:11-32, the second ex ipsa dissimilitudine (acc. to the dissimilarity itself), such as Mt 6:30; 7:7-11; Lk 16:1-13: in the first case the distinctive character of the two terms of comparison in the parable is the similarity; in the other, the dissimilarity (Quaest. evang. lib. 11,45).

In the writings of ancient Christian authors, despite the variety of their attitudes and manners of expression, one can discern a common thread: the parabolic language expressed by *Jesus tends to invite reflection and understanding from the hearers so that whoever is guided by an upright intention can more easily understand the Lord's salvific message and thereby translate it into action.

TDNT 5, 744-761; DBS 6, 1149-1177; J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, Eng. tr., London [3]1972; C.H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, London-New York [2]1961; M. Marin, Ricerche sull'esegesi agostiniana della parabola delle dieci vergini (Mt 25,1-13), Bari 1981, 49-64; V. Fusco, Oltre la parabola. Introduzione alle parabole di Gesù, Rome 1983; A. Sáenz, Las parábolas del evangelio según los Padres de la Iglesia, Buenos Aires 1994 (La misericordia de Dios), 1995 (La misericordia con el prójimo), 1997 (La figura señorial de Cristo), 1999 (El misterio de Israel y de las naciones); S. Zincone, Parlare in parabole. Osservazioni sull'esegesi crisostomiana di Mt. 13, 10 sgg., Omaggio a D. Sabbatucci, SMSR 62, XX (1996) 685-690.

S. Zincone

PARACLETE. The modern term paraclete comes from the Latin paraclitus (paracletus), which is a loan word from the Greek noun paraklētos (from parakaleō, "I call on, beseech, console, exhort"; composed of para [near] and kaleō [I call]). Paraklētos means advocate, intercessor and spokesperson. Its first meaning, therefore, strictly speaking, was not juridical; the one who has been called upon must defend and help the one accused (Demosthenes, Oratio 19, 1; Diogenes L. 4, 50), but it did not become a technical term like the Latin noun advocatus.

The term is absent from the Septuagint; *Philo of *Alexandria applied it to an intercessor before other men (In Flacc. 13, 151 and 181) and before God (GLNT 9, 682-683 [TWNT 5, 801]). In the NT, it is used only five times in *John's writings. Jesus Christ the righteous is the paraclete before the Father for sinners (1 Jn 2:1: "we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous"). Alongside Jesus, the Father will send another paraclete (Jn 14:16: "I will pray the Father, and he will give you another [paraclete] to be with you forever"). The *Holy Spirit, the other paraclete, is a teacher of truth for the disciples (Jn 14:26: "but the [paraclete], the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and will bring to remembrance all that I have said to you"); he will bear witness to Christ (Jn 15:26: "when the [paraclete] comes, whom I shall send to you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father, he will bear witness to me"). Christ himself will send the paraclete to continue his mission in the world (Jn 16:7: "it is to your advatage that I go away, for if I do not go away, the [paraclete] will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you"). Jesus identifies the paraclete with the Holy Spirit. In many languages, the term paraclete is often translated as "comforter," which does not fully convey the meaning of the word as found in John's text, because "neither Jesus nor the Spirit is described as a 'comforter'" (TWNT 5, 802; TDNT 5, 804]).

The *Fathers interpreted the term paraclete, when applied to Jesus, as "intercessor" (Clement Alex., Quis dives 25,7); for *Origen, Christ is the intercessor (Comm. in Ioh. 1,33; De princ. 2,7,4). In addition to this meaning applied to the Holy Spirit, paraclete was often understood as "comforter" (Eus. Caes., De ecc. theol. 3,5,11-12.; John Chrys., Hom. in Ioh. 75: PG 59, 403). The Latin translations of the Bible at times rendered the term paraklētos with the simple transliteration paraclitus, while other translations used advocatus and consolator. This phenomenon was very important for the Fathers' use and explanations of the term. *Tertullian understood the term paraclete as advocatus, thus preserving the juridical aspect (De ieiun. 13: Paraclitus id est advocatus; De monog. 3), but other Latin Fathers also understood it as comforter (e.g., Hilary, Tr. in Ps. 125,7; Jerome, Ep. 120,9). *Hilary himself at times understood it as advocatus (De trinitate 8,19: cum advenerit advocatus ille); *Augustine affirmed paracletus enim latine dicitur advocatus (Tr. in Ioh. 74,4); he even specifies: consolator ergo ille vel advocatus (utrumque interpretatur quod est graece paracletus) (Aug., Tr. in Ioh. Ev. 94,2). The terminological question was only partially connected to the development of the doctrine of the *Holy Spirit.

GLNT 9, 675-715 (TWNT 5, 798-812; TDNT 5, 800-814); Lampe, 1018-19; A. Casurella, The Johannine Paraclete in the Church Fathers, Tübingen 1983; E. Franck, Revelation Taught. The Paraclete in the Gospel of John, Lund-Malmö 1985; S.J. Bulgakov, Il Paraclito, Bologna 1987; G. Ferraro, Il Paraclito, Cristo, il Padre nel quarto Vangelo, Vatican City 1997; Id., Lo Spirito e Cristo nel commento al quarto Vangelo e nel trattato trinitario di sant'Agostino, Vatican City 1997; L. Dattrino - G. Di Nola, Lo Spirito Santo nella testimonianza dei Padri e degli scrittori cristiani (I-V sec.), Rome 1999; D. I. Rankin, Tertullian's Vocabulary of the Divine "Individuals" in "Adversus Praxean": SE 40 (2001) 5-46; R. Uglione, Tertulliano. Teologo e scrittore, Brescia 2002.

A. Di Berardino

PARADISE. From the Avestan word pairi-daēza, "enclosed park," from which come the Late-Babylonian term pardisu and the Hebrew word pardes. The latter term appears in the OT in Neh 2:8 and Song 4:13 with the meaning of "orchard, forest." The Septuagint translated it with παράδεισος, a term Xenophon used to refer to the park of the Persian kings: Cyrus himself showed the paradise of Sardi to Lisander, which he himself measured and laid out acc. to aesthetical principles, and in which he also personally planted some trees (Oecon. IV, 20-21). The Septuagint gave this term a religious meaning, extending it also to the account of Gen 2:3, whence, at last, the term paradisus entered the Vulgate. In intertestamental *Judaism, the Garden of Eden became the repose of the *souls of the blessed, the patriarchs and the visionaries. It thus affirms the idea that the original paradise, today hidden, will return visibly at the end of time, a conception that finds its parallel in certain passages in the NT (Lk 23:43; 2 Cor 12:4 and Rev 2:7). St. Paul's writing reveals the tension between the eschatological goal and our heavenly dimension in the here and now, which we can summarize with his famous statement: "But our citizenship is in heaven, and from it we await a Savior" (Phil 3:20). For this tension in Paul's eschatology, see A.T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet: Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul's Thought with Special Reference to His Eschatology, Cambridge 1981.

In the writings of the Fathers, the term acquired a plurality of meanings to designate the definitive place where the eschatological destiny of the blessed would be fulfilled: the bosom of Abraham where they will rest; the heavenly *Jerusalem destined to receive them; the blessed life and its location, heaven, frequently identified with the paradise of Eden. Thus, *Cyprian (Ad Fort. XII) recalls during the time of persecution that if death takes us from this deceitful earth, it does so in order to transport us to paradise, the kingdom of heaven. *Basil used the two nouns heaven and paradise interchangeably. Moreover, using the cosmology of the time, he was the first to establish the origin and the particular nature of this paradisiacal heaven. Paradise, he maintained, is the highest heaven that defies every definition; it possesses a radiant brilliance and was created to receive angelic natures and make the friends of God blessed (Hom. I in Hex. V). *Cyril of Jerusalem, to the contrary, maintains that heaven is made up of water, the most beautiful element (Cat. III; De bapt. 5). Furthermore, one must recognize, he maintains, the multiplicity of heavens: only the third, to which St. Paul ascended, is to be identified with paradise (Cat. XIV; De res. 26). Even *Augustine places this location of the blessed in the apogee of the heavens (illud summum coelum: De Gen. ad litt. XII, 35), which coincides with Abraham's bosom or paradise (In Jn. 91; Serm. 280,5), even if it should not be confused with the angels' heaven (Serm. 26, 5; and Enchir. 73). Moreover, if paradise were indistinct from heaven, where else could it be located (Enarr. in Ps. XXX 3, 8)? Ultimately, the same reality is hidden behind all these various names, i.e., the place of the blessed (De Gen. ad litt. XII, 34, 65). In conclusion, facing the more pressing demands to locate it, Augustine concluded that after this life, God himself will be the place where our souls will rest (Enarr. in Ps. XXX, 3, 8).

Augustine's difficulties inevitably reflect the wavering of the *Fathers on determining the location of paradise. *Irenaeus of Lyons, e.g., distinguished heaven from paradise, the heaven of the holy city (Adv. haeres. V, 36, 1), because unequal merits produce an inequality of rewards. *Ephrem the Syrian sought to add some specificity: the admission of the saints into the kingdom of heaven will take place only after the *resurrection of the dead. The souls of the blessed, in the meantime, wait in heaven, not in the highest part of glory but in Eden, and that is in the heaven of paradise (Carmina nisibena LXXIII, ed. Bickell, Leipzig 1866, 222-223; Éphrem de Nisibe, Hymnes sur le Paradis, Fr. tr. R. Lavenant, intr. and comm. F. Graffin, Paris 1968 [SC 137]).

These differences, however, did not affect the images depicting the content of life in paradise during the afterlife, for which we find significant testimonies even in *epigraphy and *iconography. Already, the Apostolic Fathers recalled the reward that awaits the heirs of the kingdom: they will be allowed to seek Christ and live in communion with him (Barn. VII, 11); in the future, this reward will result in infinite happiness (Clem. Rome, 1 Cor. XXXIV, 7-8). The writings of *Ignatius are replete with this idea: to be blessed with God (θεοῦ ἐπιτυχεῖν: ad Rom. IV, 1; ad Eph. X, 1), the enjoyment of God that will be mediated through Jesus Christ. These themes are also at the heart of the passions and the martyrologies. The *martyrs of *Lyons yearned to be with Christ immediately to receive the crown of immortality (Eus., HE 5, 1). Saturus (Passio Perp. et Fel. XI) had a vision of the heights of heaven, toward the east, seeing an immense space resembling a blooming garden. Heaven thus appears to the martyrs as a promised paradise, a luminous place of rest and *peace.

Subsequent theologians elaborated upon these images. *Origen's description was significant. He mentions that the place of the blessed life, wherever it may be, is above the firmament and is a world of true light in which it will be possible to dwell thanks to the glorious bodies the redeemed will possess at the resurrection (C. Cels. III, 42). When the redeemed reach this heaven, they will learn from God the true causes of events and will subsequently know invisible and ineffable things. At the end of this process, they will be pure intelligences capable of directly contemplating rational substances (De princ. II, 11, 7; on the question of the presence of a spiritual body for the blessed in paradise or of the total absence of the body, the possibility of which is left open by Origen, see the recent investigation by M.J. Edwards, Origen Against Plato, Aldershot 2002). Origen's controversial theory of the apokatastasis* maintains, moreover, that paradise will be understood at the end of time; all beings, even the enemy par excellence, called death, i.e., the devil, will no longer be an enemy and death inasmuch as he will be oriented toward the good, because, as St. Paul affirms in 1 Cor 15:28, "everything will be subject to Christ" and "God will be all in all" (De princ. I, 6,2 and 4; III, 5,6-8; 6,1-6; see M. Simonetti, Origene. I Principi, Turin 1968, 59, 71 and passim). In fact, "nothing is impossible for the Almighty, and nothing is incurable for the Creator" (De princ. I, 6,5; see also Hom. in Ier. I, 16; C. Cels. VIII, 72).

The issue of the deification of the blessed, the nature of the spiritual body and its relation to the earthly body, its duties and its functions was a privileged theme of reflection for the Fathers. *Lactantius, e.g., emphasizes the transformation that will take place in our faculties, which will be adapted to the new conditions of our heavenly residence (Div. Inst. VII, 26). *Ambrose favors the mystical theme of the elect's union with each other and with God (De ob. Th. XXIX). *Eusebius of Caesarea describes the soul of *Constantine as dressed in the splendor of light as it is being reunited to God, with his gaze fixed upon the heavenly vault (De vita Const. 1,2). The Cappadocians used vivid images to describe life in paradise. *Basil of Caesarea maintained that after the resurrection the elect will contemplate God directly (Hom. in Ps. XXXIII, 11). He compares the calm and infinite joy of this contemplation with the unforeseen rapturous moments of ecstasy that one can experience in this life (ibid. XXXII, 1). For *Gregory of Nazianzus, our joy will consist in contemplating the *Trinity; this will be possible because we will become children of God (Or. XXIV, 9). This theme returns in the thought of *Gregory of Nyssa: in addition to immortality, our nature will find itself clothed with other divine qualities such as glory, power and perfection (De an. et res.: PG 46, 156ff.). The descriptions that some Eastern Fathers offered were full of detail. *Aphraates, e.g., maintained that the air of those sublime regions will be infinitely sweet, fitting for glorious bodies clothed with eternal light and nourished by the divinity. An eternal spring is destined to cause the marvelous trees planted by the Lord to flourish in a garden without limits and boundaries (Dem. VIII, De res. mort. 22: PS 1, 402).

For Augustine, lastly, our moral perfection and our final happiness will consist in knowing and loving the divine Trinity; this is the blessedness awaiting the angels and the redeemed (De Trin. VIII, 4-8). All this will be possible thanks to the eyes of the risen and transfigured body (Civ. Dei XXII, 29, 3-6). The greatest joy will consist in praising God. There will be degrees of honor based upon merit, but there will be no jealousy. The saints will continue to use their free will and will finally lack the ability to commit *sin. Eternal life for the redeemed will be a perpetual *sabbath in which they will be brimming with blessing and sanctification from God. Thus will the words of the psalmist be fulfilled: "be still and know that I am God" (Civ. Dei XXII, 30, 1-4).

DTC 2 2474-2511 (Ciel); RGG[3] 5, 96-98 (Paradies. II im AT); J. Goubert - L. Cristiani, Les plus beaux textes sur l'au-delà, Paris 1950; H. Bietenhard, Die himmlische Welt in Urchristentum und Spätjudentum, WUNT 2, Tübingen 1951; J.Ph. McClain, The Doctrine of Heaven in the Writings of Saint Gregory the Great, Studies in Sacred Theology. Second series 95, Washington, DC 1956; G.L. Rossi, Teologia dell'oltretomba. Paradiso, Turin 1957; G.M. Colombás, Paraíso y Vida Angélica. Sentido escatológico de la vocación cristiana, Barcelona 1958; I. Colosio, Inchiesta teologica sul Paradiso e saggi storico-bibliografici sulla visione beatifica, Florence 1964; MySal XI, Brescia 1978; J.L. Ruiz de la Peña, La otra dimensión, Madrid [2]1975 (ch. VII: La vida eterna) (It. tr. Assisi 1981); A. Orbe, Cristología gnóstica. Introducción a la soteriología de los siglos II y III, I-II, Biblioteca de autores cristianos 384-385, Madrid 1976; J. Magne, From Christianity to Gnosis and from Gnosis to Christianity: An Itinerary Through the Texts to and from the Tree of Paradise, Brown Judaic Studies 286, Atlanta 1993; J.B. Russell, Storia del Paradiso, Rome-Bari 1996; G.P. Luttikhuizen, ed., Paradise Interpreted: Representations of Biblical Paradise in Judaism and Christianity, Proceedings of the Congress: Groningen 1999 (Themes in Biblical Narrative 2), Leiden 1999; J. Delumeau, Quel che resta del Paradiso, It. tr. Milan 2001.

On the Zoroastrian understanding of paradise: The Book of the Mainyo-I-Khard, Stuttgart-London 1871; The Book of Arda Viraf, Bombay-London 1872. On the iconography of paradise: Ph. Camby, Le paradis et les naïfs, Paris 1983; W.A. McClung, Dimore celesti. L'architettura del Paradiso, Intersezioni 33, Bologna 1987. On the relation between paradise and earthly paradise: A. Graf, Miti, leggende e superstizioni del Medio Evo, Turin 1925; R.R. Grimm, Paradisus coelestis, Paradisus terrestris. Zur Auslegungsgeschichte des Paradieses im Abendland bis um 1200, Medium Aevum: philologische Studien 33, Munich 1977; P. Giovetti, Inchiesta sul paradiso, Milan 1986; J. Delumeau, Une Histoire du Paradis. Le jardin des délices, Paris 1992, It. tr. Storia del Paradiso: il giardino delle delizie, Bologna 1994; P. Morris - D. Sawyer (eds.), A Walk in the Garden: Biblical, Iconographical and Literary Images of Eden, Journal for the Study of the Old Testament, Suppl. 136, Sheffield 1992; T. Stordalen, Echoes of Eden: Genesis 2–3 and Symbolism of the Eden Garden in Biblical Hebrew Literature, Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 25, Leuven 2000, with an extensive bibl. on pp. 493-560.

G. Filoramo -I Ramelli

PARALYTIC, Healing of the (iconography). The gospels narrate the healing of the paralytics performed by Christ in various places and conditions: the first occurred at Capernaum (Mt 9:1-8; Mk 2:3-12; Lk 5:18-26), the second, in the environs of the pool of Bethesda by the sheep gate (Jn 5:1-9). Very frequently already in the ancient repertoire and in the depictions found in the catacombs, the story from the gospels is generally synthesized into one sole image: the paralytic leaves with his pallet on his shoulders in obedience to Christ's command: "rise, take up your pallet, and walk" (see, e.g., fresco of the Chapel of the Sacraments A3 in the *cemetery of Callistus, which provides one of its most ancient testimonies: Wp 27, 3). Often the image of the paralytic is placed alongside a baptismal scene to emphasize the symbolic nexus between the healing of the paralytic and the remission of *sin. There are a few painted examples in which the healed paralytic is standing alongside Christ (and among these, the most important of these is the baptistery of *Dura Europos, from the second quarter of the 3rd c.: see C.H. Kraeling, The Christian Building: The Excavations at Dura Europos. Final report VIII. 2, New Haven 1967, pl. 18); this is very different from what one finds on funerary reliefs, where the figure of the Redeemer is in the act of speaking the word or laying on hands (impositio manus), and even frequently one or more of the disciples become an essential part of the depiction. Entirely lacking in the *paintings and the images on the sarcophagi is the slightest hint of the place or circumstance that would allow one to identify which of Christ's healings of a paralytic is being depicted. The focus centers on the figure of the paralytic as a paradigm of Christ's saving power and a symbol of the trust placed in such power.

One exception is offered by the depiction of the miracle on *sarcophagi that are often called the "Bethesda-type," esp. rich in details, of which many elements depend upon *John's text: the episode is represented through two images, one placed above the other, divided by a wavy stripe that is intended to represent the water of the pool near the sheep gate; at the bottom, the paralytic, surrounded by other sick people, is still laid out on his pallet as Christ is approaching him; toward the top, next to the Lord, who is in the act of issuing his command, the healed paralytic walks away with a pallet on his shoulders (see, for instance, among the more complete depictions, the example provided by sarcophagus 125 of the Museo Pio Cristiano, dating to the last quarter of the 4th c. = Rep. no. 63).

Among the *mosaics, one should note the splendid representation found in the basilica of S. Apollinare at *Ravenna from the 6th c. (Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken, pl. 175-176). Though less frequent than in painting and funerary reliefs, the miracle of the paralytic is present even in the repertoire of the iconography of the so-called minor arts: golden glass (Morey - Ferrari, Gold-Glass, nos. 159, 347, 366, 448; Kötzsche, Age of Spirituality, p. 442 no. 401); ceramics (Salomonson, Late Roman, 72-73; Kötzsche, ibid., p. 443 no. 402 [see other examples]); ivories (Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, nos. 113, 119, 125, 142, 152, 170, 179, 180, 181, 185, 221, 233, 234) and metalwork (Volbach, Metallarbeiten, p. 38, pl. 7).

DACL 13, 1615-1626; EC 9, 806-808; Wp, 201ff.; Ws II, 293ff.; E. Baldwin Smith, Early Christian Iconography and School of Ivory Carvers in Provence, Princeton, NJ 1918, 102ff.; W.F. Volbach, Metallarbeiten des christlichen Kultus in der Spätantike and frühen Mittelalter, Mainz 1921; M. Simun, Sur l'origine des sarcophages chrétiens du type Béthesda: MEFRA 55 (1938) 207ff.; F. Gerke, Die christlichen Sarkophage der vorkonstantinischen Zeit, Berlin 1940, 216ff.; L. de Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancien: RivAC 20 (1943) 113-266; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike and frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [2]1952; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten and Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958; C.R. Morey - G. Ferrari, The Gold-Glass Collection of the Vatican Library with Additional Catalogues of Other Gold-Glass Collections, Vatican City 1959; J.W. Salomonson, Late Roman Earthenware with Relief Decoration Found in Northern Africa and Egypt: Oudheidkundige Mededelingen 43 (1962) 72-73.; R. Giordani, Di un singolare rilievo funerario cristiano del Museo Archeologico Nazionale di Cagliari: RivAC 52 (1976) 171-184; L. Kötzsche, in Age of Spirituality. Late Antique and Early Christian Art: Third to Seventh Century, New York 1979; A. Nicoletti, I sarcofagi di Bethesda, Milan 1981; F. Monfrin, La guérison du serviteur (Jn. 4,43-54). Une nouvelle interprétation des sarcophages de Béthesda: MEFRA 97 (1985) 979-1012; M. Minasi: TIP 241-243; B. Outtier, Dialogue du paralytique avec le Christ, in Écrits apocryphes chrétiens. II, Paris 2005, 61-74.

M. Marinone

PARAPETASMA. The Greek term παραπέτασμα, corresponding to the Latin cortinae, vela or antependia, is generally used to refer to the curtains that, as early as the 3rd c., are found with a certain frequency on *pagan and Christian sarcophagi, on the back of the busts of the departed or praying figures (orantes), on the center of the front, the side panels or on the lid. At times, these drapes are supported at the ends by two figures (erotes, genii, victories), as, e.g., on the lid of the so-called Albani sarcophagus from S. Sebastiano (Ws 40 = Rep. 241), but in the majority of cases these are just hanging with flamboyant nodes on the upper corners (see, e.g., Ws 98, 1 = Rep. 73 and Rep. 76). The purpose of the parapetasma is not entirely clear; nevertheless, scholars believe that it was a symbol that generically alluded to the afterlife. According to Bovini, this can probably be seen in relation to the curtains used in the funerary ceremonies, but its genuine function was probably lost over time. The parapetasma thus became a simple ornament for enlivening and enriching the background behind some figures (in the so-called sarcophagus of *Plotinus, the parapetasma occupies the entire front). Cumont's theory, however, did not find much acceptance. His theory saw in the parapetasma the presence of certain apocryphal Hebrew texts, acc. to which the good spirits would cover the deceased with a radiant garment (restored with the parapetasma) to carry it to heaven. The veils that appear on the *mosaics of public or private buildings (e.g., *Theodoric's palatium at S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna) and the so-called minor arts (see the scene of Christ in the act of teaching in the reliquary of Brescia) have an entirely different meaning connected to an actual use.

DAGR 9, 670-677; G. Rodenwaldt, Cortinae. Ein Beitrag zur Datierung der antiken Vorlage der mittelalterlichen Terenzillustrationen: NGWG (1925) 33-49; F. De Ruyt, Études de symbolisme funéraire: Bulletin de l'Institut historique Belge de Rome 17 (1936) 143-185; F. Cumont, Lux perpetua. Recherches sur le symbolisme funéraire des Romains, Paris 1942, 476; G. Bovini, I sarcofagi paleocristiani, Vatican City 1949, 57-58; Volbach – Hirmer, figs. 85-86, p. 75; F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958, figs. 107-109; D. Mazzoleni, s.v. Parapetasma: TIP 243.

D. Mazzoleni

PARAPHRASES, BIBLICAL and HAGIOGRAPHICAL

I. Biblical - II. Hagiographical.

Scholars use the term paraphrase (biblical and hagiographical) to refer to the literary genre associated with, on the one hand, the broad production of biblical content, which spans Late Antique, medieval and modern European literary culture (from *Juvencus to Vida, Tasso, Milton, Klopstock and others) and, on the other hand, the less broad, but no less significant, poetic production of hagiographical content that spans above all, but not only, Byzantine literary culture. With respect to "biblical (or hagiographical) poetry," which is a rather generic term, if not completely ambiguous (Krüger, Kartschoke), and with respect to "biblical epos (or hagiographical)" (Wehrli, Hergoz, Kirsch), which is a label that does not suit all poetic compositions (the hexameter being insufficient to qualify them tout court as epics!, our use of "paraphrase (biblical and hagiographical)," established on the notion of a reworking of the biblical stories and the Lives of the saints, is more appropriate for identifying literary compositions that have for more than a millennium preserved the distinctive traits of the genre, even though changing some constituent techniques and altering their religious and edifying significance. Paraphrase, which as a term in modern literature has outlasted rival terms from ancient rhetoric such as metaphrase, metabolē or periphrase, designates every type of composition that involves the transcoding of one language into another, or rather, within the language itself, from one style to another, from one meter to another, from poetry to prose and vice versa.

Important texts on classical paraphrases are Aelius Theo (Progymn. 1, CUF 1997, 1-9) and Quintillian (1,9,2 and 10,5,4-5). Theo believed that reading, listening and paraphrase were three exercises for the initial classical program: reading prepares for oratorical action (actio); listening prepares for written composition, enriching vocabulary; paraphrasing teaches the art of formulating ideas through four principal means: the arrangement of elements, addition, subtraction and substitution. For Quintillian the paraphrase preceded the exercise of literary composition. In 1,9,2, he dwells at length on the phases of this exercise: "the first task (of the students) will be the transposition of verses (of Aesop's fables) in prose (versus primo solvere), then an explanation with different words (mox mutatis verbis interpretari) and lastly a rather free paraphrase (tum paraphrasi audacius vertere), which allows one to summarize the text and embellish it without offending the meaning." And in 10,5,4, after having emphasized the usefulness of translation from Greek into Latin, he claims that just as useful is the conversio ex Latinis, which is not a translation from Latin, as has been demonstrated, but the paraphrase of a Latin model, and he adds: Neque ego paraphrasin esse interpretationem tantum uolo, sed circa eosdem sensus certamen atque aemulationem ("and I do not want the interpretation to be a mere paraphrase, but a struggle in emulation with respect to the meaning"; 10,5,5). In sum, the paraphrasis should not be reduced to a mere interpretatio: the latter, inasmuch as it is a translation, aims at faithfulness to the sense; the former, inasmuch as it is an aemulatio, belongs to the sphere of literary autonomy.

In the same way, *Jerome (in the prologue on 1 Kings) contrasts the interpres, who in the translation treats the text with respect, with the paraphrastes, who when interpreting takes many liberties with the text, and he specifies elsewhere (In Is. 17,64,4-5) that the paraphrase is not a literal transposition of a singular term, but an adaptation to the sense. The paraphrastic exercise—about whose utility in the sphere of eloquence Cicero expresses a certain amount of hesitancy (De orator. 1, 34, 154)—was practiced above all in prose. Mythological and historical themes (progymnasmata), often taken from poetry, were treated in prose during *Augustine's time (Conf. 1,17,27) and later on appear in *Ennodius's dictiones. The biblical and the hagiographical paraphrase reconnect to the ancient rhetorical paraphrase (in prose), the former of which were composed in the epic verse of Homer and Virgil, but also—a certain type in the Byzantine milieu—in iambics. To trace the lines of development and to demarcate the characteristics of the Christian paraphrase of paraphrastic poetry, which reached its apex in the 4th-5th c., would require reviewing the history of the biblical epos, which presupposes both the interpretatio Christiana of the classical epic and the interpretatio epica of the Bible (Thraede).

The paraphrase can be attributed to a metatextual relationship (Genette), originating and developing from other texts (biblical or hagiographical), which are necessary presuppositions for understanding it. The understanding of paraphrase as a metatextual phenomenon facilitates one's understanding of both the individual works and, more generally speaking, this originally Christian poetical genre, which arose not from the mere juxtaposition of two distinct cultural traditions—the tradition of the Greco-Roman paraphrase and the Jewish-Christian tradition with its scriptural interpretation—but from their free and fruitful interaction.

I. Biblical. 1. Greek biblical paraphrases. The Hellenistic-Jewish milieu attests to the pre-Christian examples of OT hexametrical paraphrase. In this respect, *Eusebius of Caesarea preserved three fragments of *Philo the Elder's De Jerusalem (3rd c. BC), which imitates Lyocophron and Euphorion (Praep. ev. IX, 20, 24, 37), and one from Theodotus's De Judaeis (2nd c. BC), which Homerizes Gen 33 and 34 (ibid. IX, 22).

The first biblical paraphrase among Greek-speaking Christians was the Ecclesiastes of Solomon and *Gregory Thaumaturgus (PG 10, 987-1018), which puts the biblical books of the Septuagint translation into classical prose. According to *Socrates (HE 3, 16) and *Sozomen (HE 5, 18), the Christian poetical genre of paraphrase began in a Greek context, less than a century earlier, in 362, as a response to the edict of *Julian against Christian teachers. Immediately the Apollinarises (father and son, the latter to become the future heretic) went to work for Christian learning: the father put the five books of Moses to verse for didactic purposes (hexameters, but also tragic trimeters and Pindaric meters); the son rewrote the gospels in the form of Platonic dialogues. The Metaphrases of the Psalter of Apollinaris (who was neither the heretic nor one of the two from the crisis created by Julian), however, is to be dated around 460 or shortly thereafter. The author, probably an Egyptian religious who came to *Constantinople for political-doctrinal reasons, justifies recourse to epic verse by appealing to the need to recover the formal-metric dignity of the Hebrew Psalter, which was lost in the Greek translation of the Septuagint, for which reason Ptolemy preferred prose to poetry, and, to prepare an apologetic instrument for answering the *pagans (see Protheoria 15-23 Golega): the translatability of the Psalms can be achieved through Homeric language, which was also created by God as a language of song. The metaphrase that has come down to us slavishly follows the sacred text, replaces every stich of the Psalms with a hexameter and is orthodox in every respect. Also datable to the same time, the Paraphrase (Metabolē) of the Gospel of St. John, often claimed to be by *Nonnus of Panopolis, the author of the Dionysiaca. The Metabolē, a giant summa in 48 songs, expands John's text and rereads it acc. to *Cyril of Alexandria's exegesis.

2. Latin biblical paraphrases. Paraphrases of the Bible in the Latin world, which are mostly written in hexameters, took on a surprising variety of characteristics and forms: at one point a faithful transcription, respectful of the order of facts in their logical succession and averse to rhetorical amplification; at another point a free rehandling of the text (retractatio), enlivened by digressions or embellished by passages of doctrinal exegesis. By using a manner more or less emulative of Virgil, the paraphrase bestowed on the sacred text a colored epic and Romanized it. For the entry Epos in the RAC, Thraede delineated a morphological and typological map of the Christian epos and, therefore, also amorous biblical paraphrastic poetry in the Latin language, marking the various compositions. Even if at times these definitions emphasize only one—and not always the most important—of the aspects of these rather complex works, Thraede's work remains a laudable attempt at systematization.

The NT paraphrase in hexameters is represented by the Spanish presbyter Juvencus, who, at the request of *Constantine's religious political program, composed the Euangeliorum libri IV between 329 and 330, a rather literal hexametric rewriting of the gospels. Another representative is Sedulius, an author living in the 2nd half of the 4th c. who wrote the Paschale carmen in five books, the first of which is devoted to the OT, and the Paschale opus, which is a paraphrase of the Carmen in a prose heavily subject to rhetoric and which began the opus geminatum, i.e., the composition of the same work in prose and in verses by the same author, who would enjoy much success in the Middle Ages (*Bede, Alcuin). Still other representatives include the subdeacon *Arator, who wrote the metric version of the Acts of the Apostles in 544 at St. Peter's in Rome, and *Severus of Malaga (end of the 6th c.), probably the author of the Metrum in Evangelia in 12 books, a fragment of 717 hexameters of which have survived from books VIII-X.

In the area of the OT paraphrase (and in particular Genesis) Thraede distinguishes the following: (a) the historical-grammatical paraphrase (Paraphrase): the anonymous works De Sodoma and De Jona, *Hilary's De martyrio Maccabeorum, *Victorinus's De Maccabeis and *Cyprian the poet's Heptateuch; (b) the rhetorical-didactic paraphrase (Paraphrase): ps.-Hilary's Metrum in Genesin and *Claudius Marius Victorius's Alethia; (c) the elegiac-hymnic reelaboration (Umdichtung): *Dracontius's Laudes Dei; (d) the lyrical-dramatic reelaboration (Umdichtung): *Avitus's work De spiritalis historiae gestis.

Through the terminological distinction between Paraphrase and Umdichtung, this survey also shows how the term "biblical epos," if its definition is confined only to the use of traditional heroic verse, cannot be applied to all the various works of biblical paraphrase: Proba's centos from Virgil, for instance, which sings of the creation of the world and the life of Christ, would remain inexplicable outside the category of epos. Neither could epos accommodate *Paulinus of Nola, who, after having experimented with abbreviating Suetonius's work De regibus (poem III is a fragment of it), paraphrased Luke 1:5-80 in poem VI, creatively sketching the person of *John the Baptist; and in poems VII (in iambic trimeters), VIII and IX, respectively, paraphrased Psalms 1, 2 and 136.

II. Hagiographical. 1. Greek hagiographical paraphrases. The interrelationship between biblical paraphrase and hagiographical paraphrase is tied to the relationship of continuity that exists between their two hypotexts: Scripture and hagiographical literature. The latter appeared to be a practical exegesis of the former. The relationship between hagiography and Scripture is clearly affirmed by *Sulpicius, who at the end of his Life (2,468-472) claims for his writings the same faith the Christian owes to the Word of God, and in the Dialogues (1, 26, 5) he affirms that not believing in the miracles performed by *Martin is equivalent to denying the gospel. The saints are the successors of the people in the Bible, so that as a result their acts (gesta) are the natural extension of the acts (gesta) of the biblical heroes. *Venantius, in the prologue for the first book of his poem on Martin (vv. 10-25), presents himself as the heir of the biblical paraphrasers and makes known the desire to insert himself within that poetic tradition, bearing witness in this manner that even hagiography with its narration of the actions of the saints, who are similar to the people in the Bible, could and must be celebrated in a lofty form. In paraphrasing, they actualize their text and allow it to bear fruit in various contexts of space and time: their work extends the model of biblical paraphrase and contributes as much to spreading among their contemporaries the knowledge of the virtutes of the saint as to edifying the general public of the faithful. The demands for form and edification coexist in both the Greek and Latin hagiographical paraphrases. The use of the poetical paraphrase of nonbiblical texts must have been very widespread in Late Antiquity, between the 5th and 6th c., if Venantius proposed to *Gregory to put his collection of St. Martin's miracles into verse (vita Mart. epist. ad Greg. 2) and Gregory concluded the Historia Francorum (10, 31) with the recommendation that his successors not delete or rewrite his books, but that they leave them intact just as they have received them. For the most part, others could put a certain part into verse if they wished, while leaving the actual work unchanged.

The Greek hagiographical paraphrase is represented by two writers of the 5th c.: (1) the empress *Eudoxia, the author, among other things, of a short hexametrical poem, commonly referred to by the title Martyrium sancti Cypriani, a poetical version of this event enriched by fictitious and edifying details of three documents originating from various authors and relating to the legend of Cyprian the Magician, and (2) ps.-Basil of Seleucia, the author of a work in prose in two books On the Life and Miracles of St. Thecla. The first book is a reworking of the Acts of Paul and Thecla, dating to the 2nd c.; it has been embellished and expanded with long speeches; the second book contains 31 miracles connected to the sanctuary and is interesting for the history of the city of *Seleucia and Christian pilgrimages. The two books are preceded by a preface, in which the author makes known the criteria used for composing his paraphrastic work.

2. Latin hagiographical paraphrases. Following the Old Testament paraphrases in the aforementioned classification of Thraede are the metrical paraphrases of the lives of the saints built on prose as found in *Paulinus of Périgueux (but missing from *Venantius Fortunatas) and the autobiographical paraphrase as represented by the Eucharisticos of *Paulinus of Pella, which replaces the panegyristic gratiarum actio.

The most significant instance in Late Antiquity of the hexametrical rewriting of hagiographic works is certainly the work relating to the hagiography for St. Martin, which begins with *Sulpicius Severus, the author of the Vita Martini, published in 397, a few months before the death of the bishop. Then in the three letters sent between 397 and 398 to Eusebius, Aurelius and his mother-in-law, Bassula, he describes the edifying death of the bishop and the triumphal transference of his bodily remains to Tours, where they were buried in a humble grave. Six years later, Sulpicius commissioned Gallus, a monk of Marmoutier, to extract a selection of miracles from the deeds of Martin's life. At random and without any concern for chronology or composition, he collected thirty-some accounts of his marvelous deeds and presented them to Sulpicius, who placed them under the form of dialogues, setting them into three periods.

Thirty years after his death, Martin had at the place of his burial a sanctuary—thanks to his successor Britius (398–442)—which became the point of departure for the cult that would grow under the joint action of the high clergy and the pilgrims, along with the art, literature and iconography that were both a catalyst for and a testimony to the popular devotion. The sixth bishop of the city, *Perpetuus (459–488/489), replaced the first sanctuary with a gorgeous basilica, erected in the suburbium, for the consecration of which (4 July 471 or 472) he requested that Paulinus of Périgueux and *Sidonius Apollinaris write epigrams for the decoration of the walls. He himself composed a collection of 11 miracles worked by Martin, made known by an oral witness after his death.

Between 463 and 470 (a few decades after the aforementioned Greek hagiographical paraphrases) the Life and Dialogues of Martin were paraphrased into the meter of the classical epic by Paulinus, son of an orator of Périgueux, within the framework of the religious propaganda undertaken by Perpetuus, probably encouraged by Paulinus of Nola's in honor of St. Felix, Carmina Natalicia, and, a century later, by Venantius Fortunatus, upon the request of *Gregory, the bishop of Tours, the dedicatee of the poem, or, more likely, upon the petition of Agnes and *Radegund, to whom he addressed the preface in elegiac distiches. Gregory of Tours, who begins the Historia Francorum with the creation of the world, and ends it, significantly, with the life of Martin, is credited with four books (in prose) De virtutibus sancti Martini Episcopi.

With his paraphrase in six books, at one point defined as a translatio (4, 1) and at another as transcripta oratio (5, 872-873), Paulinus of Périgueux completed an original and relevant literary work, transforming Sulpicius's account into an epic poem. Moreover, in a historical-religious context in which a defense of Martin was no longer necessary, he contributed to the development of the cult of St. Martin and the improvement of the Christian city of *Tours in harmony with the intentions and directions of *Perpetuus. If Paulinus's paraphrase pleased Perpetuus, as demonstrated by his thanks to the author and the invitation to compose a metrical inscription for the new church constructed at Tours in honor of the saint, that does not necessarily mean it satisfied the tastes of the readers. In contrast, Venantius, even before receiving a request from Gregory to put to verse the book De virtutibus s. Martini, composed the work De vita s. Martini in four books (2243 hexameters), to thank the saint for healing his eyes, a miracle he received through his intercession. In this work, Venantius devoted much attention to Martin's miracles because these would satisfy the needs of his contemporaries more than the widely known acts of the life of the saint. The work is preceded by Gregory's letter and a preface in elegiac distiches addressed to Radegund and Agnes and closes with the farewell at the end of the small book, which cites Horace (Epist. I, 20) and Ovid (Trist. 1,1). It also explains how the small book made it to *Ravenna, Italy: Venantius retraces the itinerary he completed years before his trip to *Gaul and invites his old sodales at Ravenna to recognize, through the compositions in Greek, the deeds of the saint in the East. A great personal success, Fortunatus naturally awaited the dissemination of the poem among the well-read people of Ravenna, where Martin was very popular.

General bibl.: G. Krüger, Die Bibeldichtung zur Ausgang des Altertums, Giessen 1919; M. Wehrli, Sacra Poesis: Bibelepik als europäische Tradition, in Festschrift für Friedrich Maurer, Stuttgart 1963, 262-283; D. Kartschoke, Bibeldichtung. Studien zur Geschichte der epischen Bibelparaphrase von Juvencus bis Otfrid von Weissenburg, Munich 1975; A. Pignani, Parafrasi o metafrasi (a proposito della 'Statua Regia' di Niceforo Blemmida): AAP 24 (1976) 219-225; Id., La parafrasi come forma d'uso strumentale: Jahrb. der Öster. Byz. 32 (1982) 21-32; J. McClure, The Biblical Epic and Its Audience in Late Antiquity, in F. Cairns (ed.), Papers of the Liverpool Latin Seminar 3 (1981) 305-321; G. Malsbary, Epic Exegesis and the Use of Vergil in the Early Biblical Poets: Florilegium 7 (1985) 53-83; D. J. Nodes, Doctrine and Exegesis in Biblical Latin Poetry, Leeds 1993; A.V. Nazzaro, Poesia biblica come espressione teologica: Fra tardoantico e altomedioevo, in F. Stella (ed.), La Scrittura infinita. Bibbia e poesia in età medievale e umanistica, Florence 2001, 119-153; J.-F. Cottier, La paraphrase latine, de Quintilien à Erasme: REL 80 (2002) 237-252; F.E. Consolino, Il senso del passato: Generi letterari e rapporti con la tradizione nella 'parafrasi biblica' latina, in I. Gualandri et al. (ed.), Nuovo e antico nella cultura greco-latina di IV-VI secolo, Milan 2005, 447-526; A.V. Nazzaro, Riscritture metriche di testi biblici e agiografici in cerca del genere negato: Auctores Nostri 4 (2006) 397-439.

On biblical paraphrases: S. Gamber, Le livre de la Genèse dans la poésie latine au V^e siècle, Paris 1899 (repr. Geneva 1977); J. Golega, Der homerische Psalter, Ettal 1960; K. Thraede, Epos: RAC 5, 983-1042; A.V. Nazzaro, La parafrasi salmica di Paolino di Nola, in Atti del Convegno. XXXI cinquantenario della morte di S. Paolino (431-1981), Rome 1983, 93-119; Id., La figura di Paolo nella Historia Apostolica di Aratore, in L. Padovese (ed.), Atti del VII Simposio di Tarso su S. Paolo Apostolo, Rome 2002, 227-251; Id., La poesia cristiana latina, in E. dal Covolo - M. Sodi (ed.), Il Latino e i Cristiani. Un bilancio all'inizio del terzo millennio, Vatican City 2002, 109-149 (by the same author, see the bibl. cited. under the entry Juvencus); R. Herzog, Die Bibelepik der lateinischen Spätantike. Formgeschichte einer erbaulichen Gattung, I, Munich 1975; W. Kirsch, Die lateinische Versepik des 4. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1989.

On hagiographical paraphrases: A.V. Nazzaro, L'agiografia martiniana di Sulpicio Severo e le parafrasi epiche di Paolino di Périgueux e Venanzio Fortunato, in M.L. Silvestre - M. Squillante (ed.), Mutatio rerum. Letteratura Filosofia Scienza tra tardo antico e altomedioevo, Naples 1997, 301-346; Id., La parafrasi agiografica nella tarda antichità, in G. Luongo (ed.), Scrivere di santi. Atti del II Convegno di studio dell'AISCA, Napoli, 22-25 ottobre 1997, Rome 1998, 69-106 (with bibl.); La Vita Martini di Sulpicio Severo e la parafrasi esametrica di Venanzio Fortunato, in Convegno Internazionale di Studio. Venanzio Fortunato e il suo tempo, Treviso 2003, 171-210.

A. Navarro

PARENESIS in the FATHERS. From the Greek παραίνεσις, "exhortation, recommendation, encouragement," the parenesis was a specific type of discourse present in the Greek, Latin and biblical world, in *Judaism and Christianity. In Greek culture, it appears in Hesiod's writings, who interchanged expressive modes of parenesis with pedantic and mythical modes (J. Kakridis, Hesiod: SIFC 10 [1992] 827-832). It likewise appears in Tyrtaeus's works, whose elegy on virtue, e.g., was completely parenetic, as H. Shey demonstrates (Tyrtaeus and the Art of Propaganda: Arethusa 9 [1976] 5-28); we see it again in Theognis, 549-554, and in Alcaeus, 140 V, who, describing perhaps a room used for a symposium furnished with weapons, lays out a warlike parenesis. This use of parenesis was rejected by Anacreon, esp. in his programmatic fr. 56 G. In philosophy, philosophers typically used parenesis in protreptic speeches, which, following the trail of Aristotle, invite people to pursue philosophy. These works would later have a notable influence on the Christian apologetic treatises and protreptic speeches; Cicero's lost protreptic speech was very important for *Augustine. But naturally, all of Greek philosophy, esp. ethics, had a parenetic objective inasmuch as it encouraged the pursuit of virtue as a means to happiness, and this was the case from the very beginning. In his philosophical poem, Parmenides, describing his trip from not knowing to knowing, offers a parenesis for philosophy (M. Tulli, L'esortazione di Parmenide al sapere: MD 31 [1993] 35-50). The philosophical parenesis was expressed in many forms, from treatises to letters—such as the Epicurean parenesis to Meneceus, which is a protreptic speech directed at all people—to the philosophical poems such as Lucretius's magnum opus, or Perseus's satires: discite, o miseri, et causas cognoscite rerum! Many specific genres, such as the consolationes, normally included parenetic aspects. Alongside philosophical parenesis, we also possess Galen's Protrettico alla medicina (ed. A. Barigazzi, Berlin 1991, CMG V 1,1).

In the OT one finds an occurrence of the term παραίνεσις, in Wisd 8:9 (LXX), but not one instance of the corresponding adjective or verb, although the different modes of prophetic and, above all, sapiential speech that pervade the books of the OT that are chronologically closer to the NT and more closely related to Hellenistic culture employ parenesis a great deal (B. Kelly, Retribution and Eschatology in Chronicles, Sheffield 1996). Parenesis was also one of the forms to which *Philo (an exponent of Hellenistic Judaism and adherent of Middle Platonism) had recourse; his preoccupation with ethical teaching was a constant theme even in his exegetical works (E. Trisoglio, Apostrofi, p. e preghiere in Filone, Turin 1964). The Greek Sibylline oracles, which entered into the Hebrew world beginning with the Hellenistic age, assumed a more noticeable tone of moral parenesis in keeping with a more lively eschatological tension (J. Collins, The Jewish Transformation of Sibylline Oracles, in Sibille e linguaggi oracolari, ed. I. Chirassi - T. Seppilli, Pisa 1998, 369-387): this pair is found in the NT, e.g., in 1 Thessalonians, and a good portion of the writings of the Fathers. In the NT, the analysis of which is crucial because patristic reflection was rooted in it, only the verb παραινέω appears, and not by chance does it occur exclusively in the Acts of the Apostles and only with *Paul as the subject (27:9, 22), when the apostle exhorts his shipmates on the voyage to Rome to take courage: the Vulgate renders it as consolabatur and suadeo.

In effect, in the NT it is Paul who, in the letters and in the speeches of the Acts of the Apostles, makes use of parenesis, from exhortation to consolation. In recent decades, a vast amount of literature has been produced on the various rhetorical aspects that Paul borrowed from Hellenistic culture (a detailed summary is in my chapter Philosophen und Prediger, in Dion von Prusa: Der Philosoph und seing Bild, ed. H.-G. Nesselrath, Tübingen 2009, ch. 4). H. Cruz devoted an exhaustive study to Paul's use of parenesis, which, he argues, employs many aspects from Greek ethics but establishes them upon Christ (Christological Motives and Motivated Actions in Pauline Parenesis, Frankfurt a.M. 1990). Several Pauline letters are esp. marked by the parenetic canons such as 1 Thessalonians, Galatians and 1 Corinthians. A. Malherbe (The Letters to the Thessalonians, New York 2000, 86 and passim) insists on the parenetic aspects of 1 Thessalonians, as does M. Konradt (Gericht und Gemeinde, Berlin 2003, 38 and passim); esp. in chs. 4-5, Paul focuses upon the consolatory and exhortatory aspect (R. Collins, The Function of Parenesis in 1 Thessalonians: EThL 74 [1998] 398-414). In Galatians, the parenetic section is in chs. 5-6, after the introduction, the exordium, the narratio, the propositio and the probatio, as H. Betz demonstrated (The Literary Composition and Function of Galatians: NTS 21 [1975] 353-379). One particular aspect of the parenesis of Galatians also involves the idea of "having clothed yourselves with Christ" (3:27) in *baptism, which is to be connected to the ceremony of the toga virilis, an occasion for moral exhortation, which in the Pauline equivalent develops in the parenesis on the responsible use of freedom (see J. A. Harrill, Coming of Age and Putting on Christ: NovT 44 [2002] 252-277). A particular element of the Pauline parenesis is the effective recourse to speech in the first person and to one's own example (see B.J. Dodd, Paul's Paradigmatic 'I', Sheffield 1999). Even Colossians and Ephesians, which have been commented upon by H. Hübner (Tübingen 1997), whose Pauline authorship has been contested by various critics, include clear parenetic sections, as argued for example by W. Wilson (Education and Exhortation in Colossians, Leiden 1997) and A. Bevere (Identity and the Moral Life in Colossians, Sheffield 2003).

In general, the pastoral letters do not lack hints of parenesis to the Christian communities, as R. Karris, e.g., observes (The Paraenetic Elements in the Pastoral Epistles: HTR 64 [1971] 572); this aspect also recurs in the epistolographic analysis of these letters (see W. Richards, Difference and Distance in Post-Pauline Christianity, New York 2002, in A. Merz, Die fiktive Selbstauslegung des Paulus, Göttingen 2004; R. Collins's commentary 1-2 Timothy and Titus, Louisville 2002; and Y. Redalié, Paul après Paul, Geneva 1994), which analyzes the aforementioned three epistles for ethical and soteriological themes. Elements of parenesis also esp. characterize Hebrews 13, which was written to exhort Jewish-Christians to the correct faith, which did not include Christ being possessed by an angel (see M. Goulder, Hebrews and the Ebionites: NTS 49 [2003] 393-406; V. Rhee, Faith in Hebrews, New York 2001). In addition, 1 Peter, considered one of the foundations of Christian parenesis (L. Thurén, Argument and Theology in 1 Peter, Sheffield 1995), and a particular form of parenesis, was intended to encourage submission to political authorities; such parenesis appears both here in 2:13-17, and in Rom 13:1-7, as G. Jossa observes (La sottomissione alle autorità: RivBib 44 [1996] 205-211). Many other parenetic aspects are found in James; see L. Perdue, Parenesis and James: ZNTW 72 (1981) 241-256, which studies the context and the social functions of parenesis and its formal structures in James, as well as D. Edgar, Has God Not Chosen the Poor? Sheffield 2001. Not only in the letters, but also in the gospels, one recognizes a parenetic structure, primarily in the sayings, speeches and parables, where the objective is to exhort one to virtue in view of the kingdom and, esp. in John, in view of the ζωὴ αἰώνιος—(for Luke's parables in particular, see J. Kilgallen, Luke 15.16: Biblica 78 [1997] 369-376). One can detect a parenetic prophetic form also in the proclamation to the seven churches of Revelation 2–3, a form that reuses the eyewitness speech related to salvation and judgment, mixing it with what was originally the genre used for the imperial edict (see D. Aune, The Proclamations to the Seven Churches: NTS 36 [1990] 182-204).

The parenetic intimations, already notably present in the NT, esp. in Paul's writings, reached extensive developments in patristic texts. The parenetic speech of exhortation and advice extends to various literary genres, from letters to homilies, from protreptic speeches to exegesis, the final end of which is instruction that does not remain at the purely theoretical level, but is always directed toward spiritual growth and, in the eschatological perspective, salvation. One of the most ancient examples of Christian parenesis is found in Clement of Rome's Letter to the Corinthians (see B. Bowe, A Church in Crisis, Minneapolis 1988). Between the 1st and the beginning of the 2nd c., the exhortations to *peace and reciprocal love, and to not incite external hostility, are probably Christian in the letter of Ammonius to Apollonius, two Egyptians (see my study Una delle più antiche lettere cristiane extra-canoniche?: Aegyptus 80 [2000] 169-188). In the Apostolic Fathers, the second part of the *Letter of Barnabas and the Didache* contain the parenetic theme of the Two Ways (V. Balabanski, Eschatology in the Making, Cambridge 1997); the Shepherd of *Hermas is heavily parenetical in substance, like many other types of literature, which, like the apocalypses, describe the rewards and punishments in the world to come, often not without Jewish influence (see the study on Jewish and Christian apocalyptic texts by R. Bauckham, The Fate of the Dead, Leiden 1998). The heavy influence of the Jewish parenesis on the Christian parenesis of the 2nd c. AD seems to be attested in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs*, composed in Greek and interpolated in the post-Nicene age (see J. Charlesworth, Reflections on the SNTS Pseudepigrapha Seminar at Duke: NTS 23 [1977] 296-304).

All of protreptic literature clearly has parenetic purposes, where the protreptic speech for philosophy becomes an invitation to adhere to Christianity, and it takes on forms such as protreptic speeches to martyrdom or chastity. *Clement of Alexandria's Protrepticus (ed. O. Stählin, Berlin 1972^{3}, GCS 12bis; ed. M. Galloni, Rome 1991; F. Migliore, Rome 2004) and Pedagogue, and perhaps the Stromata, are part of a larger project and are an invitation to Christian philosophy, acc. to a concept already apparent in *Justin Martyr's writings, for whom Christianity is the "divine philosophy." Furthermore, the works of the *apologists in general can be considered as a parenesis to conversion to the true Christian philosophy (see B. Pouderon, D'Athènes à Alexandrie . . . les origines de la philosophie chrétienne, Louvain 1997; Id. - J. Doré, dir., Les apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, Paris 1998). Clement borrowed much from the apologists, from the criticism of paganism to the derivation of Greek philosophy from *Scripture, but with less polemics, better arguments and more parenesis: he praises Christ's new song, superior to those of the Greek poets, which also invites pagans to the revelation first reserved for the Jews. The conclusion is an appeal to the Logos who, after having inspired the philosophers, has been fully manifested in Jesus Christ. We also possess from Clement's writings the Exhortation to Patience (Esortazione alla pazienza, ed. A. Pieri, Rome 1965). But parenesis also pervades Clement's other major preserved works, the Pedagogue and the Stromata (G. Ferrarese, Sapienzialità, p. e vera gnosi: Koinonia 11 [1987] 7-26). Clement insists heavily upon human free will, also an antignostic polemic, as in *Origen's writings: what becomes so much more important, therefore, in his writings, as in Origen's, is the exhortation to free choice for the Good and the pursuit of the knowledge that allows one to identify it. The final end for Christians is, as always, salvation. In Origen's writings, a very strong element of parenesis emerges in the Exhortatio admartyrium, just as in *Tertullian's booklet Ad martyras, addressed to Christians who were awaiting martyrdom in prison, but also in another work of the same author, already leaning toward *Montanism, the Exhortation to Chastity (Esortazione alla castità, ed. R. Frigerio, Milan 1995). Another famous protreptic speech is attributed to Justin Martyr, even if today it is considered to be the work of a 3rd-c. author who was very familiar with Middle Platonism: the Cohortatio ad Graecos (comm. C. Riedweg, Basel 1994), which demonstrates the superiority of the Scriptures over the contradictions of the poets and the Greek philosophers in theological investigation. Toward the year 375, then, *Pacian of Barcelona wrote a further protreptic speech, the Parenesis to Penance, classifying the various types of sins and inviting people to abandon them.

Parenesis can be found in many patristic works, and it primarily runs through the entire corpus of homilies in the early church. This corpus was able to enrich itself even with bitterly polemical intimations as in *Cyril of Alexandria's Homiliae (S. Wessel, Nestorius . . . in Cyril's Hom. IV: AHC 31 [1999] 1-49), but it remains primarily exhortatory, as it was from the very beginning, with 2 Clement, which seems to be the most ancient Christian homily, in the 1st half of the 2nd c., and, from the 2nd half, the Homily on Easter by *Melito of Sardis. Parenesis is also present in many letters, and reaches, among other things, scriptural exegesis, the lifeblood of patristic thought.

Exegesis, even in schools with different tendencies—such as Origen's school of *Alexandria, bent toward allegorizing, and in that of *John Chrysostom's Antiochene *school, which prefered to remain at the historical level—was always aimed at spiritual and moral perfection, and was therefore soaked with parenetic emphases. In Chrysostom's writings this is immediately evident, inasmuch as his exegetical production tends to coincide with his homiletic production, as occurs in part even in St. Augustine's writings, where one should recall at least the homilies on St. *John's gospel. Nevertheless, even in Origen's works, part of his exegesis consists in homilies in addition to commentaries and scholia; the objective of the spiritual understanding of the Scriptures is always salvation. An excellent example of exegesis connected to parenesis is found in *Cyprian's interpretation of the passage on the rich young ruler in Luke 18:29-30, where one sees another consistent element of Christian parenesis: the reference to the eschatological dimension, the end to which all Christians are invited to gaze (R. Cacitti, Ad caelestes thesauros: Aevum 65 [1991] 151-169; 67 [1993] 129-171). In the Syriac church, in *Ephrem's writings (4th c.), exegesis also developed in poetic works, and likewise is married to parenesis, as shown for example by E. Vergani (La fucina di verità: CSt 19 [1998] 597-630) with regard to the exegesis of Daniel 3 contained in the Hymns on Fasting and in the *Hymns Against Julian. Even *Basil's exegesis, which is influenced by Origen and *Eusebius of Caesarea, is always directed toward edification, or to moral ends by means of direct parenesis or reflections (J.R. Pouchet, L'Église dans les homélies de S. Basile sur les Psaumes: Augustinianum 33 [1993] 369-405). One can recognize parenesis, e.g., also in Epistles 5 and 6, in the consolation of Netarius and his wife for the death of their son, which Basil, being an excellent orator, articulates acc. to a threefold division of a funerary speech in lament, consolation and exhortation, the last two of which can both be considered parenesis (V. Novembri, Due epistole, una consolatio: VetChr 40 [2003] 319-337). Basil's brother *Gregory of Nyssa was heavily parenetic, even if very speculative: his dialogue On the Soul and the Resurrection, e.g., which was very influenced by Plato's Phaedo, is a powerful encouragement not to succumb to despair in the face of death, because he demonstrates the immortality of the *soul, the *resurrection of the body and the glorious final *apokatastasis.

In sum, the parenesis in the writings of the fathers, which is rooted both in the Bible, and above all in Paul's epistles, and in classical culture, can be found in letters as well as in speeches, protreptic orations and exegetical works. In fact, it is not a literary genre, but a pervasive way of speaking inherent to many of the genres used by the Fathers—a way of speaking every time they exhort people to virtue and spiritual elevation in every sense, as had already occurred in philosophical texts, the best models of which were wisely used by patristic philosophy.

S. Prete, Escatologia e parenesi negli scrittori cristiani latini, Bologna 1966; R. Freni, Le concezioni pedagogiche nella Paraenesis didascalica di Magno Felice Ennodio, in Umanità e storia, II, Naples 1971, 109-126; E. dal Covolo, Il kerygma come critica alla prassi nella parenesi di Gal. 5,16-24: RivBib 29 (1981) 379-391; G. Tarditi, Parenesi e areté nel corpus tirtaico: RFIC 110 (1982) 257-276; R. Collins, This Is the Will of God: Your Sanctification: Laval théologique et philosophique 39 (1983) 27-53 [parenesis in 1 Th 4:3]; L. Edmunds, Theognis' Parainesis to Cavalry (549-54), Lexis 1 (1988), 53-60; G. Tedeschi, L'elegia parenetico-guerriera e il simposio, in Studi di poesia conviviale, ed. K. Fabian et al., Turin 1991, 95-104; N. Adkin, The Date of Pacian of Barcelona's Paraenesis ad paenitentiam: Prometheus 20 (1994) 73-76; K. Erlemann, Naherwartung und Parusieverzögerung im NT, Tübingen 1995; J. Murphy-O'Connor, Paul the Letter-Writer, Collegeville, MN 1995; G. Colesanti, La disposizione delle armi in Alc. 140 V: RFIC 123 (1995) 385-408; D. Allison, The Jesus Tradition in Q, Harrisburg 1997; P. Tite, Compositional Transitions in 1Pt, San Francisco 1997; J. Montes, Texto programático . . . en Anacreonte: ExcPhilol 7/8 (1997/8) 49-67; A. Kirk, The Composition of the Sayings Source . . . Wisdom Redaction in Q, Leiden 1998; J. Lambrecht, Gal 5,17d: Biblica 79 (1998) 515-524 [on parenesis in the passage]; C. Sleeper, James, Nashville 1998; A. Milazzo, Un'epistola encomiastica di Cassiodoro: Cassiodorus 5 (1999) 277-88 [on Var. 10,3, with a paranesis for the ruler]; J. Starr, 2Pt 1:4 in Its Hellenistic Context, Stockholm 2000; T. Engberg-Pedersen, Paul and the Stoics, Louisville 2000; D. Ackerman, Cross, Resurrection, and Parenesis in the Rhetoric of 1 Corinthians, Ph.D. Denver 2000; M. Jackson, Logos and Law in James, Leiden 2001; G. Burnett, Paul and the Salvation of the Individual, Leiden 2001; M. Theobald, Studien zum Römerbrief, Tübingen 2001; R. Maddox, Parenesis and Exegesis, Ph.D. Fort Worth, TX 2001 [on Hebrews 13]; C. Carpenter, James 4.5: NTS 47 (2001) 189-205; W. Meeks, In Search of the Early Christians, New Haven, CT 2002; L. Thurén, Derhetorizing Paul, Harrisburg, PA 2002; P. Hartin, A Spirituality of Perfection: Faith in Action in the Letter of James, Collegeville, MN 1999; Id., James, Collegeville, MN 2003; D. Aune et al., eds., Neotestamentica et Philonica, Leiden 2003; M. Stirewalt, Paul the Letter Writer, Grand Rapids, MI 2003; S. Elliott, Cutting Too Close for Comfort, Sheffield 2004 [on Galatians]; C. Song, Reading Romans as a Diatribe, New York 2004; J. Starr, Early Christian Paraenesis in Context, Berlin 2004; B. Pouderon (ed., tr.), Apologistes grecs du IIe siècle, Paris 2005; I. Ramelli, La coerenza della soteriologia origeniana: Dalla polemica contro il determinismo gnostico all'universale restaurazione escatologica, in Pagani e cristiani alla ricerca della salvezza (secoli I-III), XXXIV Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana (Rome, 5-7 maggio 2005), Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum, SEA 96, Rome 2006, 661-688; Id., Gregorio di Nissa. Sull'anima e la resurrezione, Milan 2007.

I. Ramelli

PARENTIUM. We know very little or next to nothing about Parentium before the Romans wanted to use the strategic position of the Parentine peninsula halfway between the two colonies Tergeste and Pola and the natural meeting point of all the internal roads of the territory. At that time, in relation to the transfer of the E Italian border from Formio (Risano) to Arsa in 16 BC, the supposedly pre-Roman center must have obtained an exact boundary and an urban organization that is still recognizable in the layout of the two primary roads and the road network that divides the layout of the city into isolated rectangles and the forum (the archaeological stratum of the forum has been explored under the modern Piazza Marafor). Here, the Romans erected the largest Roman temple of Istria, which was reconstructed by T. Abudius Verus, then vice admiral of the *Ravenna unit established at Parentium.

This city is perhaps the only place that allows one to use archaeological data in testing the theory of the existence of an episcopate before the Edict of Tolerance. In fact, the protobishop *Maurus (notwithstanding some recent doubts raised on the matter) was venerated as a martyr from at least the 6th c., which is attested in famous epigraphs (4th c.) that recall the transfer of his remains from the cemetery outside the walls into a city basilica, ubi episcopus et confessor est factus. Furthermore, one should not forget that to the N of the splendid basilica built by Euphrasius around the mid-6th c., one finds the remains of what was most likely an ecclesia domestica, excavated from the lounge of a Roman house, which was subsequently enlarged into the first rooms used for worship. The mosaic inscriptions recorded there at the end of the 4th c. document the existence of what was already a diverse community composed of people from various social backgrounds. After Maurus, there is no known name of a bishop until Euphrasius, but in the apse vault of his basilica, his image is immortalized in the mosaic alongside that of Maurus, who is in the act of placing a crown on the Virgin *Mary with his hands veiled. This provides us a glimpse of the end result of the process of Christianization achieved in Istria during the span of nearly two and a half centuries.

G. Cuscito, Parenzo dalle origini all'età di Giustiniano, Padua 1976; Id., Ancora su Mauro "episcopus et confessor" e sul "locus duplicatus" di Parenzo, in Domum tuam dilexi. Miscellanea in onore di A. Nestori, Vatican City 1998, 185-210.

G. Cuscito

PARIS. The Celtic tribe of the Parisii occupied the actual territory of Paris, once a swampy area; the Romans conquered it in 52 BC. The Celtic oppidum Parisiorum, "the town of the Parisians" (Lutetia Parisiorum: Caesar, De bello gal. 6,3; 7,57-58), was established on the Island of Seine. After the conquest, it was rebuilt by the Romans, but the new town extended to the S side of the Seine into the modern Latin Quarter, acc. to the Roman urban structure: la rue Saint-Jacques was the cardo maximus. From the 4th c. onward, the name Parisii was used in place of Lutetia Parisiorum (Ammianus Marcellinus used both terms: 20,1,1; 20,4,12; CTh; Notitia Dignitatum; Notitia Galliarum); from the 5th c. it was referred to as Parisius. The new city of the province Lugdunensis Senona, grew rapidly, being in a favorable place for river commerce and the convergence of various roads. During the time of Tiberius, the Romans erected a column in honor of Jupiter, which was found during the excavations carried out between 1965 and 1972 under the church of Nôtre Dame; after AD 50 the forum was constructed; the construction of the *thermal baths dates to the 2nd c. (today visible under the Hôtel de Cluny), fed by an aqueduct of approximately 10 miles (16 km); then an amphitheater with 17,000 seats and a theater with 3,000 extra seats were built. They also added two other buildings for the thermal baths. In the 4th c., Lutetia was a strategic spot for the defense of Gaul, and often troops were stationed there, but it never became the capital of the province. Caesar *Julian (the Apostate) spent the winter in Lutetia between 358 and 360 and was there proclaimed augustus (March 360); the emperor *Valentinian resided there in 365 and 366. In 2006 the pavement of a 1st-c. street along with the remains of other buildings were discovered. At the end of the 4th c., the city reduced its dimensions, and the island, which was smaller than it is today, was fortified. In 451, *Geneviève convinced *Attila, king of the *Huns, to spare the city of Paris, which in 508 became the capital of the Merovingian dynasty, through the work of *Clovis, and remained so during various intervals until the following century. In 577, King *Chilperic I ordered that repairs be made to the theater and also supplied provisions for the games.

We do not know when Christianity arrived in Lutetia. The first bishop we can speak of with historical certainty was Victorinus (6th on the episcopal list), who in 346 participated in the Council of *Cologne in favor of *Athanasius; Marcellus (9th on the list) is venerated as a saint. *Denis of Paris, the legendary bishop, was its first martyr; he was killed around 250 (*Gregory of Tours, Hist. 1, 30) along with Rusticus and Eleutherius, on the hill of Mons Mercurius (thereafter Mons Martyrum, Montmartre). On the burial site of these martyrs, at St. Denis (vicus catolacensis), upon the initiative of St. Geneviève (d. 502) a church was built, in which certain Merovingian kings were then buried. King Dagobert, between 628 and 637, established the Abbey of St. Denis, in which in 754 Pope Stephen III consecrated Pepin the Short. In 540, the church of St. Stephen was constructed, whose remains are under the church of Nôtre Dame and in the adjacent streets; but the ancient sources simply referred to it as an ecclesia. Germanus, whose friend Fortunatus wrote a biography about Germanus's life, was bishop during the years 558-576. In the 6th c., various *councils were held at Paris, where church buildings still stand today: the ecclesia senior, baptisterium, oratorium sancti Martini, basilica beati Vincentii (where the following kings were buried: Childebert in 558; Chilperic I in 584; and in 576 Bishop Germanus, whose name the church then took), basilica sancti Marcelli, oratorium Criscentiae virginis, basilica beati Iuliani, basilica Apostolorum (also simply called Sancti Petri). Clovis ordered that this church be constructed on the tomb of St. Geneviève, in which both the king and his wife Clotilde and the other members of the royal family were later buried. During the 6th c., councils were also held in the basilica Apostolorum.

P.-M. Duval, Paris antique, des origines au troisième siècle, Paris 1961; P. Perin, Lutèce, Paris de César à Clovis. Catalogue de l'exposition du musée Carnavalet, Paris 1984; var. aus., Topographie chrétienne de la Gaule, VIII, Province ecclésiastique de Sens, Paris 1992, 97-129; P. de Carbonnières, Lutèce: Paris ville romaine, Paris [2]2001; J.P. Adam - H. Delhumeau, Les thermes antiques de Lutèce, Paris [2]2001; D. Busson, Paris, a Roman City, Paris 2001.

A. Di Berardino

PARIS, Council of. Christianity must have reached the Roman city of Lutetia Parisiorum during the course of the 2nd c.; however, its first known bishop acc. to tradition was *Denis of Paris, from the 2nd half of the 3rd c. In this city, during the summer of 360, Gallic bishops convened a council to renounce their adherence to the acts of the pro-*Arian Council of *Rimini (359) and sign the definitions of *Nicaea. The bishops banned *Saturninus of Arles and Paternus of Périgueux from the episcopate because they supported that heresy.

CCL 148, 32-34; SC 241, 90-99; Palazzini 3, 295; Hilary of Poitiers, Fragm. Hist. XI.

Ch. Munier

PARISH. The term derives from the Greek word παροικία, which means "a temporary residence," esp. in a foreign land, a dwelling place. Early, from the 2nd c. onward, the term indicated a Christian community (Mart. Polyc. pref.; Eusebius, HE 5,18,9); to be even more precise: a stable, Christian community hierarchically organized (Council of *Ancyra, can. 18; Alexander of Alex.: PG 18, 548; Council of *Nicaea, can. 16). In the 4th c., its ordinary meaning was "diocese." Only from this period onward, and very slowly at that, did the term assume the modern meaning—the precise definition emerges only in the 13th c.—referring to the territorial structure as part of the diocese, when, with the conversions and the spread of Christianity into the countryside, it was impossible to unite around the bishop who resided in the city. In the first centuries, Christianity was primarily an urban phenomenon; nevertheless, in certain Roman provinces it also spread to the countryside, as *Pliny the Younger attests in the 2nd c., for the region of *Pontus: in the vici (towns) and in the agri (fields) (Ep. 10,96). The first African martyrs came from an unknown place, Scili, which must have been a small village, and, therefore, not an episcopal see.

In the early days, the *bishop was the center of the Christian *liturgy and ecclesial administration; he was helped by the deacons and *presbyters. Generally speaking, he was the only person to administer the *Eucharist and *baptism; in the event of an emergency, as during the persecution, presbyters administered the sacraments. When Christianity reached the villages and the latifundia, for liturgical services instead of multiplying episcopal churches, other places of worship were built. In some of those places the figure of the periodeuta, an itinerant presbyter, became a widespread phenomenon; in other areas, a chorepiscopus*. In the West, a system of plebes was devised, communities where the liturgical service was performed by presbyters. In the large cities, with the growth of the Christian community, it was impossible to gather into just one place, both because of the distance and the limitations of the gathering place. When the parochial system began to emerge, the decentralization of the liturgy occurred. Trustworthy pieces of historical information concerning communities that were under the bishop, but not directly guided by him, are provided by the Council of *Antioch (341) for the East, and by the Council of *Serdica (343) for the West. The bishop not only led the urban community, but also that of the village (χώρα). If there were bishops in the villages (χωρεπίσκοποι), they were obliged to serve only the churches that depended upon them (Council of Antioch, can. 10). From this information, one can conclude that not all the countryside churches had their own bishop and that there existed several countryside parishes. At Serdica, bishops were prohibited from interfering in another bishop's parish (can. 18).

Pope Innocent (402–417) said that all of his churches were located within the city walls; one can suppose, however, that the other bishops administered the more remote parishes. It seems Rome did not have any countryside parishes. Only those presbyters who served in the cemeteries outside the city walls would have been comparable to the countryside parish priests of other episcopal districts. Innocent called the churches in Rome tituli (Ep. ad Decen. 5). The Roman parishes must have been created long before Innocent's pontificate. However, the information on this matter in the Liber pontifi-* calis (Book of Popes) was compiled after Innocent's time, at the end of the 5th c. Already around the mid-3rd c., *Cornelius numbered the following groups within the Roman community: 46 presbyters, 7 deacons, 7 subdeacons, 42 acolytes, 52 among the exorcists, electors and ostiarii (i.e., *doorkeepers), 1,500 widows and those in need that were fed by the community (Eus., HE 6, 43, 11). The Roman community must have been composed of tens of thousands of faithful, who would have been unable to gather at the same eucharistic celebration. According to the Liber pontificalis, *Cletus (ca. 80-90) had already ordained 25 presbyters, and *Evaristus (after 100) divided Rome into tituli for the presbyters (and ordained 7 deacons). *Urban (d. 230) acquired 25 golden patens (probably for 25 titular churches). *Fabian (236–250) divided the municipal regions among the deacons and installed seven subdeacons (the districts of the deaconry are not identical to those of the titular churches).

Pope *Dionysius's (260–268) entrusting of the churches to the presbyters should certainly be dated to an earlier age; he also constructed cemeteries (and the parishes) as dioceses, i.e., he erected the churches of the cemeteries outside the walls for the parishes. Pope *Marcellinus (ca. 300) created 25 titular churches for the diocese of Rome, for the numerous baptized (neophytes) and penitents.

Therefore, the term diocese is used to refer to autonomous presbyteral communities with the right to confer baptism. This linguistic use is attested for the first time by *Sulpicius Severus in his letter to *Martin of Tours (Dial. II, 9,6; Ep. 1,10; 3,6), who established nearly ten countryside parishes (dioeceses) in the vast region of his episcopal city. In the 5th and 6th c., the parochial organization of the countryside was completed everywhere. We see this esp. in *Gaul, where only around the year 600 the term diocese entered into common use for the episcopal communities, while the presbyteral communities referred to themselves as parishes. Already from the 3rd c., the bishop was able to develop the urban parishes in the large cities, as had been done in Rome. During *Augustine's time, we find in the small centers of *Numidia presbyters who performed liturgical functions (Ep. 83; Ep. 139,1); several presbyters were killed by the *Donatists (Ep. 133,1; 134,1).

Duchesne LP 4 (1923) 1212-1219; DACL 13 (1938) 2197-2199; LTK 8, 162-170; Cath 10, 671-674; Dizionario Encicl. del medioevo, ed. A. Vauchez, Rome 1999, I, 1409-1411; K. Müller, Parochie und Diözese im Abendland in spätrömischer und merowingischer Zeit: ZNTW (1933) 149-185; E. Griffe, Les premières paroisses de la Gaule: BLE 50 (1949) 229-239; Id., À travers les paroisses rurales de la Gaule au VI[e] siècle: BLE 75 (1975) 3-26; W. Geerlings, Augustinus und sein Bistum: ThQ 158 (1978) 27-35; A. Martin, Topographie et liturgie: Le problème des 'paroisses' d'Alexandrie, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès international d'archéologie chrétienne, Rome 1989, 113-114; V. Bo, Storia della parrocchia. I: secoli delle origini (sec. IV-V), Rome [2]1992, II: I secoli dell'infanzia (sec. VI-XI), Rome 1990; M. Colardelle, Les paroisses rurales, in Atlas archéologique de la France, Paris 1992; Pastoral Care Before the Parish, ed. J. Blair - R. Sharpe, Leicester, NY 1992; Ch. Pietri, Régions ecclésiastiques et paroisses romaines, in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, 173-200; Id., Chiese e comunità locali nell'Occidente cristiano (IV-VI sec. d. C.), ibid. 475-521; Alle origini della parrocchia rurale, IV-VIII sec., ed. Ph. Pergola, Vatican City 1999; G. Gantino Wataghin, Christianisation et organisation ecclésiastique de campagne, L'Italie du Nord aux IV[e]-VIII[e] siècles, in Towns and Their Territories Between Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, ed. G.B. Brogiolo et al., Leiden 2000, 209-234.

H.J. Vogt - A. Di Berardino

PARMENIAN. *Donatist bishop of *Carthage from 362 to 391/392. He was either Gallic or Spanish, not N African (Optatus of Milevis, De schismate II, 7). He probably joined Donatus's cause during the latter's exile from N Africa and became the leader of the movement after his death around 355. He became the bishop of Carthage in 362 after the triumphal return of the Donatist leaders to N Africa, who had the support of the emperor *Julian (Optatus of Milevis, De schismate II, 16, and Augustine, Contra litteras Petiliani II, 97, 224). Julian's death on 26 June 363 did not pose an obstacle to the resurgence of *Donatism but, around 364, Parmenian wrote a treatise, Adversus ecclesiam traditorum, that justified the legitimacy of his own church and asserted the unredeemable unworthiness of *Catholics (Optatus, I, 4-6). The work was divided into five books that treated: *baptism, the unity of the church, the unworthiness of Catholics as traditores and instigators of the persecution initiated by Paul and Macarius (imperial commissioners in 347/348), and lastly, the reason for rejecting Catholic *sacraments, "the oil of the ungodly" (see Ps 141:5). Parmenian's writings reveal that he was heavily influenced by *Cyprian, even though his definition of the church by means of reference to the possession of those gifts (dotes), which are attributed to the bride in the *Song of Songs, offered an original contribution to Western ecclesiology. He claimed for the Donatists the cathedra, the sign of the authority and unity of the episcopate; the angelus, the angel that floated upon the waters of baptism; the fons, namely the baptismal font; the sigillum (*seal) of baptism; and the altar. Once again he showed the great importance the Donatists attached to the liturgy and the symbolism of baptism. His energetic denial of the emperor's right to interfere in ecclesiastical affairs (Optatus, I, 22) followed Donatus's ideas. A response was posed to his treatise around 365 when *Optatus of Milevis composed the De schismate Donatistarum.

During his 30 years in the episcopate, Parmenian maintained control over the Donatist church. In *Mauritania, he managed to control the schism of *Rogatus and the activity of the *circumcellions, even though Parmenian was unable to repress the Claudianist schism that struck the Donatists at *Rome around 385 (Augustine, Serm. II in Ps. 36,20). He even subjected Donatist superior imperial officials such as Flavian, Vicarius Africae, to ecclesiastical discipline (Augustine, Ep. 87, 8). Parmenian's Psalms, written in a simple, popular style, spread Donatist teaching throughout N Africa (Predestinatus, De haer. 43; Augustine, Ep. 55, 18, 34). His prestige almost rivaled his predecessor Donatus. Around 380, however, Parmenian found himself in conflict with the lay Donatist theologian *Tyconius, who seemed to oppose the justification that had been used for the schism and the Donatist insistence on rebaptizing their converts (Augustine, Ep. 93,10, 43-44, and Contra Epistolam Parmeniani I, 1,1). At first Parmenian tried to convince Tyconius that the universality of the church was acceptable only on the condition of its integrity (Epistola ad Tyconium), and, when he was unable to succeed, he had Tyconius condemned by a council: ca. 385 (Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. I, 1,1). His firmness, however, was successful, because it seems that Tyconius listened to his appeal not to leave the Donatist church (Augustine, C. ep. Parmen. III, 6, 29) and his excommunication created no schism among the ranks of the Donatists.

*Augustine respected Parmenian's ability as a theologian and administrator: "he strengthened the Donatist sect" (Augustine, Serm. 46,8,17). Augustine and *Optatus both regarded him as a talented speaker, wielding a sharp tongue (Optatus, II, 14). His acceptance of Donatism shows that other Western Christian communities shared similar points of view with the Donatists. Upon his death, he left a church that undoubtedly possessed the allegiance of the majority of N African Christians (Optatus, VII, 1 and Augustine, Ep. 22, 2).

Several extracts from the works of Parmenian are found in Optatus of Milevis's De schismate Donatistarum (ed. C. Ziwsa, CSEL 26) and Augustine, Contra Epistolam Parmeniani (ed. Petschenig, CSEL 51). PCBE I, 816-821; P. Monceaux, Parmenianus, primat donatiste de Carthage: JS n.s. 7 (1909) 19-26, 157-169; Id., Histoire litt. de l'Afrique chrét., V, 220ff.; A. Pincherle, L'ecclesiologia nella controversia donatista: Ricerche Religiose I (1925) 35-55; W.H.C. Frend, The Donatist Church, Oxford [2]1971, ch. 13; P. Langa, Réplica a la carta de Parmeniano. Introducción, bibliografía y notas, BAC 32, Madrid 1988, 195-377.

W.H.C. Frend

PAROUSIA. Greek term (= presence, coming) found in the NT where, beginning with *Paul's writings, it refers to the second coming of *Jesus Christ in glory, which he proclaimed more than once. Uncertainty of when this would occur produced in the mainstream church and among heterodox groups various speculations that aimed to establish a precise date: the doctrine of *millenarism emerged from among these speculations. For ecclesiastical writers, the parousia referred to the eschatological judgment (Diogn. VII, 6), the presence of God alongside the martyrs (Diogn. VII, 9) and, esp., the coming of Christ in the *incarnation (Ign., Philad. 9,2; Just., Dial. 88,2; 1 Apol. 48,2; 54,7; Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 18; II, 16; Orig., Hom Ier. 7,1). Standing in relation to the first coming of Christ in the flesh, but opposed to it in comparison to its outward manifestation, the eschatological parousia or the second parousia (Justin, Dial. 14,8; 31-32; Hippolytus, Antichrist 44,1; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 4,22,1.2) was an element discussed in *catechesis in connection to the themes of the judgment, the *resurrection of human beings and the restitution of all things, and a vigilant expectation that was void, however, of curious investigation (Cyr. Jer., Catech. XV, 1-4). It will be confirmed by two events: first the *cross will appear for the condemnation of the reprobate, then the angels for the glorification of the righteous (John Chrys., In Matt. hom. 76,3-4). The parousia of Christ at the end of time will ensure that every person will know, and thus will the righteous and wicked be separated (Orig., Com. Mt. 70).

A. Oepke, s.v. παρουσία in GLNT IX, 839-878 [TDNT V, 858-871]; N. Brox, Zum literarischen Verhältnis zwischen Justin und Irenäus: ZNW 58 (1967) 124-127; R. Trevijano Etcheverría, Ἐπιδημία y παρουσία en Orígenes: Scriptorium Vict. 16 (1969) 313-337; Lampe 1043-44; A. Brontesi, La soteria in Clemente Alessandrino, Rome 1972, see index pp. 725-726.

F. Cocchini

PARRHĒSIA. In the Greek polis, parrhēsia meant freedom of speech and the citizen's freedom. In patristic literature, the term was used in a pejorative sense to signify excessive casualness, excessive familiarity and the fruit of vanity (Dorot., Doctrinae IV, 5-6: SC 92, 252). In a positive sense, parrhēsia characterized the relationship between God and humanity before *sin. *Gregory of Nyssa identified "freedom" with the "familiarity" that God has granted to his elect (J. Gaïth, La conception, 65-66). Various authors joined parrhēsia to some special virtues, very often with prayer (Nilus, Peristeria 4,2: PG 79, 828ab), with sophia and truth (the contemplatives), with humility and with *martyrdom. Parrhēsia was a prerogative of the Theotokos* (ps.-Epiph., Hom. 5 In laudes s. Mariae Deiparae: PG 43, 501b). Lastly, parrhēsia with God is mirrored in the fraternal contact among people, in particular, the trusting relationship with one's spiritual father.

J. Gaïth, La conception de la liberté chez Grégoire de Nysse, Paris 1953, 65-66.; H. Jaeger, Παρρησία et fiducia: SP 1 (1957), TU 63, 221-239; W. Völker, Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, ed. C. Moreschini, It. tr. Ch.O. Tommasi: Gregorio di Nissa filosofo e mistico, Milan 1993.

T. Špiklík

PARTHEMIUS. An unknown 5th- or 6th-c. *presbyter, perhaps African; in his reply to a letter from the *Vandal count Sigisteus, he wrote in a deliberately ornate style and concluded with twelve hexameters and an elegiac distich.

CPL 804-805; PLS 3, 448-449; PCBE I, 821.

F. Scorza Barcellona

PARTHENIUS of Constantinople (5th c.). *Presbyter and *archimandrite of *Constantinople, supporter of *Nestorius. One of his Letters, which was preserved in Latin (Synodicum, 153, see 152: PG 84, 767-67), and addressed to the Metropolitan *Alexander of Hierapolis, an intransigent follower of Nestorius and an adversary of *Cyril of Alexandria (Synodicum 152: PG 84, 767b), refers to Nestorius as sanctissimo illo et deo honorabili archiepiscopo nostro et teste Christi domino Nestorio. Therefore, his profession of faith should be interpreted in a Nestorian sense; it reads as follows: "It is indeed true to confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is the Son of the living God, perfect God and perfect man; we certainly attribute his sufferings to the humanity of Christ, the miracles however to his divinity, preaching one Christ and one Lord" (Veritas vero est confiteri Dominum nostrum Iesum Christum, Filium Dei vivi, Deum perfectum hominemque perfectum; et damus passiones quidem humanitati Christi, divinitati vero miracula, unum Christum, unum Dominum praedicantes).

CPG III, 5780; ACO I, 4, 175-176.; Bardenhewer 4, 212; Patrologia V, 29.

A. De Nicola

PASCENTIUS the ARIAN (beginning of the 5th c.). *Arian count of the imperial court (4th-5th c.). In 406, he challenged *Augustine to a debate at *Carthage (Possid., Vita Aug. 17), which lasted from the morning to the afternoon. Pascentius, however, refused to have his words written down, fearing that they might be altered to his detriment (Aug., Ep. 238,1,7). Facing Augustine's insistence in this regard, he resorted to ad hominem attacks (Ep. 238,1,8). He later boasted that he won the debate. Augustine professed his own belief in the three divine persons (Ep. 238,2,10), explained the mystery of the *Trinity (Ep. 238,2,11; 238,4,25; 238,5,28), the word homoousios* (Ep. 238,1,4; 238,5,27) and exhorted Pascentius to explain his own belief (Ep. 238,5,26) so that by believing without distorting the truth he might find happiness (Ep. 239,1; 238,5,29; 239,2-3). He vigorously opposed Augustine (Ep. 240), who responded to the Arian's misrepresentations in his Ep. 241.

CPL 703: Ep. ad Augustinum: PL 33, 1051; CSEL 42, 559-560; CPL 366: Altercatio cum Pascentio Ariano: PL 33, 1156-1162; PCBE 1, 827-830; A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Vita di Cipriano, . . . Vita di Agostino, Milan 1975, 393-394.

L. Dattrino

PASCHAL, antipope. Roman archdeacon who, midway through the year 687 when the elderly *Conon became ill, did not hesitate to make a pact with the exarch of *Ravenna John Platyn to be elected bishop in exchange for a large sum of money. However, after Conon's death (21 September 687) the volatile Roman electorate divided into two factions, and Paschal, who was not yet consecrated, found himself opposed by the archpresbyter Theodore, then replaced by a third candidate, the presbyter *Sergius. In contradistinction to Theodore, Paschal never recognized Sergius as the legitimate pontiff and continued to scheme with his Byzantine supporters to get himself placed at the head of the Roman Church. His plot failed: he was apprehended, condemned without a trial, stripped of his ecclesiastical office and imprisioned in a monastery where he died in 692 impenitent (impenitens).

LP I, 368-382, 518; Mansi XI, 737-738, 1018, 1097-1098; E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, II, Tübingen 1933, 622-625; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 399-401; M. Andrieu, Riflessi politici delle controversie religiose con Bisanzio nelle vicende del secolo VII in Italia, in Caratteri del secolo VII in Occidente, II, Spoleto 1958, 785-787; U. Longo, Pasquale antipapa, in EPapi I, 631-633.

P. Marone

PASCHAL CANDLE. Its origin is uncertain; it may go back to the Eastern custom of lucernarium on Saturday evening and the *Easter vigil. *Egeria describes the lighting of the lamps every evening from the perpetual lamp of the Holy Sepulchre (Peregr. 24: SC 21, 191-192). A 5th-c. Ordo describes the practice of the solemn lighting of the lamps at the Easter vigil in Jerusalem (Thibaut, L'ordre des offices). But its origin may also go back to the patristic theology of baptism as illumination (Justin, 1 Apol. 65,1). *Eusebius tells how *Constantine had the whole city illuminated with lamps on the Easter vigil (De vit. Const. IV, 22: GCS I, 125,22). St. *Augustine's Easter homilies mention the lamps lit during the Easter vigil (Addit. ad Wilmart 15: PLS 2, 740; Addit. ad Wilmart 17: PLS 2, 741-742; Guelferb. V, PLS 2, 549-552).

Since the church did not use candles in the liturgy until the 4th c. because of their pagan overtones, the replacement of lamps by candles can be dated only from then. One reason Jerome severely criticized the practice of blessing the Paschal candle was because, acc. to him, neither the OT nor the NT knew the use of candles (Ep. ad Praesid.; PL 30, 182). The use of the Paschal candle in the Roman liturgy probably derives from the Gallican liturgies, which were influenced by the East. Yet the Liber pontificalis (ed. Perovsky, II, 95) attributes its use at Rome back to a pope *Zosimus, who was Greek. Though the Paschal candle was used in Roman parishes from the 5th c., it did not enter the papal liturgy until the 11th c. (Ordines Romani 23 and 24).

J. Thibaut, L'ordre des offices de la semaine sainte à Jérusalem, Paris 1916; H. Schmidt, Hebdomada sancta, Rome 1962; A. Chupungco, The Cosmic Elements of Christian Passover, Rome 1977 (SA 72); U. Perovsky, Liber Pontificalis (Studia Gratiana 22), Rome 1978; S. Rosso, Elementi naturali, in Liturgia (Dizionari S. Paolo), Cinisello B. 2001, 650-651.

A. Chupungco

PASCHALE CAMPANUM. In 464, an anonymous scholar composed the Epitoma temporum et indiculum paschae of the Paschale campanum, under the consulship of Olybrius and Rusticus. On the basis of the accounts of Victor of Aquitaine (see computus, ecclesiastical), this same author set forth an *Easter table that follows a cycle of 84 years, recognizing the celebration of Easter beginning with the 15th day of the moon established acc. to the Alexandrian tradition, and thereby establishing as the endpoints 22 March and 25 April. The period of time goes from 464 to 599. To these dates, a later anonymous author added the years 600-613. The place of the Paschale's origin was certainly Campania, as one can gather from historical information regarding the eruption of Mount Vesuvius in the years 505 and 512 and the entry of *Belisarius into *Naples (536).

The calculation is preceded by a collection of several opinions on the calculation of the years that have passed since the beginning of the world: Flavius Josephus, with 5605 years until the death of *Domitian in AD 96 (Epitome 3, ab exordio mundi); *Julius Africanus, with 5500 years before the birth of the Lord (Epitome 4, a primo homine); therefore, three hypotheses that place the *incarnation 5200 years after the creation: *Prosper of Aquitaine, with 5228 years until the passion of *Jesus, in the 15th year of *Tiberius Caesar (Epitome 5); *Eusebius of Caesarea, with 5578 years until the death of the emperor Valens, as one reads in his Chronicon, translated into Latin by *Jerome (Epistome 6, a principio mundi); *Orosius, with 5618 years until Honorius (Epitome 7, ab initio mundi); lastly, an anonymous text that calculates (iuxta diligentissimam supputationem) 5943 years until the consulate of Olybrius and Rusticus, in 464 (Epitome 8, a principio mundi): which means that the birth of Jesus would have occurred 5479 years after the creation, a number close to *Julius Africanus's calculation, but this is difficult to explain if it is not a mistake in the MS tradition.

CPL 2297; Th. Mommsen, Chronica minora I, Berlin 1982, 744-750 (MGH IX, Auct. Ant.); H. Inglebert, Les romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome: Études Augustiniennes (1996) 593-609; Repertorium 8, 488.

L. Longobardo

PASCHASINUS of Lilybaeum. Bishop of Lilybaeum in Sicily (today Marsala), Paschasinus enjoyed the trust of *Leo I (440–461) who, in 444, consulted him on the question of the date of *Easter. Paschasinus answered him (Leo, Ep. 3; 16,7), preferring the Alexandrian over the Roman solution. Seven years later Leo turned again to Paschasinus concerning the date on which of Easter would fall in 455. We do not have Paschasinus's response. Thus in 451, the pope sent Paschasinus as the head of the pontifical delegation to *Constantinople to represent him at the Council of *Chalcedon (see Ep. 88; 89; 91; 92). As one can gather from the Acts of the synod, Paschasinus was the Roman spokesperson in the conciliar debates.

CPL 1656; Leo, Ep. 3: PL 54, 606-610; B. Krusch, Studien zur christl.-mittelalterl. Chronologie I, Leipzig 1880, 247-278; T. Jalland, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great, London 1941, passim; see also the notes of the Ballerini in PL 54; Pascasino di Lilibeo e il suo tempo, ed. M. Crociato, Sciascia 2002.

B. Studer

PASCHASIUS of Dumium. Monk of the *monastery of *Dumium *Gallaecia and a disciple of the city's bishop, St. Martin of Braga (ca. 515–580). The establishment of that monastery, called for by Martin already before his election to the episcopate, conformed to the rules professed by the ancient monks of the East. To this end, Martin commissioned the learned monk Paschasius to translate the statements (apophthegmata patrum) of the *desert Fathers acc. to its Greek version (Prologus [PL 73, 1024]: (Vitas Patrum graecorum [ut caetera] facundia studiose conscriptas, iussus a te, sanctissime pater, in latinum transferre sermonem . . .). The version attributed to Paschasius is contained in book VII of a large collection titled Vitae Patrum*, first published by the Jesuit H. Rosweyde (Anversa, 1615), and is part of the well-known collection called the Verba seniorum. Thus, Paschasius of Dumium and Martin of Braga seem to be the first major humanists of the Early Medieval period in Portugal.

Díaz 315; PL 73, 1025-1066; 74, 381-394; C.W. Barlow, Martini episcopi Bracarensis opera omnia, New Haven, CT 1950, 30-51; M. Martins, Pascasio Dumiense traductor dos Padres do deserto: Broteria 51 (1950) 295-304; J.H. Waszink: VChr 6 (1952) 60; A. Kurfess, Weitere Textkritische Bemerkungen zu Martin ep. Bracarensis opera: Athenaeum 33 (1955) 60-63; C.W. Barlow, Martin of Braga. Paschasius of Dumium, Washington 1969, 113-171; Quasten 2, 189-191; J.G. Freine, A versão latina por Pascásio de Dume dos Apophthegmata Patrum, 2 vols., Coimbra 1971; G. Folliet, La tradition latine des Septem capitula abbatis Moysi: VChr 50 (1996) 200-209; Domínguez del Val 2, 322-324.

L. Dattrino

PASCHASIUS of Rome (d. before 514). His name was connected to the events of the antipope *Laurentius (498–507). With obstinate persistence, Paschasius openly approved of this antipope during the schism that occurred at Rome after the election of Pope *Symmachus (498). The faithfulness of Deacon Paschasius to Laurentius can be explained by the fact that he was probably ordained by him. Removed by time and perhaps focusing on his penitential life, Pope *Gregory the Great rendered a positive judgment about him: Mirae sanctitatis vir, eleemosinarum maxime operibus vacans, cultor pauperum et contemptor sui (Dial. 4,42,1). Paschasius was venerated in Rome after his death. The same pontiff attributed his adherence to the schismatic party more to ignorance than malice. Paschasius wrote a book on the *Holy Spirit, now lost but owned by Pope Gregory (Greg. M., Dial. 4,42,1: SC 265, 152ff.). From his writings, a letter he wrote to the abbot *Eugippus in 513 has survived (CSEL 9, 2, pp. 2-4). The abbot lived in the vicinity of *Naples and supplied him with material for writing a biography on the life of St. *Severinus of Noricum, but Paschasius declined the request.

CPL 678 and 962; CPPM 2, 1315; Commemoratorium de vita S. Severini cum epistulis amoeboeis Eugippii et Paschasi diaconi: PL 62, 39ff.; CSEL 9, 2, 1ff.; R. Cessi, Lo scisma laurenziano e le origini della dottrina politica della Chiesa di Roma: Archiv. Soc. Romana di Storia patria 42 (1919) 5-229; BS 10, 347; T. Sardella, Società, chiesa e stato nell'età di Teoderico: Papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; PCBE 2, 1606.

L. Dattrino

PASSIO SEPTEM MONACHORUM. This text has come down to us in an appendix to the Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae by *Victor of Vita and can be placed in the context of the hagiographic African literature. The Passio septem monachorum documents the martyrdom of seven monks (the deacon Boniface, the subdeacons Servus and Rusticus, the abbot Liberatus and the simple monks Rogatus, Septimus and Maximus) from a monastery in Capsa (Tunisia) who were killed at *Carthage by order of *Huneric, during the *persecution of 484. Taking cues probably from Victor's work (Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae III, 41: CSEL 7, 92) and using as somewhat of a template the biblical account of the suffering of the seven brothers found in 2 Macc 7, the Passio seems to have been composed some period after 484, when by that time the memory of Huneric's persecution began to wane.

CPL 800; BHL 4906; PL 58, 261-266; MHG AA 3, 1, 59-62; CSEL 7, 108-114; Moricca III, 763; BS 8, 16-17; PCBE I, 159 n.25 (Bonifacius), 638 n.4 (Liberatus), 740 n.21 (Maximus), 993 n.12 (Rogatus), 1015 n.11 (Rusticus), 1060 (Septimus), 1066 n.6 (Servus); V. Saxer, in Hagiographies, I, Turnhout 1994, 76-77; Patrologia IV, 41-42.

P. Marone

PASTOR. Anti-*Priscillianist bishop of the mid-5th. c., of Galician origin; it seems he was the bishop of Palencia. We know nothing of his life before his consecration to the episcopate (431). He is mentioned by *Hydatius (Chron. 102), as a friend of *Agrestius and *Syagrius, and by *Gennadius (De vir. Ill. 65. 76), who informs us that Pastor wrote a book titled Libellum in modum symboli, at Orléans in 457 as a prisoner of the Goths. He was the first person to use the term filioque. He directed his creed against the Priscillianists. Morin—following the testimony of Gennadius—identified the creed of the first Council of *Toledo with Pastor's: an opinion generally accepted by scholars, but with certain provisos. According to J.A. de Aldama, the profession of faith of Toledo went through two redactions: one shorter (Toledo, 400), the other longer (Toledo, 447). Pastor was the author of the latter.

Libellus in modum symboli: CPL 559; G. Morin, Pastor et Syagrius, deux écrivains perdus du cinquième siècle: RBen 10 (1893) 385-390; A. Künstle, Antipriscilliana, Freiburg 1902, 40-45; J.A. de Aldama, El símbolo Toledano I. Su texto, su origen, su posición en la historia de los símbolos, AG 7, Rome 1934, 29-37; A. Tranoy, Hydace. Chronique: SC 219, 68-69; A.C. Vega, Un poema inédito titulado "De fide" de Agrestio, obispo de Lago, siglo V: Bol.R.Acad. Hist. CLIX (1966) 167-209; Domínguez del Val 2, 61-63; H. Chadwick, Prisciliano de Avila, Madrid 1978, 284-289.

E. Romero Pose

PATERIKON. Greek term (understood as biblion = the book of the *Fathers; pl. paterika) which, in monastic literature, refers to the collections of anecdotes and ideas of the *desert Fathers. For more information, *see apophthegmata patrum.

A. Di Berardino

PATERIUS. Disciple and notarius secundicerius of *Gregory the Great (6th–7th c.; Ep. 1,37; V, 26; VI, 2; IX, 97; XI, 15; John the Deacon, Vita Greg. II, 11). He undertook a project to write a commentary on all of *Scripture, using the interpretations of his teacher. He divided the work into three books: two for the OT (historical books, *Psalms, Proverbs, *Song of Songs, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Prophets) and one for the NT. We do not know if he ever finished the work or edited only the part from *Genesis to the Song of Songs. Many medieval authors cited Gregory through Paterius's compilation.

CPL 1718: Liber Testimoniorum veteris Testamenti quem Paterius ex opusculis S. Gregorii excerpi curavit: PL 79, 683-916; A. Wilmart, Le recueil grégorien de P. et les fragments wisigothiques de Paris: RBen 39 (1927) 81-104; R. Etaix, Le Liber Testimoniorum de P.: RSR 32 (1958) 66-78; CCL 142, 401-432 (fragments); CPPM 2, 2820; PCBE 2, 1613.

E. Romero Pose

PATERNIANS. This was the name of the members of a heretical sect in antiquity who maintained that the lower parts of the body, i.e., from the loins to the feet, were the work of the devil, while the upper parts were the work of God. It was their view that one should only be vigilant over the *soul's purity, which resides within the stomach and the head, but one need not worry at all about the purity of one's private parts. Therefore, they taught and practiced moral laxity. It is probably the case that some propagandist coined the title "Paternians." They were also called "Venustians" for their connection to Venus, the goddess of love. Citing information from *Julian of Eclanum, *Augustine spoke of this group, likening them to the *Manicheans.

DTC 11, 2246-2247; Augustine, Contra Julianum 5,7,26; De haeresibus 85.

C. Dell'Osso

PATERNOSTER. See *LORD'S PRAYER

PATERNUS of Avranches (ca. 480–ca. 565). According to *Venantius Fortunatus, who wrote a trustworthy Vita about him, Paternus was born at *Poitiers around 480, and as a young man entered the monastic life at the *monastery of St. Jouin, near Thoars, where he held the office of cellarer (i.e., one in charge of provisions). Therafter, accompanied by the monk Scubilion, he decided to begin a life of travel and solitude for the Lord. After having settled at Sesciacum (Scissy), he established a monastery, where he remained for nearly three years leading a life full of rigor and mortification. Ordained a deacon, then a priest by the bishop of Coutances, Leontianus, he dedicated himself to intense pastoral activity and established many monasteries in the region of Coutances, Bayeux, Le Mans, Avranches and Rennes, earning himself the fame of a thaumaturge. At 70 years old, i.e., after 550, he was elected bishop through popular acclamation of the people and died after thirteen years of episcopal ministry.

BHL II, 936 n.6477; BS 10, 390-391; LTK 7, 1457. V. Fortunatus, Vita Sancti Paterni: PL 88, 487-498; P. Grosjean, S. Paterne d'Avranches et S. Paterne de Vannes dans les Martyrologes: AB 67 (1949) 384-400; R. Godding, Prêtres en Gaule mérovingienne, Brussels 2001, 507.

C. Dell'Osso

PATIENCE. The Stoic idea of patience (καρτερία), conquered of itself, for itself and finalized in itself, is different from the Christian idea of patience (ὑπομονή), which rests on divine grace and help—although with respect to the concept of patience in Greek, contrary to what followed in Latin, it did not correspond to one specific term. Stoicism, however, influenced the Christian concept, and at times during the patristic era it was a factor in introducing the concept of impassibility (ἀπάθεια).

*Ignatius of *Antioch was one of the first *Fathers of the church to speak of patience. For Ignatius (Rom. 10,3), the term means to be strong "until the very end in the patience of Jesus Christ," and this end should be understood as martyrdom. *Hermas referred to it almost exclusively as μακροθυμία and recognized it as one of the four virgins at the corners of the tower that is the church (Sim. IX, 15,2); he also dedicated the entire fifth precept to patience: "this is a witness to the presence of the Spirit, before the diabolical wrath (Mand. V, 1,2-3), overseeing all the commandments (Mand. 2,8), large, strong, serene and joyous" (Mand. 2,3 and Sim. VIII, 7,6).

In the classical Latin world, Cicero offers us a definition of patience: patientia est honestatis aut utilitatis causa rerum arduarum ac difficilium voluntaria ac diuturna perpessio (De inventione II, 54). The various positions held by Latin Fathers were not too far from this idea. *Tertullian methodically studied patience in his work De patientia, emphasizing its divine origin and explaining its nature, application and fruits. St. *Cyprian in his treatise De bono patientiae that this virtue should be accompanied by two others: humility and charity. For this reason, the philosophers were unable to know the true patience (Pat. 2). Patientia est quae nos deo et commendat et seruat: ipsa est quae iram temperat, quae linguam frenat, quae mentem gubernat, pacem custodit, disciplinam regit, libidinis impetum frangit, tumoris uiolentiam comprimit, incendium simultatis extinguit, coercet potentiam diuitum, inopiam pauperum refouet, tuetur in uirginibus beatam integritatem, in uiduis laboriosam castitatem, in coniunctis et maritatis indiuiduam caritatem ("Patience is both what commends us to and protects us in God: it is what moderates anger, restrains the tongue, governs the mind, keeps the peace, rules discipline, breaks the attack of excessive desire, suppresses the violence of a commotion, extinguishes the fire of hatred, restrains the power of the rich, supplies the necessities of the poor, protects blessed integrity in virgins, laborious chastity in widows and individual charity in couples and married people"; Pat. 20).

For *Lactantius, patience is the malorum quae aut inferuntur aut accidunt cum aequanimitate perlatio (Div. Instit. V, 22,3); it means to endure evils with equanimity. The importance of this virtue is such that all human virtues are joined to it. St. *Augustine proposed several explanations of patience: interiorem motum frenare, et quod habes commune cum pecore non tamquam pecus in omnia relaxare (Sermo 8); tolerantia malorum pro iustitia (the suffering of evil for righteousness; Sermo 15D,7); honestatis aut utilitatis causa rerum arduarum ac difficilium uoluntaria ac diuturna perpessio (De div. quaest. 31). The chief example of patience is God: patiens est dominus; peccas, et parcit; adhuc peccas, adhuc parcit, et adhuc addis (Enarr. in Ps. 63,19). And the reason for this patience is eternity: Deus autem patiens est, quia aeternus est, et nouit diem iudicii sui, ubi omnia examinat (Enarr. in Ps. 91,7).

Greek patristic authors left no treatise on patience. Only *Clement of Alexandria wrote a protreptic on patience, a brief fragment of which remains. In the Stromata (II, 18, 79, 5-80) he offers a definition: "next to courage is patience [ὑπομονή], which the Greeks call καρτερία, a knowledge of the things that one must endure or not endure." It is a virtue of the gnostic, the one perfected (IV, 21,130,1), and it is associated with ἀπάθεια (II, 20,103,1). In the Greek tradition, in numerous homilies and exegetical commentaries, Job was often presented as an example of ὑπομονή.

Cyprian, À Donat et La vertu de patience, Intr., tr. et notes de J. Molager, Paris 1982; Tertullianus, De la patience, Intr., texte critique, tr. et commentaire par J.-C. Fredouille, Paris 1984; Augustin, De patientia, tr. e comm. di A. Bussoni, Parma 1989; M. Spanneut, Le stoïcisme dans l'histoire de la patience chrétienne: Mélanges de science religieuse 39 (1982) 101-130; M. Spanneut, Patience: DSp 12, 438-476.

J. Leal

PATIENS of Lyons (d. ca. 480). Mentioned many times by his friend *Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. 2, 10; 4, 25; 6, 12; 9, 3), after his election as bishop in 469–470, Patiens was elevated to the episcopal see of *Lyons when the city fell under the rule of the *Burgundians. A guest at the king's court, esp. *Chilperic, he exercised a beneficial influence over them and the nobility, and he succeeded in converting them, and esp. their women, to Catholicism. Patiens was well known because of his activity as a builder; during his time he ordered several basilicas to be constructed, among them a cathedral. In 470 he participated at the Council of *Arles (CCL 148, 159); shortly thereafter he himself convoked another at Lyons (CCL 161) to examine the case of the priest *Lucidus, who had been accused of teaching predestinationism. Patiens made a name for himself through his works of charity: he ordered that grain be distributed during the invasion of the *Visigoths in 471. He died around 480; the date of his martyrdom is mentioned in the Mart. hier. as 11 September.

BS 10, 426-427; J.F. Reynaud, Lugdunum christianum: Lyon du IVe au VIIIe s.: Topographie, nécropoles et édifices religieux, Paris 1998.

V. Saxer - S. Held

PATRIARCHATE

I. Historical developments - II. Ecclesiological foundations - III. Canonical aspects.

The word patriarchate refers to an upper episcopal see and, from an institutional point of view, a superior ecclesial structure, possessing jurisdictional power and a privilege of honor over a vast geographical area.

I. Historical developments. Although the term patriarch appeared in ecclesiastical use and in official documents of the Byzantine Empire only from the 5th c. onward, as an institution of church government, the patriarchate began following the Constantinian turning point and more specifically with the Council of *Nicaea (can. 6), when the council fathers recognized the status and authority (exousia) of the episcopal sees of *Rome, *Alexandria and *Antioch, i.e., a true authority with responsibility and the capacity to serve as a doctrinal and disciplinary guide over other surrounding churches in large civil administrative areas. The arrangement (taxis) of importance attributed at that time to the three great sees, acc. to the order just listed, although following a civil custom (Flavius Josephus, Jewish War III, 23), was nonetheless established upon the awareness of the pre-Constantinian churches that the unity of Christ's church was expressed visibly in an ecclesiastical structure hierarchically ordered, with titular *bishops having particular responsibilities for the universal church. In fact, and only for practical reasons, the council simply gave legal form to the pastoral care, which for a long time the three great sees had exercised over communities and bishops residing beyond the boundaries of their own see. Together with the bishops of the three large cities, the council fathers at Nicaea also included the bishop of *Jerusalem, to whose see, however, they assigned "acc. to ancient tradition and custom," only a place of honor without the corresponding universal pastoral duties (can. 7).

At the Second Ecumenical Council of 381, to the four previously mentioned sees another was added, namely, *Constantinople, which was elevated to the second place of honor "because it is the new Rome" (can. 3). In 451, notwithstanding the protests of the papal legates, the decision was confirmed by the Council of *Chalcedon (can. 28), which greatly increased the pastoral faculties of the new Rome, assigning to it honors equal to the First See of Rome and the right of ordaining the metropolitan bishops of Asia, *Pontus and *Thrace (can. 9; 17; 28). On the grounds that Jerusalem was the city of Christ's *resurrection, the council also approved the agreements reached between *Juvenal and *Maximus of Antioch, so that the See of Jerusalem might become independent from the jurisdiction of *Antioch, also conferring upon it powers over the three Palestinian provinces (after the year 400, *Palestine had been subdivided into three administrative provinces: I, II and III, with their respective capitals in *Jerusalem, *Scythopolis and *Petra).

II. Ecclesiological foundations. With Chalcedon, the definitive structure of the patriarchal institution became consolidated, already having been formed by its Nicene origins, not to create a foil against the primacy of Rome, but to meet the demands of centralization for episcopal authority over large Eastern geographical areas in such a way that all the bishops around the patriarch, who depended upon him, might be able to exercise their pastoral authority for the universal church. In fact, although Chalcedon's subdivision was unanimously accepted by the E bishops, Rome did not accept its 28th can. because of the ecclesiological principle it had adopted for individuating the episcopal sees to be created by patriarchal sees. The Eastern bishops had a pragmatic understanding of the canons of Nicaea, Constantinople and Chalcedon in relation to the arrangement (taxis) of the future patriarchal sees, and they justified the elevation of Constantinople to "have the primacy of honor after the Bishop of Rome" (can. 3 of the Council of 381) because of its political importance. At Chalcedon, this interpretation was more explicit than at first, from the moment that they spoke of the ancient privileges granted to the See of Rome and the rights that therefore could not be attributed to Constantinople because "the city is honored by the presence of the emperor and the Senate" (can. 28). The weakness of the adoption of the sole "political" principle, in the event that it be taken up as the sole support of the patriarchal see, can be seen in its ecclesiological implications. According to this idea, any episcopal see could theoretically be elevated to a supra-metropolitan see on the condition that it corresponded to the will of God expressed by the "consensus" of all the bishops, with conciliar sanction.

At Rome, however, the popes opposed the "political" subdivision of the church universal's territory on the basis of another principle that had already been deeply rooted in the West as a result of earlier debates with *gnosticism: the "apostolic" Petrine foundation belonging only to the sees of Rome, Alexandria and Antioch. After having affirmed the Roman understanding of the *apostolicity of the three sees, *Leo the Great warned in May of 452 in a letter to *Marcian: Alia tamen ratio est rerum saecularium, alia divinarum, nec praeter illam petram, quam Dominus in fundamento posuit, stabilis erit ulla constructio ("Nevertheless, there is one way of thinking acc. to things of the world, another acc. to things of the divine, and, aside from that rock which the Lord laid in the foundation, no other building will stand"; Ep. 104, PL 54, 995 AB). Leo's understanding could have derived from the Decretum Gelasianum*, if one accepts that its original core dates back to Pope *Damasus, where the apostolic foundation of the Roman Church is defended and where one also finds an interpretation of can. 6 of Nicaea that understands the privileges granted to Rome, Alexandria and Antioch, on the basis of a "Petrine" foundation of the three churches (E. von Dobschütz, Das Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, Leipzig 1912, 7; PL 13, 374D-376A). Moreover, at Rome a "mystical" understanding of papal authority developed (Y. Congar), owed to the presence of Peter's tomb in the city, an understanding that in itself would not have led to a special authority of the pope over the other bishops and which at certain times the same Eastern bishops would recognize as a title of honor.

In all actuality, in the history preceding Chalcedon, the two principles of "political" and "apostolic" found an equal attestation of ecclesiological acceptance when one examines the awareness of the use in the traditions of the various patriarchal sees. Even in Constantinople, where the "political" principle prevailed and where the apostolic foundation of the church certainly could not be invoked, accepting the "apostolic" Petrine principle did not consign itself to a certain forced theological interpretation of the unity of the churches. On the basis of the apostolic principle, the council fathers at Chalcedon, and much later *Anatolius of Constantinople, appealed to the "apostolic" mediation of Rome, so that a ray of its apostolic light would most surely shine on the new Rome (ACO tom. II, vol. I, pars 118; PL 54, 958). Because it was one with Rome, Constantinople could also call itself "apostolic" (W. de Wries, in var. aus., I Patriarcati orientali, 32; 13-35).

On the other hand, aware of the apostolic foundation of its universal primacy, between the 4th and 11th c., the papacy never once appealed to its patriarchal power over the West even though the Justinian idea of pentarchy was accepted and even though the Easterners turned to the pope as the patriarch of the West and his Lateran See was called a patriarchium. In the West, the jurisdiction of Rome originally extended to the territories that fell under the civil prefecture of Rome, and the bishops who had special relations and obligations to the pope were named suburbicari. Thereafter, moreover, Rome did not invoke any rights for ordaining Western metropolitans and forwarded to a lesser extent its patriarchal rights over important Western sees such as those of *Milan, *Aquileia, those of *Gaul or *England. Only in 742, because of the extension of Western Christianity with the conversion of new peoples—to promote doctrinal unity and Western discipline—Rome decreed that the metropolitans of the West needed to go to the pope to receive the pallium (Y. Congar, L'ecclésiologie, 204-205). Lastly, with the new millennium, the urgency to make effective the reception of the Roman primacy in episcopal unity led Gregory VII (1073–1085) to transfer the "mystical" understanding of the primacy into institutional power, "established by God and non-negotiable" (J. Meyendorff, 30). Even in the East, however, when the pentarchia ceased its activities due to the loss of imperial control over the Middle East and Egypt to the invading Islamic forces, it was inevitable that the patriarch of Constantinople, who for centuries was the point of reference for the Eastern episcopate, became the sole spokesman of the Eastern Church and his patriarchate became the only center for the missionary expansion of orthodox Christianity.

III. Canonical aspects. Even with Justinian the patriarchal institution found a legislative ratification under pentarchical form. The patriarchate was, more properly, the expression of Eastern ecclesiology—albeit with Rome included nonetheless—and was imposed on a eucharistic vision of the church along with the awareness that the church is made up of a multiplicity of local churches in *communion, placed on a level of perfect equality. In the West, after centuries of events with different outcomes (A. Garuti), the Second Vatican Council reevaluated the ancient patriarchal institution (Lumen gentium 23; Unitatis redintegratio 14; Orientalium ecclesiarum 9); nonetheless, in continuity with the preceding code of canon law, the 1983 Code (Codex Iuris Canonici—CIC) specified that in the Latin church the patriarch is not the one who possesses a power of governance but is solely the bearer of a title of honor, "unless the contrary is clear in some instances and in virtue of apostolic privileges or approved custom" (can. 438). On the other hand, the code of canon law for the Eastern Churches (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium) states that the institution of the patriarchate is a recognized structure of government and it is extensively treated in cans. 55-150, always acc. to Catholic ecclesiology, in connection to the primacy of the Roman pontiff. The patriarch is recognized as having "a personal, ordinary and proper power" over the faithful, clergy, bishops and metropolitans of his own patriarchal church (can. 78), for maintaining the unity of his own church in the faith, and hierarchical communion with the Apostolic See and other churches (D. Salachas).

To support ecumenism, after the Second Vatican Council theologians sought for theological entry points into the ecumenical dialogue of the Latin church with those of the East in assessing the pope's title as Patriarch of the West, a title that in reality does not appear in the conciliar documents and not even in Paul VI's Apostolic Constitution Romano Pontifici eligendo (1 October 1975) but only in the Annuario Pontificio, and which was a title of honor in compliance with can. 438 of CIC. Nevertheless, in 2006 such ecumenical entry points became unfeasible because among the pope's titles that the 2006 Annuario listed, that of Patriarch of the West no longer appeared. In a statement released by the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, which accompanied the notice of the suppression of the title (22 March 2006), an explanation is given for both the ambiguity of the title, which was used very sparingly in the tradition, and also for the inadequacy of the term "West" in today's cultural context. That notwithstanding, the statement justifies the suppression of the title for ecumenical reasons. In effect, the patriarchal ideal, contaminated down through history by the connection between the patriarchate and political power, does not render an authentic service to actual ecumenical dialogue (J.-G. Boeglin, 535), which is attuned to an ecclesiological and cultural context in which the respective autonomies of the church and other power structures should be effectively safeguarded.

E. Eid, La figure juridique du Patriarche. Étude hist.-juridique, Rom 1962; W. de Wries, Die Entstehung der Patriarchate des Ostens und ihr Verhältnis zur päpstlichen Vollgewalt: Scholastik 37 (1962) 341-366; W. de Wries, Rom und die Patriarchate des Ostens, Freiburg-Munich 1963; O. Keramé, Le Cattedre apostoliche e la funzione dei Patriarcati nella Chiesa, in Y.M.J. Congar - B.D. Dupuy et al., L'Episcopato e la Chiesa universale, Rome 1965, 323-344; Y.M.J. Congar, L'ecclésiologie du haut Moyen âge, Paris 1968; var. aus., I Patriarcati orientali nel primo millennio. Relazioni del Congresso tenutosi al Pontificio Orientale nei giorni 27-30 Dicembre 1967, Rome 1968; V. Parlato, L'ufficio patriarcale nelle Chiese orientali dal IV al X secolo, Padua 1969; W. de Wries, Orient et Occident. Les structures ecclésiales vues dans l'histoire des sept premiers conciles œcuméniques, Paris 1974; Maxime de Sardes, Le Patriarcat Œcuménique dans l'Église orthodoxe, Paris 1975; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche. Dal concilio di Efeso (431) al secondo concilio di Costantinopoli (553), Brescia 1980; W. de Wries, Ortodossia e cattolicesimo, Brescia 1983; A. Garuti, Il papa patriarca d'Occidente? Riflessioni sull'origine del titolo: Antonianum 60 (1985) 42-85; V. Grumel - V. Laurent - J. Darrouzès, Les Regestes des Actes du Patriarcat de Constantinople, Paris (1932) 1989; R. Schiefer, Der Papst als Patriarch von Rom, in M. Maccarrone (ed.), Il primato del vescovo nel primo millennio, Vatican City 1991, 433-451; G. Dagron, Costantinopoli. Nascita di una capitale, Turin 1991; D. Salachas, Istituzioni di diritto canonico delle Chiese cattoliche orientali, Bologna 1993; F.R. Gahbauer, Patriarchat I: TRE 26 (1996) 85-91; J.-G. Boeglin, Pierre dans la communion des Églises, Paris 2004; J. Meyendorff, Lo scisma tra Roma e Costantinopoli, Magnano 2005; M.K. Magee, The Patriarchal Institution in the Church: Ecclesiological Pespectives in the Light of the Second Vatican Council, Rome 2006; A. Garuti, Patriarca d'Occidente? Storia e attualità, Bologna 2007.

V. Lombino

PATRICIANI. According to *Filaster (De haer. 62: CSEL 38, 32) the Patriciani originated from a certain Patricius, who lived at *Rome and taught that the human body was not created by God, but by the devil. Therefore, the Patriciani despised the body even to the point of suicide (see Aug., De haer. 61). They thus seem to have been a *gnostic sect (see Aug., C. adv. legis II, 12,40: PL 42, 664). The Praedestinatus* (61: PL 53, 608) adds that at times they asked others to put them to death and that the sect was widespread in *Mauretania and *Numidia, subsequently followed by the *Donatists (see also Ambrosiast., In I Ep. Tim. 4: PL 17, 499).

A. Di Berardino

PATRICIUS (d. 370/371). Husband of *Monica (Aug., Conf. 9,9,19) and curialis of the city of Thagaste in N *Africa (Conf. 2,3,5; Possidius, Vita Aug. 1,1). He was the father of three children: *Augustine, *Navigius and a daughter whose name is unknown (Possid., Vita Aug. 26,1). Though a *pagan, he respected *Monica's faith and the instruction she imparted to their children (Conf. I, 11,17). Although an average landowner, he, in agreement with his wife, greatly desired to help their son Augustine move up the social ladder by means of advanced study at *Carthage: at that time study was one of the primary means for social ascent (see Conf. II, 3,5 and II, 3,8). He succeeded with the help of a fellow citizen and relative, Romanianus, the father of Licentius (C. Academ. 2,2,3). Although at times given to anger and not very committed to marital fidelity, Patricius loved and respected his wife, even managing to win the devotion of his mother-in-law (Conf. IX, 9,20). Monica, in turn, with her sweetness and amiability, served Patricius and sought to convert him to Christianity (Conf. IX, 9,19). Patricius eventually converted (Conf. IX, 9,22) and died in 370/371, when Augustine was seventeen.

PCBE 1833-1834, W.H.C. Frend, The Family of Augustine: A Microcosm of Religious Change in North Africa, in Congresso Internazionale su S. Agostino nel XVI centenario della conversione, Rome, 15-20 settembre 1986, vol. 1, Rome 1987, 135-151; C. Lepelley, Spes saeculi. Le milieu social d'Augustin et ses ambitions séculières avant sa conversion, in ibid., 99-117; G. Madec, Le neveu d'Augustin: REAug 39 (1993) 149-153; R. Doni, La madre di Agostino. "Donna virile," Milan 2002.

A. Di Berardino

PATRICK, saint (d. ca. 492), apostle of *Ireland. The chronology of his life has been subject to much debate. From his writings one discovers that he was born in *Britain to the deacon Calpornius, a decurion, the son of Potitus, a *presbyter and landowner of a modest holding at Bannaventa Berniae (?), an unidentified locale, situated perhaps in the environs of Carlisle, near the Valley of Hadrian. Kidnapped by pirates at 16 years old, he worked in Ireland as a shepherd. After six years, he was able to escape and return to his homeland, probably passing through N *Gaul, where for two months (Conf. 21) he was also probably a prisoner of the *Franks (see Ep. 14). Having returned to his family, he felt called to the apostolate and pursued it, all opposition notwithstanding. There he prepared himself, he says, for a period that lasted several years (Conf. 23). This occurred—acc. to the biography of *Muirchú and *Tirechán—in Gaul, with *Germanus of Auxerre, and at *Lérins (which is very unlikely); instead, his preparation could have taken place in N Gaul (in one of several monastic settings modeled after St. *Martin, whose members were from the countryside and mostly illiterate) and also in Britain itself. Consecrated bishop, Patrick set sail (in 432, acc. to the chronology of the Irish Annals) to N Ireland, where he preached Christianity, reliving the experience of St. *Paul, whose epistles he cited continually. Being an itinerant bishop, he knew how to maintain good relations with the tribal chiefs (Conf. 52) and the local administrators (Conf. 53), in order to obtain free and safe passage to the country's most remote areas (Conf. 51). He pushed westward, toward the Woods of Fochluth (silva Vocluti), where he was formerly a prisoner (Ep. 10) and from where he had heard the call to come to Ireland (Conf. 23). Here the population was mostly pagan (Conf. 41) among which, until that time, no one had arrived to preach the gospel (Conf. 51). When a community of his neophytes was attacked by the Scots and the Picts, who were connected to the British tribal leader Ceretic Guletic, Patrick intervened by issuing a letter of excommunication (written in Latin) still extant.

In the 7th c., the primatial See of Armagh regarded Patrick as its own founder; other traditions made Dún Lethglaisse (Down) the place of his burial. From Armagh his cult spread until the 8th c. even onto the continent, due to the work of Irish missionaries, and there circulated many legends about him. His feast is celebrated 17 March.

Two of his writings have survived: the Epistola ad milites Corotici, against the British king probably from SW Scotland (Strathclyde), and the Confessions, written late in life. Writing in a vulgar Latin mixed with biblical words (because Patrick spoke Gaelic in Ireland and knew Latin primarily as a language of the Bible), he "confesses" God's mercy which has called him to evangelize Ireland. Presenting himself as a peccator rusticissimus, Patrick compares himself to the learned men of Britain who were probably adherents to *Pelagianism. Though choosing to evangelize the "barbaric" land of Ireland (see Ep. 1), Patrick remained deeply attached to his Romanized Celtic roots and thus to Gallic-Roman Christians (Ep. 14; Conf. 43).

The authenticity of the following works is doubtful: Epistola ad episcopos in Campo hAi (frag.) and the Dicta Patricii. In some of the canons of the first Synodus episcoporum, id est Patricii, Auxilii et Iserninі, some scholars believe they can find traces of Patrick's thought. The account of the prologue to Senchas Már is apocryphal, in which the codification of the Irish juridical traditions is attributed to an agreement reached between civil authorities, Fili and the bishops from the time of Loígaire, son of Niall, "King of Ireland," and *Theodosius "great king of the world"; acc. to late recensions, one of the bishops would have been Patrick.

Sharpe 1154; Lapidge-Sharpe 25-26; J.F. Kenney, The Sources of the Early History of Ireland, New York 1929, I, 29 and 323-329; CPL 1099-1100; 1102-1104.

Editions and translations: PL 53, 801-826; SC 249, 1978 (R.P.C. Hanson); L. Bieler, Libri epistolarum Sancti Patricii Episcopi: CM 11 (1950) 1-150; 12 (1951) 81-214; D. R. Howlett, The Book of Letters of Saint Patrick the Bishop, Dublin 1994; L. Bieler, The Irish Penitentials: SLH 5, Dublin 1963, 54-59; M.J. Faris, The Bishop's Synod, Liverpool 1976; E. Malaspina, Gli scritti di san Patrizio: Alle origini del cristianesimo irlandese, Rome 1985; D. Conneely - P. Bastable [et al.], The Letters of Saint Patrick: A Study of Their Theological Dimension, Maynooth 1993.

Biographical Sources: L. Bieler, Four Latin Lives of St. Patrick: SLH 8, 1971; Id., The Patrician Texts in the Book of Armagh: SLH 10, 1979; Id., The Life and the Legend of St. Patrick, Dublin 1949; F.J. Byrne - P. Francis, Two Lives of Saint Patrck: Vita Secunda and Vita Quarta: JRSAI 124 (1994) 5-117.

Studies: Chr. Mohrmann, The Latin of Saint Patrick, Dublin 1961; R.P.C. Hanson, Saint Patrick: His Origins and Career, Oxford 1968; D. A. Binchy, The Pseudo-historical Prologue to the Senchas Már: Studia Celtica 10/11 (1975/76) 15-28; P.A. Wilson, St. Patrick and Irish Christian Origins: Studia Celtica 14/15 (1979/80) 344-379; C.E. Standcliffe, Kings and Conversion: Some Comparisons Between the Roman Mission to England and Patrick's to Ireland: FMS 14 (1980) 59-94; E.A. Thompson, St. Patrick and Coroticus: JTS 31 (1980) 12-27; Ch. Thomas, Christianity in Roman Britain to AD 500, London 1981, 295-346; R. Sharpe, St Patrick and the See of Armagh: CMCS 4 (1982) 33-59; E. Malaspina, Patrizio e l'acculturazione latina dell'Irlanda, Rome 1984; E.A. Thompson, Who Was St. Patrick? Woodbridge 1985; K. McCone, Dubthach maccu Lugair and a Matter of Life and Death in the Pseudo-Historical Prologue to the Senchas Már: Peritia 5 (1986) 1-35; K. Devine, A Computer-Generated Concordance to the Libri Epistolarum of Saint Patrick, Dublin 1989; D.N. Dunville, ed., St Patrick, AD 493-1993, Woodbridge 1993; C. Bourke, Patrick: The Archaeology of a Saint, Belfast 1993; L. De Paor, Saint Patrick's World: The Christian Culture of Ireland's Apostolic Age, Blackrock 1993; R.M. Keogh, Does the Armorican Forest Hold the Key to Saint Patrick's Escape?: SHib 28 (1994) 145-158; T. Ó Fiaich, Saint Patrick and Armagh: SAM 16 (1995) 107-119; G. Márkus, What Were Patrick's Alphabets?: CMCS 31 (1996), 1-15; Th. O'Loughlin, Celtic Theology, London 2000; B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2003, 152-154.

E. Malaspina

PATRIMONY of ST. PETER. This expression came to refer to the sum total of possessions and properties that were acquired by the Roman See starting from the moment in which, with *Constantine's imperial law (CTh XVI, 2, 4), the church was recognized to have the right to possess, receive and inherit any type of good. Constantine himself was one of the first to donate various goods to the Apostolic See, primarily lands (in this article we are not going to discuss the so-called Donation of Constantine* because of its apocryphal character). After Constantine's donations and those of many other emperors, the faithful also contributed many gifts, a phenomenon that slowly increased the belongings and landholdings of the Roman pontiff, which, with the progression of time, took up the name Patrimonium Sancti Petri. Thus, because of the multiple historical, economic, social and political factors, the bishop of Rome initially became one of the largest landholders of his time, and subsequently a civil authority of enormous social influence, eventually to become a true and proper sovereign. Such a process of patrimonial growth was similar to the patrimonium principis discussed by Roman law.

Starting in the 6th c. various colonies of the Italian peninsula constituted part of the Petrine patrimony: Sicily, *Corsica, *Sardinia, N *Africa, *Gaul, *Dalmatia and certain areas of the East. *Gregory the Great (590–640) led a bold political administration, creating an efficient system of organization for the various territories of the pontifical patrimony. The economic benefits that resulted from this structure not only served to maintain the pontifical administration, but were also used to accomplish many works of social justice. With the passage of time and because of the unstable political situation, a portion of the income was set aside for the military defense of the Roman See. Already in the 8th c., in order to face the serious threat posed by the *Longobards, *Stephen II personally asked for protection from Pepin the Short, king of the *Franks. Moved not only by political interest, but also by an authentic, sincere and devout veneration for the Prince of the Apostles, Pepin not only guaranteed protection for Stephen II, but signed a pact with him (Donation of Pepin [Quierzy]), by which he pledged to restore to the Roman See the imperial Italian territories that had been occupied by the *Longobards. These landholdings constituted the initial nucleus of the pontifical states and consolidated the temporal power of the popes. (See also *papacy.)

G. Arnaldi, Le origini del Patrimonio di San Pietro, in G. Arnaldi - P. Toubert - D. Waley - J.-C. Maire Vigueur - R. Manselli, Comuni e signorie nell'Italia nordorientale e centrale. Lazio, Umbria e Marche, Lucca, Turin 1987, 3-151; Id., L'approvvigionamento di Roma e l'amministrazione del patrimonio di S. Pietro al tempo di Gregorio Magno: Studi Romani 34 (1986) 25-39; Id., Le origini dello Stato della Chiesa, Turin 1987; L. Duchesne, Les premiers temps de l'état pontifical, Paris 1904; B. Llorca - R. García Villoslada, Historia de la Iglesia Católica, II, Edad Media (800-1303): La cristiandad en el mundo europeo y feudal, Madrid 1963; R.A. Markus, Gregory the Great and His World, Cambridge 1997; V. Recchia, Gregorio Magno e la società agricola, Bari 1978 (bibl.).

J.A. Cabrera Montero

PATRIPASSIANS. The title the Latins used for referring to the *monarchians who were known in the East, starting from the mid-3rd c., such as the Sabellians and those whom modern scholars call "modalists," inasmuch as they made the Son a mode of being and manifestation of the *Father. The founder of this doctrine was *Noetus of Smyrna at the end of the 2nd c. He taught that, if God is only one, Christ, who is God, is to be identified with the Father, in the sense that he, presenting himself as the Son, was begotten as a man, suffered and rose again from the dead. In support of this doctrine he cited scriptural passages on the unicity of God (Ex 3:6; 20:3; Is 44:6 and others) from which he concluded that the Son is to be identified with the Father (Jn 10:30; 14:9-10), as well as Is 44:6; Bar 3:36-38; Rom 9:5. He offered an allegorical interpretation of Jn 1:1, on the basis of which the Logos theologians considered God the Son to be distinct from the Father.

Noetus was condemned by the presbyters of Smyrna, but *Epigonus introduced the doctrine at *Rome, where *Cleomenes and *Sabellius spread his teaching, as *Praxeas spread it at *Carthage. The type of patripassianism espoused by these individuals who flourished at the beginning of the 3rd c. was that of Noetus, but there was also a different version of the teaching: in the incarnate Christ the divine component represents the Father; the human, the Son; this latter suffered on the *cross, therefore, the Father did not suffer but sympathized with the Son. In fact, Lk 1:35 refers to the Son of God, the one born of *Mary. Moreover, the Philosoph. (IX, 10, 11) describes the patripassian doctrine at Rome in the following terms: the one same God manifested himself at one point as the Father, invisible, immortal, etc., at another, as the Son, visible, mortal, etc.

*Tertullian fought against this teaching at Carthage, and the Philosoph. did the same at Rome. *Callistus, around 220, condemned Sabellius at Rome for holding a via media (middle position) between the two extremes; but he himself professed a monarchian doctrine: the Father and the Son are distinguished in name, but not by substance (ousia); they are just one indivisible Spirit; their prosopon* (person) is also just one, distinct only in name. In the incarnation, the man is the Son, the divine Spirit that descended on him is the Father; thus the Father has also suffered with the Son. Callistus, like the patripassians, accused the Logos theologians of being ditheists.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884, 615-626; J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines, London 1958, 119-123; M. Slusser, The Scope of Patripassianism: SP 17, Oxford 1982, 169-175; LTK³ 7, 1470-71; M. Simonetti, Ippolito, Contro Noeto, Bologna 2000; A. Grillmeier, Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne. De l'âge apostolique au concile de Chalcédonie, Paris ²2003.

M. Simonetti

PATROCLUS, hermit (6th c.). The earliest information about Patroclus comes from his contemporary *Gregory of Tours (538–594) (Vitae Patrum IX: PL 71, 1051-1054; Hist. Franc. 5,10: PL 71, 325). Born in the area of the Bituriges (Avaricum), in the territory of Bourges (Avaricum, Bituriga, etc.), he was appointed by his father to shepherd the family's flock, while his brother Anthony attended school. Thereafter, he also attended, having much success. His scholastic achievements won him a position in the court of King Childebert, son of *Clovis and *Clotilde, at *Paris. Upon the death of his father he returned to his homeland and, against the wishes of his mother, turned to Bishop Arcadius (536–549), who admitted him into the clergy of Bourges. Because of his ascetic lifestyle, he was forced to separate from the local clergy and establish an oratory dedicated to St. *Martin of Tours at Néris-les-Bains, a small, ancient town of Roman *Gaul, where he applied himself to the instruction of children; Néris-les-Bains already had a presbytery and a church, traces of which have been preserved. His fame attracted visitors; he created a community of monks and retired to a solitary place to live as a hermit (Mediocantus, today La Celle, situated 7 km [4.3 mi] from Colombier). Other people followed him, for which reason, though continuing to live as a recluse, he established for them a monastery at Colombier, several km N from his hermitage, around 560. He died around the year 576; his body was transferred to the monastery of Colombier, which attracted pilgrims. Miracles occurred in that place. Patroclus was not mentioned in the ancient martyrologies, but in the 12th c. he was venerated by the monks of Souvigny. His feast is celebrated 16 November in the diocese of Moulins and 28 November at Bourges.

BHL 6519; BS 10, 416-17; Cath 10, 828-829; M. de Laugardière, L'Église de Bourges avant Charlemagne, Paris 1951, 80-83, and passim; R. Godding, Prêtres en Gaule mérovingienne, Brussels 2001, 508.

A. Di Berardino

PATROCLUS of Arles (d. 426). In 412, Patroclus replaced Heros as bishop, who had been caught up in the fall of the usurper *Constantine, who resided at *Arles from 409 to 411. Despite his atypical advancement in the hierarchy, he worked his way up during the time of Pope *Zosimus (417–418), at whose ordination he was present. He immediately obtained from the pope the parishes of Ceyeste and Garguier on the pretext that they had been wrongly taken by Proculus of *Marseille. Furthermore, he caused the metropolitan's rights to extend over Viennensis and Narbonensis I and II, to the detriment of *Vienne, *Narbonne and Aix. He manipulated the apostolate of St. *Trophimus, who had been supposedly sent by the apostle *Peter to occupy the See of Arles, to act as metropolitan and dominate and wield the episcopal sees as a means to his ends. *Boniface (418–422), however, the successor of Pope Zosimus, ceased to continue his predecessor's policy and did not renew Patroclus's exorbitant privileges. Patroclus was entangled in the political storm that followed the emperor *Honorius's death (423) and was assassinated (426).

G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste im 5. und 6. Jahrhundert, Bonn 1964; Storia del cristianesimo, vol. II (index).

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PATROLOGY - PATRISTICS

I. Meaning of terms - II. Origins and development (17th-19th c.) - III. Patristics in the 20th c.

The reception and use of the *Fathers during the Middle Ages and Renaissance is treated under the entry *Father, Fathers of the church; in this entry we will treat the most recent period.

The title "father" (Lat. pater) provided the source for the term "patrology," then "patristics"; two related terms that tend to be distinguished. The individual who coined the term patrology was the Lutheran scholar J. Gerhard (d. 1637) in his posthumous study Patrologia sive de primitivae Ecclesiae Christianae Doctorum vita ac lucubrationibus, which appeared at Jena in 1653; the book includes authors from *Hermas to Bellarmine.

I. Meaning of terms. The term patrology tends to refer primarily to historical and literary study (life and works) of ancient Christian writers. A certain number of historians prefer to speak of "the history of ancient Christian literature," a title shared by numerous works, with different origins and tendencies (Batiffol, Puech, Labriolle, Bardy, Moricca, Pellegrino, Moreschini-Norelli and Simonetti-Prinzivalli). At the beginning, patristic was an adjective, which was understood to refer to "theology." In the 17th c., it appeared in the writings of Lutheran and Catholic theologians who distinguished theology into the following categories: biblical, patristic, scholastic, symbolic and speculative. Today, those who prefer this term privilege the study of ideas and doctrines over the philological and literary aspects. The first patrologists did not outline rigid borders between ancient Christianity and the Middle Ages; they simply gave the name "Fathers" to earlier writers, as is the case in the ancient Bibliothecae Patrum, which go until the 15th and 16th c. Mabillon himself still considers St. Bernard of Clairvaux to be "the last of the Fathers." Migne followed this idea in his Patrologia (to the consternation of J.B. Pitra). Modern authors, however, have set more precise limits. They maintain that the age of the Fathers ended with *Gregory the Great or *Isidore of Seville for the Latins and *John of Damascus for the Greeks. Certain modern authors would like to include the Venerable *Bede and Byzantinism. *Eusebius of Caesarea can be considered the precursor of the Patrologia. In his Ecclesiastical History, he supplies us with an invaluable history of early Christian authors and their works, providing large quotes from their writings. In the De. vir. ill., *Jerome wrote 135 short biographies, taken in loose, logical order, which go from Simon *Peter to *Sophronius, ending modestly with himself. Eusebius was a great source of inspiration for this work. The best pieces of information come from those on his contemporaries. The work of Jerome was continued by *Gennadius of Marseille, who added a hundred new biographies; this work is extremely valuable for the 5th c. The continuation of *Isidore of Seville and *Ildefonsus of Toledo extends primarily to Spanish writers.

II. Origins and development (17th-19th c.). The Renaissance and the invention of the printing press helped spread patristic writings. The first text was an *apocryphal work of *Augustine, De vita christiana, printed at Mainz in 1461. Then, in the 16th and 17th c., the printing of patristic texts reached a feverish pitch. In fact, there were more than 20 editions of *Tertullian's Opera Omnia between the publication of the editio princeps in 1521, released by B. Rhenano, and the last edition of the 17th c.

Erasmus's efforts were preceded by famous publishers who were assisted by philologists such as Robert Estienne (d. 1559) and his son Henry. We should also mention here the Franciscan Feuardent (d. 1610), the author of a series of patristic editions; the Jesuit Fronton du Duc (d. 1624), editor of *John Chrysostom, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Basil of Caesarea; J. Sirmond (d. 1651), historian and editor of the writings of the Fathers, *Fulgentius, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, Eusebius of Caesarea and *Rufinus, and of the collection Concilia antiqua Galliae; the Dominican F. Combefis (d. 1678), who published *Maximus the Confessor's writings and a vast collection of patristic homilies; the historian Etienne Baluze (d. 1718), who, among other things, prepared the Conciliorum nova collectio (New Collection of Councils); J.B. Cotelier (d. 1686) who, at Paris, established a catalog of Greek MSS and published three volumes of the Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta (The Written Works of the Greek Church).

In England, one should at least mention Henri Savile (d. 1622), cofounder of the Bodleian library, who made a noteworthy edition of John Chrysostom's works, using the best MSS available at the time; in Germany, J.A. Fabricius (d. 1736), philologist and editor of the writings of *Hippolytus and *Filaster (1721). To these one should add the work of the équipe of the Maurists and the Bollandists. In fact, in the course of the 16th c. scientific historiography began with the work of Cardinal Baronius (1538–1607), with his Annales Ecclesiastici, and the Jesuit Jean Bolland (1596–1665), founder of the Acta Sanctorum, and continued by the Society of the Bollandists, among whom one should note the name of P. Peeters (1887–1950) and H. Delehaye (1859–1941), the latter considered to be the greatest modern scholar of hagiography. The work continues thanks to the work of the Congregation of the Maurist Fathers, in the Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Près at Paris, a center for the promotion of learning and historical and philological renewal. Among the Maurists, one should mention Jean Mabillon (1632–1707) and Bernard de Montfaucon (1655–1741), founder of Greek *paleography.

In the 19th c. Jacques Paul Migne (1800–1875) collected the writings of the Greek and Latin Fathers in two series under the same generic title Patrologia; the collection included all partial publications and the large editions of the Fathers, bringing together in one locus the Bibliotechae, Spicilegia, Analecta, Anecdota, Miscellanea, Monumenta and Reliquiae, published since the invention of the printing press. He also added the historical, critical and theological studies of earlier centuries—valuable resources that scholars can still consult to this day and that would be difficult to find elsewhere.

Starting from the mid-19th c., K. Lachmann formulated and applied more rigorous criteria for creating critical editions; patristic texts and the new "corpus" now benefit from his efforts, esp. the CSEL, GCS, SC and CCL. The East has its own place in the PO, PS and the CSCO.

III. Patristics in the 20th c. This rich area of research has been enormously enlarged; monographs and specialized journals have accumulated. Every year, the bibl. on *Origen and *Augustine requires numerous pages. Patristic study has been enriched thanks to the discovery of new Latin, Greek and Eastern texts that have increased the dossier. To create the Supplementum for just the Patrologia Latina, four volumes were required. The most surprising recent discoveries have been those of the following scholars: Dolbeau, who found 20 of Augustine's Sermons, all of which were published in 1996; Frede, in 1983–1984, who discovered a Latin MS of the Pauline Epistles along with a complete anonymous commentary; and Divjak, in 1981, who found 30 letters, 25 of which were Augustine's.

*Papyrology and *epigraphy have brought forth unpublished texts such as Origen's Disputation with Heraclides, *Didymus's commentaries on Genesis, Job and Zechariah, discovered at Tura in 1941. The *Nag Hammadi Library has opened a new phase in the study of *gnosticism. More modest papyri allow us to become better acquainted with the daily life of the early Christians. Moreover, archaeology enriches patristics, which explains the large amount of space devoted to this subject in this encyclopedia.

Papyri, translations, fragments, precise inventories of MSS favor the ever more rigorous editions of ancient texts, which benefit also a deeper understanding of Christian Greek and Latin.

The contribution of philology has allowed true progress with respect to the fascination with and study of ancient texts. It is not by chance that Adolf von Harnack's works have been reissued in anastic reprints, notwithstanding their unequal historical value. After the school of Uppsala, that of Nijmegen has taught us to discern better the originality of Christian Latin. The questions of authenticity and chronology have been studied with new rigor, the sources of authors accurately and patiently analyzed. The Sitz im Leben, the cultural, religious, political, social, literary and philosophical atmosphere have been minutely explored. The way opened by F.J. Dölger in his comparison between Antiquity and Christianity has brought forth abundant fruit. Studies in this area offer a new reading with greater consistency in interpretation and more objective analysis.

The 2nd half of the 20th c. has been esp. rich in various contributions to patristics studies; some series of texts have reached their 50th anniversary: the International Conference on Patristics, Oxford; Sources Chrétiennes; and the Corpus Christianorum. Scholars at the Oxford Patristics Conference in the first fifty years of its well-attended meetings (almost a thousand participants gather every four years) offered the most studies on the following authors: Augustine, followed immediately by Origen, Gregory of Nyssa, John Chrysostom and Basil the Great. The conference has also witnessed a geographical change in the provenance of scholars. In fact, in the two last patristic conferences of the century (1995 and 1999) the number of participants from the United States has surpassed those of Britain, which was historically the most numerous group, followed by the French, Germans and Italians, but Japanese, Indian and South African scholars have also attended. Every four years international patristic conferences are organized also in France and Australia, a bit more restricted but not inferior in quality. The centers for patristics studies have multiplied: to list just the most recent would be too long. We mention here the annual patristic conferences held at the Augustinianum (Rome) and the Centre for Early Christian Studies, created in 1997 in Australia. Moreover, during this time, with respect to the initial project of the CCL, the direction has had to forgo quantity in favor of quality, slowing down the rate of publication, but publishing a series of critical editions of the highest level, some entirely innovative (Simonetti). The effort has also been technological, because various editions of CD-ROMs and online editions have been published containing the original texts in electronic format (as is the case also for the PL and TLG) and lexicographical instruments of the CCL. With respect to the SC, the quality of the volumes published has improved as much as it has with the CCL.

Furthermore, in these fifty years, various patristic associations have been created, including in 1965 the AIEP/IAPS (Association Internationale d'Études Patristiques/International Association of Patristic Studies), and associations at both the national and international levels are now beginning to form (e.g., Canada, United States [1970] and Hungary).

The topics most frequently studied by scholars range from the Bible of the Fathers and patristic exegesis to *Manicheism, *apocryphal texts, the relations between Christianity, Hellenism and *Judaism, the history of Christian spirituality, *monasticism, the Origenist controversy, ecclesiology, the liturgy etc. (Di Berardino).

To all these areas one could add the influence the Fathers exerted on the subsequent centuries; scholars have been able to determine to what extent Tertullian, Origen, *Lactantius and Augustine were able to shape the thought of all Europe.

Though once reserved to the domain of the clergy (like theology), patristics has entered the public domain, drawing the interests of religious and nonreligious scholars, Christians and non-Christians, who gather together to study the Fathers, bringing their own philological and philosophical learning to the discussions. The Fathers have now found their own place in general literature and can be found widely represented on the Internet with bibliographies, texts and translations.

E. Amann, Pères de l'Église: DTC 12, 1192-1215 (summary of the discussions on the term); see also the manuals of Altaner and Quasten; H.R. Drobner, Lehrbuch der Patrologie, Freiburg 1994, 3-4; Les Pères de l'Église au XVII^e^ siècle: actes du colloque de Lyon, 2-5 octobre, 1991, publiés par E. Bury et B. Meunier, Paris 1993 (with an extensive bibl. on the topic); H. Rosweyde, Jean Bolland et la recherche des documents. Le "Memoriale pro R.P. Silvestro Pietrasancta": Analecta Bollandiana 120 (2002) 141-150. For the modern editions and translations: De studio theologiae patristicae et historicae: Seminarium 17 (1977) (fine tuned to the work of specialists). See the manuals: Quasten 1, 17-21; Altaner 33ff. For bibl., see L'Année Philologique (a large amount of space has been devoted to the Fathers) and Bibliographia Patristica. A.G. Hamman, Pour un aggiornamento des manuels de patrologie et de patristique: TU 107, 1970, 95-99; Id., Jacques Paul Migne. Le retour aux Pères de l'Église, Paris 1975; Id., Pour une lecture concrete des textes: TU 125 (1982) 285-292; Id., L'épopée du livre. La transmission des textes anciens, du scribe à l'imprimerie, Paris 1985; A. Di Berardino, Tendenze attuali negli studi patristici, in Complementi interdisciplinari di patrologia, ed. A. Quacquarelli, Rome 1989, 25-70; Id., Orientations actuelles des recherches patristiques, in Les Pères de l'Église au XX^e^ siècle: Histoire-Littérature-Théologie. "L'aventure des Sources chrétiennes," Paris 1997, 379-402; Id., Lo sviluppo degli studi patristici, in La Teologia del XX secolo, un bilancio, I, ed. G. Canobbio - P. Coda, Rome 2003, 327-357; M. Simonetti, Novant'anni di filologia patristica, in La filologia medievale greca e latina nel secolo XX, Atti del Congr. Int., Rome 1993, 17ff.; P. Maraval, Le Centre d'Analyse et de Documentation Patristiques. Histoire et bilan de trente ans d'existence: Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 76 (1996) 211-221 (Biblia Patristica); P.H. Poirier et al., Littérature et histoire du christianisme ancien: Laval théologique et philosophique 57 (2001) 337-365; 563-604; and 58 (2002), 357-394; J. Leemans, Fifty Years of Corpus Christianorum (1953–2003). From Limited Edition Project to Multi-located Scholarly Enterprise, in Corpus Christianorum 1953–2003, Xenium Natalicium, ed. J. Leemans, Turnhout 2003, 9-55; M. Simonetti, La teologia dei Padri, in Lo sviluppo degli studi patristici, in La Teologia del XX secolo, un bilancio, I, ed. G. Canobbio - P. Coda, Rome 2003, 359-389; TLG (Thesaurus Linguae Graecae), University of California, Irvine.

A. Hamman - J. Leal

PATRON. This investigation on the nature and the function of the patron begins with some observations on the etymological range and the functional capacities that the term had from its first appearance in the Latin West. The concept of patronus, in its full legal sense, represented primarily one of two sides of an unequal relationship in which the second party was the cliens, the libertus or the discipulus. The cliens, who did not enjoy the Roman civitas in the full sense of the term, found himself in an inferior state and obligated toward the patron, and for this reason, he soon also sought his protection. From this legal disparity would also necessarily derive the responsibility of the patron for the client (Dion. Hal., Ant. 2,9,3; Plut., Rom. 13). At the end of the age of the Republic, during Caesar's time, it seems that the cliens relationship ceased to be one of obligation—with the exception of freed slaves who remained bound by obligation to the those who had freed them—and instead became a voluntary relationship (Cic., Orat. 1,177). During the imperial period, the relationship of the patron remained voluntary. The patron was a respectable citizen who received praise and reverence from a large number of clients, to the extent that he merited having statues dedicated to him (Plin., Nat. hist. 34,4-5). It was not rare, however, that the use of the term patronus conveyed not only the idea of protection for people, but also of things, ideas and ways of being (Cicero speaks of Caesaris actorum patroni: Cic., Philipp. 10,16). There are, however a few passages that attribute the human title patron to a divinity: Plautus provides a case in point; he defined Venus as the patrona of a priestess consecrated to her service (Plautus, Rudens 258). Therefore, one can maintain that gradually the category of patronus came to lose its legal basis; one witnesses the shift of the term toward metaphorical meanings.

The semantic meanings of the pre-Christian period do not lack testimonies of a patronage relationship between a private Roman citizen and a civil community. They speak in these instances of patronus civitatis, patronus pagi, municipii, provinciae and coloniae. During the imperial period, the position of the patron of a community lost its historical meaning: from an intermediary between the conquered peoples and the senate, the patron tended to be transformed into a generic protector, almost a doer of public works as it were toward the client community. During this period, however, the bond between the community and its patron tended to occur in a restricted context, and in fact the patron was usually a native of the civitas that chose him to be its protector.

When the imperial power began losing strength, the subsequent decline of the municipal bodies reduced the patron-city relationship to an honorific title on the one hand; on the other hand, the weight of the bureaucracy and the fiscal burdens brought about the need to have recourse—esp. on the part of the inhabitants of the peripheral settlements in the countryside—to the great landowners or army officials to obtain special help against the tax revenue authorities. Such help, however, always required a quid pro quo, i.e., the cessation of all one's own rights. This practice would be called patrocinium (Cod. Theod. 11,24,1). With the backdrop of the decline of the city's governmental bodies, one should analyze the figure of the defensor civitatis*, who was responsible not only for juridical representation but also for providing protection against every abuse. In this regard, this person was the equivalent to the patronus, even though the latter originated from the official norms and the other from custom.

At the lexical level, Latin authors often used the term patronus as the equivalent of defensor civitatis, often creating great confusion. The term defensor, however, soon and with great success, entered into Christianity, although the same was not the case for the defensor civitatis.

From these extended meanings came the first reflections of Christian writers, who already from the beginning of the 2nd half of the 4th c. focused primarily on the veneration of the martyr *saints, whom they trusted to obtain intercession. If during the period of *persecution, in fact, the ideal of holiness was recognized in the *martyrs, then with the advance of the peace of the church and the recognition of Christianity as a religio licita, the figures of the monks and the confessores were venerated and took on the role of protectors of single individuals or groups. In the same way, the disintegration of the empire and the invasions of foreign peoples led the people to identify the sanctity of life with the commitment to survival and the support of the city, and with the defense of the communities from the invasions caused by natural disasters and barbaric invasions.

For the entire 4th c., Christian authors showed great familiarity with the classical meanings of the terms and the phenomenon of its change from the civil duty with the ensuing loss of the semantic meaning strictly connected to it (*Minucius Felix, *Cyprian, Arnobius, *Tertullian, *Lactantius, *Ausonius, *Augustine and *Jerome).

Though the pre-Christian use of the term continued, the vocabulary of patronage also entered Christian language, bringing with it the images and metaphors of the civil world. Though its meanings remained intact, it seems that there was a transferal of horizons, in the sense that the community of which they spoke began to refer to the heavenly community.

*Ambrose spoke of the martyrs as those who performed their ministry of patronage in favor of the living. In a manner similar to the civil authority, the martyr performed this protective function for the chief Authority, almost as if he were the highest magistrate of heaven (Exp. Ev. sec. Luc. 10,12: CSEL 32, 460). The martyr, the patronus par excellence during this period, held an almost juridical relationship among the faithful, inasmuch as he agreed to offer the faithful protection, offering them his own intercession before God. At the same time his remains became a pledge, a guarantee: his body and his *relics guaranteed the protection and defense of the church or city that protected them. In Ambrose's writings, two specific senses of the term emerge: advocatus of individuals who enjoy his protection and defense of the entire community. The bishop's contribution therefore was the fact that he inserted into the official Christian language a concept that was formulated however by other writers (e.g., *Victricius of Rouen and *Sulpicius Severus).

*Paulinus of Nola exerted decisive influence in forwarding the idea of a saint's predilection for a given community. He constantly attributed the term patronus to St. *Felix, who was the patron of the poet, the city of *Nola and the local Christian community. The passages that attest to personal patronage reveal that the traditional values of the bond of patronage that tied Paulinus to Felix have by that point been turned into a celestial dimension: the relationship is not restricted to a specific time, but is eternal, and Felix is a patronus, susceptor (the one who patronizes and defends at the tribunal) and dominus (dominaedius, as Paulinus says). In relation to the saint, Paulinus refers to himself as an alumnus and a mancipium, i.e., the libertus of the saint (Carm. 18,1-5; 20,11-12; 21,85-190: CSEL 30, 97.143.164). The passages, however, that attest to a patronage over a city refer both to the heavenly protection of the saint over the city of Nola, and the attribution to Felix of the title patronus caelis over the city itself (Carm. 13,26-27; 19,153: CSEL 30,45.123).

From his writings, one discovers that the living who do not possess full rights in the heavenly city are placed under the protection of the one who does. They not only protect but also lead them to liberty, causing them to seize full heavenly citizenship. Paulinus himself, moreover, mentions the *patron saints of various regions or cities among whom, alongside the *apostles and martyrs, appear the great recently deceased bishops such as *Ambrose for Italy, *Martin for *Gaul, *Delphinus for Aquitaine (Carm. 19,153: CSEL 30, 123). In this perspective, Paulinus heavily emphasizes the similarity between *Rome, the guardian of the apostles, and *Nola, protected by the presence of Felix (Carm. 13,28; 14,85: CSEL 45.49). First in the writings of Ambrose, then in those of Paulinus—both of whom came from famous families and thus possessed the canonical cursus honorum—the term patronus evolved and took on the idea of patronage over individual cities.

In the mid-5th c., moreover, hagiographical texts were added to the literary corpus. The Passio Genesii provides an example because it speaks of *Genesius as the patron of *Arles (CSEL 29, 425-428). Similarly, in the Passio Symfronianii, Symphronianus is the patronus et defensor patriae suae of the city Autun (in AASS Aug. 4, 496-497). Likewise in the 5th c., the expressions tending to express the special bond between a saint and a community multiplied, including peculiaris patronus or peculiare patrocinium, which were intended to show that, in addition to the intercession of the *saints over every region, certain places enjoyed a special assistance (see *Maximus of Turin and the Vita of Amator of Auxerre). The title peculiaris patronus was attributed to the saints and native bishops of the city (Cesarius of Arles attributes a patronus peculiaris to St. Genesius in Sermo 225,1: CCL 104, 888) or to those who are connected to the city for having suffered martyrdom in it (Valerian of Cim., Hom. de bono martyrii 15,5: PL 52, 740C). *Avitus of *Vienne, moreover, attests that the presence of a patron also determines a social phenomenon, i.e., the modification and growth of the civil conglomeration following the presence of the local martyr whose cult, with the presence of pilgrims, determines the transformation of simple towns (oppida) into cities (Hom. 28-29: MGH AA 6, 2, 150).

The authors of the 6th c. do not offer any substantial novelties to the evolution of the term patronus, even if *Cassiodorus, writing in 533, for the first time in Latin Christian literature, attributed the title "patroni of Rome" to *Peter and *Paul (Var. 11,2,6-7: CCL 96, 427-428). From the literary sources of this period, and in a manner widespread in the hagiographical sources, it seems that the person of the *bishop assumed a new role, precisely that of a protector. This phenomenon was widespread esp. in those cities that lacked the presence of a martyr or his or her relics and had recourse to the bishop and his intercession. Starting from the time of the emperor *Constantine, the bishop was no longer a simple institution of juridical government within the church; rather, he entered into the juridical structure of the empire in the full sense of the term. He represented a point of reference for the defense of the citizens' freedom. From the end of the 4th c. to the mid-7th, in fact, the guardian role of the bishop and his juridical capacity, which do not seem to have undergone substantial modifications with respect to what had been established in the imperial laws, would take on such an importance that the survival of the bishop would also determine the survival of the civil community.

The bishop assumed a role of primary importance both for the dignity of his position and the exercise of various public functions. The responsibilities of the bishop can be thus synthesized: the capacity primarily to watch and protect. For this reason, he was a supporter of the needy, the one who received the orphans and pilgrims, the redeemer of prisoners (as in the case of Namatius of Vienne and Sergius of Tarragona). He was also the intercessor for the believers before every power, public or private, a strange phenomenon very scattered in the hagiographical literature of the 5th and 6th c. The liberation of those imprisoned always pertained to the bishop (Sulp. Sev., Dial. 3,4: CSEL 1, 201), a characteristic that, in addition to representing a literary topos, had a certain relevance with the Justinian legislation for the regions of the East and Italy. From the testimonies of the 6th-7th c., scholars have concluded that the bishop possessed additional responsibilities: intervening in aid of those purely human needs of civil society, in the case of a natural disaster such as a fire and in the defense of the community from external threats such as the barbarians.

When a person presents all these characteristics or even just one of them, grounds are established for a community to choose its own bishop as a patron whose virtues have been recognized, because in the mind of the faithful the functions performed by the bishop in life do not end with his death, but continue even when he enters the afterlife (Greg. Tours, Vit. patr. 17,4: MGH Scr. mer. 1, 731; Gennad., Script. eccl. 1: PL 58, 1062; Dynam., Vita Maximi 7: PL 80, 36). As had occurred already for the martyrs and even for the bishops, from the 5th c. onward, the bond of preference and protection that began with his own city and community was maintained in a more efficacious manner if the citizens made sure to preserve his mortal remains (Gennad., Script. eccl. 1: PL 58, 1062; Dynam., Vita Maximi 7: PL 80, 36).

RAC 3, 649-656; A.M. Orselli, L'idea e il culto del santo patrono cittadino nella letteratura latina cristinana, Bologna 1965; A.M. Orselli, Il santo patrono cittadino: genesi e sviluppo del patrocinio del vescovo nei secoli VI e VII, in Agiografia Altomedievale, Bologna 1976, 85-104; A.M. Orselli, Il santo patrono cittadino fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto medioevo, Rome 1981, 771-784; W. Speyer, Die Hilfe und Epiphanie einer Gottheit, eines Heroen und eines Heiligen in der Schlacht, in E. Dassmann - K.S. Frank (eds.), Pietas, Münster 1980, 55-77; R. Wisskirchen, Christus – Apostelfürsten – Heilige – Stifter. Zur Stellung und Beziehung von Einzelfiguren oder Gruppen in Mosaiken stadtrömischer Kirchen, in E. Dassmann (ed.), Chartulae, Münster 1998, 295-310; F. Canali De Rossi, Il ruolo dei patroni nelle relazioni politiche fra il mondo greco e Roma in età repubblicana ed augustea, Munich-Leipzig 2001; M. Jost, Die Patrozinien der Kirchen Roms während des ersten Jahrtausends: Hagiographica 8 (2001) 1-34; A. Angenendt, In honore Salvatoris. Vom Sinn und Unsinn der Patrozinienkunde: RHE 97 (2002) 431-456, 791-823.

F. Lentino

PATRON SAINT. 1. In classical Roman antiquity, the term (which derived from the Latin pater, "father") generally referred to those who in some manner protected persons, or rather entire provinces. In more ancient times this type of relationship was probably not regulated by legal sanctions. With the passing of time, however, it was regulated both by certain norms pertaining to common law or, at least with respect to the relationships between the members of leading families and the poorest citizens, by some religious prescriptions. One very special type of patronage existed between *patrons and freedmen that was regulated in an ever-more-precise manner by the law. An indication of this type of bond can be gathered from a statement in one of Plautus's works: Volo me placere Philolachi, meo ocello, meo patron (Most. 167). With respect to legal assistance, the patroni had recourse to the assistance of the orators who, on the condition of payment, defended their legal cases: Iudicis est semper in causis verum sequi, patroni non numquam veri simile etiamsi minus sit verum, defendere (Cic., Off. 2,14,51). Another type of patronage was instituted at times among the commanders of the Roman army and the peoples subject to them. Pompey's patronage pertained to many regions of the empire and constituted, without a doubt, a significant element of the emperor's auctoritas: Pompeianorum colonorumque dissensio delata ad patronos est, cum iam inveterasset ac multos annos esset agitata (Cic., Sull. 60). Already during the time of the empire, certain Roman municipalities chose influential Roman citizens who, on the condition of payment, acted as mediator between the town councils and the emperors and defended in a generic way the interests of the citizens of those locales.

The transformed office of the patron of the communities, which was so widespread in Late Antiquity, was the rise and fall of the patronage of the bishops, esp. because of the disintegration of the imperial administration as a result of the barbaric invasions. The development of the episcopal patrocinium led to the creation of the figure of the civic patron saints.

2. The practice of placing a person, an association or a place of worship under the protection of a saint was born in the Christian context. From written testimonies it is evident that the patron saints lived before the founding of a given church. In fact, *Cyprian in some of his Epistulae attested that his brother bishops assumed the names Peter and Paul (Ep. 27-28; 31-32, etc.). *Eusebius of Caesarea's text is very significant in this regard. He cited the case of five martyrs who changed their pagan names to biblical ones (see Mart. Pal. 11,8). *Ambrose, for his part (Exh. virg. 3), exhorted Christian parents to name their children after virtuous people and martyrs, so as to place them under their protection and to set them forth as an example. *Prudentius wrote the work Peri stephanon in honor of Christian martyrs, primarily Spaniards and Romans, whom he calls patroni martyres; the crowns that were a reward for the soldiers and the athletes were conferred upon the martyrs, i.e., the victorious soldiers of Christ, who in turn became protectors in the common struggle against evil: Sed per patronos martyras / potest medellam consequi, "but through the patron martyrs, one can obtain a cure" (2,579-580); exultare tribus libet patronis / quorum praesidio fovemur omnes, "it is a joyful thing to cheer for three patrons / by whose protection we are all supported" (6,145-146). The case of Pope *John II (533–535) is relevant: before being elevated to the pontifical throne he had the name Mercury but then decided to change it to the Christian name John. This name change is attested by numerous inscriptions of the church of St. *Clement at *Rome. It was during that period that it became popular to be called by a Christian name, while it was felt at the same time to be unfitting to bear a pagan name.

The practice of assigning the name of a saint to a church was unknown in the first three centuries of Christianity, or at least we do not possess any written testimonies in this regard. This custom probably began in *Constantinople at the beginning of the 4th c., while Constantine was building the "basilica of the *Apostles," called the apostoleion, in which he was buried and where his son *Constantius ordered the transfer of some of the apostles' relics. The use subsequently passed into the West, esp. at Rome and *Milan. It was heavily promoted by Ambrose with the discoveries of the relics of Sts. *Gervasius and Protasius. At *Rome the cemeterial churches often took the name of the martyr buried there: St. *Peter at the *Vatican, St. *Paul Outside the Walls, St. *Lawrence Outside the Walls and St. *Agnes Outside the Walls. From the cemeterial churches, where it made its first appearance, the use was extended to the city churches. The synods held at Rome between 499 and 595 attest to a significant change in this regard. In the Acts of the Synod of 499, Roman titular priests signed the documents as those charged with the pastoral care of the tituli Pammachi, Iulii, Vestinae, tituli ss. Iohannis et Pauli, s. Mariae trans Tiberim, S. Eusebii etc. Other churches during that period bore the name of a saint: St. Clement, St. *Matthew, Santa Maria Maggiore and Holy Apostles. The pilgrims and the translations of the relics multiplied the number of churches dedicated even to nonlocal saints: Roman saints were accepted as patrons of the churches outside *Italy; similarly, buildings of worship were constructed in honor of Eastern saints in the West and vice versa.

DACL 4, 374-405 (dedication of churches); EC 9, 983-990; ODC 462ff.; LTK 8, 187-192; F. Engesser, Der Stadtpatron in Italien und den Westprovinzen des römischen Reiches bis Diokletian, Diss., Friburgo 1957; L. Harmand, Le patronat sur les collectivités publiques des origines au bas empire, Paris 1957; A.M. Orselli, L'idea e il culto del santo patrono cittadino nella letteratura latina cristiana, Bologna 1965; S. Boesch Gajano, Agiografia altomedioevale, Bologna 1976; F. Bajo, El patronato de los obispos sobre la ciudades durante los siglos IV-V en Hispania: Memoria de Historia Antigua 5 (1981) 203-212; A.M. Orselli, Il santo patrono cittadino fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, II, Rome 1981, 771-784; M. Forlin Patrucco, Social Patronage and Political Mediation in the Activity of Basil of Caesarea: SP 17, 3 (1982) 1102-1107; P. Brown, Il culto dei santi: l'origine e la diffusione di una nuova religiosità, Turin 1983; R. Van Dam, Leadership and Community in Late Antique Gaul, Berkeley, CA 1985; J.-U. Krause, Spätantike Patronatsformen im Westen des Römischen Reiches, Munich 1987; C.D. Fonseca, La dedicazione di chiese e altari tra paradigmi ideologici e strutture istituzionali, in Santi e demoni nell'Alto Medioevo occidentale (secoli V-XI), XXXVI Settimana CISAM, Spoleto 1989, 925-946; Les fonctions des saints dans le monde occidental (*III*e*-XIII*e siècle). Actes du colloque organisé par l'École française de Rome avec le concours de l'Université de Rome La Sapienza (Rome, 27-29 octobre 1988), Rome 1991; J.K. Chow, Patronage and Power: A Study of Social Networks in Corinth, Sheffield 1992; J.M. David, Le patronat judiciaire au dernier siècle de la république romaine, Rome 1992; L.M. White, Social Networks in the Early Christian Environment: Issues and Methods for Social History, Atlanta 1992; R.E. Daly, Position and Patronage in the Early Church: JTS 41 (1993) 529-553; S. Giglio, Patrocinio e diritto privato nel tardo impero romano, Perugia 1995; B. Repsher, The Rite of Church Dedication in the Early Medieval Era, Lampeter 1998; G. Ferraro, Cristo e l'altare: Liturgia di dedicazione della chiesa e dell'altare, Rome 2004.

W. Turek

PATROPHILUS of Scythopolis. One of *Arius's first followers from the very beginning of the controversy, Patrophilus sought to support his cause at the Council of *Nicaea. He took part in the subsequent reaction to that council, and at *Tyre (335) he was among the bishops who condemned *Athanasius. *Eusebius of Vercelli, who was exiled to *Scythopolis following the Council of *Milan (355), suffered various forms of mistreatment from him. In 358-359, Patrophilus worked to oppose the anti-Arian program of the *homoiousians who condemned him at the Council of *Seleucia (359), but the condemnation had little effect. Around 360, when a debate arose about the divinity of the *Holy Spirit, he took a negative position along with *Acacius.

DCB 4, 216-217; Simonetti 595; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988; A. Martin, *Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV*e siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, see index.

M. Simonetti

PAUL, apostle

I. The man and his evangelistic work - II. Paulinism - III. Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles - IV. Iconography.

I. The man and his evangelistic work. The primary sources for information on Paul's personality and evangelistic work the letters he wrote to the communities he founded, for which he lived and worked (see Gal 1:11–2:14; 1 Cor 15:9; 2 Cor 11:22-23; 12:1-10; Rom 11:1; Phil 3:4-6; Phlm 9). The autobiographical statements in the letters, though offering an incomplete depiction of his life, are supplemented by the data provided by the Acts of the Apostles, notwithstanding the problems that this text raises as a historical work composed by *Luke, his disciple, from the moment that three-quarters of the book has Paulos as its protagonist, as he himself affirms (see 1 Th 1:1; Rom 1:1), in the Greek form of the Roman surname Paulus ("small"), a typical name for the Gens Aemilia. In the book of Acts he is called "Saul" until his meeting with Sergius Paulus, the governor of *Cyprus (Acts 13:7), and from this moment onward he is called "Paul" (Gk Paulos, Acts 13:9,) as if to emphasize the placement of the apostle's missionary role in the Hellenistic-Roman world. Among groups of the Diaspora, moreover, having two names was commonplace, namely, a Semitic and a Hellenic one (see Acts 1:23; 12:25). He claims he was "circumcised on the eighth day, from the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews, acc. to the law a Pharisee" (Phil 3:5; see also Rom 11:1). Born at *Tarsus (Acts 22:3), the commercial center of Cilicia, not far from the mouth of the navigable river Cydnus, between AD 5 and 10, he traveled to *Jerusalem as a youth (Acts 22:3 and 26:5), where he was a disciple of Rabbi Gamaliel (Acts 22:3) and set himself apart in his zeal for the law and the Mosaic traditions (Gal 1:13-14), vigorously opposing the nascent church (Gal 1:13-16; 1 Cor 15:10-11; Phil 3:5).

Through a divine calling and election (Gal 1:13-16; 1 Cor 15,9-10; Phil 3,6.12), he suddenly became a follower and *apostle of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 15:8-9), who appeared to him in the radiance of his resurrection (1 Cor 15:8-9; 9:1) on the way to *Damascus (Acts 9:3; 22:6; 26:12; but this claim is not explicitly confirmed in the Pauline Epistles); he stayed in Arabia for nearly three years, then returned to Damascus (Gal 1:17). The only date that is relatively certain can be derived from the fact that he was able to flee from the governor of King Aretas (2 Cor 11:32-33), who died in AD 40. Having reached Jerusalem in an extraordinary way, he stayed there for just a short time but had the opportunity to meet *James and *Peter (Gal 1:18ff.) before returning to Cilicia (Gal 1:21). In all likelihood he stayed in Tarsus (Acts 11:25) for several years without engaging in any specific evangelistic activity. It was *Barnabas who invited him to Antioch (Acts 11:25) and who joined him on his mission (Acts 13:2). From the Pauline Epistles one can identify some significant points of his evangelical mission in Asia Minor and Greece, but it is impossible to reconstruct a complete picture of his missionary activity. Acts instead describes at length the three missionary *journeys across the regions of Anatolia, *Asia Minor, *Macedonia and Greece. At the end of the third journey, he traveled to Jerusalem to offer the Judean brothers a collection taken from the communities he had established (Acts 21:17ff.). He was arrested at Jerusalem by Roman soldiers because a riot broke out due to his presence in the temple area (Acts 21:27ff.). Facing the danger that Paul would meet a violent end at the hands of the *Jews, the Roman tribune had him led to Felix in *Caesarea, the Roman procurator from AD 52 to 58 (this date, however, has been disputed).

Felix was stalling and desired to send him back to the religious judgment of the Sanhedrin. At that point Paul appealed to the imperial tribunal, being a Roman citizen from birth (Acts 22:28). Felix's successor *Festus (AD 58-62) had him brought to *Rome. Acts narrates the vicissitudes of the sea voyage until their disembarkation at Puteoli and ends abruptly, informing the reader that he remained for two years under house arrest at Rome, while receiving guests and preaching the kingdom of God and the Lord Jesus Christ. It seems almost certain though that Paul recommenced his missionary activity after his Roman imprisonment, because his letters show that he founded the communities at Colossae and Laodicea in Asia Minor, and also at *Crete (Tit 1:5). An ancient tradition, established on Paul's Epistle to the Romans (Rom 15:24, 28) and implicitly confirmed by *Clement of Rome's Epistle to the Corinthians (chs. 5–7), describes Paul's missionary journey to *Spain before his death, which acc. to an ancient tradition of the Roman church was crowned with martyrdom together with Peter in Rome during the *persecution instigated by *Nero (between AD 64 and 68). *Ignatius of Antioch in his epistle from Smyrna seems to allude to this tradition (Ign. Rom. 4,3). At the end of the 2nd c., Gaius the presbyter was aware of the tropaion of Paul the martyr on the Ostian Way (see Eus. HE 2, 25, 7).

H.D. Saffrey, San Paolo apostolo: Una biografia storica (It. tr. P. Carozzi), Cinisello Balsamo 1995; M. Adinolfi, Da Antiochia a Roma: Con Paolo nel mondo greco-romano, Cinisello Balsamo 1996; G.F. Hawthorne - R.P. Martin - D. G. Reid, Dictionary of Paul and His Letters, Downers Grove, IL 1993; R. Penna, Paolo di Tarso: Un cristianesimo possibile, Cinisello Balsamo 2000; J.-M. Poffet, Paolo di Tarso, Cinisello Balsamo 2002.

V. Loi - B. Amata

II. Paulinism. From the very beginning, Paul's theology was a goad and a point of contention in the church's theological discussions. Already the book of Acts, which devotes one-half of its narrative to the apostle, defends him, praises his person and presents him as a great thaumaturge and powerful preacher, and at the same time passes over in silence his desire to be called an *apostle in the same way as the Twelve. Other letters composed (edited), in the tightest circle of Pauline preaching, by collaborators and disciples of the apostle, touch upon individual aspects of his theology and deepen them (Eph: the church, one holy, even if composed of *Jews and Gentiles; Col: the cosmic and universal character of Christ and the *redemption). 1 Peter and, less conspicuously, Hebrews fall under the influence of Pauline thought. Even more problematic, however, remains the problem between Paul and *John. As much as both authors insist on certain underlying concepts (law and *grace, *faith, *love), which distinguish them with respect to the synoptic gospels, so too is Paul independent from the Johannine exposition. In certain late New Testament letters (Jas, 2 Pet), one already notes some critical tendencies toward Paul and some indications about a distortion of the Pauline doctrine of *justification; such tendencies and indications in the *canonical writings, as in the later writings of the *Orthodox Church, never lead to an open rejection and condemnation of the apostle. This hostile attitude toward Paul was limited to extremely small groups of heretical Jewish Christians (see *Clementines [pseudo]). The writings of the Apostolic Fathers (1 Clem., Ignatius, *Polycarp) presuppose some knowledge of the Pauline Epistles, esp. 1 Cor, but they do not show what foundational concept provides the basis for their concern to preserve Paul's living theological inheritance. The same applies to the Pauline letters (1 and 2 Tim; Tit) which, at the end of the New Testament era, with their preoccupation for preserving the authentic teaching intact, appeal vigorously once again to the sole *authority of the apostle, but do not enter, moreover, into a discussion with their opponents on the meaning of Paul's sayings. The Apostolic Fathers and the Pastoral Epistles share great esteem for Paul, as a missionary and apostle who suffered much for Christ.

1. Controversies over Paul in the 2nd c. A large portion of ecclesiastical writings (the *Epistle of Barnabas, 2 Clement, the majority of the *apologists, *Papias of Hierapolis) pass over Paul without giving a precise reason for their decision, nor do they allow one to posit a possible explanation. After the extremist manipulation of Paul's epistles by *Marcion, ecclesiastical writers were also compelled to take a position. One cannot know with certainty if the preference for Paul shown by the presbyter of Asia Minor and author of the Acts of Paul (Tertull. De bapt. 17) was caused by an anti-Marcionite stance. The poor condition of the primary sources of that period keep us from understanding *Justin Martyr and *Melito of Sardis's knowledge of Paul and their evaluation of the apostle's teaching. An exception to the rule is the author of the *Letter to Diognetus, who, though hardly a Marcionite, displays an open disregard for the OT and a clear predilection for Paul. For the *gnostics, Paul was not a particularly authoritative witness, even though Tertullian called him the "apostle of the *heretics" (Adv. Marc. 3,5,4). The *Valentinians above all sought to exploit his ideas in their system because of his allegorical *exegesis, although some central Pauline ideas (e.g., God as the *Father of Jesus Christ, the universality of the salvific plan of God, the *resurrection of the flesh as the inalienable moment of the eschata) were irreconcilable with their views. The documents in which one notices the real points of agreement, as for instance the Letter to Reginus, show doubts on the authenticity of their gnostic character. At the end of the century, *Irenaeus (Haer) and Tertullian (Adv. Marc.) not only affirmed the incorporation of the Pauline Epistles into the revealed writings of the New Testament, but also demonstrated it. From then on, the place of the Corpus Paulinum in the biblical canon, which was being formed at that time, was no longer subject to debate.

2. The Pauline tradition in the East and West. At no particular period have all of Paul's writings been used in their entirety for theological discussion; at various times, one aspect of his thought has always been privileged over another. In the 3rd c. it came about that the Pauline tradition followed divergent paths in the Eastern and Western churches. Eastern authors first challenged Paul's doctrine of *justification, to which the West attributed utmost importance. The East propagated the Paul of 1-2 Corinthians; the West, the Paul of the Epistle to the Romans (Benz, 291). *Clement of Alexandria certainly cited Romans but did not accept the doctrine of justification. *Origen even comments upon Romans, but the epistle's key underlying concept is absent from his theological system. *Athanasius and *Gregory of Nyssa comment only upon 1-2 Corinthians and remain silent about Romans. Only from the turn of the 5th c., *Didymus the Blind, *John Chrysostom, *Theodoret of Mopsuestia and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus begin to treat the entire Pauline corpus. According to Benz (297) those *commentaries give the impression that they were compiled more out of a literary scrupulosity for completeness than for a desire to elaborate their theological contents; scholarship, however, lacks a broad study on the reception of Paul's epistles in the 4th and 5th c. In any case, all the Greek theologians heavily emphasized the following aspects: the mystical-sacramental dimension of Paul's preaching with an emphasis on conformity to Christ, the new *birth, the new creation and sanctification.

In Western theology, for a long time Paul did not exercise a role that one could call, on a large scale, "definitive." A serious investigation of the Pauline Epistles does begin before the end of the 4th c., first and foremost—at the margins of the theology of the official church. The commentaries on Paul of the so-called *Ambrosiaster and the Aquileia MS were written by unknown authors, although those of *Marius Victorinus were those of an orator recently converted to the faith from Neoplatonism. But even *Ambrose of Milan deals seriously with Paul's writings, esp. in some late letters addressed to his brother bishops (Ep. 73-76). *Priscillian is said to have had a special knowledge of Paul; he was condemned as a heretic. In Galatians and then more thoroughly in Romans, Paul articulated his theology of grace and justification, which was accepted above all in the West, inflaming the controversy between *Pelagius and *Augustine on the cooperation of grace and free will, which then developed into their extreme consequences (the doctrine of original *sin and *predestination). Luther and the Protestant Reformation, unilaterally emphasizing Romans and the doctrine of justification, further deepened the chasm between the theology of the East and the West. Paul, who wanted to become "all things to all men" (1 Cor 9:22), wrote to the Greeks and Romans, adapting himself to their various temperaments. This objective of the apostle is reversed when one forgets that he always wanted to adapt himself to particular recipients of his epistles and their life situations, and one pretends to adopt the Paul of certain epistles or theological positions as if it were Paul's teaching in its entirety.

General Studies: A. Souter, The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul, Oxford 1927; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Münster 1933 = ²1984; E. Aleith, Paulusverständnis in der Alten Kirche, Berlin 1937; E. Benz, Das Paulus-Verständnis in der morgenländischen und abendländischen Kirche: ZRGG 3 (1951) 289-309; M.F. Wiles, The Divine Apostle, Cambridge 1967; W. Schneemelcher, Paulus in der griechischen Kirche des 2. Jh.: ZKG 75 (1964) 1-20; A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum, Tübingen 1979; E. Dassmann, Der Stachel im Fleisch. Paulus in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Irenäus, Münster 1979; W. Geerlings, Hiob und Paulus. Theodizee und Paulinismus in der lateinischen Theologie am Ausgang des 4. Jh.: JbAC 24 (1981) 56-66; E. Dassmann, Paulus in frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Opladen 1982; L.F. Ladaria, Paul chez les Pères de l'Église: DSp 12 (1984) 513-22; E. Dassmann, Zum Paulusverständnis in der östlichen Kirche: JbAC 29 (1986) 27-39; W.S. Babcock, ed., Paul and the Legacies of Paul, Dallas, TX 1990; M. Simonetti, Paolo nell'Asia cristiana del II secolo: VetChr 27 (1990) 123-44.

Studies on individual authors: A. Merzagora, Giovanni Crisostomo commentatore di S. Paolo: Didaskal. 9 (1931) 1-73; U. Wickert, Studien zu den Pauluskommentaren Theodors von Mopsuestia, Berlin 1962; H. Rathke, Ignatius von Antiochien und die Paulusbriefe, Berlin 1967; P.M. Parvis, Theodoret's Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, Oxford 1975; B. Lohse, Beobachtungen zum Paulus-Kommentar des Marius Victorinus und zur Wiederentdeckung des Paulus in der lateinischen Theologie des 4. Jh.: Kerygma und Logos (Festschrift C. Andresen), Göttingen 1979, 351-366; W. Erdt, Marius Victorinus Afer, der erste lateinische Paulus-Kommentar, Frankfurt a.M. 1980; A. Viciano, Cristo el autor de nuestra salvación. Estudio sobre el comentario de Teodoreto de Ciro a las epístolas paulinas, Pamplona 1990; F. Cocchini, Il Paolo di Origene, Rome 1992; R. Noormann, Irenäus als Paulusinterpret, Tübingen 1994; J.-N. Guinot, L'exégèse de Théodoret de Cyr, Paris 1995; U. Schmid, Marcion und sein Apostolos. Rekonstruktion und historische Einordnung der marcionitischen Paulusbriefausgabe, Berlin 1995; B. Delaroche, Saint Augustin lecteur et interprète de saint Paul, Paris 1996; G. Raspanti, Mario Vittorino esegeta di s. Paolo, Palermo 1996; L. Wehr, Petrus und Paulus – Kontrahenten und Partner. Die beiden Apostel im Spiegel des Neuen Testaments, der Apostolischen Väter und früher Zeugnisse ihrer Verehrung, Münster 1996; J. Pichler, Paulusrezeption in der Apostelgeschichte, Innsbruck 1997; M.M. Mitchell, The Heavenly Trumpet. John Chrysostom and the Art of Pauline Interpretation, Tübingen 2000.

E. Dassmann - H.R. Drobner

III. Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles. Various scholars have reiterated several times (Harnack, Lagrange, Wiles, Lyonnet, Godsey) that the Pauline corpus, and, in particular Romans, with the reflections and commentaries to which it has given place, has marked the most salient moments of the history of Christianity. One finds plenty of information on the commentaries of Greek Christian writers in Jerome's writings: in Ep. 33, he provides a catalog of Origen's commentaries on the Pauline corpus, lastly presented in Vir. ill. 54; in Ep. 49, he mentions various patristic commentaries on 1 Cor and, in Ep. 119 those on 1 Th. In all, Jerome provides us information on twenty-some Greek commentaries on various Pauline Epistles, and the list of *Fathers cited includes the following names: *Origen, *Dionysius, *Pierius, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Didymus, *Diodore of Tarsus, *Theodore of Heraclea and *Apollinaris of Laodicea. *Socrates provides information about *Eunomius's Commentary on Romans (HE 4, 7).

Such statements show that toward the end of the 4th c. Pauline commentaries from the 3rd and early 4th c. were still circulating, commentaries, which, for the most part, are no longer available to us today. One can gather information about other commentaries, even if fragmentary, from the scriptural commentaries known as catenae written during the Byzantine period. If we omit the uncertain information about one possible Marcionite commentary on the Pauline Epistles—and another commentary attributed at times to *Pantaenus (Jerome, Vir. ill. 36) or at other times to *Heraclitus (Eus. HE 5, 27)—the most ancient and important commentator on Paul's writings appears to have been *Origen. From the Pauline commentaries attributed to him, aside from *Rufinus's Latin translation of the Commentary on Romans and chapters 3–5 of the same commentary preserved in a Greek text on a *papyrus from Tura, we have only fragments cited by *Pamphilus, Eusebius, Epiphanius or contained in the catenae (for the fragments on the Comm. on Eph., see J.A.F. Gregg, in JTS 3 [1901–1902] 233-244, 398-420, 554-576; for the fragments on the Comm. on 1 Cor., see Cl. Jenkins, in JTS 6 [1903–1904] 113-116; 9 [1907–1908] 231-247, 353-372, 500-514; 10 [1908–1909] 29-51). Only fragments from the catenae from *Eusebius of Emesa's Comm. on Rom. and Comm. on Gal. and *Acacius's Comm. on Rom. and Didymus's commentary on 1 and 2 Cor. have survived. Of the five commentaries on the Pauline Epistles that Jerome attributes to *Apollinaris, we only have important fragments from his Comm. on Rom. Even from Diodore's commentaries, only the fragments in the catenae have survived.

We know, however, of *John Chrysostom's 250 *homilies on the entire Pauline corpus and his systematic commentary on Galatians. In these homilies and in this commentary, the pastoral character typical of Chrysostom's work emerges continually where the text permits it; however, he does not fail to offer a literal explanation first. The catenae have preserved numerous fragments from *Severian of Gabala's commentaries, and *Theodore of Mopsuestia's commentaries on Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians and Hebrews. A 5th-c. Latin version of Theodore's commentaries on the 10 minor letters of Paul have survived. The greater part of his works have been lost because he was accused of *Nestorianism and condemned by a council a century after his death. From the Pauline commentaries of *Cyril of Alexandria we have fragments on Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians and Hebrews. However, we have all of Theodoret of Cyrrhus's systematic commentaries on the 14 letters of the Pauline corpus. These commentaries from the 1st half of the 5th c. are characterized, acc. to the author, by their brevity and unsought-for originality. Also belonging to the 5th c. are commentaries on Paul's letters from *Gennadius of Constantinople, of which we know only fragments from the commentary on Romans and brief passages from other letters which are extant in the catenae.

With regard to the Latin commentaries on the Pauline corpus, the fact that numerous commentaries have survived intact allows us to provide a more precise synthesis. The first commentator was *Marius Victorinus, from whose commentaries we have parts from Galatians, Ephesians and Philippians, in which he strives to apply a literal interpretation of the text; shortly after him was *Ambrosiaster, who wrote systematic commentaries on all of Paul's epistles, all of which have come down to us. Through this author's commentaries, dominated by literal-historical exegesis, even if not lacking typological interpretations, we can observe the transmission of the Latin text as it existed in the 2nd half of the 4th c. before the revision of the Vulgate. In 1973–1974, a discovery was made of an anonymous commentary contained in a codex from Budapest. Shortly after 386, during his stay at Bethlehem, Jerome wrote his commentaries on Philippians, Galatians and Titus, in which he reverts to the earlier commentaries of Origen, Didymus and Apollinaris, esp. for what he says about Galatians and Ephesians.

In 394 Augustine made his first attempt to comment upon Romans; he restricts himself to explain briefly only a few passages, using a literal interpretation (Expositio quarundam propositionum ex Epist. ad Rom). His complete Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians dates to this same year. Shortly thereafter, Augustine returned to Romans with the intention of commenting upon it systematically, but the work did not get beyond Rom 1:1-7. In 397, he explained Romans 7–9 for *Simplicianus (Quaest. ad Simplicianum). He commented upon other chapters of Romans in his books De peccatorum meritis et remissione and in De spiritu et littera. *Pelagius had a deep interest in the Pauline corpus between the years 406 to 409, at which time he commented upon the apostle's thirteen epistles. Pelagius's exposition is literal, restrained and contains few digressions; his interlinear explanations make his work more akin to scholia than a commentary in the true and proper sense of the term. Souter has attributed a commentary on Romans to *Cassiodorus, which was published in the 16th c. under the name of *Primasius. In the mid 6th c., Cassiodorus and his school produced a set of Pauline commentaries that modified Pelagius's commentaries in an anti-Pelagian sense (Expositio s. Pauli epistulae ad Romanos, una cum complexionibus in XII sequentes s. Pauli epistulas a quodam Cassiodori discipulo anonymo concinnatis).

Scholars have explained the limited presence of the Pauline corpus in the 2nd c. and the dearth of commentaries in the 3rd c., now for the most part lost, as a consequence of the attitude taken by the mainstream church, on the one hand, toward the use made of Paul by Marcionites (see E. Norelli, La funzione di Paolo nel pensiero di Marcione: RivBib 34 [1986] 578-586) and gnostics (see E. Pagels, The Gnostic Paul: Gnostic Exegesis of the Pauline Letters, Philadelphia 1975), and on the other, toward a strong anti-Paulinism esp. among Jewish Christians (var. aus., Antipaolinismo: Reazioni a Paolo tra I e II secolo: Ricerche Storico Bibliche I/2 [1989]).

The proliferation of Pauline commentaries in the 4th and 5th c., however, does not seem to be accidental if one considers that authors like Victorinus, Ambrosiaster, Pelagius—who were not interested in commenting on the whole Bible—devoted a large portion of their exegetical work almost exclusively to Paul's letters. It seems inadequate to account for the presence of these commentaries with the reduction of the threat posed in the 2nd c. by the Marcionites and the gnostics, by the *Ebionites and all *Judaizing groups. The following factors contributed to the phenomenon: (1) the Christian community's attainment of a higher level of maturity in its doctrinal formulation—this maturity was witnessed by the use commentators made of the Pauline corpus for arguments against heresies (see Ambrosiaster, Comm. Rom. praef.); (2) the increased interest of Jews and Christians for proselytism: a fresh reading of Paul's writings, esp. Romans, could have helped clarify questions that arose from this situation; (3) the change of the political situation, which saw the empire outlaw paganism and thus the conversion of many pagans to Christianity: Paul's letters became the point of reference for those who emphasized the sufficiency of faith and those who discussed at length humanity's sinfulness and, accordingly, each person's ethical responsibility; (4) monastic asceticism which institutionalized a nostalgia for the witness of the proper life to live in the new historical situation, with emphases that differed acc. to the intensity with which one preferred grace or free will, divine mercy or human merit—all themes extensively discussed in Paul's writings.

J.A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum, Oxford 1844 (for the Pauline fragments, vols. IV-VII); C.H. Turner, Greek Patristic Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles, in Dictionary of the Bible, ed. J. Hastings, New York 1906, 485-531 (extra vol. 484-531, Edinburgh 1947); A. Souter, The Earliest Latin Commentaries in the Epistles of St. Paul, Oxford 1927; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der Griechischen Kirche, Münster 1933; K.H. Schelkle, Paulus Lehrer der Väter, Düsseldorf 1959; M.F. Wiles, The Divine Apostle. The Interpretation of St. Paul's Epistles in the Early Church, Cambridge 1967; E. Peretto, La lettera ai Romani cc. 1-8 nell'Adversus Haereses d'Ireneo, Istituto di Letteratura Cristiana Università di Bari 1971; H.J. Frede, Ein neuer Paulus Text und Kommentar, I-II, Freiburg 1973–74; F. Gori (ed.) Mario Vittorino. Commentari alle Epistole di Paolo agli Efesini, ai Galati, ai Filippesi, Turin 1981; A. Piédagnel (ed.), Jean Chrysostome. Panégyriques de S. Paul, SC 300, Paris 1982; S. Zincone (ed.), Giovanni Crisostomo. Commento alla lettera ai Galati, Rome 1982; L.F. Ladaria, Paul chez les Pères de l'Église: DSp 12 (1983); A. Pollastri (ed.), Ambrosiaster. Commento alla lettera ai Romani, Rome 1984; M.G. Mara, Il significato storico-esegetico dei commentari al corpus paolino dal IV al V secolo: ASE 2 (1985) 71-87; F. Cocchini (ed.), Origene. Commento alla lettera ai Romani. Libri I-VI, I, Casale Monf. 1985; Id., Libri VII-X, II, Genoa 1986; L. Fatica (ed.), Ambrosiaster. Commento alla lettera ai Galati, Rome 1986; S. Zincone, Problematiche relative alla resurrezione nell'esegesi antiochena di 1 Cor 15,20 ss.: ASE 3 (1986) 99-108; S. Zincone (ed.), Giovanni Crisostomo. Panegirici su San Paolo, Rome 1988; L. Fatica (ed.), Ambrosiaster. Commento alla Prima lettera ai Corinzi, Rome 1989; M. Pesce, Il commento dell'Ambrosiaster alla Prima lettera ai Corinzi. Alla ricerca della differenza tra esegesi antica ed esegesi storica: ASE 7/2 (1990) 593-629; A. Viciano, Cristo el autor de nuestra salvación. Estudio sobre el commentario de Teodoreto de Ciro a las epístolas paulinas, Pamplona 1990; V. Ugenti (ed.), Cirillo di Alessandria. Commento alla lettera ai Romani, Rome 1991; F. Cocchini, Il Paolo di Origene. Contributo alla storia della recezione delle epistole paoline nel III secolo, Rome 1992; M.G. Mara, Agostino interprete di Paolo, Turin 1993; F. Cocchini, L'esegesi paolina di Teodoreto di Cirro: ASE 11/2 (1994) 511-532; G. Di Nola (ed.), Giovanni Crisostomo. Commento alla Prima Lettera a Timoteo, Rome 1995; F. Cocchini, I Commentari di Origene e Teodoreto di Cirro alla lettera ai Romani: Continuità e novità nella storia della recezione di Paolo: Augustinianum 36 (1996) 313-336; F. Cocchini (intr., notes, comm. and ed), Teodoreto di Cirro. Commentario alla lettera ai Romani, Rome 1998; J. Ries - F. Decret - W.H.C. Frend - M.G. Mara, Le epistole paoline nei Manichei, i Donatisti e il primo Agostino, Rome 2000.

M.G. Mara

IV. Iconography. "Short in stature, bald head, bowed legs, joined eyebrows, jutting nose, magnanimous. Sometimes he looked like a man, but at other times he seemed to have the face of an angel." This is the description of Paul by the anonymous author of the Acta Pauli et Theclae, an apocryphal Pauline work dating before AD 200 (Erbetta II, 259). Likewise, acc. to *Nicephorus (HE I, 2,37), the apostle had the following physical characteristics: small body, curved shoulders, large forehead, beak-like nose and a long face.

With regard to paleo-Christian art, scholarship has not answered the problem of the origin of the iconography of Paul nor provided a reason for its relatively late start. As in the case of many biblical figures, Paul's portrait was a reconstruction. The first representations of the apostle date back to the end of the 3rd c.; in some paintings of the Roman catacombs from this time (e.g., at Domitilla: Wp 126; 148,2), the apostolic college was portrayed with Christ at the center, but Paul's features are not yet well defined, nor are Peter's, as they would be a few decades later. The same phenomenon reappears in some *sarcophagi of the same period or shortly thereafter, in which the deceased person appears standing alongside the two *apostles, whose bodily features still varied but should still be identified in all likelihood with *Peter and Paul, representatives par excellence of the Twelve (see, e.g., Ws 81,4 = Rep. 855; Ws 269,3 = Rep. 565).

From the mid Constantinian era, however, the portrayals of the prince of the apostles took on new idiosyncrasies, which became more widespread in the figurative paleo-Christian repertoire: *painting, *sculpture, *mosaics and the so-called minor arts (ivories, gold glass and metalwork). This phenomenon can be explained by the wide diffusion of the cult of the martyrs and by their increasingly frequent depiction on the garments of the guides and supporters of the *souls of many of the deceased. Toward the middle of the 4th c., Pauline iconography (like Petrine iconography) was already established and was found in many examples from different periods and locations, with few variants of little significance: head mostly bald, beard long and pointy for the most part, usually with fine features. These physical features are different from Peter's, who, because of the law of contrast, bears different characteristics: short and curly hair, short and frizzy beard and stark features. Even if these representations, which are above all pictorial, appear simplified in some cases, the identification of the two apostles is certain and at times corroborated by captions with their names found alongside their figures.

Paul often appears to the side of Christ (opposite Peter) in the scene of the so-called traditio legis*, or, in the group of sarcophagi (esp. Roman and Gallic) referred to as "of the Passion," displaying the following events: his arrest (tied between two soldiers or with a soldier who is placing a rope around his neck) and *martyrdom, in the moment he is about to be decapitated by a soldier who is drawing his sword. The most famous example in which the images appear together is found on the front of Junius Bassus's sarcophagus (Ws 13 = Rep. 680,1), dated to the year 359 and preserved in the Vatican Grottoes. Among the many examples, there is also a columned sarcophagus preserved in the Vatican basilica (Ws 154,4 – Rep. 675,3) and another sarcophagus front in the Museo Pio Cristiano (Ws 142,3 = Rep. 61), already from the end of the 4th c.

In painting, the Pauline facial features appear particularly clear in the burial recess of Diogenes the gravedigger (fossor*) at Domitilla (Wp 182,2) and in room I of the catacomb on the Via Latina (Ferrua, Via Latina, plate CVIII and p. 69); also, they are very clear among the oldest paintings of the small basilica of the cemetery of Commodilla, certainly from the mid-6th c. (WMM 146). Among the mosaic scenes, one should note those from the mausoleum of St. Costanza in Rome (WMM 4) with the traditio legis (with considerable restorations) and the triumphal arch of the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, where St. Peter appears beside the throne (see C. Cecchelli, I mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore, Turin 1956, pl. XLVII). Among the sculpted reliefs, one can recognize Peter and Paul's profile in a piece from the Museo Paleocristiano di Monastero at *Aquileia, datable to the end of the 4th c. or the beginning of the 5th (B. Forlati Tamano - L. Bertacchi, Aquileia. Il Museo Paleocristiano, Padua 1962, fig. on p. 37). The apostle is portrayed on objects of ivory, as in the traditio legis scene of the Samagher capsella, now at the Museo Archeologico di Venezia (see M. Guarducci, La capsella eburnea di Samagher. Un cimelio d'arte paleocristiana del tardo Impero: Atti e Memorie della Soc. Istriana di storia patria 26 [1978] 1-146). One can recognize the bust of Paul, alone or together with Peter, other saints and the deceased, in golden glassware. The representation of Paul stoned to death at Lystra (Acts 14:19) appears on an ivory box produced in the West, dating back to the third decade of the 5th c. and preserved in the British Museum in London (Testini, L'iconografia degli Apostoli, p. 293 n.16).

Lastly, one should note the scene of the symbolic embrace between Peter and Paul, which alludes to the unity of the two parts of the church and likewise to the more frequent concordia apostolorum, already found in the aforementioned relief from Aquileia and some golden glass. This image recurs on a piece of ivory from Castellammare di Stabia and on a fresco from the beginning of the 5th c., found in recent years in a Roman catacomb, already known as the Vigna Chiaraviglio, but certainly belonging to the complex of the Memoria Apostolorum (or St. *Sebastian). A fragmentary sarcophagus from the Roman cemetery of St. *Valentinus is also unique, in which Paul, well stocked with captions, appears in a helmsman's garments while steering a ship upon which is inscribed the allusive name of Thecla (Rep. 832 = ICUR X, 27284). A number of frescoes, however, from the period of Pope St. *Leo the Great (440–461), which must have adorned the walls of the basilica of S. Paolo Fuori le Mura, were destroyed after a disastrous fire in 1823. Nevertheless, the theme of these frescoes is known through a watercolor painting of them that Antonio Eclissi completed around 1635 and preserved in Ms. Barb. lat. 4406 located at the Vatican Library.

DACL 2, 2694-2699; EC 9, 720-722; LCI 8, 128-147; L. de Bruyne, L'iconographie des Apôtres Pierre et Paul dans une lumière nouvelle, in Saecularia Petri et Pauli, Vatican City 1969, 35-84; P. Testini, L'iconografia degli Apostoli Pietro e Paolo nelle cosiddette arti minori, in ibid., 241-323; Id., L'apostolo Paolo nell'iconografia cristiana fino al VI secolo, in Studi Paolini, Rome 1969, 61-93; Id., La lapide di Anagni con la "Traditio legis": Archeologia Class. 25-26 (1973–1974) 718-740; Y. Christe, Apocalypse et "Traditio legis": RQA 71 (1976) 42-55; E. Dassmann, Paulus in frühchristlichen Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Opladen 1982; J.M. Huskinson, Concordia Apostolorum. Christian Propaganda at Rome in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries. A Study in Early Christian Iconography and Iconology, London 1982; H.L. Kessler, The Meeting of Peter and Paul in Rome. An Emblematic Narrative of Spiritual Brotherhood: DOP 41 (1987) 265-275; F. Bisconti, L'abbraccio tra Pietro e Paolo ed un affresco inedito del cimitero romano dell'ex Vigna Chiaraviglio, in Ricerche di Archeologia cristiana e bizantina. XLII Corso di Cultura sull'Arte Ravennate e Bizantina, Ravenna 1995, 71-93; Id., Pietro e Paolo. L'invenzione delle immagini, la rievocazione delle storie, la genesi delle teofanie, in A. Donati (ed.), Pietro e Paolo. La storia, il culto, la memoria nei primi secoli, Milan 2000, 43-53; U. Utro, Disegni relativi alla decorazione di San Paolo fuori le Mura, in ibid., nos. 56, 211-212; F. Bisconti, Paolo (s.v.): TIP, 240-241.

D. Mazzoleni

PAUL, apostle (apocryphal). Apocryphal material on Paul is particularly rich. One can classify these apocryphal documents into three categories: (1) pseudepigrapha; (2) biographic writings on Paul's life and activity; (3) other apocryphal texts concerning Paul.

1. Several apocryphal letters exist among the letters attributed to Paul: the *Letter to the Laodiceans, the *Letter to the Alexandrians, St. Paul's Correspondence with the Corinthians, part of the Acts of St. Paul (ch. 10) and Paul's *Correspondence with Seneca (14 letters—from the 4th c.), which is mentioned by *Jerome (De vir. ill. 12) and St. *Augustine (Ep. 153,3), and was recognized as authentic until the 15th c.; the work was perhaps a rhetorical exercise used in schools and the product of his popularity among the first Christians but also the consequence of a legend about Seneca's possible conversion to Christianity (see *Tertullian, De anima 20,1). The objective of this apocryphal text is apologetic: how much this great *pagan philosopher admired St. Paul and how the two spoke to each other. The eleventh letter regarding the fire of *Rome and the persecution of Christians is interesting. There exists, moreover, a letter of the Jewish High Priest Annas to Seneca.

Editions: CANT 306; CPL 191; L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Paul et ses lettres, Paris 1913; C.W. Barlow, Rome 1938; L. Bocciolini-Palagi, Florence 1978, 1985; M. Natali, Milan 1995. Translations: Eng.: Elliott 543-553; It.: L. Bocciolini-Palagi, Florence 1978, 1985; Erbetta 3, 85-92; Moraldi 3, 107-113; Fr.: R. Kappler, EApC 1, 1581-1594; Germ.: C. Römer, in Schneemelcher 2, 44-50; K. Obrycki, in Starowieyski 3, 55-66, 356ff. (bibl.). K. Pink, Die pseudopaulinischen Briefe: BbM 6 (1925) 179-200; A. Momigliano, Note sulla leggenda del cristianesimo del Seneca: RivStorItal 62 (1950) 325-344; L.D. Reynolds, The Medieval Tradition of Seneca's Letters, Leiden 1965; A. Fürst, Pseudoepigraphie und Apostolizität im apokryphen Briefwechsel zwischen Seneca und Paulus: JbAC 41 (1998) 77-117.

2. The Acts of Paul was among the five major apocryphal Acts of the *apostles of the 2nd-3rd c., but the text was unknown until the 19th c. With the discovery of the *Coptic *papyri of Heidelberg (C. Schmidt 1904), Greek papyri of Hamburg (1936, C. Schmidt, W. Schubart), Bodmer (M. Testuz, 1959) and other papyri, it was observed that some parts of the Acts of Paul were already well known (*Acts of Paul and Thecla, and the Correspondence with the Corinthians). The reconstruction shows us that the Acts of Paul were divided into 14 scenes (the trip from Damascus to *Jerusalem; stays in Syrian *Antioch, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch [the famous Acts of Paul and Thecla], then to Myra, Sidon, Tyre; a trip to Jerusalem, Cicilia and *Smyrna; stays in *Ephesus and *Philippi, Corinth; a trip to Italy and his *martyrdom in *Rome). From some episodes only fragments exist on papyri, from which it is often difficult to understand the meaning; the other episodes are complete. From *Tertullian we know that these Acts were written by a *presybter of Asia Minor who was deposed from his office (De bapt. 17,5). The Acts of Paul were written in Greek probably between 150 and 200; the question remains concerning the relationship between the Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul (which were written earlier, or which later). There exist, furthermore, other apocryphal texts on Paul: two martyrdoms of Paul, ps.-Linus and the 2nd book of ps.-Abdias dedicated to Paul. In addition, there are texts in which the apostles *Peter and Paul are connected (e.g., ps.-Marcellus's Passion, the Letter of ps.-Dionysius the Aereopagite on the Passion of Peter and Paul, in a Latin version and numerous Eastern versions); there exists, in addition, the Acts of Andrew and Paul.

CANT 211-214; Editions: Acts: Lipsius-Bonnet 1, 123-144; 104-117, 235-272; C. Schmidt, Acta Pauli aus der Heidelberger koptischen Papyrushandschrift Nr 1, Leipzig [2]1905 (Hildesheim 1965); L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Paul, Paris 1913; C. Schmidt - W. Schubart, ΠΡΑΞΕΙΣ ΠΑΥΛΟΥ, Acta Pauli nach dem Papyrus der Hamburger Staats – und Universitäts-Bibliothek, Hamburg 1936. Translations: Fr.: W. Rodorf - R. Kasser, EApC 1, 1117-1177; Eng.: Elliott 350-388; It.: Erbetta 2, 243-301; Moraldi 2, 141-210, 536-542, 692ff.; Ger.: Schneemelcher 2, 193-242.

Studies: J.N. Bremmer, The Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, Kempen 1996 (bibl.); A.F.J. Klijn, The Apocryphal Correspondence Between Paul and the Corinthians: VChr 17 (1963) 2-23; J.P. Asmussen, Der apokryphe dritte Korintherbrief in der armenischen Tradition: Orientalia 35 (1972) 51-55; T.W. Mackay, Observations on P. Bodmer X, in Actes du XV[e] Congrès Int. de papyrologie, Brussels 1977, 119-128; Id., Content and Style in Two Pseudo-Pauline Epistles (3 Corinth. and the Epistle to the La- odiceans), in Apocryphal Writings and the Latter-day Saints, ed. C.W. Griggs, Salt Lake City 1986, 215-240; G. Luttikhuizen, The Apocryphal Correspondence with the Corinthians and the Acts of Paul, in J.N. Bremmer, ibid., 75-91; W. Rordorf, Hérésie et orthodoxie selon la correspondance apocryphe entre les Corinthiens et l'apôtre Paul, in Hérésie et orthodoxie dans l'Église ancienne, Fribourg 1993, 21-63 = Id., Lex orandi, lex credendi, Freiburg 1993, 389-431; V. Hovhanessian, Third Corinthians. Reclaiming Paul for Christian Orthodoxy, StudBiblLit 18, New York 2000.

3. Other texts connected to the figure of St. Paul exist, such as the Apocalypse of Paul; although the existence of a Kerygma Paulou (similar to the Kerygma Petri) remains subject to debate.

A famous apocryphal text connected to St. Paul alongside the Correspondence of Paul with Seneca (4th c.) is the Apocalypse of Paul (5th c.). Its source is the text from 2 Cor 12:2-4 in which Paul speaks of his rapture into heaven. An Apocalypse of Paul probably already existed in the 2nd c. (*Epiphanius, Haer. 38,2,5). The Latin version of the Apocalypse of Paul probably dates to the 5th c., but it is the product of a progressive and gradual evolution of the text. There he recounts the apostle's journey into the afterlife where he sees the glory of the saved and the punishments of the damned, for whom he intercedes. This Apocalypse, which existed in Greek, Latin, Arabic, *Armenian, Ethiopian, *Georgian, *Coptic, *Paleoslavonic and *Syriac, was extremely popular and had an influence upon Dante in his Divina Commedia; the Apocalypse of Mary is an elaboration of the Apocalypse of Paul. Alongside the Apocalypse of Paul exists another gnostic apocalypse from Nag Hammadi (cod. V). In the text of NH, moreover, one finds a prayer of Paul from the 2nd/3rd c. (cod. I).

Kerygma: C. Zamagni - A. D'Anna, Accertamenti sul "Kerygma Paulou": SEA 74 (2001) 67-124; Erbetta 2, 302 n. Apocalissi: CANT 325; BHG 1460; BHL 6580-6582; BHO 899-901. T. Silverstein - A. Hilhorst, Geneva 1997, Cahiers d'Orientalisme 21 (bibl.); C. Carozzi, Eschatologie et l'au-delà, Aix-en-Provence 1994 (with Fr. tr.). Translations: Fr.: C.C. and R. Kapler, EApC 775-826; Eng.: Elliott 616-644; It.: Erbetta 3, 359-386; Moraldi 3, 369-425; Pol.: Starowieyski 3, 241-279, 369 (bibl.); Ger.: H. Duensing - A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 639-667. The Apocalypse of Paul of Nag Hammadi and the Prayer of Paul are found in the collections of texts of NH. G. Ricciotti, Apocalisse di Paolo siriaca, 1-2, Brescia 1932ff.; R. Kasser, Oratio Pauli, Tractatus tripartitus II und III, Berlin 1975; A. Koschorke, Paulus in den Nag Hammadi Texten: ZThK 78 (1981) 177-205; H.J. Klauck, Die Himmelfahrt des Paulus, in Id., Gemeinde, Amt und Sakrament, Würzburg 1989, 391-429; P. Dinzelbacher, La 'Visio S. Pauli'. Circulation et influence d'un apocryphe eschatologique: Apocrypha 2 (1991) 165-180; P. Piovanelli, Les origines de l'apocalypse de Paul reconsiderées: Apocrypha 4 (1993) 25-64. CANT 192-194, 197, 201, 203, 206, 211-214, 239, 305, 306, 323, 325; BHG 1451-1465; BHL 6644-6686; BHO 882-904; Lipsius-Bonnet 2, 1, 1-467; Suppl. 32-63; ANRW 2, 26, vol. 2 dedicated to St. Paul.

W. Schneemelcher, Paulus in der griechischen Kirche des zweiten Jahrhunderts: ZKG 75 (1964) 1-20; E. Dassmann, Der Stachel im Fleisch. Paulus in der früchristlichen Literatur bis Irenäus, Münster 1979; A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum. Das Bild des Apostels und die Rezeption der paulinischen Theologie in der früchristlichen Literatur bis Marcion, Tübingen 1979; J.N. Bremmer, The Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, Kempen 1996 (collection of articles).

M. Starowieyski

PAUL AURELIAN. See *PAUL of Léon

PAUL II. Patriarch of Constantinople (641–653). Serving previously as steward and treasurer of the Hagia Sofia, he was elected patriarch on 1 October 641, as the successor of the retiring *monophysite *Pyrrhus. Pope *Theodore rejected his very vague synodal letter and demanded from this newly elected leader a synodical condemnation of his predecessor. When the pope made new demands from him to ensure that he was orthodox, Paul II responded in 646–647 with a *monothelite profession of faith, though professing not to be in disagreement with the bishop of Rome. Theodore responded with a sentence of deposition, inciting Paul's retaliation against the altar of the palace chapel and the Roman apocrisiaries. Persuaded by Paul in 648, *Constans II promulgated a new edict of monothelite faith, the Typos, which was rejected by the Roman synod presided over by *Martin I, who in October 649 renewed the *anathema against Paul II, while around the year 650 the Byzantine patriarch sent a dogmatic document to the Armenians to restore union. Shortly before his death (27 December 653), he intervened in favor of Martin, who had been brought to trial at Constantinople in December of 653. The Sixth Ecumenical *Council (680) anathematized him along with Pyrrhus, after having read his three letters and other writings on the one will of Christ.

CPG 7620-21; Grumel, *Regestes*², 299-301; L. Maggi, La Sede Romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 212-223; J.L.D. van Dieten, Geschichte der Patriarchen von Sergios I. bis Johannes VI. (610–715), Amsterdam 1972, 76-103; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei papi del sec. VII, Rome 1971, passim (see index p. 582); Patrologia V, 109-110.

D. Stiernon

PAUL of Antioch (d. 582). Non-Chalcedonian patriarch of *Antioch, Paul (from Beth Ukkame or the Black) was born ca. AD 500 at *Alexandria. He was the syncellus (secretary) of the non-Chalcedonian patriarch *Theodosius of Constantinople, who named him the successor of Sergius of Tella, founder of the dissenting non-Chalcedonian ecclesiastical hierarchy at Antioch, who died in early 561. Paul showed himself to be very moderate toward the imperial church, willing to resign if it would simply condemn *Chalcedon, and even entered *communion with it for a time, fully convinced that it was on the verge of announcing a condemnation of that council. He took part in many dialogues held at the capital that aimed to restore peace. He was challenged by extreme factions, among which was *Jacob Baradeus, the great organizer of the non-Chalcedonian hierarchy in the East, who himself hoped to become patriarch. In *Egypt, in 575, Paul supported the moderate candidate for the See of Alexandria, *Theodore, who was defeated. Working among non-Chalcedonian theologians, Paul fought against what was being called "*tritheist tendencies," only to see himself accused of *Sabellianism. During moments of disagreement, when his authority was gradually lost, he always found support from the Ghassanid Bedouin tribes and stayed with their Sheikh Al-Haret bar Gabala for a long time. The letters he wrote in justification of his actions have been published in *Syriac by J.B. Chabot, Documenta ad origines monophysitarum illustrandas (CSCO 17, Louvain [2]1952).

CPG 7203-7214; E. Honigmann, Evêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e siècle, Louvain 1951, 195-205; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 291-293, 318-328; Patrologia V, 213-214.

J. Gribomont

PAUL of Apamea. Appointed bishop of Apamea and metropolitan of Syria Secunda, after the emperor *Justin deposed Peter the *monophysite bishop in 513. A follower of Chalcedonian doctrine, he attended the Synod of Constantinople (536), and on behalf of the suffragan bishops he wrote a letter to *Justinian containing an *orthodox profession of faith and a condemnation of *Anthimus of Trebizond, *Severus and his predecessor Peter, all monophysites (Mansi 8, 980-984).

Fedalto 2, 775.

E. Prinzivalli

PAUL of Aphrodisia. Native of Asia Minor (Ephesus?), he was ordained the metropolitan of Aphrodisia in Caria in 558 by *Jacob Baradeus along with two other *monophysite bishops. In 566, at *Constantinople, he signed a letter to his Eastern colleagues. In 571, at the beginning of the persecution of the monophysites, he was arrested at the *monastery at Caria, where for a long time he had retired, and was led in chains to the Byzantine capital and held prisoner in the patriarchal palace. The patriarch *John Scholasticus forced him to renounce his adherence to monophysitism and sent him back to Aphrodisia to be deposed and reordained by the Chalcedonian metropolitan, thus creating a unique instance of episcopal reordination. He died in poverty before 576-577.

CPG 7234; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VI^e siècle, Louvain 1951, 218-231.

D. Stiernon

PAUL of Callinicum (5th–6th c.). Only a few details are known about Paul, bishop of Callinicum (today Rakkah) in *Osroene. His professed *monophysite leanings were the cause of his elevation to the episcopate around 503, but they were also the cause of his deposition, along with about 50 anti-Chalcedonian bishops, shortly after the arrival of the emperor *Anastasius. Paul then fled to Edessa, where he devoted himself to the translation of Greek texts into *Syriac, mostly the works of the patriarch *Severus of Antioch. Despite the damnatio memoriae imposed on Severus's Greek writings, this translation preserved the polemical correspondence between Severus and *Julian of Halicarnassus on the incorruptibility of Christ's body before the *resurrection and a speech against Julian. One should also attribute to Paul the translation of the correspondence between Severus and *Sergius Grammaticus, some of the patriarch's treatises Contra impium Grammaticum (i.e., *John of Caesarea), and a treatise of the same author titled Philalethes (see CSCO 133; 134). Keeping in mind the affinity of the style of these translations to the ancient version of the Cathedral Homilies, likewise by Severus of Antioch, scholars since W. Wright have concluded that the latter version should also be attributed to Paul. Moreover, one should not confuse Paul with the bishop of Edessa who had the same name, who was exiled to Euchaita in 522 and was reestablished in his see in 526 (Duval 316 n.2) and died the following year. One must also distinguish him from the bishop Paul of Edessa (Chabot 79) who, one century later, fleeing from the invasion of the Persians (619), found refuge in the island of *Cyprus and there translated Severus of Antioch's Octoechos (a collection of approximately 300 hymns for the feast of the liturgical year).

This Paul of Edessa should in turn be distinguished (against F. Nau: ROC 7 [1902] 100 n.5) from another author bearing the same name, the abbot Paul, who around the same time (624), likewise at Cyprus, made a Syriac translation of *Gregory of Nazianzus's works. One should recall that in the 7th c. *Jacob of Edessa revised both the translation of the homilies and the Octoechos.

Duval 359; Baumstark 174; Chabot 70-71; Ortiz de Urbina 163, 245-246.

J.-M. Sauget

PAUL of Canopus. Patriarch of *Alexandria (538–540). Born at *Tarsus, he was a monk at Tabennesi and *abbot of the *monastery near Canopus. Upon the suggestion of Pelagius, apocrisary of Pope *Vigilius and future pope, the emperor *Justinian nominated him patriarch of Alexandria in place of *Theodosius, who was deposed because he did not accept the faith of the Council of *Chalcedon. Paul was consecrated by Patriarch *Mennas of *Constantinople. With the help of the military and special privileges of the imperial court he set out from Constantinople to suppress the *monophysite sect in *Egypt; his actions were so rough and imprudent that he was deposed by the Council of *Gaza (540), at which the patriarchs of *Antioch and *Jerusalem and the apocrisary Pelagius participated (Procop. Caes., Hist. arc. 27,11-9; Liberatus of Bizazena, Brev. 23,160-162). Later, Paul sought to reobtain his see by bribing the emperor, but his plan failed. His successor Zoilus was an insignificant figure.

DCB 4, 250-251

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PAUL of Concordia (d. after 381). From Jerome's letters (Ep. 5, 2), it seems that this Paul was a very old man, as well as a friend of *Rufinus of *Aquileia. Jerome sent him a letter (ad Paul senem Concordiae – Letter 10), asking to borrow some books. In exchange, Jerome sent him the Life of Paul the hermit, which he had just written (the letter is perhaps from 376). His friend's one-hundred-plus years led Jerome to rejoice in his robust old age, an age so uncommon that he believed it was a gift from God to Paul for his virtues, as was the case for the ancient patriarchs (Tu semper Domini praecepta custodiens). Jerome mentions Paul again in the De vir. ill. 53, when citing a testimony to Tertullian's fame.

J. Labourt, Saint Jérôme, Lettres, Paris 1949, I, 17 and 27; P. Zovatto, Paolo di Concordia: AAAd 5 (1974) 165-180; PCBE 2, 1670-71. (n. 1).

L. Dattrino

PAUL of Constantinople (d. after 350). Elected bishop of Constantinople in 332 (his election was contested by the nearby bishops: *Socrates, HE 2, 6; *Sozomen, HE 3,3), he participated in 335 at the Council of *Tyre and signed the condemnation of *Athanasius; but shortly thereafter he too was deposed and exiled to *Pontus. Later generations recognized him as the legitimate bishop of *Constantinople, honoring him as a martyr in the cause against *Arianism, but his anti-Arianism was anything but certain: he was deposed as the inciter of seditions and such would be the accusation always reported against him later. He reentered Constantinople upon the death of *Constantine (337) but was immediately ejected, and *Eusebius of Nicomedia was elected in his place. Paul fled to *Rome, but upon the death of Eusebius (ca. 342) he showed up again at Constantinople. These Eusebians placed *Macedonius against him, and the outcries degenerated into a true insurrection, after which Paul was again expelled from the city and first exiled to Sinagra, near the Persian border and then to *Emesa. Nevertheless, he did not desist but reappeared at Constantinople in 344, always winning the favor of the local population; he was secretly arrested, however, and was taken by ship and left at *Thessalonica, which was in the part of the empire administered by *Constans. Pressured by Constans, *Constantius allowed him to reenter Constantinople in 346, where Macedonius, who had been elected in his place, was forced to exercise his episcopal faculties only in one church. When Constans was killed by the usurper *Magnentius and Constantius in turn waged war against him (350), Paul was arrested once again. The fact that Paul had sent an embassy to him and that Athanasius was able to establish his accusation of treason, and the fact that some of his supporters, the so-called Sancti Notarii, were executed, show that the accusations leveled against them were not religious. Paul was transferred to Cucusa in *Cappadocia, where he died shortly thereafter. The ancient report that he was strangled to death does not seem very reliable.

W. Telfen, Paul of Constantinople: HTR 43 (1950) 31-92; Simonetti 395; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318-381, Edinburgh 1988, 265-66; 279-284; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV^e siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, see index; R. Fusco, La Vita premetafrastica di Paolo il Confessore (BHG 1472a). Un vescovo di Costantinopoli tra storia e leggenda, Rome 1996.

M. SIMONETTI

PAUL of Edessa (7th c.). Ordained bishop of Edessa around 602, in 619 Paul fled during the invasion of the Persians and established himself at *Cyprus. There he made a translation of a collection, perhaps at the monastery of Qennešrē, of around 300 poetical compositions for the liturgy written by *Severus of Antioch and other authors. *Jacob of Edessa then revised this translation, which was subsequently reordered in the Octoechos acc. to eight tones (CPG 7072; see Jacob's postscript for his translation, in PO 7, 801). Baumstark mentions that in this series in the W Syrian calendar, Paul is given the nickname "the translator of books" (see PO 10, 84 and 124) and suggests that he may be identified with the abbot Paul who published a translation of *Gregory of Nazianzus's Orations, on the island of Cyprus in 624. This work would later acquire great authority in the various *Syriac-speaking churches. This attribution, however, is not entirely certain.

Baumstark, 190; E.W. Brooks, The Hymns of Severus and Others in the Syriac Version of Paul of Edessa as Revised by James of Edessa (PO 6/1), Paris 1911; R.L. Bensly - W.E. Barnes, The Fourth Book of Maccabees, Cambridge 1895, 55-74 and 27-34 (text and tr. of a fragment of the tr. of the Gregory of Nazianzus's Orations); B. Coulie, Corpus Nazianzenum 1. Versiones orientales, Turnhout 1988; A. de Halleux, Les commentaires syriaques des discours de Grégoire de Nazianze: Muséon 98 (1985) 103-147; A. van Roey - H. Moors, Discours de s. Grégoire: OLP 4 (1973) 121-133 and 5 (1974) 79-126.

K. DEN BIESEN

PAUL of Elusa (d. 522). Native of Greece, and after having traveled to *Palestine, presumably on *pilgrimage, he entered the monastery established by *Theognius (d. 522). Thereafter Paul became a hermit at Elusa, a city near Beersheba. At times he was identified with Paul the Greek ("Helladikos") as well as with a Paul who subsequently became the *hegumen of the *cenobium of St. Theodosios, both mentioned by *John Moschus (Pratus Spirituale 163, 160). The following works remain from his writings: (1) The Life of S. Theognius, Bishop of Betylios: a biography of his teacher Theognius, which *Cyril of Scythopolis knew and used. (2) A letter written by Paul of Elusa has also survived.

CPG 7530-7531; BHG 1786; I. van den Gheyn, Acta sancti Theognii episcopi Beteliae: AB 10 (1891) 78-113 (emendations: AB 11 [1892] 472). Lettera: CPG 7531; V. Lundström, Anecdota Byzantina e codicibus Upsaliensibus cum aliis collatis, Uppsala-Leipzig 1902, 17-23.

A. LOUTH

PAUL of Emesa (1st half of the 5th c.). Bishop of *Emesa in Phoenicia Lebanon (today Homs, in *Syria), after 410. In 431, at *Ephesus, he was the member of a synod led by *John of Antioch and *Memnon of Ephesus. The following year, John chose him as his ambassador to *Alexandria to begin the attempts at restoring *communion with *Cyril of Alexandria, entrusting him with a document which would later become the Creed of Union. Cyril received him into *communion and invited him to preach several times in the cathedral of Alexandria because he was willing to excommunicate *Nestorius and recognize *Maximian as the bishop of *Constantinople. In 433, he traveled again to Egypt and returned to *Antioch with Cyril's letter Laetentur coeli, which brought his mission of peace to a happy ending. He died between 433 and 445, the year in which another bishop appears in the See of Emesa. From his writings, the following texts have survived: portions of the correspondence relating to the aforementioned attempts to restore union and fragments of the three homilies given at Alexandria.

CPG 6365-6369; PG 77, 165-168, 1433-1444; Hfl-Lecl II, 1, 393-402; Patrologia V, 179-180.

D. STIERNON

PAUL of Jerash (6th c.). A native probably of Chalcedon and the bishop of Jerash from 526 to 539, Paul, whom certain inscriptions remember as the "great benefactor" (Gatier, 299) and a "wise" and "just" man (Welles, 306 and 314), during the time of the emperors *Justin and *Justinian, played a role in the initial phase in the architectural evolution of the city that hosted his episcopal see and actively collaborated in the construction of various buildings, not just religious ones. In the years immediately following 526, Paul occupied the churches of *Procopius (Welles, 304), St. George (Welles, 309), St. *John the Baptist (Welles, 306), Sts. *Cosmas and Damian (Welles, 314), as well as the Cathedral of Bostra (Welles, 293), and in a certain way contributed to the transformation of a synagogue into a place of Christian worship (Welles, 323). In 539, moreover, by then at the end of his life, he ordered the construction of a prison for those accused of crimes and awaiting a verdict (Gatier, 299). This was the second prison of Jerash and was intended to serve as a "preventative prison" for those had been detained but not yet condemned. Certainly such a prison, which was most likely reserved for the clergy (Gatier, 303), is the only one that has ever been established by the bishop for use by the town, but it remains to be determined if it was introduced to meet the demands of an increase in the prison population caused by the persecution of the *monophysites (Frend, 271-274).

C.B. Welles, The Inscriptions, in C.H. Kraeling, Gerasa. City of the Decapolis, New Haven, CT 1938; M. Piccirillo, Chiese e mosaici della Giordania settentrionale, Jerusalem 1981; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972; P.L. Gatier, Nouvelles inscriptions de Gerasa: Syria 62 (1985) 297-312; A. Hoffmann - S. Kerner, Gadara - Gerasa und die Dekapolis, Mainz 2002.

P. Marone

PAUL of Léon (d. 572/575). Paul Aurelian, a Gallic monk, is known through a biography written by Wrmonoc (884). In this work, among its many legendary elements, Wrmonoc provides us several pieces of information about Paul's life such as his birth in *Great Britain (ca. 480). Having crossed the English Channel with a few of his companions, he settled on the small island of Batz (Brittany), where he established a *monastery and a missionary center of priests in the fortress on the mainland (Kastel-Paul or St.-Pol-de-Léon). Childebert, king of the *Franks, persuaded him to accept the episcopal see of Kastel-Paul. He died at Batz in 572/575 but was buried at Kastel-Paul. A city developed around his tomb and took its name from him. His feast day is celebrated 12 March.

AASS Mar. 2, 107-119; Vies des Saints 3, 260-262; LTK[3] 7, 1514; BS 10, 296-299; Cath 10, 917-918; J.M.H. Smith, Oral and Written. Saints, Miracles, and Relics in Brittany: Speculum 65 (1990) 309-343.

E. Romero Pose

PAUL of Mérida (7th c.). Deacon of *Mérida (Spain); at the beginning of the 7th c. he wrote the Vitae sanctorum patrum Emeritensium, with the stated intention to imitate *Gregory the Great's Dialogues. He wrote in a simple form to help the unlearned (imperiti) understand the text. The document aspires to be an account of the miracles of the ancient monks and *Fathers, but as the account gradually approaches the author's time it becomes enriched with important historical information relating above all to Bishops Fidelis and *Masona. He narrates at length the vicissitudes experienced by Masona, who was of Gothic origin, during *Leovigild's "persecutions."

CPL 2069; PL 8, 115-164; Diaz 214; A. Maya Sánchez, Vitas sanctorum patrum Emeretensium: CCL 116 (1992); Patrologia IV, 102-103.

M. Simonetti

PAUL of Narbonne (3rd c). The first known bishop of *Narbonne was called Paul, and he seems to have been the city's first ever. He was buried at Albolas on the Via Domitia, where a basilica was later built in his name, at the center of the necropolis in the S part of the city. Already in the 4th c., people were venerating his tomb; this is one of the most ancient testimonies of a local cult for a nonmartyr bishop. His name is mentioned by *Prudentius (Persist. 4, 34), the Mart. hier. (22 March, Italian recension), *Caesarius of Arles (G. Morin, Sancti Caesarii ep. Arel. Opera omnia 1, 1942, 179) and *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 1, 30). Caesarius calls him a "disciple of the apostles"; Gregory would later number him among the seven missionaries sent from *Rome to *Gaul around the year 250. It seems that his Vita (BHL 6589-6590) dates to the 8th c., the period when the *Franks reconquered Narbonne (759). It seems that the information for the Passio SS. Dionysii, Rustici et Eleutherii was derived from this Vita. Ado of Vienne confused this saint with Sergius Paulus of Acts 18:7-8.

BHL 6589-6590; BS 10, 261-262; LCI 8, 149; P.-A. Fevrier - X. Barral, Topographie Chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII[e] siècle 7, Paris 1989, 21-22.

V. Saxer - S. Held

PAUL of Nisibis (or Paul the Persian). *Nestorian exegete and theologian, he was learned and gifted with great judgment. For 30 years, during the time of Mar *Aba I, he was the director of the school of Hadiab; from 551 he was the bishop of *Nisibis; he died in 571. Leading a strong delegation, he took part in a colloquium at *Constantinople with *Justinian's theologians (532–533), where he defended (for the first time?) the doctrine of the two *hypostases in Christ. Without a doubt, one can identify him with Paul the Persian, who was very active in Constantinople around 527 and served as the spokesman for Christians upon the request of Justinian during an official debate with Photinus the Manichean (see PG 88, 529-574). His introduction to the Bible was the basis for the Instituta regularia divinae legis, which was edited in Latin at Constantinople by *Junilius Africanus, the then quaestor of the sacred palace (quaestor sacri palatii), which he dedicated to *Primasius of Hadrumetum (PL 68, 15-54, ed. of

H. Kihn). This clear manual, written in an Aristotelian spirit, summarizes the teaching of the School of Nisibis, that is to say, *Theodore of Mopsuestia; one finds therein teaching on the *Trinity, the *incarnation and the law. He achieved great success in St. Gallen and S Germany in the 9th c.

CPG 7010-7015; BBKL 7, 37-38; H. Kihn, Theodor von Mopsuestia und Junilius Africanus als Exegeten, Freiburg 1880; G. Mercati, Per la vita e gli scritti di Paolo il Persiano: ST 5, Vatican City 1901, 180-206; A. Vööbus, History of the School of Nisibis (CSCO 266), Louvain 1965, 170-172; A. Guillaumont, Un colloque entre orthodoxes et théologiens nestoriens de Perse sous Justinien: CRAI 1970, 201-207; Id., Justinien et l'Église de Perse: DOP 23-24 (1969-70) 39-66; M. Richard, Iohannis Caesariensis Opera: CCG 1 (Turnhout 1977) XXXIX-XLI; Patrologia V, 216-217.

J. Gribomont

PAUL of Samosata (3rd c.). Paul of Samosata, the successor of Demetrian and predecessor of Domnus, was one of the prestigious bishops of *Antioch, during the 2nd half of the 3rd c. (259/60–268/69). The end of his episcopate coincides with various synods in his own episcopal see that resulted in the condemnation of Paul's teaching and his subsequent deposition. The intervention of the Antiochene presbyter *Malchion, head of the city's rhetorical school, was the deciding factor for the defeat of Paul. For his part, the bishop, who was supported by his cohort, refused to abandon the church building and in the end brought the intervention of the emperor *Aurelian, who decided in favor of Paul's opponents, who were in epistolary communion with Rome and Italy. In modern historiography, there has been a long debate concerning the figure and the teaching of Paul, which was fueled by the fragmentation of the sources and the extant information. The sources can be reduced to the following: (a) a letter that *Hymenaeus of Jerusalem and other bishops of the area sent to Paul of Samosata, before his deposition; (b) four fragments of a letter from the synod of the bishops who condemned him, which are mentioned by *Eusebius of Caesarea, along with later information about him (HE 7, 27-30); (c) and a series of a little more than 40 fragments (in the original Greek, and in *Syriac, *Armenian and *Latin translations), where different authors, beginning with *Eusebius of *Dorylaeum, passed down semiaccurate statements about Paul, his enemies and both rival groups. Some of these fragments belong to the synodal Acts; the first fragments, as far as we know, pertain to the history of the church.

The questions surrounding Paul of Samosata have gone through various stages in the course of the 20th c. The monographs of F. Loofs and G. Bardy (1924), which mark the beginning, and the later monograph of H. de Riedmatten (1952) supply a dossier of primary texts concerning the bishop of Antioch. Later studies completed in Central Europe, such as those of M. Richard (1959) and T. Hübner (1979), raised doubts about this dossier, which it considered a *falsification by later Apollinarians, arguing that the followers of *Apollinaris intentionally pretended to connect their teaching to those of the opponents of Paul of Samosata, i.e., to Malchion, Hymenaeus and a large number of bishops and presbyters who were present at the synods of Antioch that condemned Paul. A few decades later, several scholars showed that these hypotheses were false because they lacked any factual support. M. Simonetti's two studies (1986, 1988) proved to be conclusive in this respect; his findings were then confirmed by various scholars: C. Stead (1993, 2000), U.M. Lang (2000) and P. de Navascués (2004).

With respect to the figure of Paul of Samosata, the key historical dates were set by F. Millar (1971). V. Burrus wisely brought attention to rhetoric as a way of analyzing the information provided by Eusebius (1989). Finally, recent studies have shown that the series of moral accusations against Paul are no different from the usual critiques devised in the pagan schools. They function on a hypothetical level and hide the real character of Bishop Paul. The accusations functioned as keys of communication between the different churches where the synod's letter was read so that there would be no doubt that Paul's teaching was heretical. On the other hand, with regard to the supposed relations between Paul and Queen *Zenobia, the only certain fact is the possibility of some contact between the two, but certainly after Paul's deposition, i.e., after the year 270. The intervention of the emperor Aurelian in favor of his allies in *Rome and Italy—at the moment he decided whom he should assign the building of the domus ecclesiae, the object of dispute between Paul and his enemies—must always be understood within the backdrop of the religious and imperial politics of that period, which always sought to find a middle position.

With the exception of the few differences in relation to the politics and ecclesial organization, the discussion around Paul was indeed focused on his doctrine. The opponents of Paul, led by the presbyter Malchion, responded acc. to an *Origenian schema based on *Neoplatonism. They sought to safeguard as much as possible the personality of the Logos, Son of God, who can be given various titles or epinoiai (Wisdom, Power etc.), eternal hypostasis together with the Father, incarnated through mercy in view of salvation and personally united with the human (i.e., the body) proceeding from the Virgin. The teaching of Malchion and his disciples could not but collide head-on with the monarchian tendencies of the teachings Paul defended. Paul's teaching, contrary to Origen's understanding of the hypostasis, distinguished between the Son, on the one hand, and *Jesus Christ, on the other, the man born from *Mary who was made the Son of God through his exalted union with Wisdom (or the *Holy Spirit). The unique feature of this formulation renders it irreducible to an *adoptionist position (in consideration of the fact that it also defends the existence of a preexistent Logos Son). Rather, it should be understood as having derived from the preceding Antiochene tradition. Certain aspects of Paul's teaching permit one to attribute to it a certain inspiration from the peripatetic school, esp. in the line of the exegete of Aristotle, Alexander of Aphrodisia.

Malchion's schema, which was in a certain sense Apollinarian ante litteram, by clearly defending the personal identification between the Logos and the man *Jesus Christ, was imposed on that of Paul of Samosata. The bishop of Antioch for his part continuing under various aspects in the tradition of his predecessors Ignatius and Theophilus (such as the emphasis on the soteriological character of the complete humanity of *Jesus Christ—a point that remained noticeably weak in Malchion's theology)—nevertheless seemed to distance himself from this tradition by establishing a rift between the invisible Logos and the visible man Jesus Christ united to the Logos. *Eustathius of Antioch would not go much further than Paul, even if he corrected a distinction that the latter established between the Logos and the man Christ, proposing instead a distinction between the invisible Christ Logos and the visible Christ man. The debate between Paul of Samosata and Malchion sheds light on the subsequent debates of the 4th and 5th c., i.e., surrounding *Arius and *Nestorius. In a certain sense, the question of the greater or lesser dignity of the visible and passible Logos, with different results from those brought about in the Arian controversy, is revealed in the synodal discussions of the 3rd c. in Antioch.

Another interesting point in the question of Paul of Samosata is the supposed condemnation in the synods of the term homoousios*. In reality, this term was already avoided by Malchion as much as by Paul, because both men saw within this term materialistic connotations, leading one to attribute to God a generation proper to material, corporeal substances. One should not forget that the term with its theological meaning originated in a *gnostic context to explain the generations within the *Pleroma. At one point in the debate, Paul probably seemed to have prevailed over Malchion's position, accusing him of defending a Christ homoousios with the Father. As *Athanasius reports, Malchion and his followers would have immediately opposed this argument ad absurdum forwarded by Paul. This condemnation, however, was delivered in a very different context from that of *Nicaea, where the term homoousios, if Eusebius of Caesarea's testimony is true, was only imposed by the emperor's intervention and with the clause that it should not be understood in a corporeal sense.

F. Loofs, Paulus von Samosata (TU 44, 5), Leipzig 1924; G. Bardy, Paul de Samosate, Louvain [2]1929; H. de Riedmatten, Les Actes du procès de Paul de Samosate, Freibourg 1952; F. Millar, Paul of Samosata, Zenobia, and Aurelian. The Church, Local Culture, and Political Allegiance in Third-Century Syria: JTS 61 (1971) 1-17; M. Simonetti, Per la rivalutazione di alcune testimonianze su Paolo di Samosata: RSLR 24 (1988) 177-210; V. Burrus, Rhetorical Stereotypes in the Portrait of Paul of Samosata: VChr 43 (1989) 215-225; P. de Navascués, Pablo de Samosata y sus adversarios, Rome 2004 (with bibl.).

P. de Navascués

PAUL of Tamma. Egyptian *anchorite, born in the village of Tamma—in the neighborhood of Dahut, on the Nile River opposite to Sharunah—he lived during the time of *Anthony and *Pachomius. The large Greek-Latin literary tradition on *monasticism (*Palladius, *Cassian, Historia monachorum, Apopthegmata Patrum*) has left no record of him; this lack of information makes it difficult to place him within the general context of the history and spirituality of Egyptian monasticism. Two fragmentary *Coptic codices contain a text on the life of Paul, or rather they narrate certain episodes (the most extensive fragments come from a codex of the White Monastery [sigla CMCL = MONB.FI], for the most part published by Amélineau 1888, 759-769 and 835-836 [= pp. 67-68 and 83-96 of the MS]; two folia from the University of Michigan Library, 158.44, are unpublished [pp. 59-62 of the MS]). Later a summary of the text available at the time of the compilation (12th c.) was included in the Copto-Arabic Synaxis. I argue that initially there existed two different and independent texts. Although the text attested by the Synaxis is hardly significant, the text preserved by the two Coptic MSS shows us a work from a milieu committed to collecting the lives of a certain number of monks, describing them in tight relationship one with another, perhaps somewhat forcing historical fact. These monks, however, were forgotten by the Greek-Latin tradition.

It is difficult to determine what historical information can be deduced from these documents. Broadly speaking, from this work emerges a middle-Egyptian tradition pertaining to the monastic communities of the territory between Memphis and Shmun, the chief individuals of which were, in addition to Paul, Apollo, Phib, Anup, (p)Amoun and Aphu. These individuals should be placed in the 1st half of the 4th c., and their activity seems to be viewed in contrast to the analogous initiatives of the Scetes (who came from Kellia and Nitria) to the N and the Pachomians (from which came from Shenoute) to the S. Later, Jeremiah, along with his companion and disciple Enoch (and perhaps an *ama Sibyl), revitalized the memory of these famous individuals (and perhaps above all that of Apollo) in order to establish a new community, faithful to the anti-Chalcedonian movement.

Paul of Tamma is one of the only aforementioned individuals whose works have come down to us and not merely accounts of his life. It is possible to consider him the driving force or the cultural leader of the group that we have identified. An edition of what has survived from his works can be found in T. Orlandi, Paolo di Tamma, Opere, Rome 1988. These works are as follows: (1) Letter. A brief text handed down in its entirety, containing advice for the anchorites. (2) On the cell. This long exhortatory text appears in two different redactions. The first, almost entirely complete (there are brief lacunae due to the poor preservation of the MS), is that of MU0166; the second is mutilated at the beginning (the text begins at par. 49 of the other redaction), continues parallel to the other redaction until par. 98 (which is almost the end of the other redaction), and then has a long passage that the other lacks (par. 99-125). (3) Other fragmentary passages treat poverty, *justice and humility.

The literary genre of all these works can be reduced to monastic rules and exhortations, attested above all by the Letters of *Anthony, *Ammonas, *Macarius of Egypt, and the writings of Pachomius, *Theodorus and *Horsiesi. What seems to distinguish the style of Paul is the foundational element of a literary text, i.e., the organization of the argument, which is completely lacking in Paul. His work consists of a number of individual sententiae thrown together apparently without any underlying theme. One finds certain emphases here and there and groups of sententiae joined around a concept, but one does not find a sustained set of arguments even within the author's stated objectives that do not amount to more than mere citations of Scripture. We see a certain Pachomius of the Letters (and of the Rules), those which we can presume were the primitive texts at the base of a collection of apophthegmata patrum* and other authors. Mark Sheridan has recently examined the theological and spiritual character of Paul's works, emphasizing in addition to common elements to the first Egyptian monasticism (in particular, attention to oneself, prosoché, vigilance, népsis), certain specific characteristics: the quality and nature of thoughts, and above all the fight against vain thoughts; the fight against the passions to obtain purity of heart and tranquility; certain interpretations of scriptural passages. Sheridan finds analogies between the latter of these and *Origen's intellectual context. How much that differs from the context of which we have been speaking is too early to judge.

É. Amélineau, Monuments pour servir à l'histoire de l'Égypte chrétienne aux IVe, Ve, VIe et VIIe siècles, Paris 1988; T. Orlandi - A. Campagnano, Vite di monaci copti, Rome 1984; Paolo di Tamma: opere, intr., testo, tr. e concordanze ed. T. Orlandi, Rome 1988; M. Sheridan, The Development of the Interior Life in Certain Early Monastic Writings in Egypt, in The Spirituality of Ancient Monasticism. Acts of the International Colloquium held in Cracow-Tyniec 16-19th November 1994, ed. M. Starowieyski, Cracow, Benedictine Abbey of Tyniec, 1995, 79-89; E. Lucchesi, À propos d'une édition récente des oeuvres de Paul de Tamma: Studia Christiana Orientalia 18 (1995) 161-166; M. Pezin, Nouveau fragment copte concernant Paul de Tamma (P. Sorbonne inv. 2632), in Christianisme d'Égypte, Mél. R.-G. Coquin, Louvain 1995, 15-20; L'Egitto cristiano, ed. A. Camplani, Rome 1997 (see index); E. Lucchesi, Une version copte du Sermo asceticus d'Étienne le Thébain: AB 11 (1997) 252; T. Vivian, Saint Paul of Tamma: Four Works Concerning Monastic Spirituality: Coptic Church Review 18 (1997) 105-116; Id., Saint Paul of Tamma: On the Monastic Cell (De Cella) (with B.A. Pearson): Hallel 23 (1998) 86-107; E. Lucchesi, Vers l'identification de Étienne de Thèbes: AB 116 (1998) 106; L.S.B. Maccoull, Paul of Tamma and the Monastic Priesthood: VChr 53 (1999) 316-320; A. Wadi, La recensione breve di Paolo di Tamma, in Aegyptus christiana, Mélanges P. P. Devos, ed. U. Zanetti – E. Lucchesi, Geneva 2004, 195-210; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1923-1925.

T. Orlandi

PAUL of Tella (7th c.). Miaphysite bishop of Tella d-Mauzalat, who between 615 and 617, with the assistance of a few collaborators, made a *Syriac translation of the so-called Septuagint Hexapla, i.e., *Origen's edition of the Septuagint corrected acc. to the Hebrew. This Syriac translation, called the "Syro-Hexaplaris," did not supplant the *Peshitta, but it was used in the context of biblical exegesis, esp. in the W Syrian tradition, though there are also traces of it in the liturgy. Almost the entirety of the Syro-Hexaplaris has been preserved; certain portions of the Pentateuch and the historical books are missing. The MS tradition also attributes to Paul some translations of liturgical texts.

Baumstark, 186ff.; Duval, 50-51; A. Baumstark, Nichtevangelische syrische Perikopenordnungen des ersten Jahrtausends, Münster 1921, 88-110; A.M. Ceriani, Monumenta sacra et profana VII. Codex syro-hexaplaris Ambrosyanus photolith., Milan 1874 (contains the 2nd half of the original codex, i.e., Psalms, Job, the Wisdom and Prophetic books); P. de Lagarde, Bibliothecae Syriacae quae ad philologiam sacram pertinent, Göttingen 1892 (what remains of the Pentateuch and historical books); W. Baars, New Syro-Hexaplaric Texts, Leiden 1968; A. Vööbus, The Pentateuch in the Version of the Syro-Hexapla. A Facsimile Edition of a Midyat Ms Discovered 1964, CSCO 369, Louvain 1975.

K. den Biesen

PAUL of Thebes (4th c.). The hero of *Jerome's first literary work, the Vita Pauli, written during his first visit to Chalkis in *Syria (most likely around 375/376). Jerome claims that Paul of Thebes—and not *Anthony the hermit, as *Athanasius had asserted—was the first to practice *ascesis in the desert. The superiority (and not only anteriority) of Paul with respect to Anthony is a recurrent theme in the work.

At age 15, Paul took refuge in the desert to escape from the *persecutions of *Decius and *Valerian. Having found a cave, an opening of which provided him a protected forecourt furnished with a pure well and a *palm tree (a true locus amoenus), he decided to settle there. Every day a crow brought him half a loaf of bread. When Paul was 113 years old, Anthony, who by then was 88, had learned in a vision from God that there lived in the desert a more devout ascetic than he. With the help of a centaur and a faun, he found Paul's hermitage. After convincing the hermit to open the door to the cave, he spent half the day with him, praying together and sharing a meal (that day the crow brought him an entire loaf of *bread, and not just the usual half). Paul asked Anthony to bring him the cloak he had received as a gift from *Athanasius. When Anthony returned with the cloak, he found Paul dead. The pit of his grave had been dug by two lions.

Jerome claims more than once and with much insistence that his account about Paul is true. Nevertheless, even if we overlook the part about the centaur, the faun, the crow that brought the bread and the lions that dug the grave, one cannot accept this account because it does not conform to actual facts. The numerous Egyptian sources we possess never connect the beginnings of *monasticism to using the desert as a means for escaping persecution. Moreover, the description of the desert provided by the author has nothing to do with reality. Lastly, one should note that we have no other testimony about Paul of Thebes than what Jerome has provided: all later texts clearly draw upon the Vita Pauli.

It could be the case that Jerome obtained some vague information, utterly lacking concrete details on the existence of an Egyptian ascetic older than Anthony. In this case, he acted in a way perfectly acceptable for an ancient biographer: because it was impossible to know the actual facts concerning that ascetic, he had to imagine what life must have been like in order to conform to a monastic ideal envisioned by Jerome himself. The rules of the literary genre within which he wrote this small work authorized him to see his duty not so much as to recount factual truths as much as to supply the reader with a moral example.

Paul the hermit was a literary fiction. It is certain that another person from one of Jerome's works, Vita Malchi monachi captivi, was entirely imaginary.

Jerome's small work had an immense importance for the emerging literary genre of *hagiography. The figure of Paul of Thebes became a model for many authors and for many centuries remained an element within Christian culture.

Not far from the Dead Sea, in a deep rocky wadi, within the proximity of the Monastery of St. Anthony, an enormous monastery of St. Paul was founded in the Middle Ages and exists to this day (Dayr Anba Bula). The first testimony to its existence is dated to the 13th c. It was enlarged during the centuries and remains one of the primary places of pilgrimage for modern Coptic Orthodox.

Editions: PL, 23, 17-28; B. Degórski (ed.), Edizione critica della "Vita sancti Pauli Eremitae" di Girolamo, Rome 1987; SC 508, 144-183 (with Fr. tr.). Translation: It.: S. Girolamo, Vite di Paolo, Ilarione e Malco, Milan 1975. Studies: BS 10, 269-280; M. Fuhrmann, Die Mönchsgeschichten des Hieronymus. Formexperimente in erzählender Literatur, in Christianisme et formes littéraires, Entretiens sur l'antiquité classique, 23, Fondation Hardt, Geneva 1977, 41-99; P. Leclerc, Antoine et Paul: métamorphose d'un héros, in Y.-M. Duval, ed., Jérôme entre l'Occident et l'Orient, Paris 1988, 257-265; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'antiquité, I, Paris 1991, 150-184.

E. Wipszycka

PAUL of Verdun (d. 648/49). Native of the region of Autun, after having stayed for a brief period at the court of *Chlothar II (584–629), he retired to a mountain near *Trier (Paulusberg or Bulisberg) but did not join an organized form of monastic life. Between 625/630 and 648/649, he was the bishop of Verdun. He was nominated by King Dagobert I (beginning of the 7th c.–639) and elected by the clergy and the people. Though finding his church in a miserable condition, he worked very hard: he restored divine worship, revitalized canonical life and trained the clergy well. He distinguished himself for promoting *eucharistic adoration, devotion to the Madonna and charity toward the poor. He wrote two gracious letters to *Desiderius of Cahors around 641; also extant is an invitation from Desiderius to Paul requesting his presence at the inauguration of a basilica.

CPL 1303; PL 87, 260.261; CCL 117, 333.334; BS 8, 280-281; DCB 4, 271; LTK³ 7, 1529; N. Gauthier, L'évangelisation des pays de la Moselle. La province romaine de Première Belgique entre antiquité et moyen-âge (IIIᵉ-VIIIᵉ s.), Paris 1980, 407-412; F.G. Hirschmann, Verdun im hohen Mittelalter: eine lotharingische Kathedralstadt und ihr Umland im Spiegel der geistlichen Institutionen, Trier 1996; Th. Bauer, Lotharingien als historischer Raum: Raumbildung und Raumbewußtsein im Mittelalter, Cologne 1997, 254-257, 599-605.

M.G. Bianco

PAUL SILENTIARIUS (6th c.). Byzantine poet, he performed the task of primicerius* of the silentiarii (chamberlains who were responsible for maintaining order in the imperial audiences and processions) at the court of *Justinian (527–565). He was a friend of the historian and poet Agathias (Historiae 5,9). Following the Alexandrian tradition, he composed epigrams and descriptions of artwork in verse. He is the author of the Descriptio (ekphrasis) sanctae Sophiae in 887 hexameters (in the manner of *Nonnus), preceded by two introductions, one addressed to the empress, the other to the patriarch *Eutychius. The second didactic composition is the Descriptio ambonis, written in 275 hexameters with an introduction in iambic trimeters. This pulpit of the cantors was located under the dome of the Hagia Sophia supported by eight marble columns. The earthquake of 558 greatly damaged the Hagia Sophia, which had been inaugurated by Justinian in 537. The church was restored in five years and, during the Christmas vigil of 562, the solemnities of the second "inauguration" began. Probably on 6 January 563, the first composition was read and a few days later, the second likewise in the presence of the emperor and the patriarch. The two short poems, which are important for their literary and historical aspects, are of great importance for the history of Byzantine art: the author describes at length the magnificence of this sacred building, rich in multicolored marble, possessing high columns, mosaics, precious materials and gold and silver glassware (candles, oil lamps of various types, etc.). The Anthologia Palatina* contains 789 of his Epigrams pertaining primarily to love. He did not write the short poem of 190 choliambics In thermas pythicas (On the Pythian Baths) (in Bithynia).

CPG III, 7513-7516; PG 86, 2119-2268; P. Friedländer, Johannes von Gaza und Paulus Silentiarius, Leipzig-Berlin 1912; G. Viassino, Paolo Silenziario, Epigrammi, text, tr. e comm., Turin 1963; Anthologia Palatina (ed. P. Waltz, "Les belles lettres"); Bardenhewer V, 24-25: PWK 3, 2366-2377; Impellizzeri 247-248 and 434-35. (bibl.); Patrologia V, 46-48.

A. De Nicola

PAUL the SIMPLE, saint (4th c.). Mentioned by *Rufinus (Hist. monach. 31 [PL 21, 457-459]) and by *Palladius (Hist. Laus. 28: PG 34, 1076-1084; see Appendix ad Palladium: PG 65, 381-385; De vitis Patrum seu verba seniorum, 167: PL 73, 795-796; Soz., HE 1,13: PG 67, 900 BC). An Egyptian peasant, he peacefully left his wife who had committed adultery and went to St. Anthony who was abbot in Thebaïd. Before accepting him as his disciple (at 60 years of age), Anthony put his vocation to the test. Humility, simplicity, obedience and great faith characterized his life; he exercised much power over the demons.

AASS Maii 1, 643-647; LTK² 8, 214; BS 10, 264-265.

A. De Nicola

PAULA (347–404). Mother of *Eustochium. A noble Roman matron about whose life we have information from Jerome's lengthy epitaph shortly after her death to console Eustochium (Ep. 108). She married the *pagan Toxotius from whom she bore five children, among whom were Blessilla, *Eustochium and Paulina, the wife of *Pammachius. Upon the death of her husband, which occurred before 381, she entered the *ascetic life and joined a group of noble Roman women who met in the house of *Marcella on the Aventine Hill under the spiritual direction of Jerome from the year 382 onward, when he was in *Rome with *Epiphanius of Salamis and *Paulinus of Antioch. Paul hosted Epiphanius from whom she heard stories about the lives of the Eastern ascetics; she was captivated. Under Jerome's direction, she applied herself to studying the *Scriptures and the Hebrew language, being already familiar with the Greek language. In 385, she set sail for the East to follow Jerome together with her daughter Eustochium and, after a stop at *Cyprus to meet with Epiphanius and at Antioch with Paulinus, she headed to *Jerusalem and then on to *Bethlehem. After having seen all the holy sites of *Palestine with Eustochium, she went with her and Jerome to *Egypt to visit the monks of the desert of Nitria. Finally, in 386 she settled once and for all at Bethlehem, where she established a hospice for *pilgrims and a male and female *monastery; she lived in the latter until her death (26 January 404).

Jerome, Ep. 30 (to Paula on Ps. 118); 39 (to Paula on the the death of Blesilla); 46 (letter of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella, preserved in the collection of Jerome's letters); 108 (to Eustochium); Palladius, Hist. Laus. 36; 41; LTK[3] 7, 1487 (bibl.); PCBE 1617-1626; N. Adkin, The Letter of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella: Some Notes: Maia 51 (1999) 97-110.

A. Pollastri

PAULICIANS. A heterodox medieval sect originally from *Asia Minor. If one disregards the Armenian sources, which are not clear, the first attestation to its existence was around 655 (the preaching of Constantine-Sylvan) in Byzantine Mesopotamia. After various misfortunes (imperial persecutions and migrations into Arabic territory), in the 1st half of the 9th c. the sect was already widespread in the E part of the empire and actually possessed its own "state" at Tefrik, which was suppressed by the Byzantines around 878. Until the end of the 12th c., the Paulicians are sporadically attested in the West and in the Near East and with a certain continuity in the Balkans (where they converged with the Bogomils) and at *Constantinople. The precise nature of their teaching is still subject to scholarly debate. In the Byzantine sources, they are wrongly referred to as "*Manicheans," but the Paulicians considered themselves to be Christians and willingly appealed to the NT, esp. the apostle *Paul's writings. Doctrinal developments aside, two traits seem to have characterized the sect: a certain type of *dualism and, with respect to the *incarnation, *Docetism. In their worship service, they made no place for the *saints and their *relics and not even the *cross or the *sacraments. Their affinity to the iconoclasts was only superficial. Lemerle contested Conybeare's theory (and Garsoian's), who maintained that the sect had *adoptionist origins and that its doctrines were contained in the Armenian treatise The Key of Truth.

F.C. Conybeare, The Key of Truth: A Manual of the Paulician Church of Armenia, Oxford 1898; N. Garsoian, The Paulician Heresy, The Hague-Paris 1964; Id., Byzantine Heresy: A Reinterpretation: DOP 25 (1971) 85-113; Ch. Astruc et al., Les sources grecques pour l'histoire des Pauliciens d'Asie Mineure: Travaux et Mémoires 4 (1970) 1-227; P. Lemerle, L'histoire des Pauliciens d'Asie Mineure d'après les sources grecques: ibid. 5 (1973) 1-144; G. Huxley, The Historical Geography of the Paulician and T'ondrakan Heresies, in T.J. Samuelian - M.E. Stone (eds.), Medieval Armenian Culture (University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies 6), Chico, CA 1983, 81-95; V. Nersessian, The Tondrakian Movement: Religious Movements in the Armenian Church from the Fourth to the Tenth Centuries, London 1987.

S.J. Voicu

PAULINIANS. This was the name given to those who adhered to the teachings of *Paul of Samosata. *Augustine attributed their *Ebionite christological teaching to "a certain *Artemon," and said that it was confirmed by *Photinus of Sirmium (De haer. 44; see also Eus., HE 5, 28,1-2). Canon 19 of the Council of *Nicaea maintained that they should be rebaptized if they wanted to return to the Catholic Church (Rufinus, HE I, 6; Athan., Or. c. Ar. sec. 43) and attested the existence of clerics, deacons and deaconesses within this group.

F. Cocchini

PAULINIANUS (4th c.–beginning of 5th. c). Jerome's youngest brother who followed in his footsteps, along with his sister, into the monastic life. With *Vincent (Presbyter), Jerome's friend and benefactor, he left *Rome for *Palestine. Not yet thirty years old, in 394, despite his resistance, he was ordained a priest by *Epiphanius, bishop of Cyprus, which violated the rights of the local ordinary, Bishop *John of Jerusalem, with whom Jerome was debating concerning *Origen's teaching. Paulinianus, who only desired to help his brother in the *monastery, therein exercised his ministerial priesthood. He always remained in good standing with Jerome, despite *Palladius's insinuations (Hist. laus. 79), and perhaps outlived his brother, but we know nothing of what he did afterward.

DCB 4, 230ff.; Patrologia III, 203-207.

M.G. Bianco

PAULINUS of Antioch (d. after 382). Antiochene priest, around the year 350 he was the leader of a small community in *Antioch that supported the decisions of the Council of *Nicaea and was thereby separated from the majority church of that area. This occurred because after the deposition of *Eustathius of Antioch, the majority church was continually led by pro-*Arian bishops. The disagreement continued even when the local bishop *Meletius, between 360 and 363, began to lean toward Nicene theology. In 362, *Lucifer of Cagliari ordained Paulinus bishop, and in 363 *Athanasius recognized him as the bishop of Antioch in place of Meletius: this decision exacerbated the Antiochene *schism inasmuch as *Egypt and the West aligned themselves with Paulinus and the entire anti-Arian East with Meletius. *Basil of Caesarea was particularly hostile toward Paulinus, even accusing him of being bent toward the ideas of *Sabellius and *Marcellus of Ancyra. The *Apollinarian controversy put a further strain on the small community, but around the year 380 Paulinus rejected Meletius's proposal for reconciliation (we do not know acc. to what terms). When Meletius died during the Council of *Constantinople (381), Paulinus, despite being supported by the West, was unable to get himself recognized as the sole bishop of Antioch, and *Flavian was elected in place of Meletius. The Council of *Rome (382) recognized Paulinus as the sole bishop of Antioch, but this recognition had no effect. Paulinus died shortly thereafter and was replaced by *Evagrius as the head of the schismatic community.

DCB 4, 232-233; F. Cavallera, Le schisme d'Antioche, Paris 1905; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 177ff.; 196ff.; 230-232; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVᵉ siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim; L.L. Field, On the Communion of Damasus and Meletius. Fourth-Century Synodal Formulae in the Codex Veronensis LX, Toronto 2004.

M. Simonetti

PAULINUS of Bordeaux. Contemporary of *Faustus of Riez and, perhaps, the same Paulinus whom *Gennadius presents as the author of the works on *penance, the beginning of Lent, *Easter, obedience and *neophytes (Vir. ill. 68). From his writings a fragment of a document De paenitentia has survived; it was mistakenly attributed to Faustus of Riez. Perhaps Ep. 4 of the aforementioned Faustus is by the same Paulinus (CSEL 21, 181-183), although the attribution of the Tractatus duo de initio quadragesimae to him remains doubtful (A. Mai, Spicilegium Romanum, IV, Rome 1840, 309-313).

CPL 981-982; PL 58, 875-876 (= PL 103, 699-702); B. Poschmann, Die abendländische Kirchenbusse im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums, Munich 1928, 128-129 n.4.

S. Zincone

PAULINUS of Milan. Biographer of *Ambrose of Milan. The few pieces of information on him upon which Bouvy, then Palanque, tried to reconstruct his life are based on the work he wrote (Vita s. Ambrosii) and on the information reported by *Marius Mercator (Commonitorium, ACO I,V, 1, 66.4), *Augustine and *Isidore of Seville (De vir. ill. 17). An eyewitness of the last period of Ambrose's life (the first explicit piece of information he provides is from the year 395), he came to know the bishop of Milan, whose notarius* he later became at an unknown time.

After Ambrose's death (397), he stayed in Milan and found himself there when Mascezel arrived from Africa, victorious over his brother *Gildo. He still resided there when the bodies of the martyrs *Sissinius, Martyrius and Alexander were transferred to the city. We do not know when *Simplicianus sent him to *Africa to manage the property of the Milanese church. It is very likely, however, that during his stay in Africa, he wrote the Vita s. Ambrosii at the request of Augustine. With regard to the date of the work's composition, 422 seems more plausible than 412 (see M. Pellegrino, Paolino di Milano). Much discussion has been raised concerning the biography's historical value. Today, scholars have considered the core of Paulinus's account to be trustworthy (ibid., 23) because its encomiastic aims, its moral preaching, the presence of the miraculous and his interest in the ecclesial dimension of Ambrose's life take nothing away from the seriousness of the information Paulinus provides. Lacking in literary luster and void of *rhetoric, the work follows a chronological order in narrating the life of the bishop of Milan. Scholars have also attributed to Paulinus the authorship of the Libellus adversus Caelestium Zosimo episcopo datus. Baronius and Tillemont argued that Paulinus the biographer of Ambrose should be identified with Paulinus the opponent of *Celestius; Palanque confirmed their thesis. In this brief document, Paulinus, who in the assembly of the bishops gathered at *Carthage in 412, took a stance against Pelagian ideas (Aug., De gratia Christi et de pecc. orig. II, 3.8; Contra duas epist. Pel. II 6), refused to appear, as Pope *Zosimus had wanted, before a Roman council to renew his charges; he exposed Pelagius and Celestius's errors and asked that the condemnation be ratified. All information about Paulinus after this event has been lost.

CPL 169; Vita s. Ambrosii: PL 14, 28-50; Libellus adversus Caelestium Zosimo episcopo datus: PL 20, 711-716; L. Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles, Venise 1732, X, 81; E. Bouvy, Paulin de Milan: Revue Augustinienne 1 (1902) 497-514; J.R. Palanque, La Vita Ambrosii de Paulin. Étude critique: RSR 4 (1924) 26-42; 401-420; Id., Saint Ambroise et l'Empire Romain, Paris 1933, 400-416; M. Pellegrino, Paolino di Milano. Vita di S. Ambrogio, Rome 1961; E. Lamirande, Paulin de Milan et la "Vita Ambrosii," Paris 1983; L. Canali - C. Carena (ed.), Vita di Cipriano. Vita di Ambrogio. Vita di Agostino, Milan 1975; M. Navoni (ed.), Paolino di Milano. Vita di sant'Ambrogio: la prima biografia del patrono di Milano, Cinisello Balsamo 1996; PCBE II, 1654-1658.

M.G. Mara

PAULINUS of Nola (355–431). Christian poet. A collection of his Letters and Poems has been passed down to us (ed. Hartel, CSEL 29-30). Born at Burdigala (Bordeaux) in Aquitaine in 355 (if not before) from a noble and rich senatorial family related to the most famous families of the empire, he was educated in the circles tied to the teaching of *Ausonius. This allowed him to attain the imperial laurel for poetry and numerous achievements in forensics. In 378 he was appointed Senator and, as a result, obtained the curule magistrature, probably the governorship of Campania, which he exercised with benevolence. In 383, after *Gratian's death and *Valentinian II's rise to power—as an *Arian Valentinian persecuted the magistrates of orthodox faith and esp. those who had supported the usurper *Maximus in *Gaul—he returned to Aquitaine and perhaps passed through *Milan, where he met Bishop *Ambrose. He seems to have had subsequent encounters with Ambrose, from whom he received his first series of lessons for *baptism. He was then baptized in his homeland in 389 by Bishop *Delphinus. During this year—perhaps even to avoid the persecution to which his family was then subject—he fled with his wife Terasia to *Spain, into the recesses of the Pyrenees Mountains, breaking ties with the groups with which he had associated until that time and even with his teacher and friend Ausonius. In Spain, having converted definitively to Christianity beyond mere externals, he gave away his immense fortune, causing a great scandal everywhere, but also drawing the approval and praises of Ambrose, *Augustine, *Jerome and *Sulpicius Severus. At *Barcelona, in 394, the people declared him a priest by a less-than-clear procedure. But he left Spain in 395 to flee to Nola, where he still had some assets. He felt compelled to go there by the calling to place himself at the service of St. *Felix, to whom he had dedicated himself since the years of his governorship in Campania. Here he lived until 409 or 410, leading an ascetic life together with his wife Terasia and some confreres. He resided adjacent to the sanctuary of St. Felix at Cimitile, in the environs of Nola, while maintaining contact by letter with the most respected bishops and Christian scholars and receiving friends and visitors who came from everywhere to talk with him. Toward 409-410 he ended his retirement at Cimitile to fill the episcopal chair of Nola, which was vacant after the death of Bishop Paul. Meanwhile around the year 409 his wife, Terasia, died. Paulinus died on 22 June 431.

During his stay at Cimitile, Paulinus wrote the bulk of the letters and poems that have come down to us. The letters (51 acc. to Hartel's edition), addressed to various people, among whom were Augustine, Jerome, *Rufinus, *Jovius, *Pammachius, *Desiderius, Sulpicius Severus, *Amandus, Delphinus, reveal the sentiments of a warm friendship renewed by Christian spirituality and by a geniality made purer through *ascesis and by the bonds of brotherhood in Jesus Christ. Even if he does not show himself to be a keen and original theologian nor a profound exegete when grappling with problems of theology or biblical *exegesis in these letters, Paulinus presents us an example of a *faith that is pure, intensely heartfelt, deep and rich in benevolence. Paulinus's poetic activity (33 poems acc. to Hartel's edition, but poems I, IV, V, XXXII and XXXIII have been mistakenly attributed to him) before 389 was focused on secular topics; from 389 onward however they turned entirely to singing the praises of Christ and St. Felix. From 389 to 394 while in Spain he wrote poems VI, VII, VIII and IX; in 393-394, poems X and XI to Ausonius; in 395 poem XII, the first natalicium in honor of St. Felix; at Nola, in 396, he wrote poem XIII, the second of the natalicium and, thereafter, every year, a poem for St. Felix's birthday: the others, 12 in all, from 397 to 408 or 409 (XIV in 397, XV in 398, XVI in 399, XVIII in 400, XXIII in 401, XXVI in 402, XXVII in 403, XXVIII in 404, XIX in 405, XX in 406, XXI in 407, XXIX in 408 or 409). He composed other poems for various occasions: poem XVII, propempticon for *Nicetas, and poem XXIV, a letter to Citherius, in 400; poem XXV, epithalamium for the wedding of *Julian of Eclanum and Titia, between 401 to 404; poem XXXI, a consolatorium for the death of Celsus, of an uncertain date, between 393 and 408, more likely between 393 and 401. In all these poems, with the exception of the VI in honor of St. *John the Baptist and poems VII, VIII and IX which are pareneses of Psalms 1, 2 and 136, Paulinus uses the same literary genres already consecrated by the classical tradition (propempticon, epithalamium, consolatorium and natalicium), profoundly renewing their contents, however, with a Christian meaning.

Like *Prudentius, whom he resembles in cultural formation, participation in public life and very similar religious experiences, Paulinus renewed—in accordance with the demands of a comprehensive conception of the Christian life—the poetic ideas not only of the pagan poets but even of his Christian predecessors and by consecrating poetry to Christ, he appropriated it in the service of spiritual exercise and above all that which, on the basis of lectio divina, raises the creature to the Creator so that he obtains salvation. Judgment on Paulinus's poetry has been skewed by a comparison with Prudentius's work, which is more diverse and rich in imagery and therefore more communicative. It is true, however, that Paulinus's poems are at times excessively prolix and too rhetorical, but even the digressions fulfill a specific poetic purpose. His poetry, even if it appears simple, is in fact difficult to read and, moreover, is not confined to its sympathy for one's neighbor (which manifests itself in many scenes realistically told, depicting at one point saints and learned visitors and then humble country folk and pilgrims at another, thus retaining in some ways his connection with secular poetry). He also provides vivid descriptions of feasts (still corresponding, however, to the ascetic's love for St. Felix and, through him, above all, for Christ); he reveals, however, a constant poetic tension that is always operative, even when it is weakened by certain mannerisms and excesses.

Meekness is generally considered the principal note of Paulinus's character. This assessment is derived from the friendly tone with which he speaks to his friends and by his sympathy toward the lowly. This meekness, however, should not be confused with weakness of the *soul: Paulinus also knew how to be stern and definitive as when he answered Ausonius's rebukes for having abandoned the secular topics of poetry and the criticisms of his detractors; such sternness was also evident when he had to reprimand the citizens of Nola for refusing to provide him water for his sanctuary. Rather than meekness, what is predominant in Paulinus's character is the fervor of his religious faith; it influenced all his actions and his literary activity, directing it in charity toward his neighbor for the love and honor of Christ.

Editions: PL 61; Paulinus Nolanus, Epistulae, ed. G. de Hartel - M. Kamptner, CSEL 29, Vienna 1899; Paulinus Nolanus, Carmina, ed. G. de Hartel - M. Kamptner, CSEL 30, Vienna 1899; M. Skeb (Hg.), Paulini Nolani operum concordantiae, 3 Bd., Hildesheim 2000. Translations: Eng.: P.G. Walsh, Letters and Poems, 3 vols., London-Westminster 1966, 1967, 1975 (ACW 35, 36, 40); It.: Paolino di Nola, I Carmi, A. Ruggiero, Rome 1990 (It. tr.); Paolino di Nola, Le lettere, G. Santaniello, Naples 1992 (Lat., It. tr.); Paolino di Nola, I Carmi, A. Ruggiero, 2 vols. Naples 1996 (Lat., It. tr.); German: Paulinus von Nola, Briefe, M. Skeb, [Fontes Christiani 25/1-3], Freiburg i.B. 1998.

For an exhaustive list of the studies on Paulinus (the fundamental studies of these are the two by P. Fabre, Essai sur la chronologie de l'oeuvre de St. Paulin de Nole, Paris 1948, and St. Paulin de Nole et l'amitié chrétienne, Paris 1949) S. Costanza, Meropio Ponzio Paolino: Antologia di carmi, Messina 1971, 17-36, and J.T. Lienhard, Paulinus of Nola and Early Western Monasticism, Bonn 1977, 11-16 and 192-204. To these works indicated, one should now add: W. Erdt, Christentum und heidnisch-antike Bildung bei Paulinus von Nola, mit Kommentar und Übersetzung des 16. Briefes, Heisenheim a.G. 1976; S. Costanza, Cristianesimo e Romanità in Paolino di Nola: Studi in onore di S. Pugliatti, Messina-Milan 1979, vol. V, 179-192; Kl. Kohlwes, Christliche Dichtung und stilistische Form bei Paulinus von Nola, Bonn 1979; A. Ruggiero, Nola crocevia dello spirito (with a tr. of poems XXI and XXVII); A. Ruggiero - H. Crouzel - G. Santaniello, Paolino di Nola, momenti della sua vita e delle sue opere, Nola 1983, with a tr. of the poems XV, XVI, XVIII (Ruggiero) and from the ep. XXIII (Santaniello); the studies collected in Atti del Convegno su Paolino di Nola (Nola 20-21 marzo 1982), Rome 1984; T.J. Brown - T.W. Mackay, Codex Vaticanus Palatinus Latinus 235: An Early Insular Manuscript of Paulinus of Nola Carmina, Turnhout 1988; G. Santaniello, San Paolino di Nola: una vita per Cristo, Naples 1994; F.E. Consolino, Cristianizzare l'epitalamio: il carme 25 di Paolino di Nola: Cassiodorus 3 (1997) 199-213; M. Skeb, Christo vivere: Studien zum literarischen Christusbild des Paulinus von Nola, Bonn 1997; G. Luongo (ed.), Anchora vitae, Atti del II convegno paoliniano, Naples 1998; S. Pricoco, Ancora sul Panegirico di Paolino di Nola per Teodosio e il nuovo concetto cristiano del potere imperiale: Cassiodorus 4 (1998) 225-246; D. E. Trout, Paulinus of Nola: Life, Letters and Poems, Berkeley, CA 1999; C. Conybeare, Paulinus Noster: Self and Symbols in the Letters of Paulinus of Nola, Oxford 2000; R. Kirstein, Paulinus Nolanus: Carmen 17, Basel 2000; S. Mratschek, Der Briefwechsel des Paulinus von Nola: Kommunikation und soziale Kontakte zwischen christlichen Intellektuellen, Göttingen 2001.

S. Costanza - C. Ricci

PAULINUS of Pella (d. after 459). Information about his life is gathered from his short poem. Born at Pella (Macedonia), where his Father Thalassius was the vicarius, at the end of 376 or the beginning of 377, after having briefly stayed at *Carthage, where his father was proconsul, and having passed through *Rome, he then journeyed to *Gaul (Bordeaux), the land of his parents, where he lived from the age of three (vv. 22-49). Without a doubt his father received those appointments because of the influence of his brother-in-law *Ausonius, whom Paulinus met in 379. He received his education at Bordeaux, where he studied two languages, but at home he spoke Greek. He had a child through a relationship with a slave girl, but the child died soon after (vv. 169ff.). At twenty years old, his parents arranged a marriage for him with a girl from a prominent family who bore him three children. He then devoted himself to managing his estates. His father died around 407, when the invasions of the Alans, *Vandals and Suebi began; a few years after, the *Visigoths arrived, with whom he sought to collaborate. The usurper Priscus Attalus, first proclaimed emperor by *Alaric, then by Ataulf, conferred an important office upon him; he collaborated with the *Goths (vv. 291-317). In 414 he was able to save the city of Bazas (Vasatis), where he had fled with his parents (vv. 328-376). By his own choice he then had to suffer at the hands of the barbarians (vv. 317-327) and the Gallo-Romans (vv. 424-430), who put him through considerable suffering, stripping him of many of his properties. He dates his "conversion" to the Easter of 421, i.e., a return to the faith of his childhood; he was made "an ascetic by force" (Marcone 21). He spent the last years of his life at *Marseille, where he had an estate (vv. 520-535). He died after 459.

Paulinus was the nephew of Ausonius, whose sister had married Thalassius. One should not rule out the possibility that he was born of a previous marriage of the latter, because Ausonius never mentions him. Paulinus composed a short autobiographical poem, Eucharisticos, published in the year 459, when he was 83 years old (v. 12ff.); it was composed as a hymn of thanksgiving for the divine mercy he experienced during his personal trials; but it is also a justification for his personal dealings against any possible charges. The author does not pretend, as he notes in the preface, to write his biography to satisfy the curiosity of others but to give thanks to God, who has always guided and protected him in the various ups and downs of life. The short poem of 616 verses is thus a reconsideration of his past life in the light of his faith and God's providence; the work does not contain a true spiritual and poetic dynamic. His poetry is thus deficient both in form and content. Scholars have attributed *Paulinus of Nola's Carmen IV to Paulinus (Hartel CSEL 30, 3), which is a prayer to God requesting a peaceful life with his family without having to harm others.

CPL 1472-1473; PLS 3, 1115-1128; CSEL 16 (1888) 291-318; H.G. Evelyn White, London 1921 (among the works of Ausonius and with Eng. tr.); C. Moussy, SC 209, Paris 1974 (with Fr. tr.); Paolino di Pella, Discorso di ringraziamento, [critical text, tr. and comm.] ed. A. Marcone, Florence 1995. G. Funaioli, De Paulini Pellaei carminis "eucharisticos" fontibus: Le Musée Belge 9 (1905) 159-179; P. Courcelle, Un nouveau poème de Paulin de Pella: VChr 1 (1947) 101-113 (also in Hist. Litt. des grandes inv. germ., Paris [3]1964, 293-302); P. Tordeur, Concordance de P.P., Brussels 1964; Patrologia III, 311-313; G. Sciascia, Paolino di Pella: AARC 4 (1981) 193-199; A. Fò, Tentativo di introduzione a Paolino di Pella, in Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità, ed. A. Garzya, Naples 1989, 361-382; N.B. McLynn, Paulinus the Impenitent: A Study of the Eucharisticos: JECS 3 (1995) 461-486; L. Zurli, Paolino di Pella ed Enea: BStudLat 26 (1996) 559-567; E. Colombi, Rusticitas e vita in villa nella Gallia tardoantica: tra realtà e letteratura: Athenaeum 84 (1996) 405-431; S.M. Perevalov, Bazas 414: la rupture de l'alliance alano-gothique: Dialogues d'histoire ancienne 26 (2000) 175-193.

A. Di Berardino

PAULINUS of Périgueux. We do not have much information about the life of this 5th.-c. poet, who has often been confused, even in antiquity, with the more famous *Paulinus, namely of Nola. His birth should be dated around the year 400, as one gathers from a line in the poem De visitatione nepotuli sui, written between the years 470 and 473, in which the poet makes reference to his gravis senecta (v. 20). The idea that he was the bishop of Périgueux (Petricordia) is rather doubtful. Paulinus's most famous work is his hagiographical poem De vita S. Martini, a six-book poetic parenesis of *Sulpicius Severus's work on *Martin of Tours, perhaps to be read in public upon the request of *Perpetuus of Tours, who also suggested that he put to verse one of his small books on the miracles performed by St. Martin. But Paulinus enlarged upon Sulpicius Severus's account with certain emphases that were at times overdone, thus lapsing into frequent and excessive moral and apologetic digressions, and minute descriptions, in which, however, he at times does not lack sensitivity in observation and liveliness in representation. For the exaltation of the miracles of St. Martin, Paulinus left two minor compositions of meager literary value, an inscription of 25 hexameters titled De orantibus, intended to adorn a new basilica dedicated to St. Martin, and a poem of 80 hexameters, De visitatione nepotuli sui.

CPL 1474-1477; PL 61; M. Petschenig, CSEL 16, 1, 1888. Studies: A. Huber, Die poetische Bearbeitung der Vita S. Martini des Sulpicius Severus durch Paulinus von Périgueux, Kempten 1901; J. Fontaine, Hagiographie et politique de Sulpice Sévere à Venance Fortunat: La christianisation du pays entre Loire et Rhin (Actes du Colloque de Nanterre): RHEF 62 (1975) 113-140; R. van Dam, Paulinus of Périgueux and Perpetuus of Tours: Francia 14 (1986) 567-573; G.H. Malsbary, The Epic Hagiography of Paulinus of Périgueux, Winnipeg 1988; E. Grünberg, Studien zur Vita S. Martini des Paulinus von Petricordia, Vienna 1991; A.V. Nazzaro, L'agiografia martiniana di Sulpicio Severo e le parafrasi epiche di Paolino di Périgueux e Venanzio Fortunato, in Mutatio rerum, ed. M.L. Silvestre - M. Squillante, Naples 1997, 301-346; S. Labarre, Le manteau partagé: deux métamorphoses poétiques de la "Vie de saint Martin" chez Paulin de Périgueux (V[e] s.) et Venance Fortunat (VI[e] s.), Turnhout 1998; Th. Gärtner, Zur christlichen Imitationstechnik in der "Vita sancti Martini" des Paulinus von Petricordia: VChr 55 (2001) 71-85.

S. Costanza

PAULINUS of Trier. At the Council of *Arles of 353 he was the sole participating bishop from *Gaul who refused to sign the condemnation of *Athanasius imposed by the emperor *Constantius. He was deposed and exiled to *Phrygia and died there soon after because he was indignus ecclesiae episcopus, dignus exilio a rege est iudicatus (Hilary: CSEL 65, 102).

DCB 4, 232; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 332ff., 460ff.; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IV[e] siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, 455, 461, 466.

M. Simonetti

PAULINUS of Tyre. Supporter of *Arius from the very beginning (ca. 320), he shared his beliefs and was the recipient of an important doctrinal letter from *Eusebius of *Nicomedia. At the Council of *Nicaea, he buckled under *Constantine's pressure, signing the anti-Arian formula of faith; he later assisted, however, in measures taken against Nicaea. In 327 he was elected the bishop of *Antioch in place of the deposed *Eustathius but died after a few months.

CPG 2, 2065; DCB 4, 231-232; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 44ff., 277ff.

M. Simonetti

PAULINUS of York (d. 10 October 644). He was consecrated as bishop of *York on 21 July 625, before he arrived there. He came from Kent with the entourage of Ethelburga, King Eadbald of Kent's Catholic sister, who went to York to marry Edwin, a *pagan king of Northumbria (Bede, Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II, 9). The objective of Paulinus's transfer to York was to convert the king and his court to Christianity. He exerted himself with zeal to this end, baptizing not only the king but also numerous nobles (Bede, ibid. II, 12.14). In 601 *Gregory the Great had sent him to Kent (Bede, ibid. I, 29); he was compelled to return there (Bede, ibid. II, 20) when in 632 King Edwin was defeated by the Briton Cadwallon, who brought paganism back to Christianized areas. Thereafter named bishop of Rochester, Paulinus died 10 October 644.

F. Cocchini

PEACE. The term peace was an important word in ancient Christianity. It had many meanings; we focus here on the primary ones: (1) Peace in connection to Christ, the peace of every person (Eph 2:14). The concept of peace developed in reference to the person of Christ; then, esp. in *Augustine's writings, the application of the term developed in connection to the human person. This was, perhaps, Christianity's most specific contribution to the meaning of the term peace, which, previously, was usually understood in relation to war and its absence. (2) The peace of Christ and as the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22; Rom 14:17), given to the one who believes in Christ ("Peace I leave with you. . . . My peace I give you," Jn 14:27). This is the believer's own peace; it is distinct from the peace that reigns among other groups. The Fathers heavily stress that Christians receive this peace, which is their own (see *Origen and Augustine's comments on Jn 14:27). Origen speaks of the son of peace (Lk 10:5-7), a term designating the new person in Christ; Christians, therefore, become messengers of peace by working within human history to obtain peace with God and concord while living among other people. (3) Peace in connection to civil and religious institutions and to the relations between peoples striving for dominance of economic goods and for cultural, utopian and political goals.

The first meaning of peace (i.e., Christ and the human being) was widely used in the *liturgy and in *anthropological discussions, esp. in Augustine's writings. The second—the peace "of believers," as a religious group—manifested itself in the internal debate on orthodoxy and heresy and relations between the various churches (*Cyprian and Augustine use the term in this sense in their writings, the latter using it thus in the *Donatist controversy). The third meaning was subject to the developing Christian understanding of its place in the world. Before *Constantine, Christians generally rejected war and, more generally, everything that threatened human life (e.g., the Traditio Apostolica 16, ed. B. Botte 1963, 36, forbids the *catechumen and faithful Christian believer from enlisting in the army and killing in war; it also forbids the judge from using the ius gladii; and Origen's Contra Celsum, in books 5, 7 and 8, provides the clearest testimonies). The Vita Martini (ch. 4), in his statement of faith, picks up this sort of disposition again: "It is not permissible for me to engage in combat" (pugnare mihi non licet). After Constantine and before the *Vandal invasions, Augustine responded along the same lines (Ep. 220, 229, 230, 231), during the years 426–427. Augustine's principle has remained famous: wars are destroyed at negotiating tables and peace is obtained through peaceful means, not through wars (ipsa bella verbo occidere . . . et acquirere vel obtinere pacem pace, non bello: Ep. 229,2).

By Augustine's time, the political situation for Christians had changed. This was not the era of the conscientious objector; instead, soldiers had to engage in battle. The insistent plea was made to leaders that, being in charge, they not go to war or that they postpone or mitigate its damaging effects. What was in the pre-Constantinian church a requirement for all believers (i.e., opposition to every attack on human life), after Constantine becomes a distinction between life as a citizen, which naturally requires one to defend the state, and life as a Christian, which advises one not to engage in war at all. Augustine summarized the new situation in this way: "If you ask me for advice that conforms to the principles of this world . . . I cannot offer a solid piece of advice on unstable matters. But if . . . you ask me for advice that conforms to the law of God, I know exactly what I ought to say . . . Christ's soldiers fight not to kill men but to defeat the principalities, powers and spirits of evil (Eph 6:12) . . . marital obligations do not prevent you . . . from seeking peace even in war, if you ever have to engage in it again" (Ep. 220, 9 and 12). One should read Augustine's statement on wars justified by the wickedness of neighboring countries in this light (Civ. Dei 4,15), acc. to Titus Livy's model, which he applied to the expansion of the Roman Empire.

In sum, we again note that at one point the term peace was employed to indicate the cordial relations between churches and the state, at another point, the state of reconciliation with God, eternal rest and the Christian community established upon orthodoxy and concord (*Tertullian, De or. 18; Orig., In Jer. Hom. 9.2). Peace is, therefore, synonymous with communio (Ursacius, Ep. ad Athanasium). As in the case of war, peace, acc. to the gospels, is not tied to a political state but to the coming of Christ, who came to earth to reestablish human peace with God (never the other way around, because the tension between the two arises from *sin). Paul calls Christ "our peace" (Eph 2:14). Christ's disciple, therefore, must be a "peacemaker" (Mt 5:9).

*Clement of Rome attributes great importance to the idea of peace (the term occurs seven times in his letters). The peace of the creation, acc. to the Stoic model, provides a paradigm for exhorting the Corinthian community to live in peace. For *Ignatius, peace is an eschatological good that God grants to the assembly (Phil. 7,2). *Cyril of Jerusalem asks that believers pray for the authorities so that they may promote peace (Cat. 15,6). In the writings of the other Fathers, one can distinguish different tendencies in their uses of the term. All develop the soteriological and spiritual aspect of peace acc. to the gospels. Tertullian remains faithful to the evangelical line (Adv. Marc. 3,14; 4,28; 5,14.17). Reconciliation with God completes peace (Pud. 2, 12,15). During his Montanist period, he distinguishes between pax humana, pax ecclesiastica and pax divina; so does *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 1,29,4). Though devoting much time to discussing the ravages of war (De beat. hom. 7,2-4), *Gregory of Nyssa offers a spiritual interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount's *beatitude concerning peacemakers. Christian writers use the term peace on the level of a political theology already in *Melito of Sardis. Especially from the 4th c. onward, one finds writers such as *Eusebius, *Ambrose, *Lactantius and *Orosius equating the concept of pax Christi with the pax Constantini. Augustine gradually dissociates himself from this political vision in order to come to an understanding of peace as an interior and eschatological good; Augustine's most important text is found in book XIX of the City of God. He takes another idea from Origenian terminology (filius pacis) and applies it to his understanding of divine foreknowledge and predestination (De corr. et grat. 15,46).

The term peace appears in the funeral responsory in pace, which was never used by pagans but is found very often in Christian *epigraphy. In *Africa one finds the inscription fidelis in pacis. The phenomenon of *schism gave rise to the epigraphic formula pax et unitas. Since *Justin Martyr's time the liturgy knows of the kiss of peace for fraternal reconciliation (1 Apol. 65,2). The term peace occurs in the liturgical greetings (Apos. Con. VIII, 13,1; 15,10). There we also find a prayer for peace (Apos. Con. VIII, 10,3; 15,4; Jn. Chrys., In Ac. hom. 37,3).

RAC 8,434-505; M. Viano, Contributo alla storia semantica della famiglia latina di pax: AAT 88 (1953), 168-183; C. Tibiletti, Il senso escatologico di pax e di refrigerium in un passo di Tertulliano: Maia 10 (1958) 209-219; J. Laufs, Der Friedensgedanke bei Augustinus. Untersuchungen zum 19. Buch des Werkes "De civitate Dei," Wiesbaden 1973; W.R. Schoedel, Christian "Atheism" and the Peace of the Roman Empire: ChHist 42 (1973) 309-319; A. Portolano, L'etica della pace nei primi secoli del cristianesimo, Naples 1974; A.M. Papes, Il concetto di pace in Tertulliano: Salesianum 42 (1980) 341-350; M. Toschi, Pace e vangelo, La tradizione cristiana di fronte alla guerra, Brescia 1980; V. Grossi, I nodi della pace nella storia del cristianesimo, in La pace del Regno, Turin 1983, 73-95; S. Budzik, Doctor pacis. Theologie des Fridens bei Augustinus, Innsbruck 1988; E. Corsini, La pace nella "Città di Dio" di S. Agostino: Civiltà Classica e Cristianesimo 9 (1988) 205-215; R. Farina, La pace in Eusebio di Cesarea, in F. Biffi, ed., La pace: Sfida all'università cattolica, Rome 1988, 327-337; R. Pizzorini, La pace frutto della giustizia e della carità secondo S. Agostino e S. Tommaso d'Aquino, in ibid., 562-572; I. Lana, L'idea della pace nell'antichità, S. Domenico di Fiesole 1991; E. Gallicet, Pax Babylonis, pax nostra, pax finalis: La pace in Agostino, in R. Uglione, ed., La pace nel mondo antico, Turin 1991, 291-308; P. Siniscalco, L'uomo e la pace in scritti cristiani del II e del III secolo, in ibid., 257-275; E. Lanne, Saint Irénée de Lyon, artisan de la paix entre les Églises: Irénikon 69 (1996) 451-476; M. van Parys, Paix et réconcilitiation dans la traditions patristique et monastique: Irénikon 69 (1996) 163-188; R. Farina, La concezione della pace nel IV secolo. A proposito di Costantino il Grande ed Eusebio di Cesarea, in A. Amato-G. Maffei, ed., Super fundamentum Apostolorum, Rome 1997, 229-239; V. Grossi, Testimoni. Origene. Agostino, in L. Lorenzetti, ed., Dizionario di Teologia della Pace, Bologna 1997, 926-930; 932-936; F. Ruggiero, I volti della pace. Testi dall'Episolario di Agostino di Ippona, Rome 1999; S. Agostino, La pace. Il libro XIX de La città di Dio, ed. R. Piccolomini, Rome 2000; J. Fernández Ubiña, Cristianos y militares. La Iglesia antigua ante el ejército y la guerra, Granada 2000; D. X. Burt, Peace: in A. Fitzgerald. ed., Augustine Through the Ages, Grand Rapids 1999, 629-632; T.J. Weisenberg, Die Friedenslehre des Augustinus, Stuttgart 2005.

A. Hamman - M. Flores Colín

PEACOCK. Absent from biblical literature (if one excludes a mention of it in certain MSS of 1 Kgs 10:22 LXX, though not accepted by Rahlfs's edition), the peacock was sacred to Hera-Juno in the Greco-Roman religion, evoking the celestial dimensions to which the deceased ascended once it had been deified. In the Latin world it was often mentioned in poetry (Ovid, Propertius, Martial) as a symbol of vanity and its stunning beauty found in its fan-shaped tail. *Augustine reiterated this belief when he said: "what beauty lies in the wings of the peacock!" (Com. Io. 3,4), contrasting it to the superior dignity of humanity created in the image of God. As an iconographic motif, the peacock was already part of the repertoire in *Sassanid art and was continually changed by classical and Hellenistic art, and, as a result, by metaphorical paleo-Christian and Byzantine language.

It was primarily and symbolically connected to the motif of death and rebirth: Pliny the Elder (Nat. Hist. 10,22-23), following Aristotle's path (Hist. Anim. 6,9,564), described the shedding of their feathers in fall and their rebirth in spring. Reflecting a widespread belief originally held by *pagans and disputing with Platonic rationalism (Civ. Dei 21,4), Augustine affirmed that the peacock possessed an incorruptible flesh, to thus avoid through divine decree the fixedness of the laws of nature. This legend about its incorruptibility had a definitive influence, along with its own ornamental functionality, on the success of the symbol of the peacock in sepulchral art, first Roman, then Christian. Concerning this matter, Testini categorized the peacock (as, e.g., in the case of the *phoenix) in the "paradigm of continuity" that pertained to various zoomorphic symbols in their passage from Late Antiquity to the Middle Ages. The peacock, he maintains, therefore constituted an intermediate case between two extremes: one the one hand, of their fading symbolic value (such is the case with those depictions containing animals already known from the preceding tradition that seem to fossilize in the repetition of ancient models without bearing a real trace of reappropriation: thus as in the venationes or the marine and pastoral scenes) and, on the other hand, the expansion of their use as a Christian ideogram due to their ethical and didactic value (think, e.g., of the eagle, the lion and the serpent).

The extraordinary dissemination of the peacock throughout paleo-Christian and Byzantine art—where it constituted the chief zoomorphic element, most represented until the High Middle Ages—marks a clear distinction esp. in comparison to the scarcity of information in the literary sources. When in the 13th c., this appears treated as a distinct topic for the first time in a homily of Anthony of Padua (Ant. Patav., Serm. Dom. V post Pentecosten 10), the peacock is, on the basis of the aforementioned ancient physiological conceptions, a symbol of the mortal body destined to resurrect with Christ and to be reclothed with immortality.

The primary areas of its depiction in paleo-Christian art are the following: primarily, as was said, in those of the funerary scene (catacombs, *sarcophagi and sepulchral slabs); therefore the wall and floor mosaics; likewise, not infrequently, the screens and the plutei (low walls). Many noteworthy examples, also because of their antiquity, are found in Italy. With no pretext of being exhaustive and not ignoring the spread of these motifs to other geographic contexts such as *Gaul, *Dalmatia, Tunisia, *Syria etc., this entry only treats those found in Italy. The catacombs both in *Rome (Callistus, Priscilla, viale Manzoni, etc.) and those in *Syracuse and N Africa are very rich with images of the peacock. Elements from scenes of the Garden of Eden—lush vegetation, fountains of refreshing water, etc.—among which the peacock is often placed, are rich in their value as a symbol of the *soul destined to the blessedness of the afterlife, making it the animal of paradise by antonomasia. Among the sarcophagi, the following are of great importance: Archbishop Theodore in S. Apollinare in Classe, and Theodota at Pavia (8th c.). For an example of a sepulchral slab with writing etched in it, one could also mention that slab from the cemetery Pretextatus (4th c.), today housed at the Lateran Museum. For the mosaics one should note those on the walls of the mausoleum of St. Costanza in Rome (4th c.), St. Vitalis at *Ravenna (6th c.) and those on the floor of the so-called Theodorian basilica at *Aquileia (4th c.). Similarly, at Ravenna there are screens in the basilica of S. Apollinare Nuovo and S. Vitale (6th c.). One particular case, then, is Maximinian's cathedra at Ravenna (4th c.), with depictions of the peacock on the mold of the chair.

The *iconography of the peacock is formulated in various typologies: it can be isolated, in pairs or groups of three, in relation to other elements (tree, the branch of the vine, cluster of grapes, flower, etc.) at times with a possible symbolic meaning added (as in the aforementioned slab in the cemetery of Pretextatus that also presents anchors and dolphins, or in the numerous cases where it is composed with a *cross). The motif of pairs of peacocks—or alternatively a pair of deer—enjoyed great success; they were often represented face-to-face in the act of drinking, on the rim of a chalice, goblet or a stream of water. According to Bisconti and De Maria, the analogy between the iconographic motifs of the peacock and the deer (which is such also because of their high frequency) consisted in their both being figures of salvation, in which a regenerative and baptismal meaning could be immediately recognized.

Cath I, 577; DACL 13/1, 1075-1097 (large collection of images); EC 9, 1008-09; ODB 3, 1611-12; F. Bisconti - L. De Maria, Temi paleocristiani nei rilievi altomedievali altoadriatici. Dagli animali simbolici all'immaginario zoomorfo: AAAd 32 (1988) 441-463; M.P. Ciccarese, Animali simbolici. Alle origini del bestiario cristiano, 1, BiblPatr 39, Bologna 2002 (important for its bibl.); H. Lother, Der Pfau in der altchristlichen Kunst, Leipzig 1929; T.E. Reimbold, Der Pfau. Mythologie und Symbolik, Munich 1983; P. Testini, Il simbolismo degli animali nell'arte figurativa paleocristiana, in L'uomo di fronte al mondo animale nell'Alto Medioevo, 2 (Settimane di studio del CISAM 31), Spoleto 1985, 1107-1179 (and the bibl. contained therein); R. Tosi, Dizionario delle sentenze greche e latine, Milan 1991, n. 1739.

F. Pieri

PEKTORIOS (Pectorius) (inscription). This very well known epigraph was engraved on a marble tombstone discovered in 1839 at *Autun, *Gaul (the ancient Augustodunum), and is today preserved in a local museum. The epigraph, consisting of three elegiac distiches (vv. 1-6) and five hexameters (vv. 7-11), was engraved in the 4th c., but its first part (vv. 1-6) seems to have been taken from a much more ancient text datable to around the end of the 2nd c. On it a certain Pektorios remembers his parents, Aschanios and Lilaios. The family seems to have come from *Asia Minor. Although vv. 7-11 pertain directly to Pektorios, vv. 1-6 (those taken from the most ancient texts) have a didactic character and are connected to the acrostic: (ΙΧΘΥΣΕ). This last letter, the first from v. 6, had as its conclusion in the primitive text perhaps the word Ἐλπίς, "Hope." The first and most ancient part, that esp. interests us here, is replete with Christian ideas. Humanity is the divine offspring of the heavenly *Fish (Ἰχθύς), i.e., Jesus Christ (v. 1); once they have received *baptism, "the immortal source . . . of the divine waters," they must warm their *soul again "with the perennial waters . . . of salvation," i.e., by listening to and reading the Word of God (vv. 2-4); they must nourish themselves with the *sacrament of the *Eucharist (vv. 5-6). This last distich reads as follows: "Receive the sweet food of the Savior of the Saints; eat with delight while holding the Fish in your hands." One should note here the mention of Christ as the "Savior of the Saints," i.e., of the faithful (ἅγιοι). Moreover, the verb λάμβανε (take) in the present tense indicates a continual action, i.e., the frequency of the consumption of the Eucharist; there is also an allusion to the ancient practice of putting a fragment of the eucharistic bread on the open hand of the faithful. In the second part, at v. 8, worthy of note for the 4th c., is the definition of Christ as the φῶς τὸ θανόντων ("light of the dead").

IG 14, 2525; DACL 1, 3194-3198; 13, 2884-2901; RAC 7, 1031-32; F.J. Dölger, Ichtys, vol. 1, Münster 1910, 12-15, 177-183; vol. 2, Münster 1922, 507-515. G.M. Grabka, Eucharistic Belief Manifest in the Epitaphs of Abercius and P.: American Ecc. Review 131 (1954) 245-255; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, IV, Rome ²1995, 487-494; A. Hamman, La preghiera nella chiesa antica, Turin 1994, n. 103, p. 154; LACL 560; La preghiera dei cristiani, ed. M. Simonetti - S. Pricoco, Rome 2000, p. 100, n. 40 (notes pp. 552-53).

G. Guarducci

PELAGIA, martyr. The Mart. syr. and the Mart. hier. commemorate Pelagia of *Antioch on 8 October. *John Chrysostom preached a homily in her honor (CPG 4350). *Ambrose recognized her as a martyr (De virginib. 3,7,33; Ep. 27,38). It is quite possible that *Eusebius of Caesarea may have been the first author to mention this saint (HE 8,12,2). These authors were unanimous in presenting her as a voluntary martyr: she flung herself from the roof of her home to avoid being assaulted by a group of soldiers who had come to arrest her (for the moral question on the suicide of the saints, see Augustine, Civ. Dei 1,26). Ambrose wrongly believed that she was the sister of two other martyrs in Antioch, Berenice and Prosdoce. This mistake passed into Florus of *Lyons's martyrology and, through his work, into other such martyrologies as the Mart. rom. (9 June). Another Pelagia was connected to this saint—a famous actress of Antioch who converted and led a life of penance. At the very beginning, John Chrysostom's account was probably the only one available (Hom. in Matt. 67). In the 5th c., however, ps.-James the Deacon wrote the legendary Vita, in which he borrowed elements from the life of Pelagia of Antioch (BHG 1478). The *prostitute Pelagia (also known as Margarita or *Marina) converted, was baptized and led an ascetic life at *Jerusalem under the spiritual guidance of the monk Pelagius. In fact, the feast of the second Pelagia also falls on 8 October. Another Pelagia, of Tarsus, is confused in the traditions with the two aforementioned Pelagias; this last Pelagia, who was of noble birth, was killed during the *Diocletian persecution.

BHG 1477-1479; BHL 6605-6611; BHO 919; BS 10, 430-441; LCI 8, 152-153; BBKL 7, 161-166; P. Petitmengin, Pélagie la Pénitente, 1-2, Paris 1981–1984; C. Nardi, Il martirio volontario nelle omelie di Giovanni Crisostomo sulle martiri antiochene: Ho Theológos n.s.1 (1983) 207-278; A. Di Berardino, Il modello del martire volontario, in Euplo e Lucia 304–2004. Agiografia e tra- dizioni cultuali in Sicilia, Atti del Convegno di studi (Catania-Siracusa, 1-2 ottobre 2005), ed. T. Sardella - G. Zito, Florence 2005, 63-105.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PELAGIUS (ca. 354–ca. 427) - PELAGIANS - PELAGIANISM

I. Historical outline - II. Polemical context - III. Writings and thought.

These three terms have had their own noteworthy historical significance in relation to their own time, from the person to the ideas that they embodied, and they to this day have established a symbolism in relation to what they represented in the history of Christianity. Using the findings and progress achieved by recent studies in this area, we shall try to shed light on the historical significance of such terms in order to redefine them more in conformity to textual sources than with the symbolism that has developed in a peculiar way since *Augustine's death (430). Down through the centuries the Pelagian controversy has been read mostly from the perspective of Augustine's writings, which presented it as a new "*heresy" within Christianity (Retract. II, 33). Such a perspective has negatively affected Pelagius, his movement and an understanding of Augustine's thought, because it has led people to attribute to Pelagius the anthropological positions of others, positions to which he often responded more to demonstrate their inconsistency than to offer a solution to the problem himself. Studies on Pelagianism from Plinval (1943) to this day have allowed scholars to go beyond the judgment of orthodoxy to obtain a synthetic and more complete understanding on an entire movement, which, for nearly 20 years (from 410 onward) caused great controversy in Christianity, esp. in the West.

Pelagius was born in *Britain ca. 354 and between 380 and 384 was baptized at Rome, where he lived for a long time as one of the most listened to voices of the time. The terms "Pelagian" and "Pelagianism" were derived from his first name. We shall discuss the historical outline, polemical context, the writings and thought of this ideological movement, which at Rome was tied to powerful Roman families and encountered and united itself to the *Origenist movement.

I. Historical outline. Scholars usually distinguish three well-defined periods in the Pelagian movement: before 411; from 411-418; and after 418.

I.1. Before 411. Historians of the movement have attributed to this period the anonymous document (perhaps a work of Pelagius) De induratione cordis Pharaonis. This document represents Pelagius's understanding of Christianity discussed at that time in Italy and in other Christian intellectual circles that were perhaps debating the theses of the impeccability of the baptized promoted by *Jovinian, along with *Ambrosiaster and Augustine's 83 Quaestiones. In this work he rebuts every type of *Manichean and non-Manichean predestinationism and insists on the ability to merit eternal life by observing God's precepts through the freedom placed within human nature (Indur. 46 and 51).

We must conclude that the Pelagian period before 411 is rather difficult to understand completely, given the scarcity of explicit, concrete elements that one can categorize. It is certain that Pelagius made a name for himself at Rome after the controversy started by Jovinian. In the 2nd half of the 4th c., Jovinian created much debate both on the topic of the impeccability of the baptized (Jerome, Adversus Iovinianum 1,1: eos qui plena fide in baptismate renati sunt, a diabolo posse non subverti ["those who were reborn in baptism with full faith cannot be ruined by the devil"]) and the topic of virginity, because all Christians, he argues, have been made equal by the one baptism that we receive and therefore we are all meritorious of the same crown (varia quidem luctae genera, sed una corona victorum est ["there are certainly different types of battles, but there is one crown for the winners"]: Jerome, Adversus Iovinianum 1,20). The controversy was also stirred by *Bonosus and *Helvidius, who rejected the perpetual virginity of *Mary. Augustine believed that Jovinian's position was a blend of *Stoicism (for its belief in the indistinction of sins) and Epicureanism (for its defense of carnal desires—Ep. 167,4) and summarized it in the following terms: "not many years ago at Rome a certain Jovinian encouraged the sanctimoniales of even an advanced age to marry not enticing them with carnal pleasure (non inliciendo) . . . but by arguing (disputando) that before God there exists no difference in merit for virgines sanctimoniales in comparison to married people" (De peccatorum meritis et remissione 3,13).

I.2. 411–418. During this period the Pelagian controversy began and officially ended. In 411 a synod was held at *Carthage against *Celestius, followed by a condemnation that was always referenced in the years following; the Synod of *Diospolis (415) in the East, from which Pelagius left exonerated; the African reaction that led to the condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius by *Innocent I (27 January 417); the momentary rehabilitation of Pelagius and Celestius by Pope *Zosimus (September 417); the coun- cilium plenarium of Carthage (May 418) that condemned Pelagianism in nine canons; the Tractoria epistle by Pope Zosimus confirming the condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius, sent for all the bishops to sign, and the condemnation issued by the emperor *Honorius (we do not have the precise dates to determine whether Zosimus or Honorius's condemnation was first). During this period Augustine refuted Pelagius's writings De natura and Pro libero arbitrio. During the same period Pelagius wrote his Ep. ad Demetriadem. In his three writings, Pelagius articulately elaborated his theology of creation and the possibilities of free choice in doing the good and meriting eternal life for oneself.

I.3. After 418. This last period was characterized by Augustine's controversy with *Julian of Eclanum, the last great Pelagian, on reconciling the transmission of original *sin both with the origin of the *soul and the goodness of marriage. It was also characterized by the transformation of the Pelagian controversy from a problem of the necessity of *grace into an *anthropological question (in the creation of *Adam, his freedom existed by grace and human freedom as such is therefore called to live by grace; after Adam's sin it is called to live by gratia Christi). In this last phase, Augustine composed his great theological works on human freedom and grace (De gratia et libero arbitrio, De correptione et gratia, De praedestinatione sanctorum, De dono perseverantiae). The issues discussed in the book De induratione cordis Pharaonis returned during this period (the similarity between many questions in this work and those that emerged during the years 426–428 have raised many questions concerning the author and the dating of that work). After 426 the Pelagian controversy found a home in the convents of N Africa (*Hadrumetum) and the provinces, but no longer along the lines of heresy, but rather in theological discussion. Once the promoters of the Pelagian movement had been considered harmless (Pelagius died, perhaps in Egypt, around 427; Celestius and Julian were sent into exile), there was a de facto general acceptance of the distinction made by Julian of Eclanum to Pope Zosimus, namely, between heresy and an open question. In the monasteries an argument arose concerning the questions regarding grace and free will formulated acc. to the more pelagiano, i.e., one before the other (for Augustine, however, grace is the help of the will/free choice/freedom, not its opponent) resulting in a question on the initium fidei (whether it begins with the human or with God, a problem erroneously indicated along the line of heresy by the author of the entry on *semi-Pelagianism of the DTC) and *predestinationism condemned at the Council of *Arles in 473. The reading of Pelagianism in relation to Augustine, which occurred after 431, took into consideration for the most part only this third period. The emperors produced the following documents on the controversy: the rescript of Honorius against those at fault (9 June 419) and *Valentinian III against Pelagianism in S *Gaul (9 July 425).

II. Polemical context. In the history of theology, the Pelagian controversy has continued to provide a means to understand Christian anthropology. In fact, this anthropological point was the synthesis in which it expanded in the years following the condemnation of the Pelagians, esp. from 426 onward. However, in actuality it was an entire movement of ideas that adapted itself to the local context (Italy, Gaul, Africa and the East) and thereby spread throughout Christianity in the 1st half of the 5th c. This movement presented a powerful case for itself by arguing for its adherence to the sacred *Scriptures in their totality (OT and NT). The movement read the Scriptures in the unifying optic of a revelative lex of God's will. Such a revelation required *ascesis and commitment in every state of life and therefore not only for those who chose to live in monasteries. One of the popular adages of the movement was "maybe the same law of Christianity has not been given to all those who call themselves 'Christians'?" (Divitiis 6). In the end, it was a movement committed to imitating Jesus Christ, who by his example awoke all humanity from the sleep of its sin and seriously committed his own will/freedom ut vires suas virgo agnoscat (Divitiis 2). Everything that could only signify a stimulus to doing better, however, was deepened on a theoretical level by involving a comprehensive interpretation of being Christian. The discussion in fact expanded to include the actual possibilities and the merit of human freedom, the nature and function of God's grace, and the value of the *sacraments inasmuch as they mediate grace. In Roman Christian circles, divided at that time between *Origenists and anti-Origenists, a very bitter controversy was underway that very soon spread, after the sack of Rome by *Alaric in 410, when the fugitives fled from Rome. The controversy was widespread and became radicalized esp. in Africa, a region of the church that was just finishing its century-long division between *Donatists and *Catholics by means of the Collatio carthaginensis (411).

Moreover, Christian Rome was trying to regain its balance after the challenging interpretation of Christianity proposed by Jovinian. Condemned at Rome in 392 and in 393 at Milan, he emphasized the commonality of baptismal grace and denied special merits and therefore a special award to the ascetic choices of a lifestyle of virginity and continence, lifestyles that had been greatly promoted during that time by such authoritative voices as *Ambrose, *Jerome and others. The circle of Roman Origenists was tied to the powerful families of the time, and a circle headed by Pelagius, which had already produced Rufinus's Liber de fide, an antitraducianist work, now gathered many diverse voices thanks to the moral reputation of Pelagius and the dialectical ability of Celestius, in a new unitary interpretation of Christianity: every Christian is called to follow Christ in the choice of virginity and chastity, and the possibility of accomplishing this was made to reside only within each person's freedom of choice (Ep. ad Demetriadem). Such an ideal, radically opposed to Jovinian, found favorable ground in almost every land acc. to the local circumstances: in Africa against the use of infant baptism, deemed an act void of personal and voluntary choice; at *Syracuse in the social milieu; in the noble family of the Anicii when the family felt itself honored in the work of supporting monasteries; and in the very monasteries that found, in the Pelagian ascetical ideas, a stimulus to continue to live and to set forward the choice of that propositum (embracing *monasticism) so devalued by Jovinian. Augustine tells us that in the years 425–426 at the monastery of *Hadrumetum, Africa, the following Pelagian adage was in circulation: "it is in my power to do the good, I direct my freedom" (Ep. 216,5).

The ambiguities underlying the Pelagian synthesis pertained not so much to the affirmation of the possibility of human freedom, but the way of understanding such possibilities and the very understanding of human freedom and its implications. In fact, the Pelagians, placing the choices of freedom at the foundation of everything, denied that humanity was born into "original" sin and refused to acknowledge that each person stood in need of Christ's *redemption from the moment of birth. They therefore opposed the practice of infant baptism in remissionem peccatorum, explaining that the practice was only a consecration. Moreover, they understood the grace of God to be both a natural endowment (the gift of free will/the freedom granted through creation) and God's revelation of what one must do (the sacred Scriptures in the category of revealed law), i.e., grace serves both as an external aid to freedom and as a good example to be imitated—i.e., Christ's example in distinction from Adam's, which instead provided a bad example.

The Pelagian ambiguities carried into Africa came into contact with the ecclesiological-sacramental solutions of Augustine for the Donatist question, which by that time had almost come to an end (411), and with the question of *traducianism, tied to the problem of the soul's origin, and they were received as "a new scandal in the church" (Ep. 177,15), a "new heresy" (Aug., Retr. II, 33). The old question raised by Jovinian concerning the possibility that the baptized could not sin was extended to the possibility in general concerning human freedom (Augus., De perfectione iustitiae hominis). Pelagius and Celestius were identified as the leaders of the movement; these men were learned individuals who possessed a great ability to persuade (Ep. 175, 1), but were "pernicious founders of a new heresy" (Ep. 175,1 and 182,3), which was definitively condemned as such by the Council of Carthage (418), a circular letter (the Tractoria) written by Pope Zosimus (418) and the Council of *Ephesus (431), in which an association was made between Pelagius and the *Nestorian heresy.

The Pelagian movement should be seen as a new attempt to understand a Christianity that was vulnerable after the first decade of the 5th c. Jovinian, Pelagius and Augustine certainly reflect the deep-seated ideas on the various ways of thinking about God's grace and human freedom, namely, the relationship between God and human beings and the placing of the anthropological problem within the heart of Christianity, which at that time was framed acc. to the ascetical understanding of being a sequela Christi. For Jovinian, the grace of God has been given to all in the same measure; it cannot therefore be made one's own in the sense that one can increase it by one's personal merit owed to one's ascetical commitment (the choices of virginity and those exercising continence). For Pelagius, the grace of God is only an external help for freedom, a help in the sense of creation (free will), revelation (the sacred Scriptures), remission of sins (personal), a good example (that of Christ), and therefore not an intrinsic help so that this freedom itself constitutes God's grace and enables one to act on the level of a good that is meritorious of eternal life. In fact, in the Pelagian perspective, freedom, from the moment of creation, has its own radical autonomy in the decisions pertaining to its destiny. To its choices and only to these choices are owed the merit of both desiring them and putting them into action and the corresponding just reward from God.

For Augustine, the grace of God is itself a good of human freedom: in fact, through it freedom can be what it is and operate with the help of grace on the level of a good that can be meritorious of eternal life.

Left to itself, however, and not having its own resting point, which is God, it wanders adrift; alone, it can only alienate itself from God (Ep. 194,2,3).

The help that freedom receives from grace, however, does not mean that it has now been replaced in its own decisions; it is only placed in a position to express itself at the level of freedom and not by its circumstances. In fact, grace helps freedom as a friend helps another friend, adapting itself to its actual possibilities. From Augustine's point of view, freedom is not an absolute that can actualize itself upon one's first wish. Augustine recognizes that its growth is gradual: a state of infancy (voluntas parva et invalida), when it knows what to desire but knows neither the way nor possesses the strength to bring about how much it desires; a state of adulthood (voluntas magna et robusta), when it is also able to complete what it wishes (De gratia et libero arbitrio 17,33).

III. Writings and thought. One should place the Pelagian writings in the historical-cultural context of the controversy over the understanding of Christianity that occurred in Western settings, esp. Milanese, Roman and African at the beginning of the 5th c. These texts were bent on exhorting one to fulfill what is set before us in the exhortations and examples of the sacred Scriptures. The Pelagian writings were seen in the past as a monolithic corpus attributed to Pelagius. Today with the progress of research, scholars have become aware of the differences of content and style in many of the works contained in this corpus, though possessing a homogenous outlook. The Pelagian controversy involved an anonymous diffusion of many ideas, slogans and writings that had already made it very difficult for their contemporaries to differentiate the actual thought of Pelagius from that of his followers. The Liber Testimoniorum (a collection of 160 titles), from which were extracted six propositions in the canonical trial raised against Pelagius at *Diospolis in 415, remains the most comprehensive treatise of Pelagian ideas that circulated without an explicit identification of its author. Actually, the corpus pelagianum was divided into three groups: Pelagius's works, doubtful works and works of other authors. The following studies have provided the greatest contributions in clarifying these points: C.P. Caspari (Briefe, Abhandlungen und Predigten . . . , Oslo 1890), who maintained that the works once attributed to Pelagius are the works of Bishop *Fastidius; G. Plinval (see esp., Vue d'ensemble sur la littérature pélagienne: REL 29 [1951] 284-294: a position seconded by Hamman in PLS I, 1101-1102); R.F.. Evans (Pelagius Fastidius and the Pseudoaugustinian De vita christiana: JTS 13 [1962] 72-98); P. Courcelle (Histoire litt. des grandes invasions germaniques, Paris [3]1964, 303-317); J. Morris (Pelagian Literature: JTS 16 [1965] 25-60); the clarifications of the CPL 728-766; lastly, the contributions of the DSp (1984) XII/2, 2895-2942. Finally, one should note that the majority of Pelagius's works have come down to us through the writings of ps.-Jerome.

The nature of the exegetical, theological and ascetic-moral writings of Pelagius—which can be summarized acc. to Plinval, in the De induratione cordis Pharaonis (a work written before 411 and to be attributed to Pelagius)—with respect to his thought, is summarized in imitating Christ as the gospels propose and in fulfilling the Bible's exhortations. All Scripture therefore should be understood as the revelation of a lex to be observed and examples to be imitated, and particularly that of Jesus Christ (the position in his commentaries on Paul's Epistles: Expositiones XIII ep. Pauli, ed. A. Souter, Cambridge 1926).

The theological and ascetical writings can be grouped around the De natura (from 414?; 405-406? acc. to Y.-M. Duval), in which he made the case for the fundamental ability of and possibility for humanity, lying within its nature, to orient and fulfill its own choices acc. to God's commandments and to live without sin. Pelagius expanded upon such a key idea in his thought, founded upon the doctrine of creation and the four books Pro libero arbitrio (415). The free choice of the will has been set within the human being from the moment of creation like a root, which is determined by its choices in the fruits that it bears. The grace of God plays a role in helping this primary decision under the guise of an incitement of the will to follow Christ's example. Pelagius's other writings, esp. those on chastity and virginity, explained this idea in concrete terms.

In the end, we can say that Pelagius was the name from which the titles "Pelagianism" and "Pelagian" derived their origin; historically, however, already at the beginning of the open controversy, the group that made Celestius its leader was also prominent. Julian of Eclanum did not represent a group properly speaking, but many documents after him make reference to his thought, esp. his ideas on the nature of sexual concupiscence as a Pelagian doctrine (e.g., Arnobius in his book Praedestinatus now attributed to him by F. Gori). From Augustine's death onward, "Pelagianism" was a comprehensive term used to refer to all those who, standing on the autonomy of human freedom, were suspect of being—as Augustine put it—"enemies of God's grace." Pelagius himself became a symbol: either as the heretic who wanted to make himself independent of God's grace or as a defender of human freedom.

In a similar way, Augustine was considered to be a counterpart to Pelagius inasmuch as he was considered the defender of God's grace, but, for many people, he was suspected of having overthrown human freedom. From this insinuation was born the heresy of predestinationism after Augustine's death, but connected to him acc. to some people, namely, that God has determined human freedom to good or evil, thus predestining each individual to heaven or hell. A greater understanding of the Pelagian movement has also done historical justice to the actual content of Augustine's last writings. They freed his writings from later projections onto his thought; e.g., the discovery that he believed that predestination is only and always the gift of a good, without any equivocation about the existence of a predestination to evil.

PLS I, 1101-2; CPL 728-766; C. Martini, Sei frammenti del "De fide Trinitatis" di Pelagio: Ricerche Religiose 20 (1949) 35-64; G. Plinval, Pélage. Ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme. Étude d'histoire littéraire et religieuse, Lausanne 1943; Id., Vue d'ensemble sur la littérature pélagienne: REL 29 (1951) 284-294; R.F. Evans, Pelagius. Inquiries and Reappraisals, London 1968; G. Bonner, Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism, Villanova, PA 1972; G. Greshake, Gnade als konkrete Freiheit. Eine Untersuchung zur Gnadenlehre des Pelagius, Mainz 1972; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius . . . , Stuttgart 1975; Id., Das Pelagiusdossier in der Tractoria des Zosimus: FZPhTh 26 (1979) 336-368; V. Grossi, Patrologia III, 437-453; Id., La crisi antropologica nel monastero di Adrumeto: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 103-133; Id., Pelagio: DIP 6, Rome 1980, 1327-1330; J. Burns, Augustine's Role in the Imperial Action Aganist Pelagius: JTS 30 (1979) 67-83; J.F. Kelly, Pelagius, Pelagianism and the Early Christian Irish: Mediaevalia 4 (1978) 99-124; F. Nuvolone, Problèmes d'une novelle édition du De induratione cordis Pharaonis attribué à Pélage: REA 26 (1980) 105-117; J.B. Valero, Las bases antropológicas de Pelagio en su tratado de las Expositiones, Madrid 1980; Y.-M. Duval, Pélage est-il le censeur inconnu de l'Adversus Jovinianum à Rome en 393? Ou: Du "portrait-robot" de l'hérétique chez s. Jérôme: RHE 75 (1980) 525-557; Id., L'affaire Jovinien. D'une crise de la société romaine à une crise de la pensée chrétienne à la fin du IVe et Ve siècle (SEA 83), Rome 2003; M.-F. Berrouard, Le Lettres 6 et 19* de saint Augustin. Leur date et les renseignements qu'elles apportent sur l'évolution de la crise pélagienne*: REA 27 (1981) 264-277 (to be seen in relation to Augustine's Contra duas epp. Pelag.); on De gestis Pelagii and Augustine's Ep. 19* Divjak: BA 46b, 286-291 with a long note by Y.-M. Duval, 507-516; on the De gestis and Augustine's Ep. 6* Divjak in relation to the Eastern bishops: BA 46A, 108-117 and the auxiliary note on pp. 430-442; O. Wermelinger - A. Solignac - F. Nuvolone, Pélage et Pélagianisme: DSp (1984) XII/2, 2895-2942; C. Hammond Bammel, Rufinus' Translation of Origen's Commentary on Romans and the Pelagian Controversy: Antichità Altoadriatiche 39 (1992) 131-149; F.E. Consolino, Fra Pelagio e Claudiano: l'elogio degli Anicii nell'epistola di Girolamo a Demetriade: Hestíasis (Studi . . . S. Calderone), Messina 65-83; J. Yates, The Canonical Significance of the Citations of James in Pelagius: EThL 78 (2002) 482-489; V. Grossi, L'origenismo latino negli scritti agostiniani: dagli origenisti agli origeniani: Augustinianum 46 (2006) 51-89.

V. Grossi

PELAGIUS I, pope (556–561). Coming from the Roman aristocracy, Pelagius I made a name for himself as a deacon and apocrisarius* of Pope *Vigilius. Under his influence, *Justinian I condemned Origenism (PG 86, 945-994). While still a deacon, he collaborated in the Latin translation of the Apophthegmata patrum (CPG 5570). Defending the Latin position, he took a stance against the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. While Vigilius was being detained at *Constantinople, Pelagius I played an important role at Rome. He actively helped the city's population during the conflict between *Totila and the Byzantines. Again at Constantinople, he supported Vigilius and his resistance against the condemnation of the Three Chapters, even writing a treatise on the topic (Constitutum). Though rebuking Vigilius for succumbing to imperial pressure (Defensio), he too eventually recognized the condemnation of the Three Chapters after the pope's death, as well as the Council of *Constantinople II (553). Against the resistance of the clergy and people, the emperor orchestrated his consecration as bishop of Rome. Working within the framework of imperial politics, Pelagius I restored the discipline and the finances of the Roman Church. Although he was able to obtain the people's approval through his works of charity, he continued to meet resistance in the Western churches. In N Italy, a very long *schism began. From Pelagius I onward the Roman bishops were constrained to seek approbation from the Byzantine emperor for their election.

CPL 1698-1703; PLS IV, 1277-1369; P.M. Gassó - C.M. Batlle, Pelagii I Papae epistulae quae supersunt, Montserrat 1956 (PLS IV, 1284-1312); O. Guenther, Constitutum: CSEL 25, 230-320; R. Devreesse, Pelagii in defensionem trium capitulorum, Rome 1932 (PLS IV, 1313-1369); Vitae Patrum: PL 73, 855-988; B. Rubin, Das Zeitalter Justinians, I, Berlin 1960; K. Baus et al., Storia della Chiesa, III, It. tr. Milan 1978, passim; Patrologia IV (1996), 144-146; A. Placanica, L'epistolario di Papa Pelagio, in A. Quacquarelli (ed.), Res Christiana. Temi interdisciplinari, Rome 1999, 239-246; LTK³ 8, 10-11; EPapi 1, 529-536; PCBE 2, 1710-1716.

B. Studer

PELAGIUS II, pope (579–590). Elected on 26 September 579, after an almost four-month vacancy in his see, at a time when the *Longobards (Lombards)—who were *Arians—were invading *Rome, Pelagius II could not obtain approval from the emperor Tiberius. He first sought assistance from the

*Franks (Jaffé 1048), then in 584 from the Byzantines by means of his *apocrisarius at *Constantinople, *Gregory, the future pope (Jaffé 1052). Because of the political situation in Italy, he was appointed Byzantine exarch of *Ravenna by the emperor (584). Once peace had been reestablished in 585 with the treaty between the exarch Smaragdus and King Authari, Pelagius II worked to bring an end to the schism that had been brought about by the bishops dependent on *Aquileia (Jaffé 1054-1056) that had arisen under *Pelagius I (556–561) because of the controversy over the *Three Chapters. Despite Gregory's collaboration—who in the meantime had returned to Rome (585/586)—and his position as exarch of Ravenna, Pelagius II's plan came to naught. In a long letter (ACO V/2, 112-132), where one can detect Gregory's influence, he addressed the entire theological difficulty raised by the documents sent by these bishops and distinguished the conciliar decisions pertaining to the custodia illibatae fidei from the decision of other councils, inasmuch as they had varying degrees of binding authority; moreover, he minutely examined each case of the three condemned theologians (*Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Ibas of Edessa and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus). The bishop of Aquileia, Elia, along with the bishops of Venetia et Histria, did not agree with the Roman position. This failure to achieve reconciliation led Pelagius II to seek the intervention of the exarch Smaragdus, who was under obligation to abstain from any intervention acc. to the will of the emperor Tiberius; but after the death of Elia he intervened in 587. Pelagius objected when John IV, patriarch of Constantinople, attributed to himself the title of "ecumenical patriarch" and refused to accept the Acts of the council he held in 587; he even forbade his apocrisary to communicate with John. His protests, however, were useless (Greg. Great, Ep. IV, 32, 34, 38; V, 44; VI, 41). The Liber pontificalis* and several inscriptions mention that he undertook numerous building projects in Rome; a mosaic for the basilica of St. Lawrence outside the walls portrays him as a restorer of the church. He died of a plague on 7 February 590 and was buried at St. Peter's. The plague devastated Rome.

CPL 1705-1707; Verzeichnis 482; PL 72, 701-760; PLS 2, 1413-14; LP I, 309-311; Jaffé 1047-1065; ACO V/2, XXIII and 105-132; DTC 12, 669-675; EC 9, 1078-79; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 225-300; E. Pontieri, Le invasioni barbariche e l'Italia del V e VI sec., Naples 1960; M.J. Higgins, Two Notes, in Polychronion, Fest. Dölger, Heidelberg 1966, 238-243; J. Orlandis, Sobre el origen de la "lex in confirmatione Concilii": Anuario de Historia del Derecho Esp. 41 (1971) 113-126; L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizantini, Rome-Louvain 1972, 162-165 (see index); A. Tuillier, Grégoire le Grand et le titre de patriarche oecuménique, in Grégoire le Grand, ed. J. Fontaine et al., Paris 1986, 69-70; P. Meyvaert, A Letter of Pelagius II Composed by Gregory the Great, in Gregory the Great: A Symposium, ed. J.C. Cavadini, Notre Dame, IN 1996, 84-116; Patrologia IV, 150-51; EPapi 1, 541-546.

A. Di Berardino

PELAGIUS of Laodicea. A Syrian bishop who was in communion with *Meletius of Antioch (ca. 360–ca. 382). His life before the episcopate is known to us thanks to *Theodoret of Cyrrhus. Pelagius married at a very young age, but from the first day of his marriage he lived in perfect chastity with his wife (HE 4,13). He was consecrated by *Acacius of Caesarea to strengthen the homoiousian party. At the councils of *Antioch (363) and *Tiana (367) he was a passionate defender of orthodoxy, and for this reason the emperor *Valens exiled him to Arabia (372). After the death of Valens, he reobtained possession of his cathedra. During the schism of Antioch he sided with Meletius, and at the Council of *Constantinople (381) he protected *Gregory of Nazianzus (Theodor., HE 6, 8). The date of his death remains unknown.

M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975, see index; LTK³ 8, 10.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PELLA. Various cities had the name Pella: the capital of *Macedonia starting from the 4th c. AD, and the homeland of Alexander the Great (AD 356–323); the city of *Apamea (*Syria), Pella (Pellene) in *Achaia and Pella (Tabaqat Fahl) in the *Decapolis in Peraia. This latter city—whose name was thus taken from its previous name of Pehel (Pahel) or rather from the name of the city where Alexander the Great was born—is found in the valley of the River Jordan, 4 km (2.5 mi) E of the river, 45 km (28 mi) S of the Sea of Galilee, in present-day Jordan, to the NW of Gerasa and SE of *Scythopolis. It was an important and ancient city. Though it was destroyed by Alexander Jannaeus (Flavius Josephus, De bello iud. 1,4,8; Ant. Iud. 13.15,4), Pompey revitalized the city inside the confines of the province of Syria; he reconstructed it and placed it within a federation of ten cities (De bello iud. 1,7,7 and 14,5,3; Ant. Iud. 14,4,4). It remained a city of Greek learning and part of the Decapolis from its very beginnings; it flourished during the Hellenistic, Roman and Byzantine periods because it was located along a commercial road. The city passed under Arab rule after the Battle of Yarmuk in 636 and was utterly destroyed by an earthquake in 749. Archaeological digs have brought to light artifacts from the Canaanites, esp. the Temple of Migdol. Many ruins of public buildings remain (an odeon, *thermal baths and a Byzantine fortress) and private structures from the Roman, Byzantine and Arab periods, among which was a large water reservoir and two churches, one from the 5th c. (called "the Church to the East") and another from the 6th (called "the Church to the West"). From the latter, numerous columns and remains of a mosaic on the floor have been uncovered.

According to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 3, 5, 3; see Epiphanius, haer. 29, 7; De Mens. et Pond. 15), during the Jewish war the Christians of Jerusalem took refuge in the Transjordan and the Decapolis, or communities were established, esp. in the city of Pella. The traditions reported by Eusebius and *Epiphanius have been studied in great detail in relation to Jesus' exhortation to flee during the destruction of *Jerusalem in order to better understand the development of the Christian communities in *Palestine and to understand Eusebius's sources. Scholars once considered these reports reliable, but today they pose numerous problems: when did the Christians flee (before or after the siege)? How were they able to cross between territories during the war? How were they received in a city that was primarily Hellenic? Had not Pella already been destroyed by the Jews (Josephus, De bello Iud. 2,18,1)? What happened to the communities of Jerusalem? How did they return after the year AD 70? For this reason many scholars tend to consider the information reported by Eusebius and Epiphanius as lacking historical substance; instead, they maintain that they were invented by the Jewish Christians of Pella to affirm their original connection with an apostle and the primitive communities of Jerusalem and to justify their particular form of *Jewish Christianity (Luedemann, Verheyden), or rather because Christians were unable to leave the city during the siege (Brandon). Koester, however, acknowledges the veracity of the escape from the Decapolis but denies their apologetic character for justifying the Jewish Christian community of Pella as a historical heir to the one in Jerusalem.

According to Epiphanius, the *Nazarenes were the descendants of those Christians who were Jewish and came from Jerusalem (Haer. 29,7; 30,18). Ariston was a native of Pella and a Christian writer from the 2nd c.; he wrote the Dialogue Between Jason and Papiscus, a discussion between a Christian (Jason) and an Alexandrian Jew (Papiscus), which was lost but had been translated into Latin during the 3rd c. by a certain individual named Celsus, whose dedication has been preserved. The other important cities of the Decapolis where Christian communities were born were the following: Hippos (Susieh), Gadara (Umm Qais), Philadelphia (Amman), Gerasa (Jerash), Dion (Adun), Kanatha (Kanawat), *Damascus and Raphana (Abila). From the 4th c., Pella was part of Palestina secunda (see *Palestine), the metropolis of which was Scythopolis, and the first known bishop was Zebenus (4th c.).

Fedalto 2, 1037; S.G.F. Brandon, The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church. A Study of the Effects of the Jewish Overthrow of A.D. 70 on Christianity, London [2]1957, 168-173; La distruzione di Gerusalemme del 70 nei suoi riflessi storico-letterari. Atti del Conv. biblico francescano, Rome 22-27 settembre 1969, Porziuncola, Assisi 1971; J.J. Gunther, The Fate of the Jerusalem Church. The Flight to Pella: TZ 29 (1973) 81-94; G. Luedemann, The Successors of pre-70 Jerusalem Christianity. A Critical Evaluation of the Pella Tradition, in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition: The Shaping of Christianity in the Second and Third Centuries, ed. E. Sanders, I, Philadelphia 1980, 161-173; B. Bagatti, Le comunità giudeocristiane, Vatican City 1981; A.G. Walmsley, Pella/Fihl after the Islamic Conquest (AD 635–c. 900): A Convergence of Literary and Archaeological Evidence: Mediterranean Archaeology 1 (1988) 142-159; J. Verheyden, De vlucht van de Christenen naar Pella. Onderzoek von het getuigenis van Eusebius en Epiphanius, Brussels 1988; Id., The Flight of the Christians to Pella: EThL 66 (1990) 368-384; C. Koester, The Origin and Significance of the Flight to Pella Tradition: CBQ 51 (1989) 90-106; J. Wehnert, Die Auswanderung der Jerusalemer Christen nach Pella. Historisches Faktum oder theologische Konstruktion? Kritische Bemerkungen zu einem neuen Buch: ZKG 102 (1991) 231-255 (Verheyden's vol.); T. Weber, Pella Decapolitana. Studien zur Geschichte, Architektur und bildenden Kunst einer hellenisierten Stadt des nördlichen Ostjordanlandes, Wiesbaden 1993; C. Vidal Manzanares, Pella revisitada. Espacio, Tiempo y Forma: Historia Antigua 6 (1993) 467-476; A.G. Walmsley, The Social and Economic Regime at Fihl (Pella) Between the 7th and 9th Centuries, in P. Canivet - J.-P. Rey-Coquais (éds.), La Syrie de Byzance à l'Islam, VII[e]-VIII[e] siècles, Actes du Colloque International, Institut Français de Damas, Brussels 1994, 249-261; A.G. Walmsley, Christians and Christianity at Early Islamic Pella (Fihl), in S. Bourke - J.-P. Descoeudres (eds.), Trade, Contact, and the Movement of Peoples in the Eastern Mediterranean. Studies in Honour of J. Basil Hennessy, Mediterranean Archaeology Supplement 3, Sydney 1995, 321-324; R. Houston Smith, Chancel Screens from the West Church at Pella of the Decapolis, in The Archaeology of Jordan and Beyond. Essays in Honor of J.A. Sauer, Harvard 2000, 465-475; S. Borzì, Sull'attribuzione della Disputa fra Giasone e Papisco di Aristone di Pella: VetChr 41 (2004) 347-354.

A. Di Berardino

PELUSIUM. An ancient port city situated in the W part of the Nile, between the river's two branches, 32 km (20 mi.) SE of Port Said, in the Sinai peninsula (South Canal of Peace); today it corresponds to Tell Farama, Tell Makhazan (the Byzantine extension) and the necropolis of Kanais. In antiquity these locations were the farthest from the sea. The biblical name was Sin (Ezek 30:15); the Egyptian name, Per-Amon (House of Amon). It was the city located at the border of Egypt and Syria—understood in the broadest sense of the term—and before the arrival of the Romans it was thus quite susceptible to invaders. Its linens were famous, abundant and of good quality (lenun pelusinum: Pliny, Hist. Nat. 19,1); it exported salted fish and garum (a spicy condiment often used). Marc Antony conquered it in 55 BC; Augustus entered the city in 31 BC. Pelusium suffered under the hand of the Persians in AD 619; in 640 it came under Arabic rule (Alexandria was conquered in 641).

During the Roman Empire, acc. to the Itinerarium Antonini, six roads converged at Pelusium; *Egeria passed through Pelusium (Itin. 9), but did not provide us information on its Christian community. In Late Antiquity Pelusium was a metropolis of the Roman province of Augustamnica prima, under the governance of a corrector, who relied on the prefect to the praetorian. The ongoing excavations have uncovered an amphitheater, perhaps a hippodrome, a Byzantine church and an imposing fortress with three entrances and 36 towers. After the plague of 524, the city was better known by its name Peramun.

We do not know when Christianity arrived at Pelusium, but one may suppose that this occurred rather early because it was close to *Palestine and on the road to *Alexandria. The first two bishops we know of are from the year 325: one was Catholic and a participant at the Council of *Nicaea, the other a *Meletian bishop (acc. to *Dorotheus and *Callinicus). Pelusium had a metropolitan see, but its bishop did not enjoy the same powers possessed by other similar institutions outside Egypt because in this area the patriarch of Alexandria was the point of reference for everyone. In fact, during this time one finds no mention of provincial synods. The metropolitan only had a certain preeminence in comparison to the city's importance. The most famous son of Pelusium was *Isidore (ca. d. 435), a presbyter and monk whose numerous letters survive, which are important for understanding the civil and religious life of the city. From him we learn that Bishop Eusebius ordered the construction of an impressive church and was heavily criticized for doing so (Ep. 37; 113; 700; 746).

P. Figueras, The North Sinai Road in the Graeco-Roman Period: Scripta Classica Israelica 8/9 (1985–1988) 53-65; P. Évieux, Isidore de Péluse, Paris 1995; J.-Y. Carrez-Maratray, Péluse et l'angle orientale du delta égyptien aux époques grecque, romaine et byzantine, Le Caire 1999; D. Valbelle - J.-Y. Carrez-Maratray, Le camp romain du Bas-Empire à Tell el-Herr, Paris 2000.

A. Di Berardino

PENANCE

I. Penance and reconciliation - II. Iconography and epigraphy - III. Penitentials.

I. Penance and reconciliation. Reconciliation was first procured by *baptism, through which one obtained the remission of the sins committed during one's life before receiving the sacrament of Christian initiation. After baptism, a Christian was obligated not to *sin grievously against the faith, the community or the family: the question concerning penance was therefore a baptismal question with respect to its effects (penance = second baptism).

1. The Pre-Nicene Period. The first pieces of information pertaining to a reconciliation granted to faults committed after baptism can be found in the writings of *Hermas (Rome, ca. 140), *Origen, *Tertullian (d. after 220) and *Cyprian (d. 258). According to Hermas, the only reconciliation is the one received in baptism; an exceptional case, a second penance is possible but just once in one's life: "the one who has obtained the remission of sins (in baptism) should sin no more. . . . For those who have been called before the end times, the Lord has established a penance. . . . If someone . . . falls into sin, he can do penance, but only once" (Hermas, Mand. IV, 1, 8). Origen, however, spoke of the various ways to obtain the forgiveness of sins (In Levit. Hom. II, 4), thus indicating the variety of sins and the means to receive forgiveness. Tertullian (ca. 204), in his work De paenitentia (7,9,10), provided a very clear formulation for the fundamental principle of the nonrepeatability of the ancient penance: "(for the most grave sins, a second penance is possible), but only once because it is already the second time (the first penance being that of baptism) and never again." The author of the treatise De paenitentia, which addressed the readmission of adulterers and fornicators into communion (Tertullian himself argued against this practice when he became a *Montanist), describes for the first time the penitential process at *Carthage: a life of the harshest mortification, ragged clothes, extended fasts, prayers and lamentations, various prostrations before the presbyters and the servants of God, and a request for the intercession of the community, final pardon (by God alone? through the mediation of the community?). *Cyprian (d. 258), in agreement with Pope *Cornelius (253–255), allowed for the reconciliation of numerous apostates during the *Decian and *Valerian *persecutions, not without facing opposition from many rigorists. It seems, therefore, that the penitential discipline was developed case by case and was therefore subject to variation from community to community.

2. Early Christian Post-Nicene Period (from 325 to early 7th c.). Recourse to penance was prohibited to the offices of bishop, presbyter and deacon not because of some privilege enjoyed by the laity but because of the incompatibility of the penitential and the clerical state (in two senses). All the documents (*Augustine, *Caesarius of Arles, *councils, decretals, the correspondence of the bishops of S *Gaul in particular) agree in describing the organization of the official penance. There were three distinct moments: (1) entrance into penance (petere, accipere paenitentiam), with the bishop's consent and often elicited by the bishop's word (correptio); (2) remaining in the order of the penitents for a relatively long period of time (ordo, status paenitentium), acc. to the judgment of the bishop; (3) readmission into communion, solemnly on Holy Thursday, through the imposition of hands performed by the bishops before the gathered community (reconciliatio). This official process found a rich basis in the preaching of daily penance for the lightest of sins.

Because the official process was rigorous, unrepeatable and full of consequences, various types of sinners were excluded because of their possible relapse into sin and their need for abandoning a public office or for observing perfect continence. With the explicit permission of the bishop, some of the faithful even deferred reconciliation to the very end of their life. The deferment of penance occurred as in the case of baptism, which likewise witnessed a similar postponement during this period. Even after reconciliation, the sinner remained marked for his or her entire life: entrance into official penance seemed to be the equivalent of entrance into the religion. At the same time, *Ambrose and Augustine's praise of *Theodosius's penance indicates how much the process that once carried with it the mark of infamy, civil and familial death, remained open to interpretation and pastoral action. The process (aside from the confession of sins) was public: the penitents occupied a special place in the church, the community interceded for them and they were reconciled publicly; the penitents were set off to the side in view of their reconciliation but were not excommunicated.

One does not find, however, a "penitential void": explicit preaching since Origen's time made present the evangelical word of the pardon of sins for all time. The teaching of Ambrose and Augustine on penance indicates to what extent it was based on Jesus Christ's passion and oriented toward the *Eucharist. The efforts of the penitents as signs of repentance and the intercession of the community showed the role of mercy and the desire for the penitent's reconciliation.

3. Tariffed penance (early 7th to 12th c.). At the close of the early Christian era, there appeared on the continent a penitential system introduced by Anglo-Saxon and Celtic monks, which represented a break with the official penitential discipline. Its fundamental principle was as follows: to each sin there should be applied a specific penance, which consists of various mortifications but above all fasts (days, months and years). The practice of fasting was understood to be a synthesis of all types of Christian mortification existing at that time. The tariffs or taxes were contained in the Penitential Books. The sinner, then, could turn to a confessor each time a sin was committed. The minister of tariffed penance was the presbyter (and no longer just the bishop). The sinner made a detailed confession of his faults and underwent a time of fasting that varied acc. to the gravity of the acts. Once the fasting had been completed, the sinner was considered to be absolved; only starting from the 9th c. does one find an attestation to an explicit absolution by the confessor (the formula Ego te absolvo was late). Major clerics were not excluded from tariffed penance. Given a number of sins, the days, months and years of fasting could add up to exceed the duration of one's life. The "redemptions" or ransoms provided for possible commutations to avoid this situation:

- A long fast could be redeemed by a shorter but more rigorous fast, or with corporeal punishments administered by the confessor (at times flagellation) or with other bizarre mortifications (e.g., spending entire nights in graveyards).
- The fast owed by a sinner could be redeemed by fasts completed by third parties such as monks in exchange for economic compensation (money, legacies, gifts in kind, lands, rivers or ponds).
- A fast of several years could be redeemed by Masses celebrated on behalf of the sinner by monks (who, during the same period, became priests), in exchange for various donations, esp. in the form of money. This was the most customary form of penitential atonement (indulgentia), at least for rich sinners. Hence the equation: sin = fast = Masses = sum of money given to confessor or monastery.

The Carolingian reformers who tried to fight against the tariffed penance and the Penitential Books in order to restore the ancient discipline only achieved partial success, reaching a penitential dichotomy: a tariffed penance was requested for a grave hidden sin, a penance acc. to the ancient practice was requested for a grave public sin. By this point a sin was evaluated not in light of its intrinsic gravity but its public character; the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) established the norm for annual confession and insisted on the role of the priest: absolution of the penitent.

4. Penitential reorganization (beginning of the 13th c.). At the end of the 12th c., penitential discipline evolved: the penitential books disappeared, giving way to the Confessors' Manuals. A tripartite system was set in place:

- Solemn public penance was the ancient penance with all its rigor and implications, imposed on laypeople for particularly scandalous sins (patricide, infanticide, regicide, setting fire to the city, etc.). The major clerics were excluded from this form of penance.
- Nonsolemn public penance refers to the penitential pilgrimage. The confessor sent the sinner to some famous or not-so-famous sanctuaries in Christendom, conferring upon them a blessing, the pilgrim's staff, a money bag and a hat, and supplying them with a letter attesting that the individual was traveling to atone for his or her sins. This document for the most part assured the sinner-pilgrim of lodging and water. The penitential pilgrimage was imposed on laypeople for less scandalous public sins and on clerics for grave public sins of any type (wandering clerics).
- The tariffed penance was imposed for all grave hidden sins committed by clerics or laypeople. This type of penance quickly evolved toward the actual practice of sacramental confession: confession immediately followed by absolution (expiation was made void of every moral meaning by the game of commutations).

5. Penitential discipline in the East. In its organization and evolution, the penitential system of the East was much less known than the Western system. Sinners were divided into various groups acc. to the gravity of their sins. These groups were established by Eastern councils and the penitential letters of the church fathers, esp. those of St. *Basil of Caesarea.

- The implorers (ploratio) remained standing outside the church, beseeching the faithful who were on their way to receive the Eucharist.
- The listeners (auditio) participated in the liturgy of the Word and were sent away with the catechumens without receiving a special prayer; their place was in the narthex.
- The prostrate (prostratio) left the ceremony with the catechumens after having received the laying on of hands, ante absidem (in front of the apse, i.e., in front of the sanctuary).
- The participants (assistentia) took part in the eucharistic service but did not partake.

This process was public by necessity, even though the confession of sins was not public. Sinners went through various stages, being consigned to one or the other acc. to the gravity of their sins. At a time difficult to date precisely, but nevertheless in the 7th c., the penitential groups disappeared, giving way to a penitential system in which confession, as in the Western tariffed system, had an important place. The difference was that the punishments (ἐπιτίμια) imposed on sinners were not left to the confessor, but were determined in conformity to the penitential canons established by church councils, without the possibility of satisfaction in alternate form. For the evolution of individual sanctions, see the studies of Hausherr, Ligier and van de Paverd.

I. Hausherr, Penthos. La Doctrine de la Componction dans l'Orient Chrétien, Rome 1944; B. Poschmann, Busse und Letzte Ölung, Freiburg i.Br. 1951; L. Ligier, Dimension personnelle et dimension communautaire de la pénitence en Orient: La Maison Dieu 90 (1967) 155-188; F. van de Paverd, La pénitence dans le rite byzantin: Questions Liturgiques 54 (1973) 191-203; A. Fitzgerald, Conversion Through Penance in the Italian Church of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries, Lewiston, NY 1988; C. Vogel, Le pécheur et la pénitence dans l'Église ancienne, Paris 1966; Id., Le pécheur et la pénitence au moyen âge, Paris 1969; Id., Les Libri paenitentiales (Typologie des sources du moyen âge occidental 27), Turnhout 1973; G. Picasso - G. Piana - G. Motta, A pane ed acqua. Peccati e penitenza nel Medioevo, Novara 1986; Ph. Rouillard, Histoire de la pénitence des origines à nos jours, Paris 1996; G. Moioli, Il quarto sacramento. Note introduttive, Milan 1996; R.N. Longenecker, New Wine into Fresh Wineskins. Contextualizing the Early Christian Confession, Peabody 1999; A.F. Carr, Il perdono dei peccati delle eucaristie delle Chiese orientali con particolare riferimento alla liturgia siriaca: Annali Scienze Religiose 5 (2000) 69-79; E. Mazza, Un confronto tra alcuni elementi della liturgia penitenziale dell'Occidente e dell'Oriente: il caso delle liturgia visigotica: Annali Scienze Religiose 5 (2000) 93-108; J. de Mayke, Transformation of Penance, in Rituals of Power, from Late Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, ed. F. Theuws - J.L. Nelson, Leiden 2000, 185-224; I Giubilei nella storia della Chiesa. Atti del congr. int., Rome 2001; P. Saint-Roch, La pénitence. Dans les conciles et le lettres des Papes des origines à la mort de Grégoire le Grand, Vatican City 1991.

C. Vogel

II. Iconography and epigraphy. We do not have a firsthand account of penance during the early Christian era that describes the liturgical-sacramental act of confession or reconciliation.

Nevertheless, J. Wilpert interpreted two largely reconstructed sarcophagus fragments as a description of this sacramental event (La fede, 256–260).

Aside from doubts on the accuracy of the reconstruction, one should note, however, that the laying on of hands on orantes lends itself to multiple interpretations.

Achelis (7-11) tried to connect a fresco on the face of the catacomb of Praetextatus at Rome (WK 51,1) with the issue of penance during the early Christian period. The scene at the center of the ceiling represents, acc. to this scholar, a shepherd who stretches out his right hand to the sheep approaching him, although with the left he wards off a pig and a donkey. Achelis explained this representation by appealing to *Novatian rigorism, which denied to sinners (pigs) and heretics (donkeys) reintegration into the church. This fresco would therefore have been commissioned by someone who wanted to express their personal convictions on the issue of penance, which differed from those of the Roman community. If, however, the animals depicted to the right of the shepherd, and represented in a less naturalistic manner, were not a pig and a donkey, but were wolves, it would then be the biblical scene of the shepherd, which would allow one to interpret the fresco in this light.

In the context of *baptismal *iconography one should keep in mind a scene in the area of Lucina in the catacomb of St. Callistus (WK 29,1), which, in addition to other meanings, also lends itself to a penitential interpretation. To explain the fresco, Fink (106ff.) has called attention to a passage in the Didascalia siriaca (2,15,8) in which the author invites the bishop not to allow the sinner to sink into despair, but to extend to him the hand of reconciliation. One can accept for certain that the question of the possibility and feasibility of the postbaptismal remission of sins, in addition to the few examples at our disposal up until now, constituted a theme of early Christian iconography. It is no coincidence that the beginnings of Christian art are to be dated to those decades in which the problem of the lapsi* and the reintegration of public sinners into the church had exploded in pastoral and theological discussions. Especially in the case of those who were at the point of death and in view of their passing away, the question of the verification, and also the recovery, of baptismal grace acquired utmost attention.

With reference to Ezek 14:13-20, in which God, in a punishment inflicted upon the earth, said he would save only the righteous men *Noah, *Daniel and *Job but not their sons and daughters, *Cyprian (De lapsis 19) also mentions these three persons to invite one to personal penance, which cannot be replaced by the intercession of the confessors. Fink (61-73) has therefore emphasized that these three individuals, whom he maintains must be understood to have been frequently depicted in a contextual nexus in the catacomb pictures, can be interpreted as a representation of penance. Even if the contextual connection of the scene with Noah, Daniel and Job is at times so uncertain that their insertion into other iconographic contexts appears possible, in each case it is indisputable that numerous Old and New Testament scenes, often recurring in early Christian sepulchral art, are connected to contemporary homilies and catecheses with the exhortation to penance and with hope for the remission of sins.

This holds true with respect to the figure of the shepherd, which the Christians of the Great Church, challenged by Tertullian, used as a decorative element on chalices for the eucharistic offering to thus express their hope in the remission of sins (De pudicitia 10,12). Many church fathers emphasized the love of the Shepherd-Savior for sinners (Dassmann, 322-340).

It should be noted that in patristic exegesis before *Constantine, even the image of Jonah possessed not a paschal but an exclusively penitential symbolism, as one could possibly argue on the basis of Mt 12:39ff. From the formal point of view, Jonah's repose under the booth he had made for himself—connected to the scene of his having been tossed into the sea—could be, esp. in the reliefs of sarcophagi, a survival of the secular myth of Endymion, and could symbolize at the same time the blessed repose of the dead. When, however, in certain sarcophagi (e.g., sarcophagi of Belgradus and Julian Julianete [Dassmann, 387]), the scene of repose (subject to a mythological interpretation) is completely lacking and, alongside Jonah cast into the sea or spewed forth from the mouth of the fish, the shepherd appears who saved the sheep or Noah who survived the flood, there is no doubt that the figurative agenda was transferred into the context of the Christian symbolism of salvation, and is therefore open to the theme of the remission of sins. In certain instances, in the paintings found in the catacombs, the normally tripartite cycle (Jonah tossed into the sea, Jonah spewed forth and Jonah at rest) appears expanded with the scene of the so-called Ionas irritatus, where the prophet sits saddened by the dried shrub (WK 61; 96; 100). Jonah must learn not to be angry at the mercy God has shown toward the repentant city of Nineveh. The depictions of the shepherd and those of Jonah are often connected in early Christian sepulchral art.

If New Testament motifs also appear, such as the healing of the *paralytic, the woman with an issue of blood and similar miracles, the penitential meaning of the entire figurative program of one monument becomes even more evident (e.g., cubicle 5 of the catacombs of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus [WK 98]). The 3rd- to 4th-c. patristic exegesis of the original *sin of *Adam and Eve also emphasized hope in redemption.

A subject still in need of study is the existing relationship between the images of martyrs and intercessors of any type and hope in the remission of sins. It is known that the cult of the martyrs, which began in the 3rd c. and flourished in the 4th, had as its root hope in the intercession of the saints during the Last Judgment. One cannot conclude with certainty, however, whether one can apply this intercessory function to the Old Testament scenes of Daniel in the lions' den and the three young men in the fiery furnace, given that until the era of *Constantine, one does not find iconographic representations of martyrs or scenes of martyrs; whether those scenes, together with other motifs, do not allude only to a generic symbolism of salvation, which is known from the prayers of ps.-Cyprian, remains an open question.

More recently, it has also been noted that starting from the 3rd c. the scene of Peter's denial with the rooster (Mt 26:34, 75 and parallel texts) may reflect the development of the theology and the penitential practice of the church toward the paenitentia secunda after baptism and the daily awareness of the sinful human condition. This is primarily found on the sarcophagi (e.g., Ws 45,1; Ws 126,1 = Rep. 276; Ws 226,2 = Rep. 665), but also in the Roman catacombs, churches and on objects of ivory and silver (see catalog in Post, 24-53).

From the end of the early Christian period, a dozen funerary inscriptions have been preserved with reference to penance—four coming from *Gaul (Diehl nos. 1552, 1554, 1674, 1687), four from *Spain (Diehl nos. 1551A, 1554, 1555; Huebner no. 54), three from N *Italy (Diehl nos. 1664, 1693, 1733), one of unknown origin (Diehl no. 1553). Two of them date to the end of the 5th c., eight from the 6th and two from the 2nd half of the 7th c. Six speak of paenitentia in extremis: post acceptam paenitentiam, accepta paenitentia, paenitentiam consecuta, Christo praestante paenitentiam. Four characterize the dead as paenitens resp. religiosa in the same sense. Two use the formula paenitentiam egit and one accepit paenitentiam (see Vogel). One can explain the scarcity of epigraphic testimonies as either referring to penance in extremis or to the state of the penitent until death. This phenomenon is explained by the early Christian penitential practice, which hesitated to impose heavy penitential demands upon those of a rather young age since it would affect the entirety of one's life.

E. Huebner, Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae, Berolini 1871; H. Achelis, Altchristliche Kunst 4: ZNTW 16 (1915) 1-23; G. Wilpert, Un'antica rappresentazione della penitenza: L'illustrazione vaticana 6 (1935) 15-16; Id., La fede della chiesa nascente secondo i monumenti dell'arte funeraria antica, Vatican City 1938; J. Fink, Noe der Gerechte in der Frühchristlichen Kunst, Münster-Cologne 1955; C. Vogel, La discipline pénitentielle dans les inscriptions paléochrétiens: RivAC 42 (1966 [pub. 1968]) 317-325; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973; Id., Die Szene Christus-Petrus mit dem Hahn, in Pietas. Festschrift B. Kötting, Münster 1980, 509-527; P.G.J. Post, De haanscène in de vroegchristelijke kunst, Utrecht 1984; A. Fitzgerald, Christ, Peter and the Rooster: Augustinianum 41 (2001) 409-423.

E. Dassmann - H.R. Drobner

III. Penitentials. Penitentials were books (or opuscula), originally from the British Isles, that spread to the continent thanks to the efforts of Irish and Scottish monks, who came to evangelize regions that remained *pagan or had reverted to paganism as a result of the great Germanic invasions. They presented a system of penance essentially characterized by the application of tariffs to punishments established in relation to the number and types of sins. Historians have assigned the name "tariffed penance" to this type of penance. It entered into competition with and finally supplanted the old canonical penance of earlier times, establishing the prelude to the private penance of the Late Middle Ages and the modern era. In contradistinction to the ancient and canonical penance, this form was no longer imposed only by the bishop, but by any priest; one could have access to it not just once after baptism, but whenever one felt the need. In each instance, it presupposed a confession of sins and an act of penance, but essentially it consisted in a fast, which was more or less severe and prolonged, so that as a result the two terms paenitere (to do penance) and ieiunare (to fast) became synonymous. If, at least in theory, the punishments imposed for sins confessed only once could not exceed the duration of one's life, in practice, and from the beginning, the punishments could be changed or replaced with compensations that made them shorter. An evaluation of the punishments was not left to the individual's initiative but was regulated carefully in writing.

Because a list of Penitentials is far from complete, one can only outline their history. Until the year 650, the books originated solely from the islands: the Penitential of Gilda, Canones Wallici, Irish and Celtic Penitentials and the Penitentials of *Columbanus. These documents flourished from the mid-7th c. to the age of the Carolingian reform. Some books still came from the islands, whether of the ancient type (Penitential of *Cummian, Iudiciae Theodori, Discipulus Umbrensium) or of the new type (Penitentials of *Bede, *Egbert, Alberes, Bigot, Gwynn, etc.). Others came from the continent but defied every classification because of their complexity and incoherence. Nevertheless, an attempt was made to fix this disorder by distinguishing the Penitentials in which the influence of Columbanus, Cummian and *Theodore predominates, and separating them from the books of Spanish origin.

The Carolingian reform opened the third period, characterized by the claim to revive the ancient canonical penance, but the reformers only achieved a compromise on the basis of the following principle: if the sin is public, the penance must be public (i.e., the canonical penance); if private, the penance must be private (i.e., the "tariffed penance"). Other Penitentials dating to this period are those of Alitgarius of Cambrai (825–830) and the two of Rabanus Maurus, at Otgar (841–842) and at Heribald (852–854). Moreover, during the Carolingian period, the great canonical collections were compiled and propagated: the Dionysio-Hadriana, Hispana, Dacheriana and the Quadripartita, which portrayed themselves as summae of the ancient canonical penance, even though that form was unable to establish itself and that failure demonstrates the limits of the Carolingian reform. Among the Penitentials of the last period (until the 9th-11th c.), there are three groups with original characteristics: the post-Carolingian Penitentials, which pass themselves off as Roman, but are in fact Frankish; the Penitentials in which the Anglo-Saxon character dominates; the mixed extracts that contain ancient conciliar canons and snippets taken from Penitentials appearing side by side. The penitential collection of Burchardt of Worms, Corrector sive Medicus, if not chronologically last, is the most representative of the genre and the most utilized in the Late Middle Ages. One must wait for *Gratian's Decretum and the 4th canon of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) to bring the tariffed penance into disuse and to substitute for it the present-day system of private penance to the degree it survives after the Second Vatican Council.

CPL 1877-1896; LMA 2, 1118-1122; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia liturgica 4, Milan [2]1959, 253-258; A. Di Berardino, Patrologia IV, 514-523; R. Lasczcz, Organisation de la pénitence "tarifée" d'après les "Ordines" des "Libri paenitentiales" jusqu'au "Corrector sive Medicus" de Burchard de Worms (1008–1072), Strasbourg 1972 (typed thesis); C. Vogel, Les "libri paenitentiales," Turnhout 1978; R. Messner - R. Kaczynski, Sakramentliche Feiern 1,2, Regensburg 1992, 158-175.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PENTAPOLIS. This term, Greek in origin, indicated a collection of five cities (sometimes in the sense of city-state); during antiquity it was applied to various geographic entities in *Asia Minor, *Greece, *Syria and Cyrenaica, etc.

1. The term Pentapolis appeared in the biblical book of Wisdom (10:6) to refer to the region containing the five cities of Sodom, Gomorrah, Segor (Zoar), Admah and Zeboim. These cities once united to fight off the invasion of other kings (Gen 14:1-11). During the first centuries of the common era, the existence of Segor was still known (Zoora: Josephus, Bell. Iud. IV, 8,4; Ptolemy, V, 17,5; *Eusebius, Onom. 232,236). It became an episcopal see, and its bishop was present at the Council of *Chalcedon (451). During the Roman Empire, the term "Decapolis" (ten cities) was more often used to indicate a territory in *Syria and *Palestine, an organized conglomerate of ten cities that enjoyed a certain level of autonomy and Greek culture: Gerasa (Jerash), *Scythopolis, Hippus, Gadara, *Pella, Philadelphia, Dion, Canatha, Raphana and *Damascus. Naturally, other cities were also included within the territory (e.g., Abila).

2. The territory of central Cyrenaica with the cities Apollonia (Marsa Susa), Taucheira (Arsinoe), Berenice, Cyrene and Ptolemais/Barca was called Pentapolis until the 7th c. AD (see *Libya). This territory retained its Greek cultural unity for centuries. Christianity arrived there rather early with bishops already known from the 3rd c., perhaps determined by the presence of important Jewish communities. In Late Antiquity, Cyrenaica constituted the province of Libya superior, which is distinct from Libya inferior (Marmarica).

3. In Byzantine Italy of the Late Middle Ages, Pentapolis referred to a military province S of *Ravenna with ill-defined borders; some later documents speak of two Pentapolises (maritime and governmental). The capital was *Rimini, along with Pesaro, Senigallia and Fano.

OCD ed. 1996, 1135-1136; CE 11, 97; EI 26, 698; ODB 3, 1624-1625; E. Honigmann, L'évêché de Carphia ou Pentapolis en Grèce: AB 67 (1949) 287-289; N. Alfieri, La Pentapoli bizantina d'Italia: Corsi di cultura sull'arte ravennate 20 (1973) 7-18; A.H.M. Jones, Cities of Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [2]1971; Cirene e i Libyi, ed. S. Stucchi - M. Luni Mario, Rome 1988; A. Chancey - A. Potter, The Archaeology of Roman Palestine: Near Eastern Archaeology 64 (2001) 164-198.

A. Di Berardino

PENTARCHY. For the patristic period the *patriarchate exercised its ecclesial function under the form of pentarchy, a collegial organization for the governance of all the churches located within the confines of the Roman Empire; it was composed of patriarchs from *Rome, *Constantinople, *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Jerusalem. Even though the inception of the pentarchy was gradual and at times difficult, one must recognize that this system of governance was operating de facto between the 4th and 7th c., during the period in which the Roman imperial regime exercised its power over all the geographical areas affected by the government of the church. Its function depended on the symphōnia (also synergeia) between ecclesiastical and civil power, established on the common ideology of the time that considered the Christian emperor to be chosen directly by God with sovereignty over the entire civil world and with the duty to enact laws sanctioned by the five patriarchs (in 680, the Latin Fathers gathered in the Sixth Ecumenical Council formally asked Constantine IV to ratify their conciliar decisions with his signature and to send copies "to the five patriarchal thrones"; see Mansi XI, 682D-684A). Therefore, the decline of the pentarchy as an institution of the collegial government of the church was subsequent to the decline of the Byzantine imperial power and the loss of the administrative control over large geographical areas that was esp. due to the *Longobards (Lombards), Bulgarians and Arabs.

After the 7th c. and until the 16th, however, the pentarchy survived as a theological concept and an ideology transmitted in the theological and canonical schools of the East and West. Though it had fallen entirely into disuse as an ecclesial institution of the West and though maintained in Eastern Orthodoxy as an expression of the collegiality of the governance of the universal church, the pentarchy, following the Second Vatican Council, drew the interest of ecclesiologists who identified in its institution and exercise during the time in the church when it was still united a possible solution to the ecumenical problems raised in the East by papal primacy (i.e., by the relationship between the council and the pope's primacy) and also an opportunity for the exercise of episcopal collegiality. To overcome the questions raised by the apparent antithesis between pentarchy and the Roman primacy, one must distinguish the institution's historical path from its doctrinal content. The former is understood to be an objective given of the ancient church, the latter as a development of theological reflections heavily influenced by historical contingencies.

History of the pentarchical system. If with the Council of *Chalcedon the patriarchal institution already possessed its fivefold configuration, only with *Justinian did it receive its legal form. In a series of foundational laws, the Justinian Novellae (109; 123, c. 22; 126, c. 3; 131, c. 2; 137), the canons issued by the first four ecumenical councils, became equivalent to the laws of the empire and officially named as patriarchs the archbishops of the five sees recognized as supra-metropolitan (the term pentarchy is later), with the duty of preaching "unanimously" the faith in the "Catholic tradition" (Nov. 109). The pope of ancient Rome was recognized as the "first of all the bishops" (Nov. 131). In the ancient ecclesial awareness, as the ecumenical councils attest (can. 36 of Council of Constantinople of 681, completed by the Council of Quintisext [691]; Council of Constantinople [869-870], cans. 17 and 21; IV Lateran Council, can. 5; Council of Florence 1439) and certain Fathers (*Maximus the Confessor, Disp. cum Pyrro: PG 91, 532; Theodore the Studite, Ep. II, 63: PG 99, 1281B), the pentarchy was well received even though Rome had a few reservations.

Down through the centuries, the unwillingness of the Roman See to accept this system of pentarchy should not be seen as its rejection of all collegial forms of church government, but rather as its theological reservation toward an ecclesiology that could blend the duty of the Roman primacy with the guidance of the universal church, which the Roman See always believed itself to possess. In particular, Pope *Damasus, appealing to the need for a direct apostolic "Petrine" foundation of the patriarchal sees, was a promoter of the triarchic ecumenical government of the church (Rome, Alexandria and Antioch), later taken up in the following centuries by the popes who opposed Eastern appeals to establish a hierarchical order of the patriarchate on the grounds of an "expanded" understanding of the apostolic institution of the patriarchal sees and on political justification, or on the civil dignity of Constantinople. As the Late Medieval urban toponymy attests (the title Patriarchium Lateranense for the papal residence in Rome), the pope, nevertheless, acknowledged himself to be the first of the five patriarchs (V. Peri), only after, however, a quiet acceptance of the different foundation of the title possessed by Rome and Constantinople confirmed multiple times. Especially in the 6th and 7th c., following the Byzantine reconquest, the recognition of Rome as the patriarchate of the West is evident both from the official documents of the imperial and patriarchal chancery of the East and by a series of events during the period that witnessed the involvement of the popes in regard to the symphōnia between imperial and ecclesial power and in the recourse to the principal pentarchy as the ultimate collegial instance in the government of the church universal. It was necessary to adhere to the pope's judgment if one desired to preserve ecclesial communion (in this manner, *Pelagius I attempted to prevent the schism caused by the controversy of the *Three Chapters). On the other hand, one should note that the popes were connected to the pentarchical system through the relationship of the Roman See with the basileus, who at times was responsible for approving the election of a new pope (W. de Vries, Orient et Occident, 206).

Despite the Byzantine Empire, rigid control of protocol and titles thrived; starting from the 6th c., many bishops assumed the title of patriarch with primacy over an entire ecclesiastical region (Hierapolis of *Phrygia, *Tyre, *Thessalonica, *Aquileia, *Milan, *Ravenna, *Lyons, Besançon and Bourges). To distinguish the five cities of the pentarchy, Justinian civil law had specified, however, that only these are patriarchs "of the entire oikoumenē" and that each one could be called oikoumenikos or universalis. As time progressed, the titles of those participating at the various councils of the 8th-9th c. indicate that the title of patriarch was slowly abandoned by the archbishops and only applied to the five, with the exception of the bishops of Aquileia (a title that was passed on to Grado and finally to Venice), who maintained it only with an honorary meaning.

History of the Doctrine. With the decline of the Western Empire, the system of the collegial governance of the five sees lost its authority over the churches falling outside Byzantine influence but gained theological and legal authority. For centuries in the East, arguments were sought from Scripture, tradition and reason to establish and maintain the ecclesial nature of the pentarchy. The ultimate driving force behind its theological effort resided not in the attempt to oppose papal primacy, which was safeguarded and upheld, but in the necessity of creating a check to the Caesaro-papist intrusions of the Byzantine emperors (Marella, 114ff.), esp. by some of its chief theologians who paid dearly for their reflection (*Maximus the Confessor, Tarasios of Constantinople, Nicephorus and Theodore the Studite deepened the theological discussion in the context of the iconoclastic controversy). At the close of the millennium, on the one hand, the theologians wanted to demonstrate the *apostolicity of the pentarchy, retracing at all costs the missionary activity of Peter at the origins of the various sees and, on the other hand, they justified the special quality of those five sees using a symbolic interpretation of the number five (the five senses of the body of the church; the five stars of the spiritual firmament; the five heads of a mysterious person; the five cities of the *Pentapolis).

At Byzantium, the theoretician of the pentarchy was Peter II, patriarch of Antioch (1054–1056), who explained the concept in a letter to Pope Leo IX (preamble). Then, in a letter to the patriarch of Grado, he denied his own alleged title of "patriarch," after having mentioned the five ancient patriarchal sees, saying: "Therefore, this pertains to what I am saying. The body is only directed by one head, although there are many members in it and all of these are guided by the five senses which are: sight, smell, hearing, taste and touch. This also applies to the body of Christ, i.e., the church of the faithful, which is brought about by the convergence of many peoples, similar to the members, and guided by the five senses, the aforementioned five great thrones (Episcopal), is led by one single head, namely Christ" (Ep. ad archiepiscopum Gradensem sive Aquileiae, 3-4: PG 120, 760AB). Nonetheless, following the *Schism of 1054, the legal positions of the East and the West attest to innovative interpretations of the pentarchy. The Byzantines of the 12th c. tried to transfer to Constantinople the secular primacy attributed to Rome or, at best, they tried to reduce the primacy of Rome to a simple title of honor, though the Westerners attempted to demonstrate the compatibility of papal primacy and the pentarchy to the systematic exclusion of Constantinople or any other Eastern see. In fact, in the West, aside from a few exceptions, the notion of pentarchy entirely disappeared, though in the East it remains to this very day. Its existence was not diminished even in 1593, when the episcopate of Moscow was elevated to fifth place in the patriarchate. On 12 February of that year, a "sacrosanct and large council" gathered at Constantinople, at the request of the Czar of Moscow, Fëdor I Ivanovič, approved that the archbishop of Moscow bear the title of "Patriarch of Moscow and all of Russia in the N regions" and that such notice in the sacred diptychs and the ecclesiastical gatherings be included immediately after the patriarch of Jerusalem. Nonetheless, the new see never sought access to the pentarchical college and always received its decisions (E. Melia, 354).

Final Problematic Developments. In the ancient church, it was not only the lack of political support that broke the collegial system of pentarchical government in the East, but also the schisms that occurred after the Council of Chalcedon produced a multiplication of the title of "patriarch" used by the heads of those churches that were not recognized to be in the faith of that Council or that fell outside the borders of the empire. In the West, however, the exercise of "Petrine" primacy of the See of Rome, having a different understanding of the ecclesial function of the patriarchate, discouraged every claim to the title by the archbishops of important sees (in 866, Nicholas I refused to grant the title to Prince Boris of Bulgaria, who claimed it for the head of the nascent national church). Moreover, following the Fourth Crusade, the creation of Latin patriarchates in the East caused a serious ecclesiological problem because patriarchal privileges became concessions of the Roman Sedes apostolica. Today, the Catholic Church includes eleven patriarchal sees, seven of which belong to various Eastern rites.

DTC 11, 2269-2275; D. H. Marot, Note sur la pentarchie: Irénikon 32 (1959) 436-442; W. de Vries, Orient et Occident. Les structures ecclésiales vues dans l'histoire des sept premiers conciles oecuméniques, Paris 1974; M. Marella, Roma e il sistema pentarchico. Problemi e prospettive: Nicolaus 4 (1976) 99-138; E. Melia, La Pentarchie: Istina 32 (1987) 337-360; J. Meyendorff, s.v. Pentarchy: Dictionary of the Middle Ages 9 (1987) 495-96; V. Peri, La Pentarchia. Situazione ecclesiale (IV-VII sec.) e teoria canonico-teologica, in Bisanzio, Roma e l'Italia nell'alto Medioevo, Atti delle Settimane di Studio del CISAM, XXXIV, Spoleto 1988, 209-311; M. Maccarrone (ed.), Il Primato del Vescovo di Roma nel primo millennio. Ricerche e Testimonianze, Atti del Symposium storico-teologico, Rome, 9-13 ottobre 1989, Vatican City 1991; F.R. Gahbauer, Die Pentarchietheorie. Untersuchung zu einem Modell der Kirchenleitung von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, Frankfurt a.M. 1993; E. Morini, Roma e la pentarchia dei patriarchi nella percezione dell'oriente greco tardoantico e medievale, in P. Prodi (ed.), Forme storiche di governo della Chiesa universale. Giornata di studio in occasione dell'ultima lezione del prof. Giuseppe Alberigo, 31 ottobre 2001, Bologna 2003, 27-42.

V. Lombino

PENTECOST. The origin of the Christian feast of Pentecost, the Jewish roots of which the Fathers never forgot, goes back to Acts 2:1-11. The church of the 2nd-3rd c. recognized the "seven weeks" of joy after *Easter: the laetissimum spatium, namely, the *sacrament of *baptism, the resurrection of Jesus Christ, the gift of the *Holy Spirit and the expectation of the *Parousia (Tertull., De bapt. 19,2). The alleluia was sung in churches; Christians did not pray on their knees nor did they fast, and they continually read from the Acts of the Apostles. On the 50th day, this period ended without a separate feast. Through a complex series of events, the historicizing tendency of the liturgical feasts during the 4th c. caused the development of a proper feast for Pentecost and the Ascension of the Lord. At *Rome, the insertion of penitential days (litania maior April 25, litaniae minores/rogationes before the Ascension) disrupted the connection between Easter and Pentecost, which received its own octave because it was a separate feast. The fact that the rabbis connected the Pentecost with the Ascension of Moses and the fact that Roman theology brought to mind the gift of the New Law together with the descent of the Holy Spirit provides a way to understand better the iconographic motif of the traditio legis, where *Jesus, standing on the Mount of Paradise, entrusts the law to St. *Peter. The Sacramentarium Veronense already offered formularies for the vigil of Pentecost celebrated at Rome.

CPG V (sermons); M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica 2, Milan [3]1969, 309-323; H. auf der Maur, Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit 1, Regensburg 1983, 122-124.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PEPUZA. A small town of *Phrygia, along with Tymion, it was a center of the charismatic movement of the *Montanists (also called the heresy of the Phrygians or Cataphrygians), which arose around the year AD 165 and was established by Montanus and two women, Priscilla and *Maximilla (Eusebius, HE 5,18,2; Hierokles, Synecdemos 667,6). Pepuza, the holy city, also became a place of pilgrimage. The Montanist movement soon spread into Asia Minor, almost immediately reaching even *Carthage, where one of its great supporters was *Tertullian. The level tract of land between Pepuza (to the S) and Tymion (to the N) was the place where the new Jerusalem would descend from heaven, acc. to the statement in the Apocalypse (ch. 21), at the end of time; Pepuza, in particular, was the new city. *Epiphanius wrote that during a dream Priscilla received an important revelation: "taking the form of a woman, Christ came to me clothed in a white tunic and placed wisdom within me and revealed to me that this is a holy place and that the new Jerusalem would descend on it from heaven" (Epiphanius, Panarion 49,1: PG 41, 880). For this reason, the Montanists were called the "Pepuzians" (Epiphanius, Haer. 48,14: PG 41, 872; Praedest. 27). Montanus, Priscilla and Maximilla were born in the region and resided there. Pepuza was their strategic center, a place where they had gathered many people (Cyril Jer., Catech. 16: PG 33, 928-29).

Though sought after for more than a century, the precise location had not been found; nonetheless, archaeologists tended to place it roughly in the area of the city of Uflak. In the year 2000, near the village of Susuzören, the discovery of a bilingual Greek and Latin inscription—in which the inhabitants of Tymion complained to *Septimius Severus, arguing that their taxes were too high—allowed scholars to identify first the location of Tymion and as result also the "holy city" of Pepuza. Tymion (today Susuzören) is found ca. 18 km (11 mi.) SW of Uflak. Pepuza was ca. 12 km (7.4 mi.) S of Tymion and 16 km (9.94 mi.) N of Karahalli, in the district of Ulas, where one still finds the remains of ancient buildings and, esp., the remains of a large monastery in the vicinity (its abbot Euthymius was present at the Council of *Nicaea in 787). In 550, Byzantine soldiers, following the lead of *John of Ephesus, destroyed the sanctuary that contained the bones of the movement's founders and confiscated the other buildings. The bishop of Pepuza, Theophylact, participated at the Council of Nicaea of 787. According to a Latin inscription of 205 or 208—it is said that the original was located in the *thermal baths of Trajan at Rome—Tymion was to be found near the imperial estates, which at the end of the 2nd c. were tilled by the coloni Caesaris. A procurator was responsible for the administration of the imperial landholdings in the region.

J.C. Poirier, Montanist Pepuza-Jerusalem and the Dwelling Place of Wisdom: JECS 7 (1999) 491-507; C. Markschies, Nochmals: Wo lag Pepuza? Wo lag Tymion? Nebst einigen Bemerkunger zur Frühgeschichte des Montanismus: JbAC 37 (1994) 7-28; W. Tabbernee, Portals of the Montanist New Jerusalem: The Discovery of Pepouza and Tymion: JECS 11 (2003) 87-93; T. Hauken, A New Inscription from Phrygia: A Rescript of Septimius Severus and Caracalla to the Coloni of the Imperial Estate at Tymion: Epigraphica Anatolica 36 (2003) 33-44; P. Lampe, Die montanistischen Tymion und Pepouza im Lichte der neuen Tymioninschrift: Zeitschrift für Antikes Christentum 8 (2005) 498-512; W. Tabbernee - P. Lampe, Pepouza and Tymion: The Discovery and Archaeological Exploration of a Lost Ancient City and an Imperial Estate, Berlin-New York 2006.

A. Di Berardino

PEREGRINUS. A civis, i.e., a free individual, of one city was also considered a peregrinus (stranger, foreigner) in another, and therefore a non-Roman citizen. Just as citizenship granted a strong personal identity with rights and obligations, among which were the religious practices owed to the city's divinities, a peregrinus was seen as the other, the stranger, the one who did not have civil protection and therefore his situation was insecure. During the age of the Republic, the majority of the Roman population was made up of peregrini from conquered countries. They generally did not enjoy political rights (they did not participate at the popular assemblies; they could not refer matters to the courts; they were not conscripted for military service). Within the sphere of private law, they could not offer testimony in a court, nor draw up a will in the form of Roman law, nor the property of citizens. Their marriages were considered legal (iustae nuptiae) only if they enjoyed the ius connubii granted on a personal basis or, as was more often the case, to their civitates of origin, which obtained it from *Rome. With the concession of Roman *citizenship to all the free inhabitants of the empire, all people were thereby cives romani, but also cives of their respective cities.

E. Volterra, L'acquisto della cittadinanza e il matrimonio del peregrino, in Id., Scritti Giuridici, Naples 1991, II, 257-58; Id., Sulla condizione dei figli dei peregrini cui veniva concessa la cittadinanza romana, in ibid., 229-30; E. Cizek, L'image de l'autre et les mentalités romaines du Ier au IVe siècle de notre ère: Latomus 48 (1989) 360-371.

M. Forlin Patrucco - A. Di Berardino

PEREGRINUS of Auxerre. His Latin name was Peregrinus. The Mart. hier. mentions 16 May at Bouhy (today in the Nievre department), identifying him as the city's first bishop. The Passio (BHL 6623) of the 7th c. makes him out to be a martyr, an account influenced by the Passio SS. Andochii et Thyrsi, a Roman priest whom *Sixtus II (257–258) consecrated as bishop and sent to evangelize the Puisaye. There he preached on a pagan feast day; as a result, he was imprisoned at Bouhy and beheaded. Between the 7th and 9th c., his relics were transferred to Saint-Denis. At Rome, the church of St. Peregrinus in the Vatican was near the hospital of St. Peregrinus, which was founded by Leo III (795–816) (Duchesne LP 2, 47.57).

BHL 6623-6625; BS 10, 460-462; LCI 8, 154; C. Huelsen, Le chiese di Roma nel medio evo, Florence 1926 (repr. Rome 2000), 416; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae 3, Vatican City 1971, 176-178; J.-Ch. Picard, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIIIe siècle, Paris 1992, 53.

V. Saxer - S. Held

PEREGRINUS, exegete. An individual who was very involved in biblical studies. Using Jerome's work, he made a new edition of the Wisdom books and, perhaps, even for other books. With regard to the Pauline Epistles, he revised and adjusted the *Priscillian canons (Prooemium Peregrini episcopi in epistulas Pauli apostoli) and the canons of the bishop of Avila (Canones in Pauli Apostoli epistulas a Peregrino episcopo emendati). It seems certain that he was a bishop and very likely that he was from *Baetica. Recently, scholars have tried to show that he was responsible for a complete recension of the *Bible, but the question has remained open until this day. It is unclear when he lived. Usually scholars date his activity to the 5th c., but it could also be the case that he worked in the 1st half of the 6th.

CSEL 18, 109-147; T. Ayuso Marazuela, La Vetus Latina Hispana, I, Madrid 1953, 520-522; B. Fischer, Algunas observaciones sobre al "Codex Gothicus" de la R.c. de S. Isidoro en León: Archivos leoneses 15 (1961) 5-47; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 76-78.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

PERFUME. Perfume is solar energy and a sign of the divine life. According to the ancients, the gods breathed aromas to preserve immortality. For mortals, perfume grants the joy of living and the ability to forget misfortune. It was the spirit's ambassador: it foretold the arrival of the beloved person and invoked the person's presence when absent. It is perceived by the sense of smell, releasing hidden, affective fascinations within the receiver. In ancient *Egypt, incense and aromas filled the temples to lift the faithful into the heavenly kingdom, while the ointments of embalming seem to give life back to the dead. Greeks and Romans sought in perfume a sign of the divine presence (a theophany), and in the ointment, the medicine that brings one back to life. For the Persians, perfume was the symbol of the "good," and stench, the symbol of "evil." In Israel and in all religions, perfume expressed "the life and nearness of God" (E. Lohmeyer, 3). The Jews saw in the "tree of life," planted by God on earth, the source of "the perfume of the law," which guided humanity to the "perfume of wisdom" so that it could make the world the "garden of justice" (Gen 2:9-12; Sir 24:15; 1 Enoch 24:4–32:6). The "sacrifice of a sweet odor" is a human life offered to God and to others (Gen 8:21): one's life can become a "theophany" if in irradiating the perfume of holiness, one collaborates in the manifestation of God in the world (Ap. Baruch 67,6; Jubil. 2,22). God's love for the community, his spouse, is described in the *Song of Songs with the triumph of aromas that are spread about in the fields and in the nuptial chamber. According to Flavius Josephus, "the altar of incense with thirteen perfumes . . . signified that all things are from God and for God" (Bell. Iud. V, 5,5). At his birth, Jesus received the gifts of "incense and myrrh," the perfume that announced "sweetness and bitterness" for the Messiah and all humanity (Mt 2:11). "Anointed" with the *Holy Spirit at the Jordan and with ointment at Bethany, Jesus foretold the perfume of his death and resurrection, which begot the church (Jn 1:32-34 and 12:1-8). *Paul perceived in *sin a "stench of death" and in righteousness a "perfume of life" (2 Cor 2:16). *Philo the Jew defined the breath of life given by God to *Adam "a light breath," "a breeze" and "a mild and sweet perfumed exhalation": Adam, by receiving it, opened his eyes to life (Leg. All. 1,42). The *Mandeans also affirmed this, acc. to whom "when the baby is in the womb of its mother, it breathes the odor of life" (Joh. I, in G. Furlani, Il buon odore e il cattivo odore nella religione dei Mandei: RAL VIII/7 [1952] 321).

Christians affirm that God is the "perfect perfume" (Athenag., Suppl. 13). God possesses "every sweet odor and every aroma" (Iren., Haer, IV, 14,3). *Hippolytus asked, "What is the perfumed anointing of Christ, if not the Word?" (Co. Ct. 2,4). The Father gives to the Son his immortal perfume through the anointing in the Holy Spirit; the incarnate Word brings to the world the breath of trinitarian life, by inaugurating the diffusion of love onto all humanity (Hipp., Co. Ct. 2,1-30; Orig., Co. Ct. I, 101,8–102,8 and 107,17–108,8). For *gnostics, perfume is the knowledge of God: Sophia possesses "an aroma of immortality left to her by Christ and the Holy Spirit" (*Iren., Haer, 4,1), and her children on earth "struggle to maintain in themselves the ray and the spark of light with the perfume of the Spirit" (Hipp., Ref. V, 19,6 and X, 11,4). The *fathers of the church recognized in Jesus the suffering, the sacrificial offering pleasing to God for its "sweet fragrance" (Eph 5:2): the *cross of Christ is the perfumed tree that conquers the wicked odor of death and floods humanity with new and moral life (Hipp., Com. Cant. 12,1–13,4; Orig., Com. Cant. I, 102,10-20; Greg. Nyss., Hom. Cant. III; Ambr., In Ps. 40,15).

By giving his life, Christ renewed creation and granted life to humankind, to whom God had communicated from the first day "the perfumed breath of his divinity" (ps.-Clem., Rec. IV, 9,1). The memory in perfume of the earthly *paradise, brought to life by the expectation of the perfume of the eternal paradise, grants depth to Christians' commitment in history. The heralds of God's justice "everywhere breathe incorruptibility and give life to humankind" (Iren., Haer, III, 11,8), hiding from all the fact that the "sweet odor for the Lord is the heart that praises its creator" (Barn. 2,10; cf. Greg. Nyss., Hom. Cant. XI). *Ambrose stated: "the perfume of the faith smells pleasant to the *soul that opens its heart to Christ, by receiving the odor of the burial of the Lord to believe that his flesh did not undergo corruption and did not exalt the wicked odor of death, but is arisen by spreading the perfume of that flower of life, which is always flourishing" (De virginitate 62, et passim). He also exhorted every believer: et tu, si desideras gratiam, caritatem auge: mitte in corpus Iesu fidem resurrectionis, odorem Ecclesiae, communis caritatis unguentum ("and you, if you desire grace, increase charity: place in the body of Jesus, the faith of the resurrection, the odor of the church and the ointment of mutual charity"; In Lc. 6,29, et passim). *Augustine echoed Ambrose's exhortations by offering a wonderful commentary on the anointing at Bethany (Aug., In Jo. 50,1-10).

*Martyrdom is the supreme Christian witness, in which the outpouring of the "perfume of Christ" reaches its apex: *Polycarp, when lifted upon funeral pile, "stood in between, not as flesh that burned, but as *bread that cooked . . . and we smelled an intense perfume, as if a cloud of incense or another precious aroma had been lifted up" (Mart. Polyc. 15,2). The Christian who dies for the name of the Lord spreads in the world the aroma of his resurrection and draws to God with the outpouring of his sacrifice a flood of believers: "we, i.e., where one finds the relics of the martyrs, run with urgency toward the perfume of Christ's anointed" (Phil. Carpas., In Ct.: PG 40, 41 C). A daily martyrdom is the ascent of life. The fragrance of the Spirit makes believers a sweet-smelling community of aromas that in contemplation ascend to the heights of the perfume of paradise. *Gregory the Great said that the "lives of the saints" are "a perfume of aromas" that allows one to have a foretaste on earth of the vision of God: illa bona, quae per contemplationem tu praeparas, ista omnia virtutum munera, quae in hac vita tribuisti, transcendunt (Greg. Gt, Com. Cant. 20 and 12-30).

E. Lohmeyer, Vom göttlichen Wohlgeruch: SHAW 1919, 9, 1-52; A. Stumpff, εὐωδία: TWNT [TDNT] 2, 808-810; M. Löhr, Das Räucheropfer im A.T. Eine archäologische Untersuchung, Halle 1927; W. Deonna, Euodia. Croyances antiques et modernes. L'odeur suave des dieux et des élus: Genava 17 (1939) 167-262; H.Ch. Puech, Parfums sacrés, odeur de sainteté, effluves paradisiaques: L'Amour de l'Art (1950) 36-40; G. Delling, ὀσμή: TWNT 5, 492-495 [TDNT 5, 493-495]; E. Cothenet, Parfums: DBS 4, 1653-1660; A. Orbe, La teología del Espíritu Santo, Rome 1966, 377-390; M. Détienne, Les jardins d'Adonis, Paris 1972; Id., Aromi e seduzione. Religione e Civiltà 1 (1972) 529-537; G. Piccaluga, Adonis e i profumi di un certo strutturalismo: Maia 26 (1974) 33-51; P. Meloni, Il profumo dell'immortalità. L'interpretazione patristica di Cantico 1,3, Rome 1975 (including an extensive bibl.); M. Détienne, Dionysos mis à mort, Paris 1977; P. Rovesti, Alla ricerca dei profumi perduti, Venice 1980; J.P. Albert, Odeurs de sainteté. La mythologie chrétienne des aromates, Paris 1990.

P. Meloni

PERICHORESIS (Gk. περιχώρησις). A term in *Neoplatonic anthropology that was used to explain how the *soul was intimately united to the body without being confused with it; by means of analogy, *Gregory of Nazianzus applied it to the union of the two natures in Jesus Christ (Ep. 101; Or. 38,13). In this sense, it was reused by Byzantine authors who saw in the human composite an analogy of the *incarnation (Lampe 1077ff.). *Maximus the Confessor developed the concept to explain the unity of the person against the *monothelites (Bausenhart 173), using the example of a piece of iron placed in a fire, an example *Origen had used to illustrate the union of the soul with the Logos. Following the thought of ps.-*Cyril (PG 77, 1144B, 1163B), *John of Damascus adopted the term perichoresis in an analogous sense for the inseparable, but not confused, union of the three divine *persons (Expos. 8; 14; 49). Thanks to the Latin translation of John of Damascus's Expositio made by Burgundio of Pisa, scholastic theology also received the idea under the Latin term circumincessio.

B. Studer, Die theologische Arbeitsweise des Johannes von Damaskus, Ettal 1956, 112-113; G.L. Prestige, Dio nel pensiero dei Padri, It. tr. Bologna 1969, 297-305; H.A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers, Cambridge, MA 1964 (It. tr. Brescia 1978), 418-428; P. Stemmer, Perichorese: HWP 7 (1989) 255-259; G. Bausenhart, "In allem uns gleich ausser der Sünde." Studien zum Beitrag des Maximus des Bekenners zur altkirchlichen Christologie, Mainz 1992; G. Greshake, Perichorese: LTK[3] 8, 31-32. (bibl.); E. Durand, La périchorèse des personnes divines, Paris 2005 (see also Lateranum 72 [2006] 553-575).

B. Studer

PERIGENES. Bishop of *Corinth (ca. 419–after 435). He was born in Corinth, where he was ordained a priest. He was consecrated bishop of Patras (Gk. Patrai, Lat. Patrae) in 419, but the Christians of that city did not approve of him for unknown reasons (Socr., HE 7,36,9). The Corinthians selected him as their bishop in 419 and sought the approbation of Pope *Boniface (419–422) because the election had been carried out in a manner contrary to the canons (Council of *Nicaea, can. 13). After having received information from his legate *Rufus of Thessalonica, the pope approved Perigenes's election (Ep. Bonif. 5). Some bishops, however, were not in agreement with the pope's decision so that as a result the pope was obliged to confirm the appointment (Ep. Bonif. 16). Perigenes recognized the supremacy of the papal legate, but after Rufus's death he refused to submit himself to his successor *Anastasius, who was elevated to the same position by *Sixtus III (432–440). When Anastasius convoked a synod at *Thessalonica, the pope wrote a letter to the Eastern bishops and another (435) to Perigenes so that he might recognize the authority of Anastasius (Ep. Sixt. 7; 8; 10). We do not know Perigenes's response, nor do we know the date of his death. Perigenes participated at the Council of *Ephesus (431) among the orthodox fathers; at various times at that council, his name was reported as "Peregrinus."

E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, von den Anfängen bis zur

Höhe der Weltherrschaft 1, Tübingen 1930 = Münster 1985, 373-382; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana, Rome 1976-78, 1069-1147; Id., La géographie de l'Illyricum ecclésiastique et ses relations avec l'Église de Rome. Villes et peuplement dans l'Illyricum protobyzantin, Rome 1984, 21-62.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PERIODEUTA. A priest dependent on the city's bishop who was responsible for visiting and caring for Christians in villages and the countryside. Dating back to the 3rd c., this institution was found in the E provinces: *Asia Minor, *Syria and esp. *Egypt, where one could not easily reach the bishop because he resided in the major cities of the districts, or because he was far away for other reasons, as in the case of *persecution (see Philea, Ep.: PG 10, 1566B). The Council of *Laodicea at the end of the 4th c. (can. 57) made a law stating that one should not consecrate bishops for villages and the countryside, but only that a periodeuta should be placed there who did not have a fixed residence and was responsible for ministering to the Christians of many villages (see Athan., Apol. 85: PG 25, 400), esp. in a diocese with a vast territory and Christian villages. The figure of the periodeuta was tightly connected to *chorbishop, the number of whom gradually decreased during the 4th c., though it increased for the periodeuta; among the nomadic peoples, however, the presence of a bishop was more fitting.

DACL 14, 369-379; Lampe, s.v.; P. Hindo, Disciplina antiochena antiqua. Syri. II: Les personnes, Vatican City 1951, 268-271; G. Dagron, Entre village et cité. La bourgade rurale des VIe-VIIe siècles en Orient: Koinonia 3 (1979) 29-52 (esp. 44-47); D. Feissel, L'évêque, titres et fonctions d'après les inscriptions grecques jusqu'au VIIe siècle, in Actes du XIe Congrès int. d'archéologie chrétienne, Rome 1989, I, 801-828; O. Bucci, Il Corepiscopato nella storia della Chiesa, Rome 1993.

A. Di Berardino

PERPETUA and FELICITAS
I. The Passio - II. Iconography.

I. The Passio. The archetype of the Acts of Christian martyrs. This Passio refers to the arrest of Vibia Perpetua, along with other catechumens (Revocatus, Felicitas, Saturninus and Secundinus), the events that occurred in prison, the sentencing, the execution (chs. 3-10) and the visions of Saturus, who had freely hid himself among the detainees (chs. 11-13). On the basis of the first chapters (1-2), the end (chs. 14-21) and other pieces of information, scholars have sought to attribute the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis to *Tertullian or to a member of his circle. Written by an anonymous member of the community, it contains historically authentic elements mentioned by the martyrs themselves (the three visions of Perpetua and that of Saturus) and reflects events that occurred during the first *persecution at *Carthage following an edict (202). It is dated to the year 203, and Tertullian (De anima 55) and Augustine (Sermo 280: PL 38, 1281) mentioned it. Preserved in Latin and Greek redactions, the text is a witness to the Christianity lived by the people and, more than being just an apologetic document, it was a means of edification during the *liturgy. It contains typical Jewish-Christian apocalyptic elements.

CPL 32; PL 3, 13-18 (Ruinart); P. Franchi de' Cavalieri: RQA 5 (1896) 104-148 (= ST 221, 1962, 41-155); H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, Oxford 1972, 107-131; Quasten I, 163-164; E. Corsini, Proposte per una lettura della "Passio Perpetuae," in Forma Futuri (Misc. M. Pellegrino), Turin 1975, 481-541; C. Mazzucco, Il significato cristiano della "libertas" proclamata dai martiri della "Passio Perpetuae," in ibid., 556-586; S. Prete, Il motivo onirico della "scala." Note su alcuni Atti di martiri africani: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 521-526; Atti e passioni dei martiri, ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen, Milan 1987, 111-147 (text and tr.); 412-452 (comm.); C.M. Robeck, Prophecy in Carthage. Perpetua, Tertullian, and Cyprian, Cleveland 1992; P. Habermehl, Perpetua und der Ägypter oder Bilder des Bösen im frühen afrikanischen Christentum. Ein Versuch zur Passio sanctarum Perpetuae et Felicitatis, Berlin 1992; B.D. Shaw, The Passion of Perpetua: Past and Present 139 (1993) 3-45; J.E. Salisbury, Perpetua's Passion. The Death and Memory of a Young Roman Woman, New York-London 1997; H.B. Vierow, Feminine and Masculine Voices in the "Passion of Saints Perpetua and Felicitas": Latomus 58 (1999) 601-619; K.B. Steinhauser, Lectura agustiniana de la "Pasión de las santas Perpetua y Felicidad": Augustinus 44 (1999) 172-175, 263-269.

E. Romero Pose

II. Iconography. Martyrs in 202 at Carthage, Perpetua and Felicitas and their companions were greatly venerated in this city. According to *Victor of Vita (De persecut. Vand. 1, 3), African Christians built the basilica maiorum upon their place of burial. Archaeologists identified this building in 1907 thanks to an inscription naming the *martyrs along with the confessio of the same basilica, which was uncovered in 1929. The most ancient iconographic testimonies of the two martyrs are at *Ravenna in the chapel of S. Andrea (ca. 519), which is today the archbishop's chapel, and in the procession of the martyrs in the church of St. Martin in Caelo aureo, then S. Apollinare Nuovo (6th c.). Moreover, one finds these testimonies on the underside of the apsidal arch in the Euphrasian basilica of *Parentium (543–554). Lastly, one should note that the sarcophagus of the Archaeological Museum of Burgos, variously dated between the 5th and 8th c., contains an intriguing image. Scholars have sought to identify one of the visions of the Passio Perpetuae in the scenes on the back of the sarcophagus because of the presence, among other things, of a ladder (= heavenly ladder).

E. Josi: EC 9, 1191ff.; L. Schütz: LCI 8, 155-156; Wp 445ff.; A.L. Delattre, Les martyrs de Carthage: Comptes-rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres 1907, 176-177 and 193-195; Id., Nuove scoperte di monumenti cristiani antichi a Cartagine. La "confessio" della Basilica Maiorum: RivAC 7 (1930) 303; Y. Duval, Loca sanctorum Africae, Rome 1982, 682-683; L.C. Seelbach, Perpetua und Tertullian. Die Martyrerin und der Kirchenvater, Jena 2000.

G. Santagata

PERPETUUS of Tours (d. 491). The sixth bishop of the city, from ca. 461 until his death in 491. He received two letters from *Sidonius Apollinaris (Ep. 4,18; 7,5,8-9) and one from *Paulinus of Périgueux (CPL 1475). He presided over two councils, at *Tours (18 November 461) and *Vannes (between 461 and 491) (CCL 148, 147.150). *Gregory of Tours dedicated a biographical sketch to him and passed down the Calendarium Turonense, a work written by Perpetuus and still in force during Gregory's time (Hist. Franc. 10,31; Virt. S. Mart. 1,6): the fasts were set for Wednesday and Friday from *Pentecost to the feast of St. John (24 June), from 1 September to 1 October, from St. *Martin (11 November) to Christmas, from St. *Hilary (13 January) to 15 February; the vigils, to Christmas, *Epiphany, St. *John the Baptist (24 June), *Cathedra of St. *Peter, Resurrection of Christ (27 March), *Easter, *Ascension, Pentecost, Passio of St. John the Baptist (29 August), Sts. Peter and *Paul (29 June), anniversaries of St. Martin (4 July and 11 November), St. Symphorian (22 August), St. Lictorius (13 September), St. Brize (13 November, St. Hilary (13 January). As a result, we have the liturgical calendar of Tours at the end of the 5th c. Perpetuus built a basilica at Tours in honor of St. Martin, St. Peter and another at Mont-Louis in honor of St. *Lawrence and the parish churches of Esvres, Mougon, Barron, Ballau, Vernon (Indre-et-Loire) (Greg. Tours, Hist. Franc. 2,14; 10,31). As part of his last will and testament, he left all his property to the various churches of his diocese. He was buried in the church of St. Martin 30 December; his epitaph and testament from 475 are 17th-c. forgeries (AASS Apr. 1, 747-748).

CPL 1475, 2029; BS 10, 502-503; L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IV^e au VI^e siècle, Rome 1983.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PERSECUTIONS. Persecutions can be understood as violent actions directed against the Christian church and its members by its adversaries.

Jesus' message of salvation led to a confrontation with the Jewish authorities and his crucifixion by order of Pontius *Pilate, the Roman procurator in Judea. The gospels warned the disciples that their future could involve suffering and persecution; they could be "delivered up to councils and flogged in the synagogues" (Mt 10:17). Jesus himself affirmed that the blood of his covenant was shed for many (Mk 14:24; Mt 26:28, cf. Is 53:12) and that for his name the blood of Christians would also be shed (Mk 10:39).

The primitive community of *Jerusalem immediately experienced the truth of these words. Around AD 35, *Stephen became the first martyr (Acts 7:60). In 44, the zeal of Herod *Agrippa for the precise observance of the law, during the brief period of his service in government (41–44), culminated in the martyrdom of *James the brother of *John and in *Peter's arrest (Acts 12:2-3). Although this persecution was not taken too far, Paul preferred to preach in the synagogues of the Diaspora (AD 47–57), in the face of bitter opposition from many Jews. Paul was persecuted from city to city (see Acts 17:10-13). His opponents depicted him as "an agitator among all the Jews throughout the world" (Acts 24:5) and sought to obtain his condemnation and execution from the Roman authorities first at *Corinth (Acts 18:12-17) then at Jerusalem (Acts 24:1-6 and 25:2). *Luke showed that the Roman authorities looked at Christianity as an internal affair within *Judaism (Acts 18:14-17) and were not hostile to Paul and his preaching (Acts 13:7-12). What then was the cause of the Neronian persecution of AD 64?

Little is known about the Christian community of *Rome during this period (see, however, Acts 18:10; 28:22; Rom 1:8 and Suetonius, Claudius 25,4; see Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution, 160-161). Three factors seem relevant: (a) the desperate attempt of *Nero to find a scapegoat for the fire of 19 July 64, which he was thought to have caused; (b) the official and popular opinion in Rome, which detested every threat to the majesty of the Roman gods by foreign cults, Judaism included, and the ease with which the Jews were suspected of misanthropy (Tac, Hist. V, 5, 1) and arson (Josephus, Bell. Iud. VII, 3, 3); (c) the hostility of the Jews toward the Christians.

*Tacitus's account (Annales XV, 44) of the persecution, written nearly 60 years later, could have had as a model the description of the plot of the Bachanali and its suppression in 186 BC (Liv., XXXIX, 14,10). Christians, moreover, were seen as sectarians like the Jews and, as such, guilty of "hostility toward humankind" (odium generis humani) which manifested itself in the adoption of a perverse religion (prava religio) and in the conspiracy to spread the fire at Rome. And thus, those who "confessed" (Christianity) were killed in a cruel and theatrical manner in order to appease the wrath of the gods. A generation later, the author of 1 Clement (5) seems to blame the catastrophe on the "envy and jealousy" of the church's enemies; namely, the Jews.

Although not extending to *Italy and the provinces, the persecution put Christians in a legal predicament. Tacitus leaves no doubt that for him the execution of Jesus by Pontius Pilate was justified, that Christianity was a "mortal *superstition," the adherents of which deserved punishment. His contemporary *Suetonius describes the suppression of Christians through Nero's policing actions (coercitio), whose deeds in this regard he approved (Nero 16,2). According to Suetonius, Christians are guilty of magical practices and of having introduced "a new and dangerous religion," but he did not connect the persecution to the fire of Rome.

*Melito of Sardis (Eus., HE 4, 26,8) and *Tertullian (Apol. 5,4) mention *Domitian as the second "persecuting emperor." It seems, however, that Domitian's suppressing measures were intended to discourage the members of the Roman nobility from adopting Jewish customs (Dio Cassius, Hist. Rom. LXVII, 14; cf. Suet., Domit. 18). It is possible that *Domitilla, the emperor's niece (neptis), who was exiled to Pandataria (Pantelleria), was a Christian (see Eus., HE 3, 18,4 and Chron. ad ann. Abraham 2111).

From the end of the 1st c., however, the Roman authorities distinguished between Jews and Christians (Seut., Domit. 12), and Christianity was considered illegal (see 1 Pet 4:15-16). In the province of Asia, the book of *Revelation referred to the merciless persecution carried out by Jews, the local populace and the civil authorities (Rev 2:9, 13; 17:6 and 13:16-17: a definite commercial boycott). The correspondence between *Trajan and *Pliny, his special legate (legatus pro praetore) in Bithynia (112–113), demonstrates that once denounced to the civil authorities, Christians were subject to quick execution (ad me tamquam christiani deferebantur: Plin., Ep. X, 96,2). Pliny asked the emperor if the simple profession of the name Christian deserved of punishment or if they should only be punished for the crimes attributed to them. In response, Trajan explained that although the Christians should not be sought out (as common criminals)—conquirendi non sunt—they should be punished if they refused to retract and to "worship our gods." If they recanted, however, they should be set free. In another rescript, *Hadrian, the successor of Trajan, instructed the proconsul of Asia, C. Minucius Fundanus, in 124–125, to condemn Christians only if the court found them guilty of breaking the law. They should not be victims of popular uprisings and denunciations, and they had the right to respond with an accusation of defamation against their accusers (the procedure of calumnia).

These two decisions of the emperors established the line of conduct pursued by the authorities with respect to the Christians until the end of the 2nd c. These decisions discouraged the accusations (see A.N. Sherwin White, The Early Persecutions and Roman Law Again: JTS 3 [1952] 199-213), and the Christians enjoyed a period of relative peace until the reign of *Marcus Aurelius (161–180). From that period, however, the official reluctance to take action against the Christians was overcome by the growing discontent of the populace. In addition to personal resentment, which cost *Justin Martyr his life at Rome in 165 (see Just., 2 Apol. 3 and 11), certain *pagans vociferously accused Christians of incest ("Oedipal relations"), cannibalism ("Thyestean banquets") and atheism (rejection of the Greek gods). The Christians were held responsible for the natural disasters, which pointed to the wrath of the gods (see Tertull., Apol. 40,2 and Aug., Civ. Dei II, 3, who provides the popular statement: Pluvia desit causa Christiani sunt). Also during this period they remained sufficiently close to Judaism (see Orig., C. Celsum II, 1 and 4: III, 1) so as to inherit the unpopularity of the Jews. The result was a series of sporadic but savage persecutions inspired by popular resentment: the most noteworthy was that which led to the martyrdom of *Polycarp of Smyrna, probably around 165 (or, perhaps, between 156 and 160; see Mart. Polyc., ed. H. Musurillo, Acts of the Christian Martyrs, 5-20 and cf. Eus., HE 4,15) and the pogrom of *Lyons in 177, mentioned in a letter sent by the survivors to the churches of Asia and *Phrygia (Eus., HE 5,1 and 2,1-8). At *Smyrna, the Jews joined the pagans to request the death of Polycarp (Mart. Polyc. 13 and 18; Eus., HE 4,15,26 and 29). The authorities agreed.

New light on the reasons for the unpopularity of Christians during this period is given by the Platonist *Celsus, whose book Alethēs Logos, written around the year 178, provided a complete attack to every aspect of Christian *theology, *anthropology and behavior. Celsus argued that Christians formed an "illegal association," whose members were bound by secret oaths (Orig., C. Celsum I, 1; see Caecilius, in *Minucius Felix's Octavius 8,4: "profanae coniurationis"), and not only were they not suited for taking on normal public offices, but with their proselytism (C. Celsum III, 52 and 55) they were threatening the traditional social and religious structure of the empire. The persecutions, including the hunting down of Christians, were justified (C. Celsum VIII, 69).

Christians overcame the crisis during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. In the last quarter of the 2nd c., Christians at Rome began to gain more respect and began to be considered, thanks to their behavior, as individuals comparable to "genuine philosophers" (*Galen's commentary on Plato's Republic, cited by R. Walzer, Galen on Jews and Christians, Oxford 1949, 15; see also Eus., HE 5,21). Sporadic persecutions nevertheless continued, leading to the martyrdom of the Senator (?) *Apollonius at Rome, around the year 183 (Acta Apollonii; cf. Musurillo, Acts, XXV and 90-104; G. Lanata, Gli Atti dei martiri, 145-157, with an extensive bibl.).

The beginning of the Severan dynasty in 193 opened a new era in the relations between Christians and the empire. Fewer accusations of black magic and promiscuous relations were raised, but there was an increase of charges of atheism and opposition to the gods that protected the Roman Empire. Christianity, moreover, then recovered its ancient missionary ideal. At *Alexandria, *Clement preached the need for spreading the gospel (Strom. I,1,3; 3,1ff.). Around 197 at *Carthage, Tertullian boasted of the ever-increasing number of Christians (Adv. Nat. 1,14) and other conversions to Christianity (fiunt non nascuntur christiani: Apol. 18,4). These advances provoked a strong popular reaction supported this time by the civil authorities. The persecutions, in the form of lynchings (at Alexandria, see Clem., Strom. II,20,125 and II,283,18) or mob attacks (see Hipp., In Dan. 1,23) or legal executions (at Carthage, Passio Perpetuae), took place over a wide area between 197 and 212, with great violence in 202–203. *Eusebius (HE 6,1,1) associated the persecutions with the emperor *Septimius Severus, but it seems more likely that the rescript attributed by Spartianus (Historia Augusta, Vita Severi 17,1) to the emperor in 202 that prohibited conversions to Judaism or Christianity was a response to a governor of a certain province that had requested instructions with regard to popular movements against Christians and esp. converts (see Frend, Open Questions, 349, against K.H. Schwarte, Das angebliche Christengesetz des Septimius Severus: Historia 12 [1963] 185-208). And it is to be noted that in contrast to all the other periods of persecution, the Christian converts were more often the target of pagan attacks than Christian leaders (thus the Passio Perpetuae and, for Alexandria, Eus., HE 6,3).

The wave of hatred once again diminished. Between 212 and 235 the church enjoyed another period of semitolerance. Whether one accepts Lampridius's statements that *Alexander Severus (222–235) "allowed the Christians to exist" (Historia Augusta: Lampridius, Vita Alex. Severi 22,6: christianos esse passus est), the church could now own property (the most ancient Roman catacombs) and erect buildings for prayer in certain cities (*Dura Europos).

The revolution (22 March 235) put an end to the Severan dynasty. The successor of Alexander Severus, *Maximinus Thrax (235–238), dismissed the Christian slaves and workers from the court of his predecessor (Eus., HE 6,36; cf. Orig., C. Celsum I,43). Pope *Pontianus and the martyr *Hippolytus were among the exiles (they died in *Sardinia near the end of 235), and Origen revealed that in 236 there were affluent Christians at *Caesarea, Palestine, who feared for their lives (Exhortation to Martyrdom, addressed to *Ambrose). Maximinus also died in the revolution inspired by the N African landholders (the Gordani), who were supported by the Roman senate. During the reigns of Gordian III (238–244) and *Philip the Arab (244–249) the church enjoyed a long period of prosperity (Eus., HE 6, 36; see Orig., C. Celsum I, 43). It was too good to last for long. Writing his Commentary on Matthew around 238, Origen foresaw that the persecutions against Christians would take on worldwide dimensions (In Matt. 24,9; Serm. 39).

Origen was not mistaken; a new turn of political fortunes brought with it a new emperor and a new political policy for Christians. C. Messius Quintus *Decius, who adopted the surname "Trajan" (249–251), was a good general and was a passionate believer in the traditional virtues of Rome. As in the case of Maximinus before him, he thought he could blame the Christians for the catastrophes that had struck the empire under his predecessor. Eusebius (HE 6,39,1) wrote that "because of his hatred for Philip, he launched a persecution against the churches." In January 250, Decius issued an edict stating that the annual *sacrifice performed on the Capitoline Hill to the Roman gods should be repeated in the provincial cities, and at the same time he ordered the arrests of many prominent Christians. On 21 January Pope *Fabian was brought to trial before him and condemned. The same was done to *Babylas, bishop of *Antioch (Eus., HE 6,39,4). At Carthage, *Cyprian was forced to go into hiding and, at Alexandria, *Dionysius was fortunate enough to escape arrest (Eus., HE 6,40,2ff.). This initial phase followed the establishment of commissions in the provinces to monitor the sacrifices to the empire's gods and the emperor's plan (see Cypr., Ep. 43,3; 67,4; also Eus., HE 6,42,1). The trials were held from February to March at Carthage and Smyrna, and until June-July in certain parts of *Egypt. Egyptian *papyri have preserved for us 43 libelli (certificates) given to all those who had sacrificed (see esp. J.R. Knipfing: HTR 16 [1923] 345-390). It is presumed that all people sacrificed because to refuse to do so would have resulted in one's death (Acta Pionii 7,4). Decius's measures were initially successful. His intention was more to obligate Christians to conform themselves to the worship of the Roman gods and not to ban the practice of Christianity (thus, in the Acts of Conon 4,4 [Musurillo, Acts, 189], the judge told *Conon: "if you have recognized Christ, recognize our gods too"). Some Christians resisted; several important bishops such as Euthemon of Smyrna openly apostatized (Acta Pionii 15,2), while *confessors such as *Pionius of Smyrna were the objects of derision and pity (Acta Pionii 10,16 and 20). Paganism was still at its height, while Christianity remained an urban religion spread about in minority communities in the chief cities of the empire.

Decius, however, died in battle against the *Goths (June 251). An attempt to restart the persecution by his successors Gallus and *Volusianus (Cyp. Ep. 59,8) resulted in the exile and death of Pope *Cornelius at Centumcellae in June 253, but little else. The church soon recovered its lost ground. The 87 bishops gathered at Carthage on 1 September 256 to support Cyprian's position against Pope *Stephen in the controversy over the *baptism of *heretics bore witness to the church's resilience and flexibility. In the summer of 257, the emperor Valerian (253–260), after having been put to the test by the Persians on the E border of the empire, made a fresh attempt to force the Christians to recognize the gods of the Romans. The text of his edict has been lost, but a paraphrase remains, it seems, in a statement preserved by the Acta Proconsularia regarding the exile of Cyprian (Sacratissimi imperatores Valerianus et Gallienus litteras ad me dari dignati sunt, quibus praeceperunt eos, qui Romanam religionem non colunt, debere Romanas caerimonias recognoscere: Acta Proc. 1, ed. W. Hartel, CSEL 3,3, p. CX). The authorities, therefore, accepted the fact that the Christians did not worship the gods; they asked, nonetheless, that they formally recognize in some way their salvific power for the peoples of the empire. This is what Aemilianus, vice-prefect of Egypt, said in his conversation (which was hardly a "trial") with Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria in 257 (see Eus., HE 7,11,9-11, which records the account of Dionysius, contained in a letter to Bishop Erammon). Cyprian and Dionysius refused to accept the compromise and were thus exiled, Cyprian to a comfortable villa on his property at Curubis on the Gulf of Hammamet; Dionysius, however, was less fortunate—he was sent to the oasis of Kufra.

The following year Valerian gave much more severe instructions to the senate so that they might in turn forward them to the provincial governors. According to Cyprian (Ep. 80), the bishops, presbyters and deacons had to be punished immediately (with death). The Roman senators (viri egregii) and the knights (equites) were forced to give up their high positions and properties, and even the matronae were forced to relinquish their property and go into exile. Civil servants (caesariani) were reduced to slavery and were sent in chains to work in the imperial landholdings. This was the most severe and detailed list of punishments ever decreed for Christians and, in the West, the persecutions lasted for a long time and were probably more costly in terms of human life, esp. among its leaders, than even the "Great Persecution." On 13 September, Cyprian was taken from Curubis to Carthage and on the following day brought before the proconsul Galerius Maximus. After a brief hearing, he was condemned to death and executed on the evening of 14 September. Galerius's motives for putting him to death are intriguing: the Christians were "irreligious" (sacrilegia mente), "they gathered together as an illegal association" (nefariae conspirationis), and Cyprian, as their "standardbearer," was "an openly professed enemy of the gods and the religion of Rome" (Acta Proconsularia 4, pp. CXII-CXIII). The accusations seem to be those that Celsus formulated 80 years earlier, but now the "conspiracy" directly challenged the primacy of the Roman gods.

Outside events helped the Christians yet again. Valerian was imprisoned by the Persians at *Edessa (June 260), and his son and successor, *Gallienus (253–268), ordered the reconstruction of the church's places of worship and granted them the freedom of existence (and therefore of worship). A paraphrase of the text, sent ca. 262 to Dionysius and his suffragan bishops in Egypt, after the civil war, was preserved by Eusebius (see HE 7,13: "I have ordered that the benefit of my generosity expand into the whole world so that they (the authorities) withdraw from places of worship, and thus even you can benefit from the provisions contained in my rescript, so that no one bother you there").

In the 40 years after, a modus vivendi between the church and the empire was established. The church obtained something akin to an intermediary situation, that of an autonomous body governed by its own officials acc. to its own laws, but subject to the commanding authorities of the imperial governing power. Although during this period, curiously enough, great leaders did not emerge from the Christian church, the church entered into every facet of the society and, more significantly, among the indigenous populations of important territories of Egypt, *Syria and N Africa and even beyond the frontiers of the empire, to the kingdom of *Armenia. It was no longer exclusively based in the cities, a relatively easy target for the authorities. The Great Persecution of 303–305, in the West, and of 303–312, in the East, can be seen today as the culmination of the measures taken by *Diocletian and his colleagues in the tetrarchy bent on imposing a tightly uniform administration in the empire, inspired by the worship of the Roman gods and the practice of the so-called traditional virtues of Rome. One after the other, the army, the administration of the provinces, the taxes and the coins were reshaped in view of providing an administrative and economic system that was simple and uniform, but resilient, across the entire empire.

The saying genio populi Romani on the back of the silvered bronze coins, minted in the tens of thousands of pieces for use in the empire, summed up the imperial message as in the emperor's edict on prices (301); it reflected his paternal search for uniformity. Uniformity was inevitably extended to religion. In March of 297 (302 acc. to some), Diocletian ordered the prefect of Carthage to put the *Manicheans to death and to burn their books (Coll. legum mosaicarum et romanarum, in Iurisprud. anteiustin., ed. Seckel-Kübler, II, 2, p. 381; and the discussion in F. Décret, L'Afrique manichéenne, IV^{e} et V^{e} siècles, I, Paris 1978, 162-165). The Manicheans were seen as "enemy agents" paid by Rome's adversary, *Persia, but as soon as the latter was definitively crushed in 298, the government directed its attention toward Christians.

The persecution gradually developed—as it seemed to Eusebius, who was alive during this time (Chron. ad ann. 301: Veturius magister militae Christianos milites persequitur, paulatim ex illo iam tempore persecutione adversum nos incipiente). Christians were purged from the army and the civil administration, but during the last part of 302 Diocletian hesitated. His wife and his daughter may have been favorable to Christianity. At the end, the arguments of his caesar, *Galerius, and a visit to the oracle of the Milesian Apollo at Didyma persuaded him otherwise. The fact that Christianianity was a challenge to the empire had to be accepted, but the shedding of blood was not necessary (Lact., De mortibus persecutorum: SC 39, 11,8). The civil authorities chose 23 February 303, the day of the feast of the terminalia, as the day in which the Christian threat was to be put to an end.

The text of the first edict has not come down to us, but it seems to have followed the measures taken by Valerian, without the death penalty. The Christian churches had to be destroyed, religious functions prohibited and the Scriptures handed over to the authorities to be burned (see Lact. De mort. 13). Christians belonging to the upper classes were to lose their privileges. Those with civil offices (οἰκετίαι, in Eus., HE 8,2,4) were to be reduced to slavery, and Christians were prohibited from laying claim to or defending their own rights in a court of law. The edict was put into effect without difficulties from the provincial and local authorities. A second edict, after the revolts in Melitene and Syria reportedly inspired by Christians, condemned the *clergy to imprisonment (Eus., HE 8,6,9), but the prisons were inadequate to receive such a large number of people; therefore, in the summer of 303 a third edict decreed that Christians were to be forced to sacrifice on the spot and then freed. Every attempt was made, at times with grotesque results, to obtain the Christian's assent (Eus., Mart. Pal. 1,3-5). Diocletian then departed for Rome to celebrate his Vicennalia (20 November 303).

Until this point, the persecutions achieved a certain amount of success (Eus., HE 8,2,1). The churches were destroyed, many bishops succumbed to pressure (such as Paul, bishop of *Cirta in *Numidia), others stalled or fled (such as *Peter of Alexandria), and the communities were scattered. Only a small number of unwavering men and women were put to death (Eus., Mart. Pal. 1,5). During his visit to the West, however, Diocletian fell ill and Galerius took advantage of the situation. In the spring of 304, a fourth edict was issued that intimated to all men, women and children that they were under obligation to sacrifice and pour out a libation or suffer the death penalty. At that point, there began to be so many martyrs that in N Africa the dies thurificationis was remembered a century later (CIL VIII, 6700), alongside the dies traditionis.

Aside from N Africa (Eus., HE 8,6,10), the Great Persecution in the West was more violent in its historical transmission than its reality; it ended practically speaking at the time of Diocletian and *Maximian's resignation (1 May 305) and was not renewed. In the East, however, things turned out differently. Galerius was now the Senior Augustus and, after a pause that lasted until Easter 306, the persecution began again. *Maximinus Daia, the caesar of Galerius, issued an edict commanding all the governors of the provinces to impose on everyone the obligation to sacrifice to the gods. At Caesarea, the public officials called forth each individual by name acc. to a census (Mart. Pal. 4, 8). Eusebius mentions many deaths in Palestine in the two following years (Mart. Pal. 5-7). Between July 308 and November 309, another interval of persecution occurred during the meeting between Diocletian, Maximian and Galerius at Carnutum (November 308). From this period onward, however, pagan zeal began to wane. When, in November 309, the persecution restarted in Palestine, every item purchased or sold at the market had to be contaminated with libations and sprinklings of blood from the sacrifices (Mart. Pal. 9,2). The pagans themselves were skeptical about the effectiveness of this measure; Eusebius comments that they "considered it to be off the mark" (Mart. Pal. 9,3); nonetheless, during this time a famous victim suffered martyrdom (Mart. Pal. 11) in March 310, the presbyter *Pamphilus.

The same lack of pagan zeal awaited the attempts of Maximinian to restore the cult and the pagan temples. Even before Galerius fell ill in the spring of 311, it was clear that Christianity had become too strong to oppress with violent means.

Galerius's retraction (30 April 311) has rightly been considered the turning point in the fight between paganism and Christianity in the Roman Empire. Although written up in the conviction that everything "must be reordered acc. to the ancient laws and public order (disciplinam) of the Romans," it admitted that many Christians had refused to obey. Now the Christian God, deprived of worship, was angry; therefore, "let Christians exist once again (denuo Christiani sint) and reconstruct their churches" and let them "pray to their God for our well-being, for that of the state and themselves, so that in every place the state might be safe and that they themselves might live safely in their own homes" (text in Eus., HE 8,17,3-10). But all this was in vain because Galerius died a painful death six days later (5 May 311).

This edict put Christianity back into the same situation it had enjoyed before the beginning of the persecution: but this was not the end of the fight. There were now two divine entities responsible for the safety of the empire: the "immortal gods" and the "Christian God." For the first time in Roman history, a power different from that of the ancient ones was accepted as exerting influence, even if in a negative manner, over the empire's destiny.

Maximian, however, did not acknowledge the spirit of Galerius's edict. The Christians "could exist," but what would happen if their pagan neighbors objected? Petitions against the "atheists" were organized, thanks to the city curiae of *Nicomedia, *Tyre and Antioch (Eus., HE 9,9,4-5) and the senates of the provinces of Lycia and Caria (Diehl 1a and b). In 311, a last atrocious wave of persecution shook Egypt and cost the life of Peter of Alexandria (d. 25 November 311) and the lives of innumerable Coptic Christians in *Thebaid (Eus., HE 9,9,4-5). This time, the Christians knew that death signified victory; they never forgot this lesson. Diocletian's rise to power began the "age of the martyrs," which marked the starting point for the computus* of the Coptic Christians.

The last victim of the persecutions was *Lucian of Antioch, who was martyred at Nicomedia on 7 January 312. On 28 October of that year, *Constantine defeated *Maxentius at the Milvian bridge, and in 313 he met *Licinius at *Milan: this marked the solemn end for the age of the persecutions (*Edict of Milan).

Why, for two and a half centuries, were Christians the objects of suspicion, attack and official suppression? It is impossible to provide just one answer. Much ink has been spilled, esp. at the beginning of the 20th c., in attempts to define the nature of the charges leveled against the Christians. It is more likely the case that the persecutions were the result of numerous political, social and legal factors, with different emphases over time. In the first place, there was the conviction, deeply rooted in the governing class of Rome, that the salvation of the empire depended on one's recognition of the gods. In no way could one tolerate an attack on their primacy. In AD 64, the Christians were accused, wrongly or with reason, of having insulted this belief and, as Tacitus showed, they were not forgiven for this; as a result, their religion could never become a religio licita. Second, to the 2nd-c. inhabitants of the provinces, the ties between Jews and Christians could appear stronger than they really were, and the Christians gradually began to inherit the unpopularity already experienced by the Jews in the Greek cities of the E Mediterranean world. Third, their apparent secrecy and closed organization made them the objects of fear and common resentment. Celsus's twofold rebuke of "illegal organization" and "apostate Judaism" summarizes this attitude. They deserve suppression as a latebrosa et lucifuga natio (Caecilius's opinion is recorded in Minucius Felix, Octavius 8,4). The authorities agreed. In the 3rd c., to these various accusations was added that of directly fighting against the gods and therefore the political stability of the empire. This was the background of the persecutions from those of Decius to those of Diocletian. It took the genius of Constantine to understand that one could accept the victory of the Christian God without causing a political disaster. The organization of the church and the conviction of a personal salvation suggested that the pagan world had fallen and that its defeat could be placed at the service of a new Christian empire.

Acta martyrum: R. Knopf - G. Kruger, Ausgewählte Märtyrerakten, 4. Auf., with an appendix by G. Ruhbach, Tübingen 1965; H. Musurillo, The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, texts with Eng. tr. (Oxford Early Christian Texts), Oxford 1972; G. Lanata, Gli Atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973.

Studies: until 1963, see bibl. in W.H.C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford 1965, 572-604; M. Sordi, Il cristianesimo e Roma, Bologna 1965; G.E.M. de Ste. Croix, Why Were the Early Christians Persecuted: Past and Present 26 (1963) 6-38; C. Delvoye, Les Persécutions contre les chrétiens dans l'Empire romain, Brussels 1967; R. Freudenberger, Christenreskript. Ein umstrittenes Reskript des Antoninus Pius: ZKG 78 (1967) 1-14; Id., Das Verhalten der römischen Behörden gegen die Christen in 2. Jahrhundert, Munich 1967; T.D. Barnes, Legislation Against the Christians: JRS 58 (1968) 32-50; Id., Pre-Decian Acta Martyrum: JTS 19 (1968) 509-531; E. Bickermann, Trajan, Hadrian and the Christians: RFIC 96 (1968) 290-315; P. Keresztes, Marcus Aurelius a Persecutor?: HTR 61 (1968) 321-341; G. Clarke, Some Observations on the Persecution of Decius: Antichton 3 (1969) 63-76; J. Molthagen, Der römische Staat and und die Christen im zweiten und dritten Jahrhundert, Göttingen 1970; A. Wlosok, Rom und die Christen, Stuttgart 1970; Id., Die Rechtsgrundlagen der Christenverfolgungen der ersten zwei Jahrhunderte, in R. Klein (ed.), Das frühe Christentum im römischen Staat, Darmstadt 1971, 275-301; G. Clarke, Two Measures in the Persecution of Decius: BICS 20 (1973) 118-124; W.H.C. Frend, Open Questions Concerning the Christians and the Roman Empire in the Age of the Severi: JTS 25 (1974) 333-351; P. Keresztes, The Peace of Gallienus: WS 9 (1975) 174-185; L.F. Jannsen, "Superstitio" and the Persecution of the Christians: VChr 33 (1979) 131-159; B.W. Workman, Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford [2]1980; W.H.C. Frend, Martyrdom and Political Oppression, in The Early Christian World, II, ed. P.F. Esler, London 2000, 815-839.

W.H.C. Frend

PERSIA

I. Origins - II. 2nd-4th c. - III. 5th-7th c. - IV. After the 7th c..

The Persian territory, which extended from *Mesopotamia to the borders of India and from *Armenia to *Arabia, was a fief of the Arsacid (Parthian) and *Sassanid (224–632) empires and then of the caliphates of *Damascus (637–750) and Baghdad. Persia was the birthplace of an Aramean Christian church. The territory was very active from its origins. Because it developed on the margins of the Roman Empire, in an area that was subject to religious syncretism in every period, following the Byzantine Empire it preserved important aspects of the Eastern ecclesiastical tradition.

I. Origins. With regard to origins our understanding of Persia has greatly advanced in recent years. Thanks to the discoveries and research done in the field of *gnosticism (*Nag Hammadi, *Manicheism), heterodox *Judaism (Qumran) and in particular *Jewish Christianity (*Elkesaites), one can say that Persia, even before *Osroene, was the first bulwark of Aramean-Syriac Christianity. The important Jewish communities, which resided in Mesopotamia for a long time, and above all those of "Palestinian obedience"—beginning with the small realm of *Adiabene, in which Judaism was the religion of the state from AD 36—account for the immediate success in the evangelization that reached the periphery of Ctesiphon already between 76 and 116 (Ancient tradition pertaining to Mari is preserved in Arabic in the Book of the Tower. The apocryphal literature relating to Judas *Thomas, *Addai, Mari and Aggai is rather late in its attempts to make everything depend on *Edessa, from which it comes). The characteristics of early Persian Christianity (which can be reconstructed with the help of *Aphraates, the Persian sage, and *Ephrem of *Nisibis)—asceticism, *encratism, Targumic and Midrashic traditions, liturgy (eucharistic blessings, music and architecture), a theological school—point to a Jewish Christianity that was often tainted by an underlying sectarian Judaism, as in the case of the Odes of Solomon, the Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas, the *pseudo-Clementines and the Manichean Psalter, etc. (The question of the evangelization of India since apostolic times, although not guaranteed by any scientific proof, is historically admissible because of its commercial relations with the Roman Empire: see ANRW 9,2 [1978] (s.v. Mesopotamia.)

II. 2nd-4th c. Evidence for the period immediately following the beginnings of the evangelization is still rare. The stele of *Abercius (see RAC I, 12-17) speaks of the Christianity lying beyond the Euphrates around 150, and the Book of the Laws of the Countries, attributed to a disciple of *Bardesanes, briefly describes the life of the communities of "Parthia, Media and Hatra" around 200–220. Nevertheless, it is clear that Christianity had developed in the 3rd and 4th c. in the Persian Empire, as one can conclude from the following phenomena: (a) the disappearance of *heresies like *Marcionism and esp. Manicheism; (b) the reception of Christian exiles and prisoners deported during the successful campaigns in the West (as far as *Cilicia) by the first

*Sassanids; (c) the existence of the first *martyrs; (d) reverberations of quarrels over the See of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon starting from 310 (see *Papa bar Aggai); (e) establishment of a theological school at Nisibis. The Sassanid court led by a policy of tolerance, in contrast to their enemies the Romans, who were expelled during the reign of *Gallienus (260–268). It was during the "small peace" that the party of the Magi, at the urging of its powerful leader Kartîr, put heavy pressure so that the shahanshah Bahram II (276–293) launched the first persecution against foreign religions (during which time, among other things, *Mani was put to death), and it was precisely after peace was established that, under *Constantius II, *Shapur II (309–379) carried out the "Great Massacre" (344–345) against those who by that time must have been considered "allies of the Caesars." On the other hand, in their internal policy, the kings of Persia always had to make treaties with the very influential national religion, Zoroastrianism, but also with the Jewish and Manichean communities and at times with those "Greek" Christians, who were useful for developing their economy.

III. 5th-7th c. Starting from *Yazdegerd I (399–420) until the advent of Islam, Persian Christianity benefited from the protection afforded by the shahs. According to their political policy, they knew how to make use of Christians at times, even as ambassadors to *Byzantium, and to favor them over the party of the Magi, and at other times to take advantage of their internal disagreements or to exert much pressure on them. Nonetheless, this period was characterized by a reorganization of martyr Christianity and its consolidation with the help of the West. The following events provide specific evidence for this: the exponential growth of *monasticism, the polemical disputes with *Messalianism and *Origenism (see Henana of Adiabene, d. 610), the theological work (translation of the Greek Fathers, establishment of the school at Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 541 by Mar *Aba), but also the divisions, and all this under the direction of the chief leaders, a good number of which were doctors at the Sassanid court. The first among them, *Maruta of Maiferqat, brought about the recognition of the faith and the ecclesiastical discipline of the Council of *Nicaea in the Synod of 410. This synod, moreover, attested the expansion of the Persian church over this period (from the islands of the Persian Gulf to the borders of Armenia and from Persis [Fars] to the region of Nisibis). The expulsion of the Persians from Edessa, the establishment of a new school at Nisibis by *Narsai (d. around 502), and the strong personality of *Barsauma (d. 491–496) were the primary causes for the adoption of *Nestorianism by the Persian church (486). The young Nestorian church, however, was not organized early enough and in a manner capable of opposing the infiltration of the *monophysites. The latter group, taking advantage of the Byzantine conquest over the N part of the country, was able to install its own hierarchy at Takrit until the year 629.

IV. After the 7th c. The tolerance of the Umayyads (637–750) and above all of the Abbasids (750–1258) (the patriarchal see was transferred to Baghdad, which had become the new capital) favored the *Jacobite and Nestorian Christian churches. Although they began to separate themselves from the imperial church, the Nestorian churches dedicated themselves in a peculiar way to new missions, esp. in China, and to transmit their own Aramean and Greek heritage to the new Muslim culture.

Sources: In addition to the secular Roman, Byzantine, Persian and Arabic sources, to reconstruct the history of the Persian church it is necessary, first and foremost, to consult the ecclesiastical, and more specifically Syriac, sources (a list of which is found in the work of Ortiz de Urbina 206-212 and esp. in J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310/subs. 36, Louvain 1970, 8-31) and, preferably, the Chronicle of Seert (in Arabic), Synodicon orientale (ed. Chabot), as well as Bedjan and various authors, beginning from Aphraates and Ephrem (see Ortiz de Urbina 115-153).

Studies: J. Labourt, Le Christianisme dans l'empire perse sous la dynastie sassanide (224–632), Paris 1904; E. Tisserant, Nestorienne (Église): DTC 11, 157ff.; S.P. Brock, A Classified Bibliography: ad loc.; ANRW II, 8 and 9; J. Neusner, History of the Jews in Babylonia, Leiden 1965–1970; R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, Cambridge 1975, esp. 1-38; J. Ries, Mani et le Manichéisme: DSp 10, 198-216; F. Decret, Les conséquences sur le christianisme en Perse de l'affrontement des empires romain et sassanide de Shâpûr Ier à Yazdgard Ier: RecAug 14 (1979) 91-152; G. Wiessner, Zur Märtyrerüberlieferung aus der Christenverfolgung Schapurs II, AKW Göttingen, Phil.-hist. Kl. 3, Folge 67, Göttingen 1967; J.-M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, 3 vols., Beyrouth 1965–1968; Id., Nisibe, CSCO 388 (sub. 54) Louvain 1977; Id., Chrétiens syriaques sous les abassides, CSCO 420/subs. 59, Louvain 1980; M.-L. Chaumont, La christianisation de l'empire iranien des origines aux grandes persécutions du IVe siècle, CSCO 449, Louvain 1988; R. Gyselen, La géographie administrative de l'empire sassanide. Les témoignages sigillographiques, Paris 1989; La tradition syriaque, Colloque Pro Oriente, Vienne, juin 1994: Istina 40 (1995) 1-160; J. Rist, Die Verfolgung der Christen im spätantiken Sasanidenreich. Ursachen, Verlauf und Folgen: Oriens Christianus 80 (1996) 17-42; G. Greatrex, Rome and Persia at War (502–532), Leeds 1998; B. Isaac, The Eastern Frontier, in The Cambridge Ancient History, XIII. The Late Empire, ed. A. Cameron - P. Garnsey, Cambridge 1998, 437-460. Bettiolo (esp. in Patrologia V, 427-430) reopens the discussion on origins and Drijwers's theses, in opposition to a position that regards the early Syriac-speaking church as Jewish Christian.

F. Rilliet

PERSONA - PERSON. In addition to the classical meanings of the term persona (role, person and individuality), Latin theology from the very beginning knew of a technical meaning. The refutation of the *monarchians provided *Tertullian the opportunity to develop the trinitarian use of the term and even to suggest a christological meaning (Prax.). Borrowing from secular exegesis that distinguished persona grammatically and aesthetically (dignity or personal character), and under the influence of the legal tradition, he applied a realist meaning to the term (persona = res). In the 4th c., the anti-*Arian authors clarified the trinitarian meaning of the term, excluding the purely functional meaning that the Greek equivalent πρόσωπον (prosopon) seemed to suggest (see *Hilary). *Augustine, although having some reservations about the trinitarian use of the term persona (Trin. VII, 4, 7-6, 11), introduced it with a positive sense into *Christology (from 400: unitas personae]; from 411: una persona). As its parallel use in ecclesiology demonstrates (ecclesia quasi una persona), the exegetical associations remained strong even in Augustine's writings. But applying the expression una persona to the person composed of *body and *soul, Augustine also shows to what extent for him persona not only signified the logical subject of attribution, but also the ontological principle of the one Christ (not yet, however, explicitly in the sense of a *hypostatic union). Under the influence of the philosophical and christological discussions of the 6th c., *Boethius finally offered the definition of persona as a naturae rationalis individua substantia (De duab. naturis 3), a foundational definition for scholastic theology and the beginning of modern personalism.

M. Nédoncelle, Prosopon et persona dans l'antiquité classique: RSR 22 (1948) 277-299; T. van Bavel, Recherches sur la christologie de s. Augustin, Fribourg 1954; C. Andresen, Zur Entstehung und Geschichte des trinitarischen Personbegriffs: ZNTW 52 (1961) 1-39; J. Moingt, Théologie trinitaire de Tertullien, II, Paris 1966; S. Otto, Person und Subsistenz, Munich 1968; A. Milan, Persona in Teologia, Naples 1984; B. Studer, Una persona in Christo: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 453-487; H. Drobner, Person-Exegese und Christologie bei Augustinus, Leiden 1986; B.J. Hilberath, Der Personbegriff der Trinitätstheologie in Rückfrage von Karl Rahner zu Tertullians "Adversus Praxean," Innsbruck 1986; M. Fuhrmann, Person, 4: HWP 7 (1989) 274-282 (bibl.); G. Greshake, Person, II: LTK³ 8, 46-50, esp. 46.

B. Studer

PERSONIFICATIONS 1. Personifications of concepts. The most ancient personifications of figurative Christian art may be the figures of the so-called *orans and the Good Shepherd, esp. if viewed alone, inasmuch as their symbolic expressions convey pietas and philanthropia (Klauser, Sudien, II, 397 and III, 112) . It is thought that a woman holding a palm branch on a *mosaic carpet of the S hall of the Theodorian estate in *Aquileia (4th c.) alludes to the victoria eucharistica (Mian, La "vittoria," 131ff.).

2. Personifications of the church. Personifications of the church appear on the front of a *sarcophagus preserved at Perugia (late 4th c.)—facing St. *Peter and standing in place of St. *Paul, a matron is depicted alongside Christ (Ws, pl. 28,3)—and in the mosaics that adorn the basilicas of St. Pudentiana (WMM III, 42-44) and of St. *Sabina (5th. c.), where two female figures are defined by the subtitles ecclesia ex gentibus and ecclesia ex circumcisione (ibid. III, 47, 1 and 2). Also at St. Sabina, one of the panels on the wooden doors, dated approximately to the aforementioned mosaic, the church—if it is not *Mary, as has also been suggested—is represented in the form of a woman who is standing between the two princes of the apostles and in a scene of triumph (Jeremias, Die Holztür, pl. 68).

3. Personifications of physical elements. Similarly, in ancient Christian art, personifications of the common repertoire persist such as those of the seasons, months, sky—motifs constantly repeated in pictures and sarcophagi, without, however, acquiring new or renewed significant meanings. In the floor mosaic of the martyrial basilica of Gasr Elbia (ancient Olbia), in Cyrenaica (6th c.), a series of panels likewise includes personifications, among which are that of the lighthouse of Alexandria (Guarducci, Epigrafia, IV, fig. 148) and the four rivers of *paradise (ibid., figs. 144, 145). In this respect, it does not seem that a figure painted in the *cemetery of the Jordani personifies the Tigris River (Wp 212), although more certain is the identification of the Jordan in the figures represented in the context of the scenes of Christ's *baptism, as occurs in the mosaic decorations of the baptistery of the orthodox (Bovini, Mosaici, pl. 2) and in those of the *Arians (ibid., pl. 19) at *Ravenna. Likewise, mountains, rivers, cities and geographic locations are personified in the miniaturist codices and in the itineraria picta, as on the Joshua Scroll, the Chronography of 354* and in the Tabula peutingeriana.

4. Personifications of the moon and the sun. The personifications of the moon and the sun, in bust or in entire figure, already on the front of the so-called sarcophagus of *Jonah (late 3rd c.: Ws 9, 3), on the covers of sarcophagi from the Constantinian age (Ws II, p. 300) and the scenes of the two dreams of *Joseph depicted on the hypogeum of the Via D. Compagni (4th c.: Ferrua, fig. 51), are intended to indicate the heavenly ceiling vault, alluding perhaps to the afterlife or, more simply, to the course of human life. The symbolic component appears more explicit in the ivories of the 5th and 6th c., where the sun and the moon are personified, in the context of the scene of Christ's crucifixion to signify the end of his earthly life and to foretell the *resurrection, and of his baptism, to indicate the beginning of his human journey (Testini, Arte mitraica, 443-452). Added to this phenomenon of personification is that of the symbolic assimilation in the representation of Christ-Helios, as in the mosaic that adorns the vault of the mausoleum of the Julii in the *Vatican Acropolis (Sear, Roman Wall, pl. 53, 2-3).

5. Zoomorphic substitutions. The last manifestation of the process of personification is signaled by a secondary phenomenon to personification itself: the substitution of animals for human figures. On the front of the so-called Celerina arcosolium at Pretestato, the episode of *Susanna harassed by the elders is portrayed with a lamb threatened by two wolves, which are identifiable by the captions: Susanna and senioris (Dagens, Autour du pape Libère, 327ff.). In the cubicle of the lion (4th c.) at Commodilla, in place of Christ is depicted a lamb multiplying bread (Ferrua, Scoperta, 35), the Agnus Dei between two lambs (Peter and Paul: ibid., 37), a dove with a monogrammatic *cross accompanied by the Greek letters alpha and omega (ibid., 36), a haloed dove on a mountain (ibid., 10), with twelve other doves facing it (the apostles—ibid., 11). Likewise alluding to the apostles are the twelve doves that appear around a threefold *monogram decorating the ceiling of the baptistery of Albenga (Sciaretta, Il battistero, fig. 10).

LCI 3, 394-407; H. Stern, Le calendrier de 354, Paris 1953; G. Bovini, Mosaici di Ravenna, Milan 1957; A. Ferrua, Scoperta di una nuova regione della catacomba di Commodilla: RivAC 34 (1958) 10ff.; Id., Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960; Th. Klauser, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der christlichen Kunst: JbAC 2 (1959) 115-145 and 3 (1960) 112-133; F. Darsy, Santa Sabina, Rome 1961, 81; M.C. Dagens, Autour du pape Libère. L'iconographie de Suzanne et des martyrs romains sur l'arcosolium de Celerina: MEFR 78 (1966) 327–381; F. Mian, La "vittoria" di Aquileia: AAAd 8 (1975) 131-153; R. Farioli, Ravenna romana e bizantina, Ravenna 1977; V. Sciarretta, Il battistero di Albenga, Ravenna 1977; F.B. Sear, Roman Wall and Vault Mosaics, Heidelberg 1977, 127-128; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, IV, Rome 1978, 476-481; P. Testini, Arte mitraica ed arte cristiana. Mysteria Mithrae, Rome 1979, 443-452; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980; C. Murray, Rebirth and Afterlife, Oxford 1981, 77-84; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute: una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la Via Latina, Florence 1990 (Eng. tr.: The Unknown Catacomb: A Unique Discovery of Early Christian Art, New Lanark 1991).

F. Bisconti

PESHITTA. Probably between the end of the 1st and the beginning of the 3rd c., the first Syriac translation from the Hebrew OT was made, which from the 9th c. onward was called pšiṭṭā, i.e., "simple" and "common," to distinguish it from the version called "Greek," i.e., the translation from the *Hexapla of the LXX, made by Paul of Tella and completed around the year 615–617. The Peshitta was not a monolithic translation, because some of its parts (such as the Pentateuch, Chronicles and the book of Proverbs) seem to have had close contact with the Targumic traditions. The text of the Peshitta already appears to have been stable in the NT citations of the OT as found in the Diatessaron and the Vetus Syra, the first "separate" translation of the gospels, which both date back to the 2nd half of the 2nd c. The Peshitta seems to have come from *Edessa, because it uses the writing and language proper to the territory of Edessa. There are many views with respect to the environments that produced the Peshitta of the OT. Recent study of the Diatessaron has strengthened the hypothesis of a pre-Christian formation, esp. for the most ancient books such as the Pentateuch, although the more recently translated books such as the book of Proverbs or the Psalms testify instead to a greater proximity to Christian thought.

The Peshitta of the gospels is more recent; not until the beginning of the 5th c. was the gospel text used in the Syriac-speaking churches added to that of the Diatessaron. A first Syriac version of what came to be called "the separate gospels" (evangelion damepharreše) is attested by two ancient MSS (the Syro-Sinaiticus and the Curetonian, respectively, from the 4th and 5th c.) and was called the Vetus Syra. This ancient version served as the basis for establishing the Peshitta's text, although it in turn was based at least in part on the Diatessaron. The gospel text of the Peshitta, having become the sole authorized text in Syro-Western settings starting from the first decades of the 5th c. was then subjected to radical modifications before the beginning of the 6th c. by the *chorbishop Polycarp, who, commissioned by *Philoxenus of Mabbug, made a new Syriac translation of the Greek text of the gospels (the Philoxenia), and then, in 616, by Thomas of Ḥarquel, who undertook a translation from the Greek text of the entire NT (the Harqulensis).

Peshitta Institute, The Old Testament in Syriac According to the Peshitta Version, Leiden, since 1972; W. Cureton, Remains of a Very Ancient Recension of the Four Gospels in Syrian, Hitherto Unknown in Europe, London 1858; A.S. Lewis, The Old Syriac Gospels or Evangelion Damepharreshe; Being the Text of the Sinai or Syro-Antiochene Palimpsest, London 1910; E. Pusey -

G.H. Gwilliam, Tetraeuangelium Sanctum juxta simplicem Syrorum versionem, Oxford 1901 (text used in the current editions of the Syriac NT); University of Munich, Das neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung, 1986 (critical ed. of the Syriac NT); G.M. Lamsa, Holy Bible from the Ancient Eastern Text, San Francisco 1985 (Eng. tr.). Studies: S. Brock, Syriac Studies. A Classified Bibliography (1960–1990), Kaslik 1996, 43-52 and 54-61; J.P. Lyon, Syriac Gospel Translations. A Comparison of the Language and Translation Method Used in the Old Syriac, the Diatessaron and the Peshitta, Louvain 1994; G. Lenzi, L'antica versione siriaca dei Vangeli dopo centocinquant'anni di ricerca: Annali di scienze religiose 3 (1998) 263-278; M. Weitzman, The Syriac Version of the Old Testament. An Introduction, Cambridge 1999.

K. Den Biesen

PETER, apostle

I. The ancient evidence - II. Legends of Peter - III. The veneration of Peter at Rome - IV. The veneration of Peter in the ancient world - V. Iconography.

The cult of the *apostle Peter rests on presuppositions whose veracity must first be verified: his trip to *Rome, his death and burial at the *Vatican. A critical examination of such presuppositions prepares the way for a discussion of the various forms the cult of the apostle acquired over time.

I. The ancient evidence. From the chronological point of view, it is necessary to identify the first witnesses who referred to Peter: *Clement of Rome, 1 Cor. 5-6: ca. 95–96; *Tacitus, Ann. 15,44: between 98 and 117; Jn 21:18: before 100; The Ascension of Isaiah 4,25,8: between 100 and 125; *Ignatius of Antioch, Rom. 4,3: dated to 24 August 107; Suetonius, Life of Claudius, 25,4: ca. 120; *Dionysius of Corinth (*Eus., HE 2,25,8): ca. 166–174; the Roman priest Gaius (*Eus., HE 2,25,6-7): between 199 and 217. I have deliberately left out *Papias of Hierapolis because his testimony is ambiguous and thus subject to debate. All the other sources, however, permit one to reach the following conclusions: (1) In his epistle to the Romans, *Paul makes no mention of Peter's stay at Rome, which means that at that time Peter was not yet there. None of the other texts oblige us to deny or to affirm that this trip occurred. (2) With regard to Peter's *martyrdom, there exists an entire tradition dating to the end of the 1st c., attested by *John the Evangelist, Clement of Rome, the Ascension of Isaiah and Dionysius of Corinth. (3) One must make several distinctions on the circumstances of the martyrdom. The establishment of Rome as the place in which the martyrdom occurred becomes evident from the statements of Clement of Rome and The Ascension of Isaiah; as to the period, the age of *Nero. Moreover, Clement of Rome and Tacitus agree that there were a large number of Christian victims, and at first they seem to refer to the same event. John the evangelist indicated the mode of the martyrdom, namely, crucifixion. (4) Only one text—the testimony of Gaius—the last on our list of authors—specified the burial place. The interesting thing about this last text lies in its correspondence to a monument from that period. This monument was found in the *Vatican necropolis placed on a red wall. The monument commemorated the place in which the body of Peter was laid. From time to time, the faithful gathered here to perform the traditional commemorative rights in his honor. These rites explain how people outside Rome were able to preserve the memory of Peter's burial place.

II. Legends of Peter. Starting from about the year 100 there appeared some texts, anonymous or with suspect names, that attempted to complete the *canonical writings through an account of the teaching, actions and deeds of the apostle. (1) The Doctrine of Peter (early 2nd c.) and (2) The Kerygma of Peter (2nd c.) are two texts limited to the preaching of the apostle in the *East and mention no tie to Rome. (3) The Acts of Peter is a primitive form known only through fragments and uncertain citations that lead one to think that the text dates back to ca. 200. The first part refers to the Acts of Peter at *Jerusalem and contains two episodes with the apostle's daughter and the gardener. In the second, one finds Peter's fight with *Simon Magus, and the crucifixion of Peter upside down. This early recension was used in the writings of ps.-Clement from the beginning of the 3rd c.; the definitive form is contained in the Latin Acts of Vercelli (4th c). This last redaction originated in Rome and offers several points of comparison with the city's topography and iconography. It contains the Quo vadis?*, but neither the place of martyrdom nor burial is specified. (4) The so-called Passion of ps.-Linus (BHL 6655) is a 4th-c. document that borrows from the preceding text, namely the Quo vadis? but adds the imprisonment of Peter at the Mamertine prison, the episode of the titulus Fasciolae and situates the apostle's death "in the naumachia near Nero's obelisk on the hill." It is also based on a 2nd-3rd-c. Vatican tradition, but with a very unrealistic perception of things and does not speak at all of Peter's tomb. (5) The Acts of Peter and Paul by ps.-Marcellus (BHL 6657, chs. 22-88), dated ca. 400, establish a further development of the legend likewise on the basis of preceding traditions. New elements were established by Pontius *Pilate's letter to *Claudius: the identification of the place where Simon Magus flew, the imprint left by the knees of the apostles in prayer alongside the Via Sacra (iuxta templum Romae), the burial place of Peter "under the terebinth near the Vatican naumachia." (6) The Passion of Peter and Paul by ps.-Hegesippus and ps.-Ambrose (BHL 6648) compiled around the year 580 provides no new elements. On the basis of the Latin Chronology of 553 his martyrdom was dated to 29 June 57. (7) The Martyrdom of Peter by ps.-Abdias (BHL 6663) is another compilation made by using numerous preexisting elements such as ps.-Hegesippus. In conclusion, the legendary texts, through their ever more frequent and less trustworthy claims (from no. 3 on) concerning the topography of Rome and the Vatican, on the one hand reveal the continuity of a local tradition that connects to the monument mentioned by Gaius and the burial of Peter, and on the other, the ever more fanciful and inacurate rumors identify the circumstances of the apostle Peter's stay and martyrdom at Rome.

III. The veneration of Peter at Rome. In the Depositio martyrum* for 29 June, one reads: III kal. iul. Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostense Tusco et Basso cons. From this piece of information one concludes that starting from 258 the Roman cult of Peter was celebrated in the catacomb of St. Sebastian and that of Paul on the Via Ostia on 29 June. The graffiti on the walls of the triclia (*see memoria apostolorum) from the catacomb dating to the 2nd half of the 3rd c. associate Paul with the cult of Peter, and specify the nature of the cult: it was a celebration of the refrigeria in honor of the two apostles (*see cathedra Petri). Neither from the graffiti nor the Depositio can one conclude or find a basis for this cult offered to them at St. Sebastian. Two opposing theses on this matter have been offered that, with time, have been transformed into theories. Duchesne proposed that the bodies were transferred into the catacomb during the time of the *Valerian persecution. This hypothesis is in vogue again and has apparently found confirmation in the archaeological digs of the Vatican necropolis, although the ensuing scholarly discussion has shown that the transference of the relics of Peter to St. Sebastian remains only a hypothesis. The second hypothesis was put forward by H. Delehaye, who explained the creation of this location of the cult with the impossibility of celebrating the memory of Peter at the Vatican during the Valerian persecution (257–259). According to Delehaye, it was a transference of the cult, not of the relics. Because it became impossible to perform the refrigeria near the tomb, the rites were transferred to St. Sebastian near a cenotaph. This hypothesis has recently been reaffirmed by M. Guarducci.

Whatever the case may be, *Constantine built the great basilica of St. Peter not at St. Sebastian but at the Vatican, it seems, in 324; the reasons for his decision are obvious. Nonetheless, around 350, the basilica apostolorum was erected at St. Sebastian dedicated to the joint cult of the two apostles. The basilica on the Esquiline was specifically dedicated to the apostle Peter, where his chains had already been venerated since 431, the time in which *Sixtus III tried to unite Paul to the patronage of Peter, but with little success. The second family of MSS of the Mart. hier. specifically identified that basilica as the first church established and consecrated by Peter, but this novelty cannot date back to the Italian recension of the martyrology. Another one of Peter's churches from the ancient period is the chapel that indicated the place in which Peter and Paul prayed when Simon Magus came crashing down on the Via Sacra. Paul I (757–767) restored it.

In addition to these constructions, works of the emperors and popes, one can add the testimonies of private individuals preserved in the iconography of the catacombs, the sarcophagi, and the golden windows, medals and other objects of the so-called minor arts. Popular testimonies come primarily from Rome. The themes follow two fundamental testimonies: either Peter and Paul appear together with Christ (personified or symbolized), or without him, with or without the apostolic college, and with a similar attitude (both either seated or standing) or differentiated by their attributes or their relation to Christ (Peter alone receives from him the law or the keys). Or rather, Peter is represented alone in various moments of his life and those invented by popular legend (e.g., the scene with the rooster, the water gushing forth from the rock, in the act of reading or being led to execution).

Christians thus expressed a faith to which the liturgical formularies provided a more theological and, in a certain way, official expression. Even the formularies invoked Peter and Paul simultaneously so that when speaking of the "apostles" without further qualification, they always intend to refer to the two sole apostles of Rome: together they founded the church of Rome with their blood and continue to teach and rule it in the person of their successor, the pope; their united authority and their care extend to the universal church, for which they serve as the foundation, the leaders and the capstone. According to liturgical formularies, Paul was the apostle of the nations (in keeping with his advance of Christianity, the primitive meaning of gentes [*pagans] disappeared in favor of its universal meaning), Peter, as the shepherd of the flock. But the two titles also expressed each individual's different relationship to Christ: Paul remains "the last of the apostles," because he was last among them to be called to the faith; Peter "the first," because he was the first to confess it and because he received from Christ, along with the primacy, the responsibility of the universal pastor, which the popes inherited. Therefore, in the religious topography of the city and in *iconography, under the most varied forms, in the same liturgical *prayer there appears in every area this twofold fundamental tendency of Rome's veneration toward Peter: on the one hand he was Paul's inseparable companion, together with this symbology of the internal unity of the Roman church born ex circumcisione et gentibus, and on the other hand, he was the head of the apostolic college and, as a result, of the Roman Church and the church universal.

IV. The veneration of Peter in the ancient world. Among the Roman feasts, only that of 29 June achieved universal diffusion. In the Mart. syr., however, it was set for 28 December; in the Coptic *calendar of *Alexandria for 5 Epaphis (= 11 July). In these two cases, one should note that Peter was considered the coryphaeus or the leader of the apostles. The feast of 22 February (cathedra Petri*), however, was unknown in Africa (Cal. Carth.), and in *Gaul, it competed with 18 January. From this situation of competing feasts arose the compromise achieved through the Hieronymian and Gallican martyrology: 18 January, cathedra of St. Peter at Rome; 22 February, cathedra of St. Peter at *Antioch. One should also note that the calendar of *Perpetuus of Tours (d. 490) presents some ambiguities on the dating of this feast, and like the Hispanic calendars they always received that of 22 February.

The pilgrim movement solidified around these feasts: 29 January drew them from every region to Rome to venerate the tomb of the apostle; the Fathers testified to this: *Ambrose (Apostolorum passio), *Prudentius (Perist. 11,1-2, the entire 12th par.), *Paulinus of Nola (Ep. 17-18, 29, 35), *Gregory the Great (Hom. in Ev. 37,9). The circulation of ideas accompanied all this traveling of peoples. The Roman portrayal of Peter was reiterated by *Asterius of Amasea (PG 40, 264), *John Chrysostom (PG 60, 678-679; 62, 57) and *Maximus of Turin (CCL 23, 1-8, 30-33, 426-428). *Augustine was among those preachers who wrote most on St. Peter (Serm. 295-299, 381; PLS 2, 462ff., 598-608, 756-758); among the most significant was *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, who reiterated the pro-Petrine ideas of *Leo the Great (PG 83, 1311-1313).

It should not be surprising to find that the same pilgrims and others spread the apostle's relics and created churches after his name in their home countries. Usually they were representative relics or the links from his chains, as found in Africa from 359 at Kherbet-Oum-el-Ahdam, near *Sétif (Alg., CIL 8, 20600), in *Spain from the 4th to the 7th c. (J. Vives, Inscr. crist. 199, 316, 335, 374, 389, 513). Churches of the apostle existed in Gaul, *Tours, at the time of Perpetuus (d. 490), at *Vienne in the 5th c., at *Arles, during the time of *Caesarius (d. 543), S.-Pierre-de-Mouleyrès and S.-Pierre-de-Gallègue. At *Paris, the basilica of Sts. Peter and Paul received the remains of *Clovis (d. 511), *Clotilde (d. 545), St. *Geneviève (d. ca. 502), the last of which the church itself was eventually named after (the Abbey of St. Geneviève); at the end of the Merovingian era, there existed at Paris three other churches dedicated to the apostle: S.-Pierre d'Arcis, S.-Pierre-des-Boeufs and S.-Pierre-des-Bois. Even at Corbie a basilica of St. Peter arose, thanks to Clotilde, then *Chlothar I (d. 561). At Nantes a church of Sts. Peter and Paul existed in 567; at Rouen, the church of St. Peter took on the name of St. Ouen upon the death of this saint (d. 684). The missionaries sent by Gregory the Great to England spread the apostle's cult: the church of Sts. Peter and Paul in London was established by *Augustine of Canterbury (end of the 6th c.). After 653 St. Peter's of Bradwell on Sea was constructed, St. Peter of Wearmouth in 674. *Boniface, in turn, laid the roots of the apostle's cult in *Germany, but with him we come to the chronological limits set for our investigation.

BHG 1482-1501; BHL 6644-6688; BHO 933-954; W. Schneemelcher (ed.), Neutestamentliche Apokryphen 2, Tübingen [5]1989, 243-289; BBKL 7, 305-320; EPapi 1, 175-194; H. Lietzmann, Petrus und Paulus in Rom, Berlin-Leipzig [2]1927; Th. Klauser, Die römische Petrustradition im Lichte der neuen Ausgrabungen unter der Peterskirche, Köln-Opladen 1956; A. Rimoldi, L'apostolo san Pietro, Rome 1958; O. Cullmann, Petrus, Zürich-Stuttgart [2]1960; F. Susman, Il culto di S. Pietro a Roma dalla morte di Leone Magno a Vitaliano (461–672): Archivio della Società Romana di Storia Patria 84 (1961) 1-193; Saecularia Petri et Pauli, Vatican City 1969; P.L. Vannicelli - B. Mariani (ed.), Pietro e Paolo nel XIX centenario del martirio, Naples 1969; D. O'Connor, Peter in Rome. The Literary, Liturgical and Archaeological Evidence, New York 1969; E. Kirschbaum, Die Gräber der Apostelfürsten, Frankfurt 31974; U. Fasola, Pietro e Paolo a Roma, Rome 1980; Y. Duval, Loca Sanctorum Africae 2, Rome 1982, 633-645; M. Guarducci, Pietro in Vaticano, Rome 1983; J.E. Walsh, The Bones of St. Peter, New York 1987; C.P. Thiede (ed.), Das Petrusbild in der neueren Forschung, Wuppertal 1987; W. Jordan, Das Apostelgrab, der sakrale Grundstein der Vatikanischen Basilika, Trier 1990; J. Meyendorff (ed.), The Primacy of Peter, New York 1992; R.J. Bauckham, The Martyrdom of Peter in Early Christian Literature: ANRW 2, 26, 1, Berlin-New York 1992, 539-595; L. Wehr, Petrus und Paulus – Kontrahenten und Partner, Münster 1996; L. Hertling - E. Kirschbaum, Le catacombe romane e i loro martiri, Rome [5]1996, 83-111; E. Schurr, Die Ikonographie der Heiligen, Dettelbach 1997, 99-135; V. Saxer, Le culte des apôtres

Pierre et Paul à Rome: Les Cahiers de Saint-Michel de Cuixà 29 (1998) 15-27; H.G. Thümmel, Die Memorien für Petrus und Paulus in Rom, Berlin-New York 1999; Pietro e Paolo. Il loro rapporto con Roma nelle testimonianze antiche, XXIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 4-6 maggio 2000, Rome 2001; A. Donati (ed.), Pietro e Paolo. La storia, il culto, la memoria nei primi secoli, Milan 2000; J. Gnilka, Petrus und Rom. Das Petrusbild in den ersten zwei Jahrhunderten, Freiburg 2002; P. Fortini, Nuovi documenti sul Carcere Mamertino (Carcer-Tullianum) quale luogo di culto cristiano: Ecclesiae Urbis 1, Vatican City 2002, 503-532; S.J. Voicu, Feste di apostoli alla fine di dicembre: Studi sull'oriente cristiano 8 (2004) 47-77.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

V. Iconography. Peter was certainly the most represented individual in early Christian iconography, a fact that perfectly corresponds to the numerous times the apostle is mentioned in the gospels. Beyond the pertinent statistics, though useful, documenting the number of times the apostle Peter appears displayed on monuments (figures thoroughly tallied by E. Josi), thanks to recent studies one can say that a fixing of the physical features of the apostle in the figurative arts did not appear before the mid-4th c.

Previously, Peter was only depicted in a few scenes. Among the most ancient examples in which one can certainly identify the apostle, one must mention the baptistery of *Dura Europos (256): here, in the episode of Peter's being rescued from drowning, a symbolic value connected to the hope of salvation clearly appears. With a gradual spread of the scenes portraying Christ among the apostles, Peter certainly had to possess a role of primary importance, not yet clearly delineated by precise physical traits: at the end of the 3rd c. the composition developed almost in antithesis to the image of the emperor surrounded by the apparitores, a theme that would be largely taken up later.

The physical characteristics that would come to distinguish his person (curly hair, short beard, wide forehead) took shape in the period immediately following, between the religious peace (313) and the entire 1st half of the 4th c., alongside the birth and development of numerous other new scenes that entered into the definitive repertoire of Christian compositions.

This repertoire created the so-called Petrine cycle with episodes relating to the life and works of the apostle: a portrayal is thus given of the moment of his denial (the scene that occurs at least 70 times on decorated monuments), where Peter generally occupies a central place in the scene alongside the rooster, the interpretive key of the episode; likewise, one can often observe Peter tied between the two soldiers who arrested him; the miracle of the fountain also reappears, an episode derived from apocryphal texts, where the apostle is likened to *Moses, confirming what Augustine wrote more or less during the same period in which the scene developed (Serm. 351, 4: [Moses] figura fuit Petri). It is precisely these three moments from Peter's life that are often represented together as if they constituted part of one trilogy. A fourth episode developed over the course of the 4th c.: Peter in the act of catechizing his two prison guards Processus and Martinianus (see Bisconti). Once his facial characteristics had been defined, he was often associated with Paul. Both are represented alongside Christ in *sculpture, *painting and *mosaic (see also Traditio legis et clavium*): Christ, in addition to being a magister, is now also an imperator and is joined together with his court, both symbolically opposed to the imperatores and earthly courts.

Scenes of this type signal the stages of the evolution in Christian representations of the 4th c., the period in which they became the vehicle of ideological opposition to the power established by determined social categories. From the representation of the apostle without a precise iconography in scenes without the message of hope in salvation, one then arrives at an iconographic definition of Peter inserted into a heavily symbolic context where, alongside the early gospel message, ideas are present that are taken from the ideologies of that historical period.

Though not lacking many examples of pictorial or mosaic representations, a good number of the monuments through which it is possible to identify the Petrine cycle are established by the sarcophagus figures (an element that per se reveals a certain client). Peter, his acts, miracles or, more simply, his figure associated to Paul's, is fully attested on the monuments of the so-called minor arts: one merely has to think about the enormous production of engraved or golden glass, upon which the heroes of classical *mythology formerly appeared, now clearly replaced by new heroes of an ideology of the ruling class that creates fashion. Peter and the miracle of the fountain are on a glass cup from Podgoritza: Peter and Paul together wish health to the users of the golden glasses or cups.

DACL 14, 822-891 (esp. 935ff.); EC 9, 1417-1420; EAA 6, 162-167; LCI 8, 158-174; C. Cecchelli, Iconografia dei Papi, I, S. Pietro, Rome 1937; G. Ladner, I ritratti dei Papi nell'antichità e nel medioevo, Vatican City 1941; A. Grabar, Le portrait en iconographie paléochrétienne: RSR 36 (1962) 87-109; M. Sotomayor, S. Pedro en la iconografía paleocristiana, Granada 1962; P. Testini, Gli apostoli Pietro e Paolo nella più antica iconografia cristiana, in Studi Petriani, Rome 1968, 105-130. On the sarcophagi: G. Wilpert, I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, Rome 1929–1936; F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage, I, Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967. For images in the Roman catacombs: A. Nestori, Repertorio topografico delle pitture delle catacombe romane (Roma Sotterranea Cristiana, V), Vatican City 1975; J.M. Huskinson, Concordia Apostolorum. Christian Propaganda at Rome in Fourth and Fifth Centuries. A Study in Early Christian Iconography and Iconology, London 1982; R. Giordani, Spigolature su un frammento di rilievo funerario a carattere cristiano di Roma: RivAC 62 (1985) 279-297; F. Bisconti, Altre note di iconografia paradisiaca: Bessarione 9 (1992) 89-117; TIP 258-259.

U. Broccoli

PETER APSELAMOS or BALSAMOS (d. 309). Native of the village of Anea on the borders of Eleutheropolis (Beit-Guvrin/Bet Gubrin) in Judea acc. to *Eusebius (Mart. Pal. 10,2). Despite his youth, he refused to sacrifice to the gods, and thus was burned alongside the *Marcionite Bishop Asclepius. A Latin Passio, which reproduces the now-lost original Greek text, attributes to him the nickname "Balsamos" and affirms that he died in likeness to Christ, crucified at Aulona (Samaria). In reality, he died at *Caesarea in *Palestine on 11 January 309, a date recorded by the Armenian Lectionary. The Mart. hier. records his feast day for the same day but with much confusion over the details.

BHL 6702; BS 10, 791-792; M. Simonetti, Nuovi studi agiografici: RivAC 31 (1955) 244-252.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PETER CHRYSOLOGUS (ca. 380–450). The life of Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna, remains very obscure. From the 9th c. onward, he acquired the name "Chrysologus." The testimonies of the Liber pontificalis, a 9th-c. biography and certain writings attributed to him indicate that he was born at Imola around 380. Between 425 and 429, or at least before 431, he became the metropolitan of Ravenna. In 445 he was present at the death of St. *Germanus of Auxerre. Three or four years later, he wrote to *Eutychius, presbyter of *Constantinople, who appealed to him after his condemnation by *Flavian. He warned him to submit to the decisions of *Leo, bishop of *Rome and successor of *Peter. He died between 449 and 458 (the date of one of Leo's letter to his successor, Neones), probably 3 December 450, perhaps at Imola. The following are now considered to be Chrysologus's authentic works: a letter, 168 sermons of the Collectio Feliciana (8th c.) and another 15 sermons. Other writings, such as the famous Scroll of Ravenna and a collection of prayers (7th c.), cannot be considered authentic. The sermons for which Peter Chrysologus became famous are well known for the careful preparation of a well-prepared orator, their human sentiment and the divine fervor of a holy man. Through their examples, they also reflect the situation during that time at Ravenna, the imperial residence, an important port and agricultural center. As to the content, they are mostly homilies on passages from the gospels, but also on the Pauline letters, *Psalms, the baptismal *creed, *Lord's Prayer or on the saints. He also delivered sermons that exhorted the people to repentance. Commenting upon the *Bible and taking cues from the themes of liturgical celebrations, Chrysologus became an authoritative witness to the theological concerns of his time: the Latin teaching on the *incarnation, Catholic theological positions concerning *grace and the Christian life, and even the recognition of the primacy of the bishop of Rome. Above all, his vast work as a preacher has left us an invaluable amount of documentation on the *liturgy of Ravenna and the culture of that city, situated between Rome and N *Italy. No other bishop from this period allows us to create a more complete picture for the course of the liturgical year. Opposing the resistance of a dying *paganism and arguing against the Jews of his city, Peter Chrysologus also represents the pastoral attitude of the episcopate of the imperial church from that time. It remains a mystery why many of his sermons have been transmitted under the name of Bishop Severian/Severinus.

Editions: CPL 227-237; PL 52, 183-666: Coll. Feliciana; PLS III, 153-183; V, 399; A. Olivar, critical ed.: CCL 24; 24A; 24B; Text and Italian translation of sermons, ed. G. Banterle, R. Benericetti et al., 3 vols., Rome 1996/97; Ep. ad Eutychen: PL 54, 739-744 (see CPL 229).

Studies: BS 10, 685-691; A. Olivar, Los sermones de san Pedro Crisólogo, Montserrat 1962; R. Ladino, La iniciación cristiana en san Pedro Crisólogo de Ravena, Diss. Greg., Rome 1969; G. Lucchesi, Stato attuale degli studi sui santi della antica provincia ravennate: Atti dei conv. di Cesena e di Ravenna I, Cesena 1969, 51-80; F. Sottocornola, L'anno liturgico nei sermoni di Pietro Crisologo, Cesena 1973; A. Olivar, Die Textüberlieferung der Predigten des Petrus Chrysologus, in Texte u. Textkritik, J. Dummer (ed.), Berlin 1987, 469-487; R. Benericetti, Il Cristo nei sermoni di C., Cesena 1995; L.H. Westra, The Authorship of an Anonymus Expositio symboli: AugR 36 (1996) 525-542; TRE 25 (1996) 290-91; LTK[3] 8, 117-118; E. Lodi, L'esegesi biblica: SEA 68 (2000) 617-653; LACL (2002) 570-571; PCBE 2, 1728-1730; V. Zangara, Una predicazione alla presenza dei principi. La Chiesa di Ravenna nella prima metà del sec. V: Antiquité Tardive 8 (2000) 265-304.

B. Studer

PETER MONGUS (d. 490). Patriarch of *Alexandria between 477 and 490. Elected by the anti-

Chalcedonian party upon the death of *Timothy Aelurus, at first he was not recognized by the patriarchs of *Constantinople (*Acacius) and *Rome (*Gelasius), who were both favorable to *Timothy Salofaciolus. But upon the latter's death, from the moment that his successor *John Talaias provided no guarantee from the political point of view, Acacius convinced the emperor Zeno to send a letter of reconciliation to Alexandria (commonly known as the Henotikon). The result was a rapprochement between Acacius and Peter Mongus, even though they had different theological interpretations of the Henoticon's text. This rapprochement, moreover, displeased many of the Egyptian anti-Chalcedonian *clergy and Rome. In response, Rome broke communion with Acacius (Acacian *Schism). But Peter Mongus's work enabled his anti-Chalcedonian successors to rule the Alexandrian See without rivals until the period of *Justinian and the patriarch *Theodosius.

CPG 5495-5499; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972 (esp. 174-183); Patrologia V, 356; Ph. Blaudeau, Le cas Pierre Monge au regard des sources monophysites d'origine palestinienne (fin 5e-début 6e s.), SP 38 (2001), 353-360.

T. Orlandi

PETER I of Alexandria (d. ca. 311). Elected bishop of Alexandria around 300, after having directed the catechetical school (Didaskaleion*). He was imprisoned during the last persecution, then freed around 306; arrested again and beheaded ca. 311. During the years of the persecution, he had to deal with Meletius of Lycopolis. Meletius did not agree with Peter I's moderation toward the lapsi who wanted to reenter the church; he thus replaced the bishops held in prison with those who agreed with his ideas. Peter I condemned and opposed Meletius by a council held during the interval between his two imprisonments, and this measure caused the Meletian *schism. One of Peter I's brief letters concerning the schism has survived. Writing from prison, Peter warned his faithful against the false doctrines of Meletius. We know the titles of his various literary works and possess a few fragments: On the Divinity, which treated the divinity of Christ; On the Advent of Our Savior, which perhaps should be identified with the preceding work; On the Soul, in which he refuted the *Platonist position adopted by *Origen on the preexistence of the *soul with respect to the *body; *On the Resurrection, perhaps also in response to Origen, whose doctrine on the spiritual condition of the resurrected human body he refuted; a letter, probably festal, On Penance, whose 14 disciplinary canons have survived. These canons pertain to the sanctions imposed on the lapsi who were requesting readmission into the church. Perhaps the treatise On the Passover dedicated to Tricenius was also a festal letter.

Peter I's attack on several of Origen's teachings has led several modern scholars to suggest the idea that there was a widespread anti-Origenian reaction at *Alexandria during his time. This reaction would have also involved the exegetical principles of the great Alexandrian. In reality it was only Peter's stance against the most frequently discussed teachings of Origen, because Origen's exegesis and theology continued to exert influence at Alexandria even after Peter I's life.

PG 18, 449-522; Quasten I, 378-382 (bibl.); DCB 4, 331-334; L.B. Radford, Three Teachers of Alexandria. Theognostus, Pierius and Peter, Cambridge 1908; M. Simonetti, Le origini dell'arianesimo: RSLR 7 (1971) 317-330; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle, Rome 1996, 219-298; E. Prinzivalli, Magister ecclesiae. Il dibattito su Origene fra III e IV secolo, Rome 2002, 33-64; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1943-1947; A. Camplani, Atanasio di Alessandria, Lettere festali; Anonimo, Indice delle lettere festali, intr., tr. and notes, Milan 2003, 26 and 28 (festal letters for 309) and 53-54 (the discipline of the ordination of bishops and the patriarch); V. Conticello, Un florilège sur le Grand Carême attribué à Jean Damascène. Authenticité, sources, nouveaux fragments de Sévère d'Antioche, in Philomathestatos. Studies . . . J. Noret, ed. B. Jansenns et al., Leuven . . . 2004, 77-104.

M. Simonetti

PETER II of Alexandria (d. 381). Priest of *Alexandria; as *Athanasius was dying (373), he appointed him as his successor, but the emperor *Valens imprisoned him and installed the Arian *Lucius. Peter II was able to escape and find refuge with *Damasus at *Rome. Here Peter worked in favor of *Paulinus in the *schism of *Antioch, all to the detriment of *Basil of Caesarea's efforts in uniting the anti-Arians of the East. He reentered Alexandria shortly before the death of Valens (379), and in the following year he attempted to install *Maximus in place of *Gregory of Nazianzus as the bishop of the anti-Arian community of *Constantinople. His plans failed. Peter died before the beginning of the Council of *Constantinople (381).

CPG II, 2515-2517; DCB 4, 334-336; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, passim (see index).

M. Simonetti

PETER IV of Alexandria (d. 577). Upon the death of the *monophysite patriarch *Theodosius I (566), who died in exile, there ensued a few years of confusion, after which in 575 the elderly Deacon Peter was elected patriarch by the Alexandrian clergy who were still faithful to Theodosius in opposition to the Syrian *archimandrite *Theodore. Theodore had already been consecrated by *Longinus, bishop of Nobatia. At Alexandria, moreover, there were two irregular elections and consecrations. Peter, a monk of the monastery of Enaton, situated nine miles W of Alexandria, was consecrated by *John of Cellae. To strengthen his authority in favor of the monophysites (*Jacobites), Peter immediately ordained 70 bishops (*John of Ephesus, Hist. Eccl. IV, 12). He was not recognized in Nobatia, which was controlled by Longinus. Peter IV was supported by *Jacob Baradeus but not by John of Ephesus (Hist. Eccl. IV, 15-17). Peter deposed Theodore and immediately clashed with *Paul "the Black" (of Beit Ukkame), exiled in *Egypt at that time; though resisting, he accepted the deposition of Theodore on the condition that Paul "the Black" not be excommunicated. Peter died on 19 June 577, and after a year of uncertainty, the learned *Damian succeeded him. He was also a monk from the *monastery of Enaton. From Peter's writings, only a Syriac fragment of his original conciliar letter written against Paul has survived.

CPG 7238; J.B. Chabot, Documenta: CSCO 17, 230 (text); CSCO 103, 161 (tr.); J. Maspéro, 223-245; Fliche-Martin IV, 619-620; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites, CSCO 127, Sub. 2, Louvain 1951, 224-234; E.R. Hardy, The Christian Egypt, New York 1952, 142-152; P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus. The Church Historian, Leuven 1981, 33-34.; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1948-1949; Patrologia V, 213-214; 391.

A. Di Berardino

PETER of Altinum (5th–6th c). Bishop of Altinum; he was ordered in 501 by *Theodoric to serve as an administrator over the church of *Rome, which was awaiting clarification on the controversy between *Symmachus and *Laurentius. Peter performed his duty in a manner unfavorable to Symmachus; instead of being neutral, he acted as Laurentius's representative; he celebrated *Easter at the Lateran while Symmachus was celebrating Mass at St. Peter's. His attitude provoked a reaction from Symmachus, who condemned Peter in a synod of 115 bishops, held at the Roman basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere (Mansi 8, 245-248; 273-290; Anast. Bibliot., Hist. de vitis rom. pont. 53: PL 128, 451).

PCBE 2, 1747-48.; T. Sardella, Società, Chiesa e Stato nell'età di Teodorico. Papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996.

E. Prinzivalli

PETER of Apamea (d. after 536). A follower of the *monophysite *Severus, patriarch of *Antioch (512–518, d. 537/538), around the year 510 (during the time of the emperor *Anastasius), he became bishop of *Apamea (metropolitan of Syria Secunda) contrary to the *canonical norms. He erased the name of his orthodox predecessors from the *diptychs and led a very violent and scandalous life (turpem ac omni abominatione plenam: Libellus monachorum, Mansi 8,1129). Upon the restoration of orthodoxy promoted by *Justin (518–527), Peter was excommunicated by the Council of *Tyre (16 September 518; Mansi 8, 577 and 1093ff.; Hfl-Lecl 2, 1049-1050) and was forced to distance himself from his see. *Justinian, at the beginning of his reign, sought to bring the monophysites who were under the protection of *Theodora into the unity of the church. Meanwhile, she was able to place *Anthimus, who was leaning toward monophysitism, into the See of *Constantinople. Only through Pope *Agapitus's intervention in 536 was Anthimus removed and replaced by the patriarch *Menas. A council was immediately convoked to which Severus, Peter and Zoara were summoned. During their stay at Constantinople, they undertook an intense propaganda effort in favor of the heresy, even causing scandal. The council then condemned and deposed them (Mansi 8, 975-1156; a second condemnation followed at the Council of *Jerusalem in 536: Mansi 8, 1163-1176: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1142-1155). Justinian, with Novella 42, ratified the council's decisions.

DBC 4, 340-41 (n. 12); Bardenhewer 5, 22; DHGE 3, 920; Fliche-Martin IV, [3]1972, 339, 368-371; Beck 54 and 379.

A. De Nicola

PETER of Callinicum. *Jacobite bishop of *Antioch from 581 to 591, he was esp. important for his dogmatic writings and his controversy against *Damian of *Alexandria (578–606/7), who was also an anti-Chalcedonian bishop.

Peter's fundamental work was the Treatise Against Damian of Alexandria, structured in three sections or speeches (mêmrē), and originally written in Greek. The second section of the work has been preserved, and almost the entirety of the third exists in an ancient *Syriac translation, although the first does not seem to have left a trace, not even in the dogmatic *florilegia in the Syriac language. This treatise represents an important stage in a theological debate at the end of the 6th c. that occurred within the anti-Chalcedonian camp. Already from the year of the work's redaction, the trinitarian controversy dividing the two patriarchs led to a *schism between the Egyptian and Antiochene churches, which, only in 616, Athanasius of Antioch and Anastasius of Alexandria were able to heal, albeit with some dissent and difficulty. This schism occurred after Damian's antitritheist treatise written around 585. Peter considered the work to be defective, but Damian responded with an apologetic treatise responding to Peter's criticisms. After a burning crisis in which ecclesiastical factors, such as the two patriarchs' testing of each other's power, had their effect, and after the *Easter of 588, Peter composed a long refutation.

To understand the terms of the new trinitarian question, one should recall that, even though the *tritheist controversy was brought to an end with the official condemnation by the Eastern episcopate (569), the questions raised by it had been inadequately resolved. If the tritheist theologians emphasized the distinction between the three *hypostases, maintaining that in the *Trinity there are as many natures or substances or divinities as there are hypostases, while the divinity common to the persons ended up being considered an abstraction (Aristotle's secondary ousia) rather than a reality, the majority of their adversaries lacked adequate theological reflection on the nature of the divine substance common to the three hypostases. Damian, following the example of *Theodosius of Alexandria, sought to explain this theory. Noting that the earlier "*Fathers" had used the term "property" to refer to the hypostases considered in the one divine substance, he sought to enrich it with the qualifier "characteristic," thus producing the technical expression "characteristic properties" and indicating its content: ingenerate (= *Father), generated (= Son), *proceeding (= *Holy Spirit), subsisting and unchangeable among each other inasmuch as they are ingenerate/generated/proceeding, but participating in the one substance inasmuch as they are divine hypostases. The reality of the common divine substance was thus safeguarded on the one hand, and the distinction between the hypostases, on the other.

Peter, in a long treatise against Damian, accuses the Egyptian bishop of failing to distinguish between the two senses of the term "property," i.e., property as "hypostasis," and property as "modality of being." The modality of the hypostases' being cannot, for Peter, coincide with the hypostases themselves; if in fact the hypostases were lined up with their "characteristic properties," they would lose the reality of the linguistic referent of these same hypostases. Ingeneration, generation and procession, confessed necessarily as consubstantial, could also be taken as being appearances, mere modalities of being, of the one same substance, with the great risk of falling into *Sabellianism. In the course of Peter's refutation, as in the case of Damian's, but perhaps with a superior competence, he made use of patristic authorities (*Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Gregory of Nazianzus) with a mastery of the subject that cannot but strike the modern scholar. Nevertheless, one must point out the limits of a theological preparation and elaboration, which by that time was based solely on "ecclesiastical" learning and hardly open to the contributions of the philosophical and rhetorical heritage of the past and present.

These are Peter's other works: (a) the antitritheist dossier, whose character as an autonomous work, however, remains doubtful; it seems rather to have been a portion from the first section lost from the Treatise Against Damian; (c) a letter preserved by Michael the Syrian; (d) an anaphora attributed to him by the liturgical MSS.

Duval 365-366; Baumstark 177; Chabot 78-79; Ortiz de Urbina 165; R.Y. Ebied - L.R. Wickham, The Discourse of Mar Peter of Callinicus on the Crucifixion: JTS 26 (1975) 23-37; R.Y. Ebied, Peter of Antioch and Damian of Alexandria. The End of a Friendship, in A Tribute to A. Vööbus, Chicago 1977, 277-282; A. van Roey, Une controverse christologique sous le patriarcat de Pierre de Callinique: Symp. Syriacum 1976 (OCA 205), Rome 1978, 349-357; Peter of Callinicum, Anti-Tritheist Dossier, Leuven 1981; Petri Callinicensis Patriarchae Antiocheni Tractatus contra Damianum, ed. R.Y. Ebied - A. van Roey - L.R. Wickham (CCG 29, 32, 35, 54), Turnhout 1994–1998.

A. Camplani

PETER of Jerusalem (d. 552). Patriarch of *Jerusalem from 524 to 552, he succeeded *John II. He was a great devotee of the ascetic St. *Saba, whom he sent to *Constantinople to intercede before *Justinian for the suspension of taxes for Christians in *Palestine, who had been reduced to poverty by the insurrection of the Samaritans. When Pope *Agapitus deposed *Anthimus, the *monophysite patriarch of Constantinople, replacing him with *Menas (536), Peter signed the condemnation. Because of the disorder caused by the *Origenist monks of Palestine supported at Constantinople by *Domitian of *Ancyra and Theodosius of Askida of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia, Peter appealed to Justinian, who through an edict ordered the bishops and abbots to sign the condemnation of *Origen (543). Later, however, Peter, along with Gelasius, abbot of Mar Saba, refused to sign the edict by which Justinian condemned the *Three Chapters: only after being called to Constantinople did he agree to sign, and he was forced to accept the two Origenist syncelli. He died in 552. One of Peter's homilies on Christmas survives in a Georgian translation, as well as a fragment on fasts. One of the primary sources for his life is *Cyril of Scythopolis's Vita Sabae.

CPG 7017 (homily on Christmas): I. Abuladze, Mravalthavi, Bulletin de l'Institut Marr de langue, d'histoire et de culture matérielle 14, Tiflis 1944, 307-316; CPG 7018 (fragment on fasts): PG 95, 76B (in ps.-John of Damascus, De sacris ieiuniis); DCB 4, 343-344; Hfl-Lecl 3, 1, 17; L. Duchesne, L'Église au VI^e siècle, Paris 1925, 207-208; P. Batiffol, Justinien et le Siège apostolique: RecSR 16 (1926) 236-237; Fliche-Martin IV, 514, 584, 603; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, passim; Patrologia V, 314-315.

F. Scorza Barcellona

PETER of Mira. The bishop of Mira, in the 3rd quarter of the 5th c. He was one of the bishops to whom the emperor Leo (457–474) sent an encyclical letter in 458 to reestablish peace and orthodoxy in *Egypt after the Council of *Chalcedon. Only two of his letters survive: a fragmentary treatise Contra Apollinarem and a letter Ad Leonem imperatorem.

CPG 6157-6158; F. Diekamp, Analecta patristica: OCA 117 (1938) 50-53.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PETER of Perembolae (d. before 441). The first bishop of Perembolae, a military station in *Palestine. In his work on the life of St. *Euthymius, *Cyril of Scythopolis narrated the legendary story of Peter until his episcopate (Vita s. Eut. 18-21). Peter, a Greek by birth, had the name Aspebetus when residing in the Persian Empire and was a very high ranking official. During the period of the last *persecution (at the end of the 4th c.), instigated by the party of Magan, Aspebetus received the order to occupy the mountain passes in order to capture Christians who were escaping toward the Roman Empire. He did not follow the order; in fact, he helped the refugees escape and as a result even he was bound to flee along with his son Terebus and many relatives. Anatolius, the Eastern prefect, received them and named Aspebetus governor of the Bedouin tribes of his vassals. Terebus, who was a paralytic, received a suggestion in a dream that St. Euthymius could heal. After the miraculous healing of Terebus, Aspebetus and all his family were baptized; he took the name "Petrus" and entered the religious life. To fulfill the request of the Bedouin converts, *Juvenal, patriarch of *Jerusalem, ordained him their bishop contrary to the demands of the cathedral metropolitan of *Caesarea. Although the precise date of his ordination remains unknown, it must have occurred at least before 428. Peter participated at the Council of *Ephesus (431) where, following the advice of Euthymius, he sided with *Cyril of Alexandria. He was one of the four bishops who advised *Nestorius to travel to the council to justify himself and also one of the three who informed the council of the decisions taken by *John of Antioch, who arrived late. Peter condemned Nestorius. On his way home, Peter went to visit St. Euthymius to inform him of the decisions reached by the council. We know nothing of his life after this event.

DCB 4, 837-839; E. Honigmann, Juvenal of Jerusalem: DOP 5 (1950) 209-279; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 75.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

PETER II of Sebaste (ca. 344–ca. 394). Brother of *Basil the Great, he was born while his father was dying. He received an education in asceticism from his sister *Macrina (Greg. Nyss., Vita Macr., 12-13). A priest, he probably resided at Annesi, near *Neocaesarea (Basil., Ep. 216) and acted as a mediator with the bishops of *Pontus (Ep. 203, end). He was elected to the See of *Sebaste before May 381, in opposition to the recently deceased *Eustathius. *Gregory of Nyssa dedicated to him his very openly Origenist work De opificio hominis and sent Letter 29 to him. Peter responded in what is now Letter 30 in Gregory's corpus of letters (PG 45, 241-244; ed. G. Pasquali, Leiden [2]1952, 89-91). He appears, moreover, in the legendary letter on the miracles of Basil (ps.-Amphilochius, CPG 3253).

BS 10, 771-772; P. Devos, S. Pierre l'évêque de Sébastée dans une lettre de Grégoire de Nazianze: AB 79 (1961) 346-390; R. Van Dam, Families and Friends in Late Roman Cappadocia, Philadelphia 2003.

J. Gribomont

PETER of Trajanopolis (5th c.). Bishop of Trajanopolis (*Thrace). In 431 he participated at the Council of *Ephesus and supported *John of Antioch's Nestorian position. The council condemned him along with John and his supporters (ACO I, 1, 3, pp. 13, 25, 26). Later, however, he wrote and dedicated a short treatise (libellus) to the council in which, rejecting his previous position, he professed the orthodox faith and rejected *Nestorius.

CPG 3, 5799; ACO I, 1, 7, p. 139 (text of the libellus); PWK 19, 1327.

J. Irmscher

PETER the DEACON (d. after 604). A deacon of *Rome and a disciple of St. *Gregory the Great. After he gave his possessions to the poor, he led a monastic life under Gregory's spiritual direction. Immediately upon his election to the papacy, Gregory commissioned him first to administer the properties of the Sicilian church, and then starting from 592, while still a subdeacon, the church's landholdings in Campania. The exchange of letters between the pontiff and his administrator became frequent, as one can see from Gregory's corpus of letters (Registr. Epist.: PL 77, 442-1327 passim). In it, one sees the pontiff's concern for the distribution of the church's revenues for the benefit of the poor, esp. at Rome. After having returned to the city of Rome, Peter was ordained a deacon in 593 and, after the pope's death, he became the most vocal defender of the work of the pontiff, who had been accused by some people of having squandered the possessions of the church of Rome, even by way of charity. He seems to be one of the main characters in Gregory's Dialogues (PL 77, 150-430). A letter exists in his name bearing the title Liber Petri diaconi et aliorum qui in causa fidei a Graecis ex Oriente Romam missi fuerunt. Therein he affirms the doctrine of the two natures and the one *person of Christ acc. to the faith of the Council of *Chalcedon (451) and *Cyril of Alexandria.

CPL 663 and 817; PL 45, 1772-1776; 62, 83-92; 65, 442-451 (among the Letters of St. Fulgentius of Ruspe, no. 16); John the Deacon, Vita S. Gregorii, II, 11: PL 75, 92; PCBE 2, 1762-1771.

L. Dattrino

PETER the FULLER (d. 488). First *monophysite patriarch of *Antioch, and intermittently on several occasions between 471 and 488. The primary sources do not permit us to make a thoroughly reliable reconstruction of his life. It seems, however, that Peter, though initially a member of the *monastery of the *Acoemete monk at *Constantinople, distanced himself from it, perhaps because of his theological disagreements with his zealous Chalcedonian brothers. On good terms with Zeno the Isaurian, the son-in-law of the emperor *Leo, he followed him to Antioch when he was nominated magister militum per Orientem. Here he strengthened the opposition to the patriarch *Martyrius and succeeded him for a brief period, so that as a result the latter was forced to retire (471). Deposed and exiled by order of Leo, Peter returned a second time to the episcopal throne of Antioch during the revolt of Basiliscus (475–477). Again expelled from his episcopal see, he finally reentered thanks to the political policy of reconciliation with the monophysites achieved by the emperor Zeno through the Henoticon (485–488).

A controversial and difficult person to evaluate precisely, Peter left significant vestiges of himself in certain liturgical innovations. The most important and discussed was the addition of the Trisagion* of the *theopaschite formula ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι᾽ ἡμᾶς during his first service in the episcopate. This was the object of intense controversies in the 6th c., as the apocryphal letters sent to Peter bear witness, which are preserved in the Collectio Sabbaitica. In 476 he began to recite the *Creed at *Mass and also introduced the rite of the consecration of oil (μύρον) and the blessing of water on the night of *Epiphany. It was primarily these liturgical facets of his work that led some scholars to suggest that Peter be identified with the author of the Corpus Areopagiticum, in which writings, among other things, the consecration of the μύρον is elevated to the level of a *sacrament (Ecc. hier. IV: PG 3, 472D-485B). The thesis, which has been reproposed by Riedinger, has not been accepted, but scholars acknowledge that the writings of ps.-*Dionysius reflect a liturgical context close to the one described in Peter's writings.

CPG 6522-6525; Zacharias Rhetor, HE V, 10; CSCO 83 (tr.) 233-235, CSCO 87 (tr.) 161-162; ACO III, 6-25, 217-231; E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum Acacianischen Schisma (ABAW NF 10), Munich 1934, 182-183, 192-193, 210, 287-300; E. Honigmann, Évêques et Évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VIe siècle (CSCO 127), Louvain 1951; U. Riedinger, Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagites. Pseudo-Kaisarios und die Akoimeten: ByzZ 52 (1959) 276-296; Id., Akoimeten: TRE 2, 148-153; W. Strothmann, Das Sakrament der Myron-Weihe inder Schrift de Ecclesiastica Hierarchia des Pseudo-Dionysios Areopagita in syrischen Übersetzungen und Kommentaren, Wiesbaden 1978; G. O'Daly, Dionysios Areopagita: TRE 8, 772-780; E. Klum-Böhmer, Das Trishagionals Versöhnungsform der Christenheit. Kontroverstheologieim V. und VI. Jahrhundert, Munich-Vienna 1979; A. Solignac, DSp 12 (1986) 1588-1590; Grillmeier, II, 2,265-277; Patrologia V, 194-195.

L. Perrone

PETER the IBERIAN (d. 491). He received this name because he was a native of *Georgia (= *Iberia). He was one of the prominent leaders of first-generation *monophysitism. The son of King Bosmyrios, his actual name was Nabarnugi. At 12 years of age he was sent as a hostage to *Constantinople. Moved by ascetic zeal, in 437–438 he fled to Jerusalem and was received by *Melania the Younger and *Gerontius, who clothed him with the monastic habit and gave him the Christian name Peter. In 445 he settled at Maiuma near *Gaza, where he was ordained a priest. As the bishop of the city during the Palestinian rebellion against the Council of *Chalcedon, he went as an exile in *Egypt in 453 and later consecrated Timothy Aelurus as patriarch of *Alexandria. When he returned to *Palestine, he consolidated the monophysite presence. He escaped with Isaiah of Gaza when both men were requested to accept the Henoticon. Despite his intransigent rejection of Chalcedon, Peter was not a proponent of radical monophysitism, as witnessed to by his condemnation of John the Orator's Eutychian theses. He exerted great influence on the intellectual circles from which *Severus of Antioch would emerge. His quality as a visionary, esp. attested by John of Beth Rufina's Pleroforiae, has led some to identify him with ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite. The Life, another work by John and the primary source for the biography, presents Peter as the "new Moses," set apart by his itinerant existence always aspiring to the monastic ideal of xeniteia.

R. Raabe, Petrus der Iberer, ein Charakterbild zur Kirchen- und Sittengeschichte des 5. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig 1895; F. Nau, Jean Rufus, évêque de Maiouma. Plérophofories: PO VIII, 1, Paris 1912; E. Schwartz, Johannes Rufus, ein monophysitischer Schriftsteller: SHAW 16, Heidelberg 1912; E. Honigmann, Pierre l'Iberien et les écrits du Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite: Mém. de l'Ac. Roy. de Belg., Cl. des lettr. 47, 3, Brussels 1952; P. Devos, Quand Pierre l'Ibère vint-il à Jérusalem?: AB 86 (1968) 337-351; L. Perrone, Dissenso dottrinale e propaganda visionaria. Le Pleroforie di Giovanni di Maiuma: Augustinianum 29 (1989) 451-495; M. van Esbroeck, Pierre l'Ibère et Denys l'Aréopagite, in Proceedings of the Second Int. Symposium in Kartvelian Studies, ed. E. Khintibidze, Tbilissi 1993, 167-177; A. Kofsky, Peter the Iberian. Pilgrimage, Monasticism and Ecclesiastical Politics in Byzantine Palestine: SBF 47 (1997) 209-222; J.-E. Steppa, John Rufus and the World Vision of Anti-Chalcedonian Culture, Piscataway, NJ 2002; B. Bitton-Ashkelony, "Imitatio Mosis" and Pilgrimage in the "Life of Peter the Iberian," in B. Bitton-Ashkelony - A. Kofsky, Christian Gaza in Late Antiquity, Leiden 2004, 107-129.

L. PERRONE

PETER the PATRICIAN (6th c.), also called "Peter the Orator," Byzantine historian. Born at *Thessalonica around 500, he was a lawyer at *Constantinople and the curator at the court of the empress *Theodora. In 539/540 he became the magister officiorum, and before 550 he was appointed patrician. Already in 535, Peter had carried out negotiations in *Italy with Theodahad, king of the *Goths; during that period, he was imprisoned for three years. In 552 he was sent to Pope *Vigilius, who during the course of the debate over the *Three Chapters had fled from Constantinople to *Chalcedon. In 561/562, he reached a peace treaty with the Persians. His diplomatic ability, vast learning and rhetorical talent won for him the admiration of his contemporaries. Peter died after his return from *Persia. Fragments from his Histories (Ἱστορίαι) are preserved in the collections of Excerpta de legationibus and De sententiis, compiled by Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus (1st half of 10th c.). The work was probably divided acc. to imperial reigns, beginning with the second triumvirate (43 BC); his history reached at least to the age of *Julian. Peter's primary source, cited in a few passages, was Dio Cassius. A second work was titled On the Organization of the State (Περὶ πολιτικῆς καταστάσεως). Belonging to it were chapters 84-85 of the first book, and also perhaps chapters 86-95 of Constantine Porphyrogenitus's book on the ceremonies. The attribution of the *palimpsest fragment Περὶ πολιτικῆς ἐπιστήμης, a work discovered by A. Mai (Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, 2, Rome 1827, 571-609), remains subject to vigorous debate. Through his reflections, Peter clearly wanted to offer practical direction for the development of a model for a constitutional monarchy established on philosophical principles. A third work, which has been completely lost and was written in common language (an event of considerable interest), discussed the peace negotiations between the Byzantines and Persians in 560/562.

Potthast 2, 921; PG 113, 663-676 (very incomplete); C. Müller, Fragmenta historicorum Graecorum, 4, Paris 1868, 181-199 (without the Constantinian excerpta); A. Mai, loc. cit., 197-246; L. Dindorf's edition of Dio Cassius, 5, Leipzig 1865, 181-232; PWK 19, 1296-1304; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, 1, Munich 1978, 300-303; R. Dostálová, Soziale Spannungen des 5./6. Jh. in Byzanz im Spiegel des anonymen Dialogs Περὶ πολιτικῆς ἐπιστήμης. Eine Quellenanalyse, in Volk und Herrschaft im frühen Byzanz, Berlin 1991, 33-48; F. Paschoud, Nicomaque Flavien et la connexion byzantine: AntTard 2 (1994) 71-82; PLRE 3, 994-998; P. Antonopoulos, Petrus Patricius. Some Aspects of His Life and Career, in V. Vavrínek (ed.), From Late Antiquity to Early Byzantium, Praha 1985, 49-53.

J. IRMSCHER

PETILIAN. Donatist bishop of *Constantine (ca. 395–412) and opponent of *Augustine. Originally a jurist and *Catholic, he converted to *Donatism, initially against his will (Aug., Sermo ad Caesariensis ecclesiae plebem 8). He became the chief representative of the Donatist church during Augustine's time. In 400–401 he wrote an encyclical letter to his clergy, Epistola ad presbyteros, to prove that *Donatus's church was the true Catholic church in N *Africa. In 401 Augustine responded with the first two books Contra Litteras Petiliani, to which Petilian responded with a work personally directed to Augustine (Ad Augustinum), in which he asserted that his opponent had never fundamentally ceased to be a *Manichean. Augustine responded again with the last book of the Contra Litteras Petiliani. Later, around 410, Petilian wrote the book De unico baptismo in defense of the Donatist practice of rebaptizing their converts; Augustine responded with the work De unico baptismo contra Petilianum. At the Conference of *Carthage of 411, Petilian immediately emerged as the chief protagonist of Donatism: he tirelessly defended the movement's cause with subtle rhetoric and, even more effectively, succinct and caustic remarks on the arguments raised by Catholics. He spoke almost 150 times; toward the end, when it became obvious that the Donatist cause was weakening, he sought to obtain an adjournment, asserting that throat pain was preventing him from speaking (Gesta Collationis III, 541-542: CCL 159, 50). Once deposed from his episcopal see after the proscription of Donatism (CTh XVI, 5,52), he still tried, where possible, to gather the remaining Donatists, and he even gathered a council of bishops in *Numidia (Aug., C. Gaud. I, 37,47-48). He disappeared after 415.

Sources: For a reconstruction of the Epistola ad presbyteros, see Monceaux V, 311-318. Augustine's works against Petilian were edited by Petschenig, CSEL 52-53. Studies: Monceaux VI, Paris 1922, 1ff.; S. Lancel, Actes de la conférence de Carthage en 411, I, Paris 1972 (SC 194), 231-238; PCBE I, 855-868; P. Langa, Réplica a las cartas de Petiliano e El unico bautismo (réplica a Petiliano). Introducción, bibliografía y notas, BAC 33, Madrid 1990, 5-400.

W.H.C. Frend

PETITIONES ARIANORUM. In 363, after having reentered *Alexandria following the death of the emperor *Julian, *Athanasius traveled to *Antioch to meet the emperor *Jovian; several *Arians presented repeated requests to the emperor not to allow Athanasius to take possession of his episcopal see and to put in place another person instead. These requests were of no effect, but they have come down to us in the form of a dialogue between the emperor, the Arians and the crowd, in an appendix to the letter Athanasius sent to Jovian (PG 26, 820ff.). *Lucius of Alexandria was also among the Arians petitioning before the emperor. The Arians sought to set him against Athanasius as the bishop of Alexandria.

PG 26, 819-824; Simonetti 376.

M. Simonetti

PETRA. The city situated on the mountains of Idumea, 300 km (186.4 mi.) S of Amman. Petra (OT Sela?) was the capital of the Nabataeans and an important caravan city. The Romans annexed it in 105, and during the Byzantine period it was the metropolitan see of the province of *Palestine III. The earthquake of 551 signaled the decline of the city. Its beauty was achieved by cutting and embellishing rock, which was rich in stunning colors. One of the major temples, called the "Temple of the Urns" because of its decorations, in 447 was transformed into a church by Bishop Jason—as one gathers from the inscription therein (Saller - Bagatti, Nebo, 233; Brúnnow - Domaszewski, Provincia Arabia, I, 393). Another church was found SE of Qasr el-Biut. Some graffiti and several inscriptions bear *crosses, as does a lamp and various steles (Dalman, Petra Forschungen, 26). As a result of the Arabic occupation, the rocky city lost its strategic value.

The location has been the object of recent excavations that have led to important discoveries. Most significant is the ecclesiastical building structure known as "the Petra Church," which is found in the central N area of the city's valley, not far from a colonnade street, and which includes, in addition to the monumental basilica decorated with pavement mosaics, the baptistery and other areas that have not yet been excavated. In an area connected to the church, archaeologists have found an archive containing many papyri dating to the 6th c. AD, the reading of which is now allowing scholars the chance to shed new light on the history of the Nabatean city during the Byzantine period. Five km (3.1 mi.) W of Petra on the slopes of Jabal Harun, a small *monastery was found on the mountain. Tradition maintains that *Aaron was buried on this mountain, and on its peak one can still visit to this day a small Muslim sanctuary containing his cenotaph.

R.E. Brúnnow - A.V. Domaszewski, Die Provincia Arabia, I, Strassburg 1904; G.H. Dalman, Neue Petra Forschungen und der heilige Felsen von Jerusalem, Leipzig 1912; S. Saller - B. Bagatti, The Town of Nebo, Jerusalem 1949; A. Negev, The Nabateans and Provincia Arabia: ANRW II, 8, 520-686; A. Negev, Petra: NEAEHL 4, 1181-1193; Z.T. Fiema - Ch. Kanellopoulos - T. Waliszewski - R. Schick, The Petra Church, Amman 2001; J. Frösén - Z.T. Fiema (eds.), Petra. A City Forgotten and Rediscovered, Helsinki 2002; J. Frösén - A. Arjava - M. Lehtinen (eds.), The Petra Papyri I, Amman 2002.

B. Bagatti - C. Pappalardo

PETRONILLA, martyr. The most ancient documentation on the saint is found on an arcosolium of the retro sanctos of the basilica of the catacomb of *Domitilla, the 4th-c. fresco of Veneranda: this deceased saint is portrayed at the moment of her introduction into heaven by Petronella mart. Petronilla then appears in the papyri of Monza as a daughter of St. Peter and in the Roman Itineraries of the 7th c.

(CCL 175, 294, 299, 316, 327, 332, 341). These latter texts attest the saint's popularity, whose name replaced those of Sts. *Nereus and Achilleus as the titular of the cemetery basilica. The saint was inserted into the legendary Passio of Sts. Nereus and Achilleus (BHL 6061): not only did these men, former soldiers, become eunuchs and guardians of the palace of Domitilla, but Petronilla was the daughter of the apostle Peter and was miraculously healed by her father, as maintained in the Acts of Peter. The identification does not seem to derive from the fresco but rather from the *sarcophagus upon which the inscription reads: Aur. Petronillae filiae dulcissimae. The sarcophagus was considered to be that of Peter's daughter and the inscription written by the very hand of the apostle. The sarcophagus was transported by Paul I (757–767) into the chapel of "St. Petronilla" S of the *Vatican basilica (the former mausoleum of the imperial family of *Theodosius). The transfer was made in order to reunite father and daughter in burial, and to please Pepin the Short, king of the *Franks. Petronilla was considered the firstborn daughter of the church. For this reason, the *Mass of St. Petronilla continued to be celebrated down through the years in France, on the day of her feast (31 May), in the Capella regum Francorum.

BHL 6640m/n; BS 10, 514-521; LCI 8, 157; BBKL 7, 303-304; Ph. Pergola, Petronella martyr. Une évergète de la fin du IVe siècle? in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes, Miscellanea V. Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 627-636; M. Jost, Die Patrozinien der Kirchen Roms während desersten Jahrtausends: Hagiographica 8 (2001) 28-31.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PETRONIUS of Bologna. According to the testimony of *Eucherius of *Lyons (PL 50, 719) and *Gennadius (PL 58, 1082-83), Petronius, after having occupied high civil offices, must have been the bishop of Bologna from 431/432 until 450. His name was connected to the construction of the church of St. *Stephen, which was designed on the model of the Constantinian basilicas in *Jerusalem. For a variety of reasons, he could not have been the author of the Vita patrum monachorum Aegypti, attributed to him by Gennadius, but is perhaps the author of two sermons in honor of St. *Zeno of Verona and for the anniversary of his episcopal consecration. Nevertheless, from the Middle Ages onward he was frequently venerated at Bologna.

CPL 210-211; G. Morin, RBen 14 (1897) 3-8; F. Filippini, Petronio di Bologna, Bologna 1948; BS 10, 521-530; E. Lodi, Due omelie: FS G. Lercaro, Rome 1967, 263-301 (coll. ed.); LTK³ ad. loc., 89-90; LACL (2002) 565; PCBE 2, 1723-24.

B. Studer

PHILASTER, PHILASTRIUS. See *FILASTER

PHILEAS of Thmuis (d. 306). Bishop of Thmuis, a city of the Nile delta, and archon of *Alexandria at the beginning of the 4th c. We possess firsthand documents on the circumstances of his martyrdom: (1) the letter sent by him to his diocese at his arrest, on his imprisonment and the tortures inflicted on the *martyrs of Alexandria (Eus. HE 8,10, 2-10); (2) his defense, i.e., the minutes of the verbal trial of the fifth and final audience during which the prefect of Egypt Culcianus condemned him to death 4 February 306 (Bodmer Papyrus XX); (3) the Acta composed in Latin of his martyrdom and of the martyrdom of Philoromus (BHL 6799). The first two documents are very close to the events; the last goes back to the end of the 4th c.

F. Halkin, L'Apologie du martyr Philéas de Thmuis et les Actes latins de Philéas et Philorome: AB 81 (1963) 5-30; V. Martin, Papyrus Bodmer XX. Apologie de Philéas, évêque de Thmuis, Geneva 1964; BS 5, 686-687; Acta Phileae: BHL 6799; BHG 1513k, m; Atti e passioni dei martiri, critical text and comm., ed. A.A.R. Bastiaensen et al., Milan, Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, 1987, 247-337; G.A.A. Kortekaas, De Acta van Phileas, in De heiligenverering in de eerste eeuwen van het christendom, ed. H. Hilhorst, Nijmegen 1988, 138-150; V. Saxer, Atti dei martiri dei primi tre secoli, Padua ²1989, 209-223; J. Fontaine, Littérature narrative sur le martyre et l'ascèse, de 280 à 370 après J.C., in Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, V: Restauration et renouveau. La littérature latine de 284 à 347 après J.C., ed. R. Herzog, avant propos de J. Fontaine, Turnhout 1993, 588-589; Th. Baumeister, Fortschritte in der ägyptischen Hagiographie, in Divitiae Aegypti. Koptologische und verwandte Studien zum Ehre von Martin Krause, Wiesbaden 1995, 9-14; Id., Der ägyptische Bischof und Märtyrer Phileas, in Garten des Lebens. Festschrift für W. Cramer, ed. M.B. von Stritzky - Ch. Uhrig (Münsteraner theologische Abhandlungen 60), Altenberge 1999, 33-41; F. Scorza Barcellona, Agli inizi dell'agiografia occidentale, in Hagiographies. Histoire internationale de la littérature hagiographique latine et vernaculaire en Occident des origines à 1550, sous la direction de G. Philippart (CC. Hagiographies III), Turnhout 2001, 75-77.

V. Saxer

PHILIP, apostle. He is named between John and Bartholomew in Mt 10:3 and Lk 6:14; after Andrew in Mk 3:18/Acts 1:13; together with Andrew in Jn 12:22. The two names (Philip and Andrew) are Greek. According to Jn 1:44, Philip was born in Bethsaida as were Andrew and Peter. In Jn 6:5-7, Philip is called by Jesus before the multiplication of the loaves. In Jn 12:20-23, the Gentiles who want to be introduced to Jesus turn to him. According to *Clement (Strom. III, 25,3) he was the anonymous person to whom Jesus said the phrase in Mt 8:22/Lk

9:60. *Papias, *Polycrates of Ephesus, and the apocryphal Acts Andr. and Acts Phil. confuse the apostle Philip with *Philip "the deacon" (Acts 6:8 and 21:8). Clement (Strom. III, 52,5; cf. Eus., HE 3, 30,1) also talks about the daughters of the apostle Philip, but only to refer to the fact that the father married them. He is one of the eleven apostles presented as authors of the Ep. Apostolorum (2,13).

He is one of those who question Jesus during the gnostic disputes (Sophia J. C., Pistis Sophia, Books of Jeu). Pistis Sophia 42-44 presents Philip as an author of the deeds and acts of Jesus, as were Thomas and Matthew. Therefore he is the presumed author of one of the three principal apocryphal gospels, so highly prized in certain gnostic circles. The Ev. Phil. was known only through a brief citation of *Epiphanius (Pan. 26,13,2-3). It was known that it had been used by the *Manicheans (Tim. of Constantinople: PG 86, 21C; ps.-Leontius of Byzantium: PG 86, 1213 C). The document in *Coptic discovered in *Nag Hammadi (NHC II, 51,29–86,19) is a collection of the sayings of Jesus which offers an important contribution to our very limited knowledge of gnostic theology and sacramental practice. It is a collection that seems to combine elements of the tradition of "Thomas," a few extracts of elements linked to the Apocryphon of John and Hypostasis of the Archons, and longer passages with a style and theology similar to those of the fragments of *Valentinus and the Gospel of Truth. From Nag Hammadi (NHC VIII, 132,10–140,27) comes also a Letter of Peter to Philip (a gnostic dialogue of the risen Savior with his disciples) in which Philip is mentioned only at the beginning. Rather than a letter, it is of the same literary genre as the questiones and responsiones illustrated by the Epistula apostolorum. The Letter presents a chronological distinction between a period in which the apostles do not believe in the supposed gnostic teaching of Jesus and a period of full understanding. According to the most ancient tradition (Heracleon, in Clem., Strom. IV, 71,3), Philip did not die a martyr.

R. Trevijano

PHILIP, apostle (apocryphal). Philip the apostle is mentioned in the synoptic gospels only in the lists of apostles, while he appears several times in the gospel of John (6:5-7; 12:21-22). According to *Clement of Alexandria, the words of Mt 8:22 were addressed by Jesus to Philip (Strom. 3,25,3). Philip must have had four daughters (cf. Eusebius, HE 3,39,9). Philip preached probably in Greece and Asia Minor (*Phrygia) and died in Hierapolis; acc. to the apocrypha he suffered martyrdom. Philip became in the following centuries an emblematic figure in Phrygia (*Papias, *Polycrates, *Eusebius); already in antiquity he had been confused with *Philip the Deacon (Acts 6:5; 8:5-13, 26-40; 21:8). We find the same error in the most important apocryphal narrative on Philip, the Acts of Philip in Greek: one part is dedicated to the apostle (1,8-15, Mart.), the other to the deacon (3-7). The Acts constitute a series of texts on Philip: an orthodox section (2) is inserted in a body of a radically *Encratite character. The text of the Acts of Philip, published in volumes 12-13 of the CCAp, is the fruit of long research: today we have most of the text available. Independent of the Greek Acts are the Latin text (ps.-Abdias X), the text in *Syriac and in Arabic of the Acts of Philip at Carthage, the Acts of Philip and Peter in *Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopian and an Irish legend. The gnostics were interested in Philip: acc. to the Pistis Sophia, Philip wrote the sayings of the Lord (42-44); an existing gnostic text, the Gospel of Philip, extremely important for knowledge of the sacramentology of the Valentinians, is preserved in Coptic among the texts of *Nag Hammadi (cod. II), along with a Letter of Peter to Philip of the same group of texts of Nag Hammadi (cod. VIII). Italian archaeologists have made important excavations in the (octagonal) basilica of S. Philip at Hierapolis (Pamukkale).

CANT 20; 26; 250-255; BHG 1516-1530; BHL 6813-6818; BHO 974-984; BS 5, 1964, 706-711; LCI 8, 1976, 198-205. Editions: F. Bovon - B. Bouvier - F. Amsler, CCAp 11-12, 1999 (text, commentary, bibl.—a fundamental work); Id., Actes de l'apôtre Philippe, Apocryphes 8, Turnhout 1996; Id., EApC 1, 1997, 1181-1320—previous translations were based on an imperfect form of the text; P. Verzone, Hierapolis di Frigia nei lavori della missione archeologica italiana: Quaderni di La Ricerca Scientifica 100 (1978) 391-475 (or Martyrium 448-457); T. Ritti, Fonti letterarie ed epigrafiche (Hierapolis, Scavi e ricerche), Rome 1985; Hierapolis di Frigia, 1957–1987, ed. A. Peres, Milan 1987; A. Frey, L'éloge de Philippe, saint apôtre et évangéliste du Christ (BHG 1530b): Apocrypha 3 (1992) 165-209 (édition du texte); M. van Esbroeck, Les actes syriaques de Philippe à Carthagène en version arabe: OrChr 79 (1995) 121-146. The Gospel of Philip and the Letter to Philip have been published in the collection of Nag Hammadi texts; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Il "Vangelo secondo Filippo." Rassegna degli studi e proposte di interpretazione: ANRW II, 25,5, 1988, 4107-4166; J. Jacobsen Bucley, Conceptual Models and Political Issues in the Gospel of Philipp: ibid., 4167-4194; Lipsius-Bonnet 2, 2, 1-53; Supp., 64-73; F. Bovon, Les Actes de Philippe, ANRW II, 25,6, 4431-4527; A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 424-432; F. Amsler, The Apostle Philip, the Viper, the Leopard and the Kid. The Masked Actors of the Religious Conflict in Hierapolis of Phrygia (Acts of Philip VII-XV), in 1996 Seminar Papers (SBLSP), Atlanta 1996, 432-437; Id., Remarques sur la réception liturgique et folklorique des Actes de Philippe (APh VIII-XV et Martyre): Apocrypha 8 (1997) 251-264.

M. Starowieyski

PHILIP, deacon. Acts (6:5; 8:5, 12-13, 26-40) speaks of "one of the Seven," of an "evangelist" (Acts 21:8), Philip by name. The identification of the ministry of the "Seven" in the church in Jerusalem (Acts 6) with that of the deacon is very questionable and does not appear before *Irenaeus (Haer, I, 26,3; III, 12,10; IV, 15,1) and, after, in *Cyprian (Ep. 3,3). Some writers confused this "evangelist" with the apostle *Philip, one of the Twelve. They speak of the apostle Philip, father of daughters (*Papias, in Eus., HE 3,39,9), of virgins (*Polycrates of Ephesus, in Eus., HE 3,31,3), of prophetesses (the Montanist Proclus, in Eus., HE 3,31,4), buried at Hierapolis. These are the daughters of Philip in Acts 21:8-9. On the other hand, *Jerome was shown, in *Caesarea in 385, the house of Philip and the residences of his daughters. The same confusion appears in the Martyrdom of Andrew (Lipsius - Bonnet II, 1,47), where the apostle Philip ends up a missionary in Samaria. The principal personages of the A. Phil. (ibid. 1-98), the apostle and the "deacon," are the same person. This work is a compilation of fifteen different Acts. The combination of two Philips into a single person is obvious particularly in the first 7 Acts, those most marked by *encratism. The compilation seems to be the product of Encratite circles of Asia Minor of the middle of the 4th c. The Acts 8-15, the oldest and most important section, with various ancient translations, constitutes, as a unitary account, the Acta Philippi in Hierapolis, which finishes with the Martyrium; the work, which depends on older legends, was probably composed in the 5th c.

Lipsius-Bonnet, I, 1-2; Erbetta I, 213-243 (gospel), II, 451-490 (Acts); R.M. Wilson, The Gospel of Philip, London 1962; J.-E. Ménard, L'Evangile de Philippe, Strasbourg 1967; A.H.C. van Eijk, The Gospel of Philip and Clement of Alexandria: VChr25 (1971) 94-120; BS 5, 719-721; A. de Santos Otero, Jüngere Apostelakten, in W. Schneemelcher, II, Tübingen [5]1989, 380-438; G.P. Luttikhuizen, The Evaluation of the Teaching of Jesus in Christian Gnostic Revelation Dialogues, in J.-M. Sevrin (ed.), The New Testament in Early Christianity. La réception des écrits néotestamentaires dans le christianisme primitif, Leuven 1989, 363-372; M.L. Turner, The Gospel According to Philip. The Sources and Coherence of an Early Christian Collection, Leiden 1996; R. Trevijano, La Biblia en el cristianismo antiguo. Prenicenos. Gnósticos. Apócrifos, Estella 2001.

R. Trevijano

PHILIP, presbyter (d. after 431). As Roman legate he took part, along with the bishop *Faustinus of Potentia and the Roman priest Asellus, in the delegation sent before December 418 by Pope *Zosimus to *Carthage to handle the case of *Apiarius, priest of Sicca Veneria, who, having been excommunicated by his bishop *Urbanus, had appealed to *Rome. They took a scriptura emandata with them, where their role was defined, and a commonitorium in four points, given to them to treat with the African episcopate the question of the appeals to Rome and of episcopal visits to the court, as well as that of priests and deacons excommunicated by their bishop, and finally the question of Urban, whom the pope threatened to excommunicate or judge at Rome if he did not change his behavior. The African episcopate contested some canons (presented as being from *Nicaea, while in reality they were from *Serdica), while declaring to Zosimus, through a letter prior to 26 December 418, that they agreed provisionally—until further results of the inquiry—to observe the contested canons. Meanwhile, a letter from the new pope *Boniface I and a new delegation arrived. Philip was present at the Council of Carthage of 25 May 419 and of 30 May, where the canons were contested again and the canones in causa Apiarii were ratified. Philip signed the Acts and carried back to Rome the Acts of the council and a letter of the African bishops.

Philip also took part, along with the bishops Arcadius and Projectus, in the Roman delegation charged to represent Pope *Celestine at the Council of *Ephesus (431) with the intention of ending the conflicts between *Cyril of Alexandria and *Nestorius of Constantinople. He was also instructed to defend the authority of the Apostolic See and to model his attitude in everything on that of Cyril. Because of delays through the difficulties of the sea voyage, Philip and the other legates arrived with the work already begun. In the session of 10 July, Philip spoke in Latin (the first of the legates) to request the reading of the original letter sent by Pope Celestine to the council, then to solicit the reading of the Greek translation; he also intervened with Arcadius to protest the communication of the conciliar gesta prior to the arrival of the delegation. He recognized the canonical character of the deposition of Nestorius; he profited from the occasion to defend the Roman primacy and the accord between the church of the West and that of the East in condemning Nestorius. He signed immediately after Cyril the letter sent to the clerics of *Constantinople to confirm the deposition of Nestorius, and is associated with the sentence of excommunication brought against Nestorius, in a relatio sent from the council to *Theodosius II. He was also present in other sessions, signing the minutes and the various letters.

Furthermore, along with the legate Arcadius, Philip was one of the eight delegates chosen from the Cyrillian party to participate in the contrary reunion called at Constantinople by Theodosius II. Having arrived at *Chalcedon, Philip, like the other Cyrillian delegates, had to confront the representatives of the Antiochene party multiple times between 11 September and 25 October 431; and, like his colleagues, he defended, but without success, the cause of the council before the senate and before the emperor. Later he was present in Constantinople at the designation of *Maximian, new bishop of the imperial capital, of whose election he also informed Pope Celestine and the other churches. Incardinated in the ecclesia Apostolorum (at least from 431), Philip was already old when he was charged with supervising the construction of a new church, also with imperial donations, completed under Pope Sixtus (432–440), in the last two years of his pontificate.

L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976; PCBE II, 1786-1792.

M. Palmieri

PHILIP, priest (d. 455/456). A disciple of *Jerome (Gennadius, De viris ill. 63) from whom there has reached us a commentary on the book of Job, an important witness of the Vulgate. There are two recensions of it, a long and a short (CPL 643 and 757; PL 26, 619-802 and 23, 1407-1470). The introductory letter and several fragments are in A. Wilmart, Analecta Reginensia, Vatican City 1933, 316-322.

CPL 643; J. Bauer, Corpora orbiculata. Eine verschollene Origenesexegese bei Pseudo-Hieronymus: ZKTh 82 (1960) 333-341; Patrologia III, sp. ed. (ed. A. Di Berardino), Madrid 1981, 290; RAC 15, 405-406.

J. Gribomont

PHILIP of Gortyna (2nd c.). Bishop of Gortyna (*Crete) around 170. *Dionysius of Corinth, writing to the church of Gortyna, praised Philip for the faith and courage of his church and exhorted it to preserve itself from heretics, perhaps Marcionites (Eus., HE 4, 23,5). Philip wrote a work against *Marcion (Eus., HE 4, 25).

E. Prinzivalli

PHILIP of Side (5th c.). Disciple in Side (Pamphilia) of Rhodo, he was ordained deacon and priest by *John Chrysostom, with whom he was linked by close friendship (Ep. 213; PG 52, 729). He competed three times for the *patriarchate of *Constantinople (426 *Sisinnius; 428 *Nestorius; 431 *Maximian). He refuted the writing of *Julian the Apostate Against the Galileans. His voluminous Christian History in 36 volumes, in around a thousand chapters, began with the creation of the world and reached to 426. It was published between 434 and 439; it often departed from the chronological order and had continual digressions of every kind (geometrical, astronomical, musical, geographical, botanical, etc.); the style also was verbose (Asian) and lacking refinement. Some fragments and extracts remain; important are those which complete the HE of *Eusebius (e.g., on *Papias of Hierapolis, on the catechetical school of *Alexandria).

CPG III, 6026; Socrates, HE 7,26-27.29.35; Photius, Bibl. 35; Bardenhewer 4, 135-137; Quasten II, 533-535; Altaner 228; BBKL 7, 510-512.

A. De Nicola

PHILIP the Arab. Emperor from 244 to 249. According to *Eusebius (HE 6, 34), who probably bases his account on the letters of *Origen to Philip and to his wife (mentioned in V6I,36,3)—the information is confirmed by two independent authors, of Antiochene tradition, *John Chrysostom in one of his sermons on Babylas of Antioch (PG 50, 539-544) and the Chronicon Paschale (Dindorf I, 503)—the emperor Philip and the empress Otacilia Severa were submitted to public penitence by Babylas, bishop of Antioch, during a paschal vigil, for the assassination of the young son of Gordian III, entrusted to them by his father. Philip might then have been the first Christian emperor, and if Eusebius does not mention him in his Life of Constantine, it could be because Constantine included the memory of Philip in the damnatio memoriae of his supposed descendant Licinius. The objections constantly raised by historians to the Christian faith of Philip could thus find a partial response. A further objection, however, sees the supposed Christianity of Philip as the result of an identification between the empire and the new religion practiced by *Orosius on the occasion of the millennial celebrations of the city (ludi saeculares) organized by Philip, an identification supported by his policy of tolerant syncretism even toward Christians. A sign of that toleration appears in his relations with Origen, as well as the speech Eis basileia of the ps.-Aristides, probably addressed to him, where themes dear to Origen and to *Cyprian are found, such as divine providence or universal peace. One can also think that the attribution of “Christian” sentiments to Philip might be an indirect consequence of his hostility to *Decius, the great persecutor of Christians.

J.M. York, The Image of Philip the Arab: Historia 21 (1972) 320-

332; H. Crouzel, Le Christianisme de l'empereur Philippe l'Arabe: Gregorianum 56 (1975) 545-550; F. Elia, Ancora sul cristianesimo di Filippo l'Arabo: QC 1 (1979) 267-283; M. Pavan, Filippo l'Arabo e il millenario dell'Urbe: PP 45 (1990) 401-419.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

PHILIP the Gnostic (3rd c.). A disciple of *Bardesanes, he belongs to the E branch of Valentinianism. According to some scholars (e.g., Nau, Quasten, Drijvers), he would be the author of the Book of the Laws of the Nations, a writing composed in dialogue form, but in reality a monologue interrupted by some questions, traditionally attributed to *Bardesanes, in which the master responds to the questions of the disciples on the characters of men and the influence of the planets. This text, mentioned by *Eusebius (HE 4, 30,1-3) and preserved in the original language, represents one of the most ancient documents of *Syriac literature (if one excludes the translations of the Bible).

The Syriac text of the Liber legum regionum with Fr. tr.: F. Nau, PS, p. I, t. 2, Paris 1907, 490-658; It. tr. and ed. by G. Levi della Vida: Il dialogo delle leggi dei paesi, Rome 1921 (rev. ed. by R. Contini, Rome 1989); W. Drijvers, Bardesanes of Edessa, Assen 1966; G. Widengren, Bardesanes von Edessa und der syrisch-mesopotamische Gnostizismus, in The Many and the One. Essays on Religion in the Graeco-Roman World presented to H. Ludin Jansen, Trondheim 1985, 153-181; A. Camplani, Rivisitando Bardesane. Note sulle fonti siriache del bardesanismo e sulla sua collocazione storico-religiosa: Cristianesimo nella Storia 19 (1998) 519-596; I. Ramelli, Linee generali per una presentazione e per un commento del "Liber legum regionum" con traduzione italiana del testo siriaco e dei frammenti greci: RIL 133 (1999) 311-355; Id., Bardesane e la sua scuola tra la cultura occidentale e quella orientale. Il lessico della libertà nel "Liber legum regionum." (testo siriaco e versione greca), in Pensiero e istituzioni del mondo classico nelle culture del Vicino Oriente, ed. R. Bianca Finazzi - A. Valvo, Alessandria 2001, 237-255.

C. Gianotto

PHILIPPI. "The city of Philippi was once called Datos and, even before, Krēnides, because of the numerous springs of water (krēnai) which emerge from its hills. Philip II of Macedon furnished it with fortifications, because it was the most flourishing city of *Thrace, and named it for himself as Philippi" (Appian, Bell. civ. 105, 439). A city of *Macedonia, it is on the Via Egnatia; after the battle of Philippi in 42 BC it became a Roman colony with Roman organization. The apostle *Paul reached it with his followers at the end of 49–50, from Troas, following the vision that disclosed new paths and opened new horizons to him in his apostolic mission (Acts 16:8-10). From the first years of Christianity nothing is preserved at Philippi that might shed light on the organization, worship and activity of the first community. The small and poor environments which probably were transformed into domestic churches have been destroyed. The church discovered several years ago belongs to the 2nd half of the 2nd c.

Late Antiquity is the period of maximum splendor of Christianity at Philippi. It is not logical, however, to expect grand Christian religious edifices immediately after the *persecutions. In the center of the city, to the E of the agora, is an important "Macedonian" tomb of the 2nd c. BC with a rich assortment of golden objects (a crown of oak leaves, a finely worked diadem, etc.). Above the funeral chamber there was a construction in the form of a naos, of which the foundations remain. It is a monument dedicated to the deceased hero Euephenes Exekestou, as the epigraph of the sarcophagus says, and who, as is deduced from some discoveries, being a priest of the Cabeiri, was also considered, acc. to a later legend, the founder of the city and was venerated with a particular cult. Next to this late Hellenistic tomb the first house of prayer of the Christian community of Philippi was founded: a single-aisled hall with an apse with rectilinear termination, whose form appears to be conditioned by the presence of a street linking the Via Egnatia with the market street, which bounded the Roman forum to the S. The construction up to the limit of the altar, 10.5 m (34.5 ft) high, following successive enlargement reached 18 m (59 ft). The restructuring allowed the late Hellenistic tomb to be included in the construction. A transversal wall, more or less at the center of the oratory, in which arcades or passages must have been opened, divided the hall into two areas: probably this fulfilled the function of supporting the roof. The *mosaic decoration of the floor corresponded to this internal articulation of the edifice. The E part includes six sectors, placed side by side in pairs and surrounded by panels, with intervals enlivened with trees, peacocks and small birds that pick at fruit or else *peacocks next to vases, stems that sprout from the vases, etc. On the E side of this composition, at the center of the tabula ansata, an inscription on three lines, composed of golden, red, blue and white tesserae, reads: ΠΟΡΦΥΡΙΟΣ ΕΠΙΣΚΟΠΟΣ ΤΗΝ ΚΕΝΤΗΣΙΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗΣ ΠΑΥΛΟΥ ΕΠΟΙΗΣΕΝ ΕΝ ΧΡΙΣΤΩ. The Bishop *Porphyry to whom the inscription refers is the noted bishop of Philippi who was a signatory at the synod of *Serdica (342–343). In the years of his episcopal ministry, Porphyry substituted the present mosaic for an older and coarser one, less valuable, which covered the floor. The construction of the church can therefore be dated back several decades, but still after the *Edict of Milan (313). The other mosaic composition that covers the floor of the S part of the church is divided into four grand sectors in which animal and floral themes are enclosed in a geometric decoration. At the center of these sectors an inscription with black letters on a white field has been discovered: ΧΡΙΣΤΕ ΒΟΗΘΙ ΤΟΥ ΔΟΥΛΟΥ ΠΡΙΣΚΟΥ ΣΥΝ ΠΑΝΤΙ ΤΟΥ ΟΙΚΟΥ ΑΥΤΟΥ. Around the end of the 4th c. Philippi began to lose the urban outline that the Romans had given it with sumptuous public edifices and streets on a regular plan. With the peace of the church, the ecclesiastical Christian architecture began to develop, of which we will record the principal monuments.

The octagonal basilica. Born from a small church dedicated to St. Paul, it became the cathedral of the city. It is an octagonal construction with an internal peribolos of columns that make a deambulatory within the central nucleus: to the E is the shallow apse with the subsellia; to the W a narthex slightly larger than the naos. To the W of the narthex, and of the same size, is placed the triporticoed atrium with the font, which occupies the space of the W portico. To the S a semicircular vestibule (propylaeum) opens that, with a monumental entrance with three flights of stairs, links the temple with the market street. The floor is in marble slabs; the perimeter walls of the hall and the atrium had rich decorations in marble and in opus sectile with various themes (plants, fish, etc.). Around the middle of the 5th c., the octagonal structure was transformed by the insertion of an inscribed square, the enlargement of the apse, new subsellia and the addition of galleries. In the 1st half of the 6th c., in the first inscribed octagon very few structural modifications were done, limited to reinforcing with plinths the corner pilasters of the temple, forming four angular apses, which therefore underwent alterations. The angular pilasters, having become thicker, altered the original proportions of the building; the atrium, which linked the octagon A and B, together with the font and the splendid vestibule that opened to the market street, was eliminated and replaced with a modest courtyard open to the sky. Centered on the octagon were the constructions indispensable for liturgical life: to the NW the font, to the NE the baptistery, perhaps the best preserved of its kind in all its parts (vestibule, changing room, cathecumeneum, hall of the baptistery, in the middle of which was found the cruciform pool, and chrismarium linked with the E sector of the naos). More to the N, separated from the complex of the baptistery by a dividing wall, the structure of a bath has been discovered, used from the late Hellenistic era until the destruction of the city. To the NE of the octagon an imposing episcopal palace on two levels has come to light, whose architectonic phases mirror those of the octagonal basilica. The complex of the octagon constitutes a scheme of paleo-Christian ecclesiastical architecture rare if not unique in the area of the E basin of the Mediterranean, including *Syria.

The basilica outside the walls. To the E, 500 m (.3 mi) from the walls of Philippi are the ruins of a paleo-Christian basilica brought to light in the years 1956–1957, 33 m x 15.5 m (108 ft x 50.9 ft): it has three aisles, galleries and a semicircular apse to the E with presbyterial bench. Nothing remains in the space of the altar except the altar of consecration and the thalassidion. The naos proper reveals two architectonic periods; it was preceded by a narthex and by a quadriporticos, of which it has been possible to excavate only the E portion. Along the N perimeter wall five areas were attached; the functions of three of them have been identified. The smallest zone, to the NW, functioned as a landing for the entrance stairway to the galleries; the other two, as could be certified from the discoveries, were the place of the offerings (prothesis) and the room of the deacons (diaconicon). In the 4th c. the basilica had a transept with stylobate columns and a floor mosaic with geometrical, animal or vegetable figures framed in multicolored cornices of various kinds. Below the pavement of the basilica, in correspondence with the naves and the narthex, many vaulted or chest tombs have been discovered, for the most part of clerics, and also inscriptions now preserved in the local museum. The foundation of the basilica dates back to the middle of the 4th c., i.e., to the reign of *Constantius II (337–361). The coins of a later date found in more recent levels of the construction belong to the era of *Theodosius II (408–450). In 473 the *Goths reached Philippi without succeeding, however, in taking the city: "they made only raids outside the walls of the city and did not perform any other cruelty" (Malchus, ed. Bonn 1829, 234ff.). It is nevertheless obvious that in the course of this incursion the basilica that was outside the walls, "in front of the city," was partially destroyed. It is not possible to tell if restorations were carried out: perhaps the church remained abandoned for several decades or perhaps it was used in a haphazard way until the epoch of Justinian, when in the works of rebuilding it underwent the above-mentioned modifications. The second period of the basilica was finished a little before the era of Leo VI (886–912). In the 5th c. in particular, but also in the 6th, other splendid churches were built at Philippi, without the Octagon losing its ancient prerogative as the cathedral of the city. Another basilica has been discovered 400 m (437.5 yd) to the S of this basilica, datable between the end of the 4th and beginning of the 5th c., with three aisles and a narthex with mosaic floor; next to the basilica is a sepulchral complex made up of two chambers and a common vestibule.

Basilica A. Built around the end of the 5th c. at the foot of the acropolis, above a natural terrace situated to the N of the Roman forum, it is notable for its dimensions of 130 m x 50 m (426.5 ft x 164 ft). The basilica was connected to the Via Egnatia through a monumental staircase that reached into the atrium or quadriporticos, whose S side was occupied by a fountain for ablutions, which presented itself as a structure on two floors. In the thick wall of the pool five niches open: the central, larger than the others, served as a sacristy and for other liturgical necessities; the others, alternatively square and semicircular, were closed with parapets that made little basins. From the atrium, three entrances led to the narthex and from here as many doors admitted into the basilical interior of three aisles with transept. In the altar the hollow of the consecration stone and the series of subsellia on the N and S sides have been discovered. On the N side of the basilica is the staircase, which leads to the galleries and two other areas whose function is unknown.

Basilica C. More to the W and a short distance from Basilica A, a three-aisled basilica has been discovered, with transept, rich furnishing of *sculpture and splendid marble decoration in the lateral sectors of the transept, with tribunes, a narthex, an atrium to the N and annexes in a more elevated position, which were accessed via a stair, and a hall that served as diaconicon, i.e., a deposit of the offerings that did not serve for the eucharistic service (cf. Apostolic Canons* 3). In the 6th c. it underwent modifications for liturgical adaptation with the creation of an inscribed transept and with various other interventions; the date has been confirmed by the discovery of a coin of Justinian.

Basilica B is a domed basilica, built around 550 in the center of the Roman city, to the S of the forum, on the market street. It has three aisles separated by colonnades of six columns, a large altar and semicircular apse extending to the E, narthex to the W, and rooms laid out along the perimeter, among which is the fountain for the ablutions and an extension to the N. The sculptures that decorated capitals, bases, abacuses and gates are of exceptional quality, comparable to those of Hagia Sophia of Constantinople. This basilica has been placed in relationship with Bishop Demetrius, who had a close relationship with Justinian, and was active in 531–534. From the 7th c., Philippi lost the importance that it had enjoyed for so many centuries. Slowly the monuments fell into ruin, and the city was reduced finally to insignificance. Despite this, the tradition of the veneration of Paul the apostle was kept alive even after the radical destruction of the city at the time of Turkish rule.

P. Lemerle, Les inscriptions latines et grecques de Philippes: BCH 59 (1935) 126-164; P. Collart, Philippes, Ville de Macédoine, Paris 1937; P. Lemerle, Philippes et la Macédoine orientale, Paris 1945; S. Pelekanidis, Ἡ ἔξω τῶν τειχῶν παλαιοχριστιανικὴ βασιλικὴ τῶν Φιλίππων: AE (1955) 114-179; PAAH 1958-1965, 1967-1979 (for a general reconsideration of the excavations of the complex of the Octagon at Philippi); R.F. Hoddinot, Early Byzantine Churches in Macedonia and Southern Serbia, London 1963, 99-116, 169-173, 188-193; S. Pelekanidis, Kultprobleme in Apostel Paulus-Oktagon von Philippi im Zusammenhang mit einem älteren Heroenkult, in Atti del IX congr. int. di Archeologia cristiana, Vatican City 1978, 303-397; A. Mentzos, The Bishop of Philippi Demetrius and the Early Christian Monuments of the City of Philippi: Egnatia 1 (1989) 195-205; V. Abrahamsen, Bishop Porphyrios and the City of Philippi in the Early Fourth Century: VChr 43 (1989) 80-85; E.D. Maguire, A Revolution in Northern Justinianic Capital Design: The Axial Void in Constantinople and Philippi: ByzF 14 (1989) 159-175; G. Gounaris, L'archéologie chrétienne en Grèce de 1974 à 1985, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Intern. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2687-2711, esp. 2707; Tabula Imperii Romani, K-35.1, Philippi, ed. A. Avraméa, Atene 1993; EAA II Suppl. 3, 666-667; L. Bormann, Philippi. Stadt und Christengemeinde zur Zeit des Paulus, Leiden 1995; E. Kourkoutidou-Nikodou - E. Marki, Des innovations liturgiques et architecturales dans la basilique du Musée de Philippes, in Akten des XII. Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, I, Münster 1995, 950-956; C. Pennas, Early Christian Burials at Philippi: ByzF 21 (1995) 215-227; P. Pilhofer, Philippi, I: Die erste christliche Gemeinde; II: Katalog der Inschriften von Philippi, Tübingen 1995–2000; G. Gounaris - G. Velenis, Casa paleocristiana di Filippi, in XIII Acta Congressus intern. Archaeologiae Christianae, ed. N. Cambi - E. Marin, Vatican City 1998, 355ff.

E. Pelekanidou

PHILO, historiographer (between the 4th and 7th c.). He composed an ecclesiastical history (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία), as we learn from two citations of *Anastasius the Sinaite (8th c.). He should not be identified with the bishop *Philo of Carpasia (4th c.; cf. PWK 15, 362ff.).

CPG III, 7512; G. Mercati, Un preteso scritto di san Pietro vescovo d'Alessandria e martire sulla bestemmia e Filone l'istoriografo, in Opere minori, 2, Vatican City 1937, 426-439 (for the fragments: 429-431 and 437-438).

J. Irmscher

PHILO of Alexandria (1st c.). The principal representative of Hellenistic *Judaism. His influence on the *exegesis, theology and spirituality of the *Fathers has been great, through the mediation of *Clement, *Origen, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Ambrose, all of whom knew him directly. He was treated by *Eusebius and *Jerome almost as a Christian, and the preservation of his works seems to be due to Christians. He was several years older than Jesus and still alive in 41. He led an ascetic and contemplative life, and he seems to have carried out the activity of a rabbi. He belonged to an extremely rich Alexandrian business family: his brother Gaius Julius Alexander, called the Alabarch, administered the goods of numerous members of the imperial family and of the Herodian dynasty; his nephew Tiberius would apostatize from Judaism, become procurator of Judea, prefect of *Egypt, finally lieutenant of Titus at the siege of *Jerusalem; his nephew Marcus would be the first husband of the celebrated Berenice. Philo received a fairly profound Greek education, but remained sincerely attached to the Jewish faith. His work is the first, to our knowledge, where the encounter of two cultures takes place on a large scale. He is, however, also the defender of the Jewish community of Alexandria against the pogroms stirred up in 38 by the Prefect Flaccus (cf. In Flaccum) and led the delegation sent to the emperor Caligula (cf. Legatio ad Caium): only the assassination of the mad emperor prevented a disaster.

His work is above all exegetical. Part of his treatises correspond to a literal and moral exegesis: De opificio Mundi, De Abrahamo, De Iosepho, De vita Mosii, De Decalogo, De Specialibus Legibus, De Virtutibus, De Praemiis et Poenis, De Exsecrationibus.

Another part consists in the allegorical explanation of certain passages of Genesis: Legum Allegoriae, De Cherubim, De Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini, Quod Deterius Potiori insidiari soleat, De posteritate Caini, De Gigantibus, Quod Deus sit immutabilis, De Agricultura, De Plantatione, De Ebrietate, De Sobrietate, De Confusione linguarum, De Migratione Abrahami, Quis Rerum Divinarum Haeres sit, De Congressu Eruditionis et gratiae, De Fuga et Inventione, De Mutatione nominum, De Somniis. The two exegetical styles meet in the Quaestiones et Solutiones in Genesim et in Exodum preserved in Armenian. Along with these there are philosophical works: Quod Omnis Probus Liber sit, De Vita contemplativa (which describes the life of Hellenistic Jewish monastic communities, the Therapeutae), De Aeternitate Mundi, De Providentia, De Animalibus. Above we have cited two occasional works, In Flaccum and Legatio ad Caium. His interpretation of the Scripture is multiform. The literal sense is the base of the spiritual one, and he explains it with all the science of his time. At the source of his paideia is found, on the one hand, the Jewish law, esp. the Pentateuch, on the other, Hellenistic culture with the encyclopedic training (grammar, *rhetoric, dialectic, music, geometry, astronomy, physics, etc.), handmaid of *philosophy, this itself subordinated to Wisdom, which is spiritual understanding. He explains the text and its anomalies, he makes a broad use of symbolic arithmetic inspired by the Pythagoreans, and he knows law and jurisprudence, both Jewish and Greek. The spiritual interpretation takes place on various registers. It is finally cosmological: the temple is symbol of the world, and its diverse parts, of regions of the world; the same is true for the vestments of the high priest. From the macrocosm he passes then to the microcosm, from the world to the human: psychological exegesis which reveals intelligence and feeling in the couples *Adam/Eve or Abraham/Sarah. Thus the step to moral allegory is easy, such as that of the animals representing the passions. The essential interpretation, however, is the mystical: reading the text becomes the awareness of a spiritual experience that awakens and expresses itself. For example, take the exegesis of the three patriarchs, developed in De Congressu and repeated everywhere, as three types of acquiring Wisdom: Abraham by study, Jacob by practice (asceticism), and Isaac, the greatest, who possesses it by nature. We cannot dwell on his theology: *God, the Logos, the Powers, the *angels, humanity, the *world.

Philo uses philosophy with regard to theology in an eclectic manner: his inspiration is above all *Stoic and *Platonic acc. to the amalgam inaugurated by Posidonius of Apamea and Middle Stoicism, but *Aristotelianism of other schools is not absent from his works. His biblical exegesis can be found elsewhere in the diverse genres of rabbinical interpretation. It is not, however, without links to that of the Stoics Cornutus and Chaeremon, applied to Greek mythology or to Egyptian traditions. He influenced patristic exegesis despite the fact that he differed on an essential point, the central role occupied by Christ. Despite being fully Greek, Philo remained a Jew in his fundamental convictions, a Jew who often was close to being a Christian in his theology and spirituality: to be mentioned are the affirmation that God alone works virtuous action in the *soul and that humans should give him thanks; the distinction between the Creator and the creature that replaces the more Greek one of the incorporeal and the corporeal; finally, the importance given to charity.

L. Cohn - P. Wendland - J. Reiter, 8 vols., Berlin 1896–1930; F.H. Colson, 12 vols. (with Eng. tr.), London 1928–1952; R. Arnaldez - J. Poilloux - Cl. Mondésert, 36 vols. (with Fr. tr.), Paris from 1961. For a general introduction, see J. Daniélou, Philon d'Alexandrie, Paris 1958, and the extensive intr. of R. Arnaldez in vol. 1 of the Fr. ed. Bibliography: D. T. Runia, Philo of Alexan- dria: An Annotated Bibliography, 1987–1996; with addenda for 1937–1986*, with the assistance of H.M. Keizer, Leiden 2000. It. tr., ed. by R. Radice - C. Kraus Reggiani, Milan 1986ff.; G. Bolognesi, Studi e ricerche sulle antiche traduzioni armene di testi greci, Alessandria 2000; P. Borgen, Philo of Alexandria, an Exegete for His Time, Leiden-New York 1997; J. Leonhardt, Jewish Worship in Philo of Alexandria, Tübingen 2001; "Studia Philonica Annual" (specialized periodical).

H. Crouzel

PHILO of Carpasia (d. beginning of 5th c.). Bishop of Carpasia (*Cyprus). A deacon and an expert in the interpretation of the *Scripture, contemporaneous with *Epiphanius of Salamis, he seems to have been ordained by him a bishop (Vita S. Epiph. II, 49). He wrote a Commentary on the Song of Songs. Of this work there remains a summary of the Greek text, published by Giacomelli in 1772, and a Latin translation, important because it is closer to the original, prepared by *Epiphanius Scholasticus, friend of *Cassiodorus. The latter, however, attributed the work of Philo to the more famous Epiphanius of Salamis (Inst. I, 5,4). Passages of the Commentary were used in the *catenae of *Procopius and of ps.-*Eusebius on the *Song of Songs, and in the Christian Topography of *Cosmas Indicopleustes. Philonian exegesis, based on the traditional identification of Christ as the bridegroom and the church as his bride, is modest and is a compilation. In Ethiopian there is a paschal homily that is inspired in large measure by the In sanctum pascha of ps.-*Hippolytus.

PG 40, 27-154 (M. Giacomelli); A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Commento al "Cantico dei Cantici" di Filone di Carpasia, Turin 1979 (CP 6) (the ed. of the Latin version and tr.); BBKL 7, 539; DSp 12, 1374-1377; S.J. Voicu, Filone di Carpasia e Pseudo Ippolito: di un'omelia pasquale tramandata in etiopico: Augustinianum 44 (2004) 5-24.

E. Prinzivalli

PHILOCALIA. *Gregory of Nazianzus sent to his metropolitan *Theodore of Tyana an *Origenian anthology, in memory of *Basil, recently deceased. There is reason to think that the work was composed by Gregory himself and his friend likely around 360, at the beginning of their theological studies; the fact need not surprise us, if we recall that the two already possessed an exceptional maturity. The work, which in the original has preserved some remarkable pages of Origen, concerns itself mainly with exegetical method and the doctrine of liberty, passing over in silence controversial theological themes.

CPG/S 1502; J. Robinson, The Philocalia of Origen, Cambridge 1893; E. Junod, Origène. Philocalie 21-27 (SC 226), Paris 1976 (the other chapters have been published in SC with the works of Origen to which they belong); M. Harl - N. de Lange, Origène, Philocalie (SC 302), Paris 1983; DSp 12, 1336-1352; LACL 576.

J. Gribomont

PHILOCALUS (or Filocalus), Furius Dionysius (d. ca. 382). Author of the calendar called the Chronography of 354*, whose frontispiece is signed Furius Dionysius Filocalus titulavit. The name of Philocalus remains linked to the work of Pope *Damasus, for whom he carved the famous epigrams, by which the deeds of the martyrs were celebrated. For these epigraphs, Philocalus elaborated characters new in their proportions and their heights: these, defined later as philocalian characters, represent an important stage in the history of *paleography and *epigraphy.

PCBE 2, 820-822; DNP 4, 518; M.R. Salzmann, On Roman Time. The Codex-Calendar of 354 and the Rhythms of Urban Life in Late Antiquity, Berkeley, CA 1990, 3, 26, 202-205; A. Cameron, Filocalus and Melania: Classical Philology 87 (199) 140-144; G. Binder, Der Kalender des Filocalus. Eine illustrierte Ausgabe des römischen Festkalenders aus dem 4. Jahr. n. Chr., in Der Kalender, ed. W. Geerlings, Paderborn 2002, 61-83.

G. Pilara

PHILOGONIUS of Antioch (d. 324). Bishop of Antioch when the Arian controversy began, he was among the adversaries of *Arius, and the Arius mentions him in the letter to *Eusebius of Nicomedia as one of those who conceived of the generation of the Son from the Father in a way unacceptable for him. He died between 324 and 325, a few months before the Council of *Nicaea.

DCB 4, 389-390; Fedalto 2, 682.

M. Simonetti

PHILOMENA, martyr. There never existed a martyr venerated in antiquity with this name; the BHL and BHG do not offer a hagiographic dossier. The inscription Pax tecum, Filumena (ICUR 23234), found above a sepulcher in the catacombs of Priscilla and the bones found there 25 May 1802 were considered to belong to a martyr, because there was a vase that contained a liquid held to be blood (G.B. de Rossi, Sulla questione del vaso di sangue, Vatican City 1944). Hagiographic and biographical romances were written, based on the Revelations of the third-order Dominican sister Maria Luisa di Gesù and on the Historic Relation of the translation of the priest of Nola, Francesco De Lucia. When the body of Philomena had been transferred to Mugnano (diocese of Nola), miracles immediately took place, so that the spot become a pilgrimage destination and the celebrity of Philomena became universal. The Curé d'Ars attributed his own miracles to her mediation. Philomena became "the saint of the 19th century"; the Sacred Congregation of Rites permitted the possibility of veneration in 1837 (feast day 11 August), but suspended it in 1961 (AAS 53, 1961, 174).

BS 5, 796-800; BBKL 7, 521-523; E. Trapp, Philomena. Ein Beitrag zur christlichen Kunst des 19. Jahrhunderts: RQA 86 (1991) 252-260.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PHILOSOPHY and ANCIENT CHRISTIANITY. In relation to ancient Christianity, the term philosophy (love of wisdom) refers to the various ways Greek thought, starting from the 6th c. BC, seeks to understand and explain the realities (truths) and the meaning of the cosmos: the "Presocratic" philosophers (e.g., Heraclitus ca. 544–ca. 483 BC and Pythagoras 540–ca. 500 BC), the two greatest thinkers *Plato (427–347 BC) and *Aristotle (384–322 BC), the schools of *Stoicism (e.g., Zeno ca. 335–ca. 262 BC, Seneca ca. 4 BC–AD 65, Epictetus ca. AD 50–ca. 130 and the emperor *Marcus Aurelius 121–180 AD), of Neo-Pythagoreanism (e.g., *Apollonius of Tyana, 1st c. AD), of *Middle Platonism and of *Neoplatonism (e.g., *Ammonius Saccas ca. 175–ca. 242, *Plotinus 204/205–269/270, *Porphyry of Tyre 234–302/305, *Iamblicus ca. 240/50–ca. 325, *Proclus 412–485). With the integration of Greece into the Roman Empire in the 2nd c. BC, Hellenism began to permeate the entire Mediterranean culture in a syncretistic form of thought and way of life. In the Latin area Cicero (106–43 BC) tried to translate Greek philosophy for the West into a unitary and homogenous system. These ancient philosophies, furthermore, also embraced theology (investigations on God) and *ethics, assuming thus an aspect more attractive for the Christian milieu.

Until the era of the Reformation (Erasmus of Rotterdam, Melanchthon) the idea was transmitted acc. to which only the Greek *apologists, starting from the middle of the 2nd c., had introduced philosophical categories into Christian theology in order to defend the faith from *persecutions, whether concrete or intellectual. In reality, *Fronto of Cirta, teacher of the emperor *Marcus Aurelius (121–180), considered one of the great philosophers of his time, pronounced a public discourse on the absurdity of the Christian faith. The sophist *Lucian of Samosata mocked the ideas of love of neighbor and martyrdom in his satire De morte Peregrini (ca. 170). In this work the author supposes that Peregrinus has killed himself driven by the ardent desire for God, and suggests that all the Christians should follow his example. The Alexandrian Platonist *Celsus composed a book titled Ἀληθὴς Λόγος (ca. 178), in which he appreciates the Christian doctrine of a Logos and also the very high ethic of the Christians. The *incarnation of the Logos in the person of Christ and his resurrection, on the other hand, seemed to the Greek philosopher to be totally unacceptable ideas. Furthermore, the idea was created that Christian theology had begun only at this point: Before Celsus, Christianity was based on the "simple" message of the gospel born in the Semitic-Judaic environment. While the Catholic Church has always accepted philosophy as a suitable progress in the expression of the faith, in the 1700s Protestant thinkers began to consider it rather as an abandonment of the original truth of the gospel (e.g., A. Gottfried, Unparteische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie, Frankfurt a.M. 1699–1700, repr. 1967–1999). The resulting thesis of the "Hellenization of Christianity" of Adolf von Harnack (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Freiburg i.Br. 1886–1889) then had a strong following for almost a century. Only from 1958 did Jean Daniélou open the route toward a Jewish Christian theology, and the later hermeneutic development in the context of the research on "Antike und Christentum" clarified that the shape of this theology was much more a matter of a complex of ambivalent influences of acceptance and refusal, which transformed all the interested parties.

First of all, one must understand that an exclusively Semitic Christianity had never existed, because, from the 3rd c. BC, *Judaism also was subject to the direct and indirect influence of Hellenism, both in *Palestine and even more in the Diaspora (esp. in *Alexandria), as the translation of the *Bible into Greek (Septuaginta) and Jewish authors such as *Philo of Alexandria (20 BC–AD 42) prove. The writings of the NT also confirm this fact. The first converts to Christianity during the feast of Pentecost at Jerusalem were "Parthians, Medes, Elamites, inhabitants of Mesopotamia, of Judea and *Cappadocia, of *Pontus and *Asia, of *Phrygia and of Pamphilia, of *Egypt and the regions of *Libya near Cyrene, Romans who live here, Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabs" (Acts 2), that is to say, Hellenized Jews from the entire Mediterranean Diaspora and the Near East. In the Areopagus of *Athens *Paul presented his "new doctrine" to Epicurean and Stoic philosophers, and only when he began to speak about the *resurrection of the dead, "Some scoffed at it, and others said, 'On this we will hear you another time'" (Acts 17:17-33). Philosophy and the faith, therefore, never have reconciled without problems: "For Jews demand signs and Greeks seek wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified, a stumbling block to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. For the foolishness of God is wiser than men. . . . God chose what is foolish in the world to shame the wise" (1 Cor 1:22-27). "See to it that no one make a prey of you by philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits of the universe and not according to Christ" (Col 2:8). Despite the numerous enticing resemblances with philosophy—such as the idea of the transcendence of the One, of the three hypotheses or *hypostases, of the supreme good, of the demiurge, of the divine Logos and the logoi of the world, of νοῦς, of the *soul, of the virtues and of *divinization—the Christian doctrines of the creatio ex nihilo, of an incarnate God, dead and risen for the salvation of human beings because of his love, and the disposition of the Christians to follow him as far as martyrdom with the hope of the resurrection of the flesh, remained an irreconcilable scandal.

Therefore, certain theologians absolutely opposed the entire Hellenistic culture. The Oratio ad Graecos of *Tatian (155–170) considered all the conquests of which the Greeks were proud, their *rhetoric, poetry, philosophy and ethics as barbarian and void of any value. They knew nothing of the truth, because this is found only in the OT, which is older than all the Greek philosophy. In his Apologeticum 47-48 (197), *Tertullian rejected the use of the term philosophy for the Christian faith, and in De praescriptione haereticorum 7 (a few years before 207/208) began from Col 2:8 to identify philosophy as the root of the *heresies: "The same questions are brooded over by heretics and by philosophers. . . . From whom do those myths derive, and those sterile genealogies and those discourses which go sideways like a crab: from these the Apostle keeps us far away. . . . What do they have in common, then, Athens and Jerusalem? The academy and the church? The heretics and the Christians?" The majority of Christian theologians, on the other hand, accepted philosophy as a propaedeutic instrument for reflecting on and proclaiming the Christian faith: *Justin Martyr "the philosopher" (d. 165), *Clement of Alexandria (140/150–before 215/216), *Origen (ca. 185–254), *Marius Victorinus (282/291–a little after 362), *Gregory of Nyssa (335/340–after 394), *John Chrysostom (ca. 350–407), *Augustine (354–430), *Maximus the Confessor (ca. 580–662), ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite (end of the 5th or beginning of the 6th c.), *Boethius (475/480–ca. 525) and many others. Certainly, they too knew to distinguish between divine wisdom (the Logos) and human wisdom: "It is one thing to become wise only through the Wisdom of God and another to carry the Person himself of the Wisdom of God" (Augustine, De agone Christiano 20,22; cf. Gal. exp. 27). Intellege ut credas, crede ut intellegas (Augustine, Sermo 43,9). Therefore Christianity is the verissima filosofia (Augustine, Contra Academicos 3,20-22.42; De civitate Dei 10,32), because it was revealed by God himself.

At the same time one should not forget that the conception cannot be maintained acc. to which the ancient church was permeated by philosophy to the exclusion of any reservations. Certainly the great theologians, those who produced the great ancient Christian literature and who had a decisive influence on the councils regarding the development of theology, imported their classical education which culminated in the study of philosophy. On the other hand, every little center of the empire had its bishop, who took part in synods. From the 3rd c. many bishops had received in the monasteries an exclusively biblical education, others had little or no education, and some were not able to sign their own name. But beyond the names we know little or nothing about them, and with the exception of *Epiphanius of Salamis (310/320–403), almost none of them published anything. Despite all this, during the centuries of the great controversies, esp. under the influence of the monks, the opposition to philosophy grew—a field perhaps as yet too little studied.

The various philosophical schools exercised influences of various intensity. Epicureanism seems not to have had any influence on Christianity and *Aristotelianism little, mostly in syncretic contexts. In the NT a certain presence of Neo-Pythagoreanism is felt in the literary dimension of Jesus as θεῖος ἀνήρ, and of Cynicism in the Pauline letters. In the first two Christian centuries *Stoicism predominated, which had also assimilated Platonic and Aristotelian elements. This was the system that permeated the literary and philosophical interests of the apologists. Among the monks the figure of the Stoic sage Epictetus was esp. popular. In first place, however, is without doubt Plato and his successors in Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism, above all Plotinus, *Porphyry and Iamblicus. The Fathers admired Plato as the author of the most inspired philosophy, a true theology, and read his books frequently, which were also translated into Latin: Parmenides, Phaedo, Phaedrus, Symposium, Theaetetus, Timaeus, De republica. For several decades the relationship between *Platonism and Christianity has been discussed: perhaps they only used the same terminology, which however in the two contexts expressed totally different realities? Or was the Platonic doctrine "baptized" by Christians, creating misunderstandings? Or rather, did the Christian message change under the influence of philosophy? Given the fact that Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism developed contemporaneously (Plotinus and Origen were school companions of the same *Ammonius Saccas) and in consideration of modern hermeneutics, maybe one should rather look for the reciprocal influence of philosophy and Christianity.

Christian philosophy continued to handle the traditional questions of humanity from its new point of view centered on salvation in Christ: (1) The origin and end of the universe, including the stars and all the creatures; the one God as creator along with the Logos and Holy Spirit; the creatio ex nihilo; the divinization of human beings through the virtues and the struggle with the passions; and sometimes also the restoration of everything, also of the fallen angels, to the primordial state (apokatastasis*). (2) The person of God, *providence and the *free will of humankind (theodicy). (3) Human persons as beings composed of *body and *soul, intelligence (γνῶσις, mens) and personality. (4) Time and history as integral parts of the divine *creation, which has as its goal the salvation of all people "of good will" (cf. Lk 2:14). The history of salvation has its beginning in the creation on the part of God and develops acc. to the divine plan up to the last judgment. Its culmination is the incarnation of the Son of God. (5) *Ethics: virtues and duties private and public (political), the origin of evil, passions, based on the fundamental idea of God as the source and end of every good, of following Christ, and of the double commandment of love toward God and toward neighbor (cf. Mt 22:37-40).

The use of philosophical terms and concepts was particularly important for the development of trinitarian theology and of *Christology from the 4th to 7th c. It was toward the year 318 when the Alexandrian priest *Arius made use of a (Neo-)Platonic vocabulary in order to develop and clarify the trinitarian doctrine of Origen, which he had formulated in the context of Middle Platonism. Starting from 362, *Apollinarius of Laodicea added a term close to Stoicism to better explain the unity of God and man in Christ. From then the debates of theologians and of the great councils of this period (*Nicaea 325, *Constantinople 381, *Ephesus 431, *Chalcedon 451, Constantinople II 553, Constantinople III 680/681) turned on words and formulas such as ἀγέν(ν)ητος, ἀληθινὸς θεός, ἀρχή , ἐνέργεια, ἡγεμονικόν, θέλος, ἰδιότης, ἰδιώματα, ὁμοούσιος, ὁμοιουσιος, ὅμοιος, οὐσία, πρόσωπον, ὑπόστασις, φύσις, μία οὐσία—τρεὶς ὑποστάσεις, μία φύσις τοῦ Λόγου σεσαρκομένη, ἕν πρόσωπον καὶ μία ὑπόστασις ἐν δύο φύσεσιν, communicatio idiomatum, consubstantialis, essentia, natura, persona, una persona in utraque natura, subsistentia, substantia and many others. On this foundation the hypothesis of the "Hellenization of Christianity" was inspired.

The modern study of the ancient Christian philosophy, however, as stated above, should rather investigate the relationships between philosophy and Christianity as a phenomenon of mutual influence in the context of multiple interactions with the entire ancient world.

Numerous specific entries in this encyclopedia handle in more detail the complex relationship between Christian thought and Greek thought; in particular, see *Aristotelianism, *Hellenism and Christianity, *Hellenistic Judaism, *pantheism, *Platonism and the Fathers, *Stoicism and the Fathers.

L. Bieler, θεῖος ἀνήρ. Das Bild des "Göttlichen Menschen" in Spätantike und Frühchristentum, 2 vols., Vienna 1935–1936 (repr. Darmstadt 1967); P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris 1948; M. Spanneut, Le stoïcisme des pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Aléxandrie, Paris ²1957; A.H. Armstrong - R.A. Markus, Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy, London 1960; J. Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée, Tome I: Théologie du Judéo-Christianisme, 2e Édition, Texte établi sur l'édition italienne de 1974, revu et corrigé, Tournai 1991; Tome II: Message évangélique et culture hellénistique aux IIe et IIIe siècles, Tournai 1961; C. Tresmontant, La métaphysique du christianisme et la naissance de la philosophie chrétienne, Paris 1961; E. v. Ivánka, Plato Christianus. Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die Väter, Einsiedeln 1964; H.A. Wolfson, The Philosophy of the Church Fathers. I: Faith, Trinity, Incarnation, Cambridge, MA ²1964; A.H. Armstrong, The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967; C.R. Holladay, θεῖος ἀνήρ in Hellenistic Judaism. A Critique of the Use of this Category in New Testament Christology, Missoula, MT 1977; C. Andresen, Antike und Christentum: TRE 3 (1978) 50-99; Ch. Gnilka, CRHSIS. Die Methode der Kirchenväter im Umgang mit der antiken Kultur. I: Der Begriff des "rechten Gebrauchs," Basel-Stuttgart 1984; M.L. Colish, The Stoic Tradition from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, 2 vols., Leiden 1985; E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity, Grand Rapids, MI 1987; ANRW II, 36.1-3 (1987–1989); B. Blackburn, θεῖος ἀνήρ and the Markan Miracle Traditions. A Critique of the θεῖος ἀνήρ Concept as an Interpretative Background of the Miracle Traditions Used by Mark, Tübingen 1991; C. Colpe et al., eds., Spätantike und Christentum. Beiträge zur Religions- und Geistesgeschichte der griechisch-römischen Kultur und Zivilisation der Kaiserzeit, Berlin 1992; F.G. Downing, Cynics and Christian Origins, Edinburgh 1992; D. Ramos-Lissón et al., eds., El diálogo fe-cultura en la antigüedad cristiana, Pamplona 1996; F.G. Downing, Cynics, Paul and the Pauline Churches, London 1998; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004.

H. DROBNER

PHILOSTORGIUS (d. ca. 430). A writer of ecclesiastical history, born around 368 in the village of Borissus in *Cappadocia, he died after 425 (in his works he refers to events of that year). He was a *layman, but we have no information as to his profession. He arrived in *Constantinople as a 20-year-old and lived there, leaving occasionally for travels (among others in *Palestine and to *Antioch) which increased his exposure to culture: in fact he demonstrates that he knows geography, astronomy and natural sciences. The change of his life was determined by the encounter with Eunomius, his compatriot, a disciple of *Aetius and head of the intransigent *Arians: from then on he shared the destinies of the *Anomoians and his work was extraordinarily influenced as a result.

Two writings (ἐγκώμιον of Eunomius; ἀγῶνες against *Porphyry) mentioned by him in the Historia Ecclesiastica are lost. The complete text of this work did not reach us either, but we have ample extracts edited by Bidez and known beforehand through the editions of J. Gothofredus (Geneva 1643) and H. Valesius (Paris 1673). The work, conceived as a continuation of that of Eusebius, included the events between 320 (beginning of the Arian controversy) and 425; it was divided into two tomes, each one introduced by an epigram (Anth. Pal. IX, 193-194), of twelve books total, of which the initial letters, reunited, made an acrostic with the name of the author. Photius (Bibl., cod. 40) knew the entire work. He made a summary of it, preserved for us by the MS tradition (cod. Barocc. 142 and its descendants), not always exact and somewhat tendentious, because he omitted whatever was in contrast with orthodoxy. Numerous other fragments of the HE have also been found in the Artemii Passio (PG 96, 1251-1320), drawn up before the 10th c. by John of Rhodes, and in the Suda (acc. to the character of the lexicon, it is a story of famous persons such as the martyr Babylas, Agapetus of Synada, Auxentius of Mopsuestia, *Leontius of Tripoli). Excerpta are also in the Thesaurus orthodoxae fidei of Nicetas Acominatus and above all in the Vita Constantini of the cod. Angel. 22, edited by H.G. Opitz (Byzantion 9 [1934] 535-593): here the author summarized a compilation of the HE done by others and in which every heretical excess had been eliminated. The sources used by Philostorgius are unknown. He certainly used letters of emperors, Acts of councils and martyrs and perhaps also the work of *Eunapius. *Paganism and Catholic orthodoxy are his enemies, and the persecution of heretics, as Battifol has revealed (Quaestiones, 12), led him to apocalyptic views: thus in the misfortunes of the Roman Empire he recognized the realization of divine anger and of the prophecies of Daniel and the gospels. The apologetic intent toward the Arianism of Aetius and Eunomius led him above all to cite documents of Arian origin: precisely this factionalism makes the HE valuable to round out knowledge of a historic period for which the majority of the sources are orthodox. *Photius (Bibl., cod. 40) acknowledged a certain elegance of style in Philostorgius.

CPG 3, 6032; PG 65, 460-637; GCS 21, Berlin 1972; E. Walford, The Ecclesiastical History of Sozomen . . . also the Ecclesiastical History of Philostorgius as Epitomized by Photius, London 1855; P. Batiffol, Quaestiones Philostorgianae, Paris 1891; L. Jeep, Zur Ueberlieferung des Philostorgius, TU 17, 3b, 2; Schmid-Stählin, Geschichte: HAW VII, 2, 2, 1433-1434; P. Heseler, Neues zur Vita Constantini des codex Angelicus 22: Byzantion 10 (1935) 399-402; J. Bidez, Fragments nouveaux de Philostorge sur la vie de Constantin: Byzantion 10 (1935) 403-442; G. Fritz, Philostorge: DTC 12, 1495-1498; G. Geutz, Philostorgios: PWK 20, 119-122; G. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica I, Berlin 1958, 473-474; Quasten II, 535-537; G. Fernández Hernández, La elección episcopal de Atanasio de Alejandría según Filostorgio: Gerión 3 (1985) 211-229; G. Zecchini, Filostorgio, in Metodologie della ricerca sulla tarda antichità, ed. A. Garzya, Naples 1989, 579-598; D. Woods, Three Notes on Aspects of the Arian Controversy c. 354–367 CE: JTS 44 (1993) 604-619; R.J. Penella, Julian the Persecutor in Fifth-Century Church Historians: Ancient World 24 (1993) 31-43; I. Tantillo, Filostorgio e la tradizione sul testamento di Costantino: Athenaeum 88 (2000) 559-563; W.I. Argov, Giving the Heretic a Voice. Philostorgius of Borissus and Greek Ecclesiastical Historiography: Athenaeum 89 (2001) 497-524.

A. Labate

PHILOTHEUS. A monk of Our Lady of the Burning Bush, in *Sinai, of uncertain date, he wrote, in the *hesychast line of *John Climacus and of Hesychius, several spiritual works (CPG 7864-7866) published in part in the Philocalia of Nicodemus the Agiorite (Athens 1958, II, 274-286), in part in PG 98, 1369-1372, with a further fragment under the name of Philotheos Kokkinos, PG 154, 729-745 (see the indications in col. 717, nn. 21 and 22). See the MSS, hesychastic collections written in Mount Athos in the 14th c.: Vat. gr. 658, 703, 730; Marc. II 73; Vindob. theol. gr. 156, 224, 228. Another collection, not recorded in CPG, is in the Italian Greek MS Paris. Suppl. gr. 1277. According to Beck (453-454) these writings would be later than Simeon the New Theologian; certainly, they do not belong to antiquity.

Patrologia V, 286.

J. Gribomont

PHILOTHEUS, catenist (5th–6th c.). Author of a biblical *catena, which was constituted perhaps between the 2nd half of the 5th c. and the 1st half of the 6th c. The terminus ad quem is reconstructed on the base of the lemmas of authors and the prologue, which confer on *Theodoret the attribute "blessed" and the title "saint" respectively, honors which were revoked after the condemnation of the Council of *Constantinople in 553. The Philotheus named in the prologue, "Philotheus, nourished with the study of the (sacred) Scriptures," is probably the compiler of the catena and not a late copyist of the same. We know nothing else about him. Among writers who have the name Philotheus, he could be the monk of Our Lady of the Burning Bush, in Sinai, who lived before Simeon the New Theologian. Our catena transmits two authors, of whom the commentary on the Minor Prophets has reached us: Theodoret, a continuous commentary; *Hesychius of Jerusalem, a scholiastic one.

Patrologia V, 640-646.

M.A. Barbàra

PHILOXENUS of Mabbug (d. 523). By his ferocious battles whether political or doctrinal, by his assiduous action with the monks of *Syria, Philoxenus was the principal craftsman of the installation of the Severian regime at *Antioch and deserves the title of pioneer of Syrian monophysitism. Even though his memory has been eclipsed by that of *Severus, what remains of his works reveals an original theological synthesis, expressed in very beautiful language, which is located at the point of encounter between the Syriac (*Ephrem and *John of Apamaea) and the Alexandrian (*Athanasius, *Cyril and *Evagrius) traditions.

He was a native of the province of Beit Garmai, where he was born around 440, and had the name Xenaias (perhaps Joseph). Probably he was sent very early to the theological school of the Persians at *Edessa. At the end of a solid education he embraced the Cyrillian ideology, abandoning the Nestorian theology in order to be able to sojourn in the *monasteries of Syria-Mesopotamia and of W Syria. Toward 470 he proceeded to Antioch (at this time he must have taken the Hellenized form of his name) and managed to make himself appreciated by the patriarch *Peter the Fuller. When the latter was removed from his seat (476–484), Philoxenus was expelled as well by the patriarch Calendion (482–484). Sent to Constantinople by the monks of his faction, he obtained from the emperor Zeno the deposition of Calendion and the return of Peter, who ordained him 16 August 485 for the metropolitan see of Mabbug (Hierapolis). Philoxenus dedicated his episcopate, at least until the arrival of Severus to the patriarchal see of Antioch (512), to the fight against the Council of *Chalcedon and the Tome of Pope Leo, to the point of accepting the Henotikon of *Zeno. He employed all his strength, his zeal, his eloquence and his pen to convince the clergy and the monks of his province, rather hostile to his ideas, to support the *monophysites of *Persia and to neutralize his adversaries, the principal of whom was the patriarch of Antioch *Flavian, whom, after ten years of fierce fighting, he caused to be deposed. During the too-few years of the patriarchate of Severus, Philoxenus tried to calm the extremist spirits of the faction. The arrival of the emperor *Justin I (518) put an end to monophysitism at Antioch; Philoxenus, refusing to recant, was deported. He died, tired and at a very advanced age, at Philippopolis in *Thrace.

The works of Philoxenus are divided into two literary groups: those of monastic and those of dogmatic character. For the first, Philoxenus depends on the *Messalian and Evagrian terminology, from which he distances himself by opposing the Syriac tradition. An evolution has also been observed in his attitude toward the "learned spirituality" of Evagrius: this permits the establishment of a relative chronology of his works, otherwise datable with difficulty. Thus the Epistle to Abraham and Orestes follows that to Patricius, which in turn comes after the 13 parenetic mēmrē. To the second group of works, on the other hand, belong tracts, commentaries and letters, which, having a polemical character, are more easily datable. To a first pre-episcopal period belong the Ten mēmrē against Ḥabīb (De uno e sancta trinitate incorporato et passo). The beginnings of his episcopate saw the birth of the great Evangelical Commentaries, which seek to be a pendant of the similar works of *Diodore of Tarsus and of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. To finish this work, Philoxenus had carried out by his suffragan, the Bishop Polycarp, a new translation of the NT more faithful to the Greek; this version, today lost, is known by the name of Philoxeniana. In a third period we see a Philoxenus who hardens his positions, and is anti-Chalcedonian even in words, but then a little more conciliatory from the moment of the arrival of Severus, as the Book of Sentences shows. The last letters finally are an echo of the antimonophysite persecution of Justin. (For a complete list of his works, of the spurious, and of references, see the bibl. and esp. the fundamental work of A. de Halleux).

The "verbal" and archaizing monophysitism of Philoxenus sinks its roots at the same time in the theocentric Alexandrian tradition and in the apophatic Syriac tradition, for which his theology is not a simple reaction against the Council of Chalcedon; it is characterized rather by a double divine becoming: without change, God is born, suffers and dies (*Theopaschism); with the destruction of *sin the Son makes humanity into a new creature (filiation: the state of the simple believer) and unites them to God (restoration to the primordial state: the monk). Strictly connected with the trinitarian doctrine (the Savior does not assume another nature nor another *hypostasis than that of the God-Word), Philoxenus's *Christology is founded above all on soteriological bases: "the monophysitism of our author conceives the union less as a principle of singularity and of personal unity than as a principle of mediation of the individual humanity of the Word between the divine person and the whole human race" (de Halleux, 514). This soteriology is not intellectualist (e.g., Evagrius), but sacramental: it sinks its roots in the mysteries of the salvific economy of Christ. His feast is celebrated by the Syro-orthodox on several occasions: 18 August (ordination), 10 December (death) and 18 February (translation).

M. Brière - F. Graffin, De uno e sancta trinitate incorporato et passo, diss. 3, 4, 5: PO 38 (1977); diss. 6, 7, 8: PO 39 (1979); diss. 9-10: PO 40 (1980); A. de Halleux, Commentaire du prologue johannique, CSCO 380-381, Syr. 165-166 (1977); J.W. Watt, Fragments of the Commentary on Matthew and Luke, CSCO 292-293, Syr. 172 and 174 (1978); cf. A. de Halleux: Muséon 93 (1980) 5-35; S. Brock, A Classified Bibliography: PdO 4 (1973) 343-465; Id., for the years 1970–1980: PdO 10 (1981/82) 291-412; Id., A Classified Bibliography: PdO 17 (1992) 211-301; Baumstark, 141-144; Ortiz de Urbina, par. 107; A de Halleux, Philoxène de Mabbog, sa vie, ses écrits, sa théologie, Louvain 1963 (with bibl.); P. Harb, Les origines de la doctrine de "lā-hāšūāta" (apatheia) chez Ph. de M.: PdO 5 (1974) 227-241; F. Graffin, Le Florilège patristique de Ph. de M.: OCA 197 (1974) 267-290; A. Vööbus, La biographie de Ph. de M., tradition de manuscrits: AB 93 (1975) 111-114; A. de Halleux, La Philoxénienne du Symbole: OCA 205 (1976) 295-315; A. Grillmeier, Die Taufe Christi und die Taufe der Christen. Zur Tauftheologie des Ph. von M. und ihrer Bedeutung für die christliche Spiritualität: Fides sacramenti, sacramentum fidei, studies in honor of P. Smulders, Assen 1981, 137-175 (with bibl.); J. Martikainen, Gerechtigkeit und Güte Gottes. Studien zur Theologie von Ephraem dem Syrer und Philoxenos von Mabbug (Göttinger Orientforschungen I, 20), Wiesbaden 1981; Patrologia V, 462-465.

F. Rilliet

PHILUMENE the Marcionite (2nd c.). According to the sources from antiquity (*Rhodo, *Tertullian, *Hippolytus, ps.-Tertullian, Adv. Omnes haereses 6), *Apelles, follower of *Marcion, encountered at Rome the clairvoyant virgin Philumene, whose dreams and visions he collected in a work titled Revelations, now lost. Her fame has been obscured by the fact of being a heretic and a woman, but certainly she influenced the thought of Apelles; among other doctrines she maintained that Christ had flesh in reality, but not received through normal birth, rather taken from the elements of the stars (cf. Tertullian, De carne 6,1; 8,2; De praescr., 6,6; Adv. Marc. III, 11,2); perhaps the doctrine that the *soul knows a sexual differentiation prior to birth belongs to her (cf. Tertullian, De anima 36,6).

R. Hanig, Der Beitrag der Philumene zur Theologie der Apelleianer, ZAC 3 (1999) 241-277.

A. Di Berardino

PHINEHAS (iconography). Up to now paleo-Christian art has transmitted to us a single representation of the biblical episode of the killing, by the Israelite Phinehas, of the Hebrew Zamri, guilty of having united himself with the Midianite idolater Kozbi (Num 25). This appears in Rome in a picture of the catacomb of Via Dino Compagni (Nestori, 72, no. 2), datable to around the middle of the 4th c.: Phinehas appears here dressed as a Roman official, while he holds with the left hand a lance on which the bodies of Zamri and Kozbi are impaled; below, to the left, is represented perhaps the bed where Phinehas killed the couple. The identification of the scene should be held as certain, on the basis of the close iconographic parallels with medieval Bible miniatures and with a Serbian psaltery of the 15th c. (Kötzsche Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe, 85-87, pl. 21), in which the episode is formulated in an entirely analogous manner. The scene, as it is represented in the picture and in these later miniatures, seems however to have drawn on, more than the biblical story, old rabbinical traditions, which had amplified it and which were evidently widespread in the Christian environment. Furthermore, a Jewish archetype has been proposed from a formal point of view as well; in contrast, the illustrated versions of the *Octateuch and of the Psalteries from the 9th c. on (Kötzsche Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe, 86f.; Ferrua, Una scena nuova, 110) seem more adherent to the letter of the Bible.

A. Ferrua, Una scena nuova nella pittura catacombale: RPAA 30-31 (1957–58, 1958–59) 107-116; Id., Le pitture della nuova catacomba di via Latina, Vatican City 1960, 48, pl. 92; L. Kötzsche-Breitenbruch, Die neue Katakombe an der via Latina in Rom. Untersuchungen zur Ikonographie der alttestamentlichen Wandmalereien: JbAC Erg. 4 (1976) 85-87, pl. 21.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

PHOCAS of Sinope (d. 305?). The only historically documented saint who bore this name was a gardener, presumably martyred under *Diocletian at Sinope, of whom *Asterius of Amasea wrote a *panegyric around 400 (Hom. 9; CPG 3260). At that time his veneration was already widespread in *Pontus, in the Cyclades (AB 120 [2002] 203), at *Constantinople (John Chrys.: PG 50, 699-706; AB 66 [1948] 85-86), in Sicily, at *Rome (Asterius), Sidon (SC 90, 242), *Antioch (Severus, Hom. cath. 72 [PO 12, 71-89]) and *Tyre. His feast day was celebrated 22 September (Synax. Eccl. CP), and he was the patron of sailors in danger (Aster., Hom. 9; John Chrys., Hom. in Phoc. 1-2). Starting from the real existence of this person and using his name, the following were fabricated: a bishop Phocas of Sinope (executed under Trajan and recorded as 22 September: Synax. Eccl. CP; 14 July: historical martyrologies), another martyr executed under *Trajan (22 July: Synax. Eccl. CP) and a martyr of Antioch (5 March; Mart. hier.) invoked against snake bites (Greg. Tours, Glor. conf. 99).

BHG 1535-1540; BHL 6837-6838b; BHO 990-991; BS 5, 948-950; LCI 8, 209-210; A. Ehrhard: ByzZ 21 (1912) 309-311; E. Donckel, Ausserrömische Heilige in Rom, Luxemburg 1938, 82-85; P. Maraval, Lieux saints et pèlerinages d'orient, Paris 1985; N. Koutrakou, Nautical Information from the Life of St. Phocas, a Byzantine Maritime Saint, in Ch. Makrypoulias (ed.), Sailing Ships of the Mediterranean Sea and the Arabian Gulf, Athens 1998, 41-44; W. Mayer, The Sea Made Holy. The Liturgical Function of the Waters Surrounding Constantinople: EphLit 112 (1998) 459-468.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PHOEBADIUS (d. after 392). Already bishop of Agen (Aquitania, Gallia) prior to 357, he played a primary role as an anti-*Arian in the Council of *Rimini of 359, was the last to bend to signing the pro-Arian formula and was allowed to add some clarifications. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 108) says he was very old in 392. He also identifies him as author of certain opuscula but names only the Contra arianos, the only one extant. It is a brief writing in refutation of the Sirmian formula (pro-Arian) of 357 and composed immediately after that date. Phoebadius employs, through the absence of appropriate literature, the Adversus Praxean of Tertullian, adapting its antimonarchian arguments to the requirements of the anti-Arian polemic. Although never naming the term homoousios, characteristic of the Nicene theology, Phoebadius defends this theological position and considers the formula of 357—pro-Arian but presented as a compromise—as a pure and simple affirmation of Arianism. He participated in the Council of *Valence in 374 (Mansi 3,491ff.), apparently as president of the assembly. He was a friend of *Delphinus of Bordeaux, with whom he participated in the Council of Saragossa in 380, where again it seems that he was the president of the assembly. His feast day is celebrated 25 April.

CPL 473; PL 20, 11-30; CCL 64; Patrologia III, 77-78; A. Durengues, Le livre de S. Fébade contre les Ariens, Agen 1927; P.P. Glaeser, Phoebadius von Agen, Univ. Ausburg 1978; Phoebadius, Contra Arianos, Streitschrift gegen die Arianer, tr. and ed. by J. Ulrich, Freiburg im Breisgau 1999; DHGE 16, 785-790.

M. Simonetti

PHOENIX (iconography). Born in the ancient East and in *Egypt as a symbolic expression of the exceptional or everyday events of the cosmos, the myth of the phoenix, as it was introduced into the West by Herodotus (Hist. II, 73), has it that a sacred bird, similar to an eagle and a *peacock, dies every five hundred years to rise immediately from its ashes. The Latin authors referred to it to illustrate the concept of eternity understood as palingenesis, a cyclical and continuous return; the *fathers of the church used it to communicate the mystery of the resurrection of the flesh (1 Clem. 1,25; Tert., De res. carn. XIII; Commod., Carmen apolog. vv. 139-142; Zen. Ver., Tract. I, 2,9; Ambr., Hexaem. V, 23,79; Apos. Con. V, 7, 15; Aug., De natura et orig. anim. IV, 20,33; ps.-Epiph., Phys. XI) and the concepts of *virginity-chastity (Ruf., Expos. symb. IX, 10) and of filial piety (Orig. C. Cels. IV, 98,25). The most extensive and definite literary expression consists of the De ave phoenice of ps.-Lactantius. In paleo-Christian art the myth is reduced to a symbol, and the bird is usually shown furnished with halo and rays—typical solar attributes—in the proud and majestic aspect of the already accomplished regeneration. Thus, it appears in a carving on a slab in S. Callistus (ICUR IV, 10785) and, perhaps, in a *painting on a wall block in the catacomb of Praetextatus (Nestori 1993, 92, no. 11). The mythic bird appears also associated with *palms, with which it shares name and meaning in Greek, on some leaden seals, in a carved slab of *Priscilla (Bisconti, Lastra incisa, 45) and on a bronze lamp of *Aquileia (Bertacchi, Il grande lampadario, 341).

In areas connected with the scene of the Traditio legis,* the phoenix is represented with palms, in correspondence with St. Paul, the most important proponent of the fundamental aspect of the resurrection (1 Cor 15:14). The fronts of a group of *sarcophagi referable to the final period of the 4th c. follow this format (Ws 150,2; 154,5; 151,1; 12,4; 39,2), as do a painting in the catacomb of Grottaferrata (WMM I, 132), a carved slab preserved at Anagni (Testini, 718) and several gilded glasses. To designate the paradisiacal spot, the phoenix also appears in later paintings and in *mosaics that employ the format and ambience of the traditio. Recall, e.g., the painting that decorates the little basilica of the cemetery of Felicitas (8th c.) (de Rossi, Scoperta di una cripta, 149) and the apsidal mosaic of the basilica of SS. Cosmas and Damian (WMM III, 102). Pictorial documents that present the bird in the moment of death among the flames are more rare. An example in painting is known in the so-called Greek chapel of Priscilla (Ferrua, Tre note di iconografia, 273) and another in mosaic in an environment attached to the post-Theodorian basilica of Aquileia (Menis, I mosaici, 33). Mosaics and monetary coinings, esp. of the Constantinian dynasty, also attest the representation of the phoenix on the mountain and on the globe (Van den Broek, The Myth, pl. II, III, VIII, XX, XXX).

G.B. de Rossi, Scoperta d'una cripta storica nel cimitero di Massimo "ad sanctam Felicitatem" sulla via Salaria Nuova: BACr 3 (1885) 149-184; L. Charbonneau-Lassay, Le bestiaire du Christ, Bruges 1940, 402-422; A. Ferrua, Tre note di iconografia paleocristiana. La fenice sul rogo: Misc. G. Belvederi, Vatican City 1954–1955, 237-277; G.C. Menis, I mosaici cristiani di Aquileia, Udine 1965, 33-35; R. Van den Broek, The Myth of Phoenix According to Classical and Early Christian Tradition, Leiden 1972; P. Testini, La lapide di Anagni con la "Traditio legis." Nota sull'origine del tema: Archeologia Classica 25-26 (1973–1974) 718-740; L. Bertacchi, Il grande lampadario di Aquileia: Aquileia Nostra 50 (1979) 341-350; F. Bisconti, Aspetti e significati del simbolo della fenice nella letteratura e nell'arte del cristianesimo primitivo: VetChr 16 (1979) 21-40; Id., Lastra incisa inedita dalla catacomba di Priscilla: RivAC 57 (1981) 43-67; Id., La fenice nell'arte aquileiese del IV secolo: AAAd 22 (1982) 529-547; Id., TIP, 180; F. Zambon - A. Grossato, Il mito della fenice in Oriente e in Occidente, Venice 2004.

F. Bisconti

PHOS HILARON. The hymn Phos hilaron, acc. to *Basil the Great (De sp. sancto 29, 33), is very ancient. It was an evening song sung when the lamps were lit (Greg. Nyss., De vit. Macr. 25). In the song, the light is portrayed as a symbol of Jesus Christ who was sent from the *Father. Perhaps it represents a Christian reaction to the cult of the Sun, which was very dear to the *pagans. The hymn is addressed to Christ and closes with the trinitarian *doxology, in which the three divine persons are associated. We find an analogous structure to it in the liturgical hymn Gloria and a papyrus from the 3rd c. (PO 18, 506). On the basis of Basil's argument, one can conclude that the hymn was written before the *Arian controversy. Dölger thinks that it dates to the 2nd c.

C. Pelargus, Enchiridion Graeco-Latinum Hymnorum, Frankfurt 1594 (editio princeps); M.J. Routh, Reliquiae sacrae, 3, Oxford 1815, 299, = ed. Usher; E.R. Smothers, Phos hilaron: RecSR 19 (1929) 266-283 (text and analysis). F.J. Dölger, Der christ. Abendhymnus, Phos hilaron: AC V, 11-26; A. Hamman, La prière, II, Paris-Tournai 1962, 251; E. Lodi, Enchiridion euchologicum fontium liturgicorum, Rome 1979, no. 300, 168; M.E. Mcbann, Hymn and Anaphora in Early Christian Liturgy: Ecclesia Orans 17 (2000) 407-443; P. Plank, Phos hilaron. Christushymnus und Lichtdanksagung der frühen Christenheit, Bonn 2001.

A. Hamman

PHOTINUS of Constantinople (d. after 610). *Presbyter and defender of the church of *Constantinople, he is the author of a *Life of John (IV) the Faster, the patriarch of Constantinople (589–595) to whom the popes *Pelagius II (579–590) and *Gregory the Great (590–604) made their remonstrances in vain, because he had attributed to himself the title of ecumenical patriarch (i.e., of the Byzantine Empire). Of the Vita a fragment is preserved, reported in the Acts of the Nicene Council II (787), Actio IV (Mansi 13, 79-80): it narrates a miracle obtained with the image of the Madonna. Photinus, as it seems from the story, knew the patriarch personally and wrote his life after the death of the emperor Mauritius (602), who is called martyr. He almost certainly wrote after the death of the emperor Phocas (610) as well, since he refers to him as a serpent from the abyss and a tyrant.

CPG III, 7971; Bardenhewer 5, 75 and 131; Beck 459; Patrologia V, 100.

A. De Nicola

PHOTINUS of Sirmium (d. after 362). A Galatian by origin and a deacon and disciple of *Marcellus of *Ancyra, he was bishop of *Sirmium (Pannonia) when for the first time those in the East associated him with his teacher, condemning him in the Ekthesis makrostichos; those in the West signed the condemnation at *Milan (345). After an action against him in 347, about which we are poorly informed (Milan? Sirmium?), a council of Eastern bishops, reunited at Sirmium in 351, condemned and deposed him. He reentered Sirmium at the arrival of *Julian (362) but was later chased out again. His followers had a certain influence in the West, even to *Africa, but never represented a real peril for orthodoxy. *Jerome (Vir. ill. 107) says that Photinus wrote extensively and refers to a Contra gentes and Ad Valentinianum. Not only have all of his works been lost, but likewise those written by his adversaries to refute him. Among the few surviving testimonies, the *anathemas of the Council of Sirmium of 351 and the mention of *Epiphanius (Pan. 71) are important. Photinus, whom the ancients associated with *Paul of Samosata as a representative of *adoptionism but who shows close contacts above all with Marcellus, affirms a rigid *monarchianism in which the Logos is conceived as a mere impersonal dynamis of the *Father, which at one time was contained within him in repose, and now is expressed and is externalized in the divine action inherent in the world (Logopator). In this sense Photinus assigned to the Father, operating by means of the Logos, the theophanies of the OT, which a unanimous ancient tradition assigned to the Logos conceived personally, because he considered this tradition to be ditheist. Photinus, like Marcellus, considered the Son of God to have been born from *Mary, in the sense that the Logos became Son only by incarnating in the man Jesus and taking residence in him. Compared to his teacher, Photinus was clearer in affirming that the humanity assumed by the Logos was complete, including a soul, against the Logos/Sarx *Christology typical of the Alexandrians. As *Adam had sinned with *soul and with *body, so the Logos, to redeem man, became incarnate in a complete humanity of body and soul.

M. Simonetti, Studi sull'arianesimo, Rome 1965, 135-159; Simonetti 590; M. Clauss, Photin BBKL 7, 554-555; Photinus: ODC (1997), 1283; K.-H. Uthemann, Photeinos: LTK 3, 267; L.A. Speller, New Light on the Photinians. The Evidence of Ambrosiaster: JTS 34 (1983) 99-113; R.M. Hübner, Die Schrift des Apollinarius von Laodicea gegen Photin (Pseudo-Athanasius, Contra Sabellianos) und Basilius von Caesarea, Berlin-New York 1989, 163-196; G. Feige, Die lehre Markells von Ankyra in der Darstellung seiner Gegner, Leipzig 1991, esp. 144-155, see index s.v.; G. Emery, Le photinisme et ses précurseurs chez saint Thomas. Cérinthe, les ébionites, Paul de Samosate et Photin: Revue Thomiste 95 (1995) 369-398; Ch. Markschies, Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie, Tübingen 1995, 144-165, 180; M. Vinzent, Pseudo-Athanasius, Contra Arianos IV. Eine Schrift gegen Asterius von Kappadokien, Eusebius von Cäsarea, Markell von Ankyra und Photin von Sirmium, Leiden-New York 1996; J.T. Lienhard, Contra Marcellum. Marcellus of Ancyra and Fourth-Century Theology, Washington DC 1999, passim.

M. Simonetti

PHOTIUS (ca. 820–891). Born in *Constantinople around 820 in a noble iconodule family, he received an excellent education. Under the regency of *Theodora (843–858), he was professor of philosophy at the university and later head of the imperial chancellery and member of the senate. He was called by Bardas to be patriarch (858), replacing Ignatius; he was deposed (867) by Basil I, who recalled Ignatius, but was restored at the death of the latter (878) and remained in office until 886, when he was definitively removed by Leo VI. He died in 891. Photius is important in the history of the church as a theologian and as a humanist. This latter aspect (the only one which is of interest here) is evident above all from his work usually called Bibliotheca or Myriobiblon, whose authentic title seems however to be Description and List of the Volumes We Have Read. As is said in the prefaced Letter, addressed to his brother Tarasius, and repeated at the end of the work, this was put together and published immediately before Photius left for the embassy to the Caliph Mutawakkil (855), and was intended to be a testimony of affection for his brother during the separation. The work, therefore, was compiled when the author was about to turn 40 and was still a layman with duties at court. It gathers the readings completed and summarized in the preceding years, from the moment in which the desire to become educated awoke in him. Within it 279 writings are reviewed, without any established order, which testify to the variety and immensity of the interests of the author: writings of philologists, grammarians, lexicographers, metricians, orators, sacred and profane historians, doctors, philosophers, novelists, theologians. Each work forms a chapter, commonly called a Codex; the size is extremely variable: from simple annotations of a few lines (Cod. 2, 4, 5, etc.) to genuine summaries of works with anthologies of extracts (Cod. 220, 223, 230, 242, 245, etc.). Some authors are treated more than once; very often Photius gives an opinion on the utility and literary value of the work in question. Many more than half of the works cited in the Bibliotheca have been lost: from this the importance of Photius's work is obvious.

The large space devoted to ecclesiastical literature is surprising in Photius, as yet a *layman, both for the number (20 historians, 55 theologians), and for the size (more than half the work). The authors or texts cataloged include: (a) historians: Basilius Cilix, Charinus, *Chrysippus presb., *Evagrius, *Eusebius, Eustratius, Georgius Alex. episc., Hermias *Sozomenus, *Hesychius ill., Ioannes presb. Aegates, Ioannes (*John) Moschus, Fl. Iosephus iud., *Metrodorus, Nicephorus, Philippus Sid. (*Philip of Side), Philo Iud. (*Philo, historiographer), *Philostorgius, Sergius, *Theodoretus, Theophanes Byz.; (b) theologians: Adriani Alex. Andronici Isagoge, Andronicianus, Apollinarius (*Apollinaris), *Athanasius, *Asterius Amasiae ep., Basilius M. (*Basil of Caesarea), *Basilius Seleuc., *Cassianus, *Caesarius, Iohannes (*John) Chrys., *Clemens Alex, *Clemens Rom., *Conon, *Cyrillus Alex., *Diadochus Phot., *Diodorus Tars., Ephraem Theop., *Ephraim Syrus, *Epiphanius, *Eugenius, *Eulogius, *Eusebius ep. Thess., *Gelasius, *Germanus patr., *Gregorius

Nyss., Heracleanus, *Hesychii duo, *Hippolytus ep., Hippolytus Irenaei discip., Iobius (*Jobius) mon., Ioannes (*John) Carpathius, Ioannes (*John) Scytop., *Irenaeus ep., Iustinus (*Justin) martyr, *Leontius ep., Marcus mon., *Maximus Conf., *Methodius ep., *Modestus ep. Hier., Nicias mon., *Nilus mon., *Origenes, *Pamphilus Martyr, *Pierius presb., *Polycarpus Martyr, *Procopius, *Sophronius patr. Hier., Stephanus Gobarus (*Stephen Gobar), *Synesius Cyn., Synodi variae, *Theodorus Antioch., *Theodorus mon., *Theodorus presb., *Theodosius mon., *Theognostus.

E. Bekker, Berlin 1824 (in PG 103-4); R. Henry, Paris 1959–1977; PWK 20,1 (1941) 667-737; S. Impellizzeri, La letteratura bizantina, Florence 1975, 340-365; LTK 8, 484-488; J. Schamp, Photius, Bibliothèque. IX: Index, Paris 1991; N. Wilson, Fozio, Biblioteca, Milan 1992 (partial); Thesaurus Photii Constantinopolitani, Bibliotheca, ed. J. Schamp - B. Kindt et CENTAL (Thesaurus Patrum Graecorum), Turnhout 2004.

A. De Nicola

PHRYGIA. Included from the beginning in the province of *Asia (the list of the cities, which later all became episcopal sees, is given by Pliny, Nat. Hist. V, 95 and 145), after the *Diocletian reorganization it was divided into two smaller provinces, Phrygia I (cap. Laodicea) and Phrygia II (cap. Eukarpia). A distinction, from a doctrinal point of view, can be made in the region on the basis of the vast *epigraphic material preserved: on the one hand there are *Montanist inscriptions from the valley of the Tembris, in NW Phyria, on the other hand, there are *orthodox ones found in the central and S urban areas. The latter testify to the Christianization effected through the Pauline churches of Laodicea, Colossae and Hierapolis; those of the valley of the Tembris to the spread of the Montanist heresy in the 3rd c.—chased out of the Hellenized cities of S Phyria—in the N countryside, among rustic classes not touched by Hellenism, where, moreover, there are indications of the presence of a heretical Christianity into the 4th c. (cf., e.g., Socr., HE 4, 28, on the *Novatianist bishop of Cotiaion, metropolis of the upper valley of the Tembris). Hierapolis gloried in *Philip and his daughters. Its bishop *Papias (around 130/140) was known for his Explanations of the Words of the Lord. The inscription, toward the end of the 2nd c., of its bishop *Abercius is famous; he had traveled widely, arriving as far as Rome.

In the Christianization of the region, the city of Laodicea Combusta occupies a special place, at the crossing of the roads from *Cappadocia to *Cilicia, a vivacious center of commercial traffic. Always absent from the urban representatives at the councils of the 4th c. (the first mention is at *Chalcedon in 451), acc. to *Epiphanius (Haer. 47), it owed its nickname of κεκαυμένης (Combusta) to the burning of the *Encratite heresy in its territory (cf. also Basil, Ep. 188), a response to the question of *Amphilochius, bishop of *Iconium, concerning the admission of members of heretical sects to his church. This was not an academic question, but founded undoubtedly on the concrete problem represented by the presence of a heretical city like Laodicea in the district, as also demonstrated by the epigraphs of Laodicea, which mention the same sects that were the subject of the letter of Basil (Cathari, Saccophori, Apotactites, *Encratites). A famous epitaph of the Bishop Eugenius survives, a provincial noble, imperial functionary, victim of the *persecution of *Maximinus, who died around 340, after a 25-year episcopate in his home city of Laodicea Combusta. He provides an exceptional example of the role played by Christians of the dominant social classes before the Constantinian period. The little town of Orcistus was already Christian at the time of *Constantine, as was Eumeneia even earlier, of which *Polycarp named the bishop toward the middle of the 2nd c. (Eus., HE 5,24,4).

W.M. Ramsay, The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Oxford 1895–1896; W.M. Calder, The Epigraphy of the Anatolian Heresies, in Anatolian Studies Presented to Sir W.M. Ramsay, Manchester 1923, 59-91; J. Schmidt, Phrygia: PWK XX, 1, 781-891; C.H.E. Haspels, The Highlands of Phrygia. Sites and Monuments, Princeton, NJ 1971 (fundamental); E. Gibson, The "Christians for Christians." Inscriptions of Phrygia, Greek texts, tr. and comm., Missoula, MT 1978; A.R.R. Sheppard, Christians, and Heretics in Acmonia and Eumeneia: AS 29 (1979) 169-180; A. Strobel, Das heilige Land der Montanisten. Eine religionsgeographische Untersuchung, Berlin 1980; W. Wischmeyer, M. Iulius Eugenius. Eine Fallstudie zum Thema "Christen und Gesellschaft im 3. und 4. Jahrhundert": ZNTW 81 (1990) 225-246; G.J. Johnson, A Christian Business and Christian Self-Identity in Third/Fourth Century Phrygia: VChr 48 (1994) 341-366; W. Tabbernee, Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia. Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism, Macon, GA 1997; D. Feissel, L'"adnotatio" de Constantin sur le droit de cité d'Orcistus en Phrygie: AntTard 7 (1999) 255-267; S. Dmitriev, The End of "provincia Asia": Historia 50 (2001) 468-489.

M. Forlin Patrucco

PHYSICIAN, CHRIST the. For the ancient peoples of the Mediterranean, sickness and healing were at the center of personal religious experience and had repercussions on the general cosmic equilibrium (P. Gerlitz). In the imperial period, despite the fact that the art of medicine had already developed techniques and rationales that provided cures for sicknesses of various sorts with tested remedies, nevertheless, recourse to the gods and to superstitious practices to obtain a restoration of health lost due to some evil remained the primary solution. Christianity entered into this religious context with the preaching of Jesus, a worker of miracles and exorcisms. It did so not because of the need for pastoral adaptation to Hellenistic culture, but rather because such an image is fundamental to the Christian perception of Jesus. His miraculous and healing actions manifest the presence of the kingdom of God and his messianic mission (Mt 12:28), and, acc. to patristic theology, they manifestly confirm these things and are the expression of the divine power present in him (*Origen, C. Celsum II, 48.51). In a period in which popular anxiety for health was at extreme levels and means were not spared, including the magic of charlatans, to obtain the healing of sickness, the preaching of and faith in Jesus the Healer allowed Christianity to penetrate rapidly in *Palestine, *Syria and areas where Greek was spoken (H.C. Kee, 205).

This image of Jesus was not forgotten in the following centuries. In the 2nd and 3rd c., Christ was defined as a physician by the *apologists who responded to the comparison made between him and Asclepius, the god of health, and the rational objections of the Greek philosophers, who accused Christians of having recourse to magic (Orig., C. Celsum I, 6; II, 50-51). The image of Christ the physician acquired strength from comparison with the philosophical schools as well, esp. the Cynic-Stoic school, whose philosophers presented themselves as physicians capable of healing the passions of the soul. The earliest apologetics transferred the notion of Christ the physician to a metaphorical, soteriological level of meaning, beside the number of other images of the redemption. Deeply rooted in the NT tradition (A. Oepke), this meaning refers essentially to human liberation from sin, understood as incurable sickness. It is described in the language and with the knowledge of medicine which belong to the time: passages from the writings of the Corpus Hippocraticum or from other famous medical treatises are often cited in writings (see, e.g., Orig., C. Celsum IV, 15; *Eus., HE 10,4,11; *Greg. Naz., Disc. 7,20,4).

Yet the notion of Christ the physician is not limited to the symbolic representation of the redemption. Indeed, Christ is the "only physician of bodies and souls" (Orig., Hom. in Lev. VII, 1), who heals those who have recourse to him in the church and invoke him in their physical and spiritual sicknesses. Thus, liturgy and spirituality are presented from a medicinal point of view, esp. in the *Alexandrian tradition and in Eastern monasticism, where they constitute the healing remedies for humanity, who is sick in nature due to the passions. Finally, the image of Christ the physician in the gospel shaped the disposition of the church toward the sick, not so much with regard to offering specific medicines, as to the merciful care reserved for them. These themes—apologetic, dogmatic, anthropological-spiritual and ecclesial—tied to the notion of Christ the physician cannot easily be gathered together in one concise exposition. Moreover, this image belongs to the same problematic triangle of health in antiquity, the three sides of which were the sickness, the sick person and the physician (Corpus Hipp., Epid. I, 2,5). Therefore, the exposition of this topic, which cannot be exhaustive for obvious reasons, will turn upon the following three fundamental points: (1) Christ the physician—(a) in the apostolic preaching, (b) in ante-Nicene apologetics, (c) in catechesis of the 4th–5th c.—(2) Christ the physician and sick humanity; (3) sicknesses healed by Christ the physician—(a) healing remedies of Christ, (b) ecclesial care of sickness.

1. Christ the physician. In the OT, sickness and healing depend on God, who assumes the task of healing Israel (Ex 15:26). But in general, Yahweh is a healer in a figurative sense: he can heal from sin and restore the sinner to communion with him (Is 6:10; 2:4; Ps 6:10; etc.). This salvific monopoly is exercised in the NT by Jesus, whose very name means "Yahweh saves" (Mt 1:21; Acts 4:12); and save in the language of the NT means "liberate," "take out of danger," but also "heal." In the gospels, Jesus never presents himself directly and personally as "physician" (iatros). Nevertheless, the NT tradition is undoubtedly oriented toward such an image. In fact, Jesus not only heals all the sick that he encounters, but also saves them, healing their sins and restoring them to the life of a relationship with God and the community. Because of his activity, the gospels attribute to Jesus the title of physician either because he was defined as such by his fellow citizens (Lk 4:23), or else because it may be understood from the way Jesus justified his redemptive activity by comparing himself to a physician who cares for the sick, since he came not for the just but for sinners (Mt 9:12; Mk 2:17; Lk 5:31). The Fathers drew the medical image of Christ from this passage of the gospel (see Harnack, 125).

a. In the apostolic preaching. The apostolic tradition received this image as essential, as it appears in the first sermon of Peter (Acts 10:30), and, when the cripple is healed at the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:2), the apostle calls upon the "salvific" power of Jesus of Nazareth (Acts 3:11). In noncanonical writings, the title "physician, fleshly and spiritual" for Jesus Christ appears for the first time at the beginning of the 2nd

c. in an antidocetic profession of faith by *Ignatius of Antioch (Eph. 7,1-2). Yet the image was equally popular with marginal groups which denied the reality of the body of Christ, who was invoked by them as the "physician who heals for free" (Acts of John 108; Acts of Thomas 156).

b. In ante-Nicene apologetics. The 2nd c. was a golden period for Roman medicine, which had masters such as Soranus and *Galen, who raised a wave of enthusiasm unheard of before for medicine. This was also the century of *Asclepius, who had the title of sōtēr, because of the miraculous healings attributed to him by those devoted to him, and by the votive offerings (ex voto) placed in the famous Greek places of worship in Epidaurus, Kos, Pergamon, but also in Rome itself, on the Tiber Island, and in some 400 other temples or shrines scattered throughout the Mediterranean. These places of worship were also centers for health, with corresponding structures, where incubation was practiced, and where priest-physicians carried out specific forms of treatment for the sick, who went there either because they were poor—although the poor also were required to contribute financial remuneration for the services offered—or else when professional physicians had failed. But such an order was not always observed. While keeping their distance from magic, professional physicians, from Hippocrates to Galen, upheld both medicine and the cult of Asclepius. In fact, in antiquity medicine always remained religious, and physicians carried out their practice as earthly substitutes and helpers of the divine healers (Gerlitz).

For their part, Christians greeted with favor Soranus and Galen and rejected Asclepius. Galen was almost made into an idol by some Christians, guided by *Theodotus, an *adoptionist from *Byzantium. But Galen was able to provide some medical ideas by which Christianity could be presented to pagans (Eus., HE 5,28-13-14). In the 4th c., thanks to the popularization of his ideas by Oribasius, a physician in the circle of *Julian the Apostate, it became the foundation of the medical and anthropological knowledge of the Cappadocians, and later, of Byzantine medicine. In the West, *Tertullian, in addition to knowing and citing Hippocrates, Galen, Herophilus and Asclepiades, shared with Soranus, esp. for his concept of nature, the ideas of the medical school of the "methodists," whose positions are between those of the "dogmatists" and those of the "empiricists" (De An. 6,6; 27,4). On the other hand, criticism of the cult of Asclepius began early on and is perhaps already present in the gospel of John (Sauser, 106). Still, thanks to the almost universal positive attitude toward medicine, the apologists of the 2nd c. use the image of Christ the physician to present Christian salvation in comprehensible terms while they criticize the supposed healings worked by Asclepius (*Quadratus, HE IV, 3,2; *Aristides, Ap. X, 5; *Tatian, Orat. 21; *Athenagoras, Suppl. XXIX; *Diognetus IX).

For *Justin, the cult of Asclepius and the healings occurring in his shrines are works of demons seeking to create obstacles to the work of Christ (1 Ap. XXII, 6). Unlike Asclepius, a man who became a god (1 Ap. XXV, 1), the Logos of God became human for us, "so that, having become a partaker in our infirmities, he might be able to heal them" (2 Ap. XIII, 4). In this way, the medical image of the redemption pertains to the divine oikonomia itself, since, because of his wounds, healed humanity can now approach the Father (Dial. XVII, 1).

Unlike the other Greek apologists, *Theophilus places the activity of physician in the Father, who unfolds his work of salvation in healing by means of the Logos and Wisdom (Theophilus, Ad Aut. I, 7). The unclear theology of this bishop of Antioch nevertheless cleared a path for the theologians who descended into the arena of antignostic polemic. *Irenaeus presents both the image of Christ the physician as well as of God who, just as a good physician, gives proof of his skill by healing sick humanity (Adv. Haer. III, V, 2; IV, XX, 7). On the other side of the Mediterranean, in Africa, in polemics with the *Marcionites, who may have used Christ the physician as a point in favor of the predilection of Christ the foreigner for the pagans, Tertullian took up the image of God the physician in Against Marcion (1,22; 3,17) and introduced it firmly into the African theological tradition (De Paen. 10; 15). In defense of the value of martyrdom and, again, against the *gnostics, who did not approve of it, Tertullian was disposed to accept the aspect, at times cruel, of God the physician (also in Marc. 2,16), who nevertheless works so as to save the sick from death. Tertullian combines the idea of God as medicator (hapax), with that of God as predicator (Marc. 3,17). With his word he cuts out from human hearts the word of death placed there by Adam. If, then, he commands the martyr to die, he actually delivers him from death (Scorp. 5).

In the 3rd c., due to their openness to Greek culture, the Alexandrians were able to give the metaphor of Christ the physician its fullest formulation. Already *Clement, a man of many cultural interests, was fascinated by medicine in his time, and understood the work of Christ to be like that of a good physician who prepares the faithful for the divine pedagogue (Paed. I, 83,2-3). The activity of the divine physician is focused on the spirit of the believer who has received the call of the Logos, because for Clement, good spiritual health is necessary in order to progress in divine knowledge (Exc. ex Theod. 45,1). The Logos thus exercises a double function: first, as physician, he heals human passions; next, as pedagogue, he can introduce the mysteries of God (Paed. I, 3,1-3). In polemics with the gnostics, who depreciated the human body, Clement remarked that the Logos heals the entire person: spirit and body. As the only physician of humankind, he healed the paralytic, saved Lazarus from death (Paed. I, 6,1-4; Strom. III, XVII,104,4), and as the Good Samaritan, heals from the passions of the soul which dominate the world and lead to death (Quis Dives 29). In the doctrine of Origen, medicine and the knowledge of the word of God are considered equivalent, because both are necessary for human life (Com. in Luc. I, 5) and thus the figure of Christ the physician has an important position in his doctrine for catechetical, spiritual and apologetic reasons. But the title physician applied to Christ is firmly rooted in his doctrine of the Logos. According to Origen, Scripture attributes to the Logos various titles through which it adapts to various human necessities (Com. in Jo. I, 20). These are subdivided into eternal and essential titles, those that pertain to the mystery of God in itself, and in temporal and contingent things, those that pertain to the economy of salvation. Among the latter, the title of physician is among the most important, as it refers to the action of the Son of God with respect to sick humanity (Comm. in Jo. I, 23). Because of the descent of the Word to mortal prostration, the medicinal mission of Christ, the "Great Physician" (archiatros)—a common title for physicians in imperial times—is inscribed in the very plan of God, who comes to cure the horrible wound of sick humanity (Hom. in Jer. II, 6). The angels had failed in the case of humanity, and likewise the patriarchs and prophets, "physicians superior to all other physicians," sent to heal Israel, and finally, the disciples themselves. Thus, it was necessary that the only great specialist, Christ, present himself as the "physician of bodies and souls" (Hom. in Luc. XIII, 2-3; Hom. in Jer. XVIII, 5; Com. in Mt. XIII, 5).

To *Celsus, who considered the descent of Christ to the sick dishonorable for the divinity, which would thus be subject to change, Origen stated that, unlike earthly physicians, the Logos of God is immune from the contagion of evils. In fact, Christ heals souls through the immutable divine Logos present in him (C. Celsum IV, 15). Further, Celsus's manner of making comparisons leads Origen to evaluate the healings attributed to Asclepius, "a demon physician." For Origen, it is possible that true healings occurred in his shrines, but no one acquired health from such a god. On the contrary, Christ's absolute superiority and divinity are proved through the gift of health, which no earthly physician or demon can offer (C. Celsum III, 3.25.42; V, 2).

c. In catechesis of the 4th–5th c. At the end of the 3rd c., the Latin apologists sharpened their criticism against the cult of Asclepius (*Arnobius, Adv. Nat. 7,44; *Lactantius, DI 2,16,12), but ante-Nicene artistic production, which portrays Christ with the characteristic features of the pagan divinity (Dinkler), shows that the image of Asclepius as savior and healer had strongly influenced Christians as well. Yet in the following century, the popularity of the healer god among pagans declined in favor of the cult of Isis, Serapis and *Mithra. In the mid-4th c., *Firmicus Maternus names him only in passing (De err. 12,8), whereas he elaborates upon the Eastern mystery cults which promised salvation, asking the emperors for the suppression of all such cults. And indeed, a few decades earlier, *Constantine had taken measures in order to demolish the Asklepion of Aegae in *Cilicia (Eus., Vit. Const. 3,56). As the cult of Asclepius disappeared in the post-Nicene period, the theologians' criticism of the god of medicine diffuses into a general criticism of polytheism (Ambrose, Virg. 3.2.7; Aug., Civ. Dei 3,12.17; 4,21 etc.) and of magic, which was supposed to have been taught in the shrines of the divinity (*Jerome, In Is. Comm. 18,65; Life of Hilarion 21). Yet, although the image of Christ the physician lost its apologetic interest, it gained in theological depth. In the West, the reading of the apologists and of Origen was not forgotten by their eminent Latin readers, who deepened the theological meaning of the titles medicus and salvator applied to Christ (Jer., Tract. In Psalm. LXXXIII 8; Aug., Sermo 155,10; 299,6) and preached to the faithful the urgency of conversion and the confidence that they could find in him, their savior and physician, pardon for their sins and spiritual health (Ambrose, De Helia 20.75; Cain 2.3.11; Exp. Ev. Lucae 4.57; 67; 5.19; 46; Exp. Ps. CXVIII III, 22-26). In his preaching, Jerome accumulates medical terms for Christ: verus medicus, ipse et medicus et medicamentum, verus archiater, quasi spiritualis Hippocrates (Jer., Tract. in Marci Ev. I, 13-31 CCL 78,468; SC 494, 16; other loci: Sauser, 109). In the East, the metaphor of Christ the physician is essential in the soteriology of *Athanasius (CG 1; De Inc. 18; 44) and recurs in the images of redemption in the baptismal catecheses of *Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. 2,6; 10,13; 12,7), in the soteriology of the Cappadocians and in the preaching of *John Chrysostom (various loci in Larcet, Terapia 288-289).

With *Augustine, the title medicus for Christ received a new lease on life, as he placed it within the economy of salvation understood as dispensatio medicinalis. The metaphor of Christ the physician is present above all in the discourses preached to the people and in the polemics with the *Manicheans, the *Montanists and the *Pelagians. It helped Augustine explain to the people how the redemption is a *mystery of the humility of Christ, who descended in order to heal humanity from the tumor of pride. For pride brought about the fall of the first parents and is the cause of all human vices (Pecc. merit. 2.17.27). In redemption, therefore, Christ carries out the role of medicus humilis (loci: Abersmann 7 ff.), who came to heal the sick with his humility. He suffered in order to teach "them humility, so that, instructed in humility, they would be healed of pride" (En. in Ps. 35,17). However serious the sickness of the one who approaches Christ, he should never despair, since, as in the case of Paul of Tarsus, Christ gives proof of his talent in desperate cases (Sermo 175,9). In order to remain in the condition of health, the Christian, healed by the divine physician, must become a disciple of the magister humilitatis (Sermo 77.7.11). The image of Christ the physician appears again in Augustine's defense of Christianity, which had been accused in his time of being the cause of the many disasters which had occurred in the empire. In this case, Augustine changes the image, and Christ becomes the all-powerful physician, the only one capable of diagnosing true human sickness in sin, which causes every catastrophe, and for this reason descended to heal humanity from sin (Serm. 87, 10.13–11.14 and again, Abersmann, 23-28).

2. Christ the physician and sick humanity. The healings worked by Christ are considered by the evangelists from a theological point of view. Jesus fulfills the prophetic promise of Yahweh as healer to save his people and heal the nations. He heals in order for human spiritual transformation to be realized and for the salvific economy of God to be actualized (Kee, 205-207). The Fathers continued such a theological reading of the activity of Jesus (Iren., A.H. III, 5,2; Clem. Alex., Paed. I, 2,6; Ambrose, Exp. in Luc. 7,73-75). They had learned from medicine and from philosophy that sickness is weakness, lack, deformation of all that pertains to nature (modus deficiens). The natural human condition is health in agreement with cosmic harmony. Sickness, on the other hand, is not a natural event, but rather a corruption of health, res contra naturam (Aug., Fund. 53). Considered theologically, esp. in the tradition of the Cappadocians, the state of human health is a dynamic condition and consists in the healthy orientation of spiritual powers such that they cooperate with divine grace, so that the image of God within is completed by likeness to God as well, in the perfection of divinization. "Man is a creature which has received the commandment to become God" (Basil in Greg. Naz., Disc. 48, PG 36, 560A). Human health depends on an ordered will, capable of dominating passions. But the fall brought about a loss of rational control over the passions, which are unchained and impose themselves as "a brand upon bodies" (Greg. Naz., Disc. 32,27). For the Cappadocians, the spiritual has predominance over the bodily, and the various sicknesses are not all caused by physical causes which specific medicines can be used for. Briefly, sickness appears as a disturbance and negation of human nature acc. to the divine project. Gregory of Nyssa states that "once the human race . . . enjoyed health," but after the fall "this mortal sickness which sin is, fixed itself in human nature" (Hom. on the Lord's Prayer IV, 2). Thus, the truly sick one is the whole human race, the Adam for whom the heavenly physician came "casting away evil by its contraries, acc. to the rule of medicine," healing the human will and orienting it toward God (ibid.). In the West, this doctrine of incurably sick humanity received its most famous theological formulation in Augustine: "The human race is sick, not with a bodily sickness, but with its sins. There he is, the great sick one, who lies upon the whole earth from E to W" (Serm. 87,11; 155,10).

3. Sicknesses healed by Christ the physician. According to our sources, we must distinguish two types of sickness: physical and spiritual. To cure their physical sicknesses, Christians turned to the physicians of their time, but when these failed, they sought miraculous healing. But the custom of asking for the intervention of the divine physician in order to heal sicknesses increased as they lost awareness of the causes of diseases (Ferngren, 2965f.). With the development of demonology in all ranges of society in the 1st and 2nd c., both Jewish and Hellenistic, many sicknesses were attributed to the activity of demons, and such sicknesses thus rendered necessary a supernatural intervention. Among Christians, at first only marginal groups, such as the Montanists, the gnostics, then the *Donatists, requested miraculous healing, but later, beginning in the 3rd c., the orthodox sought such healing as well, through exorcisms, sacramental anointings and the invocation of the name of Jesus Christ. At *Timgad in Africa, an inscription that was most likely Donatist, discovered in 1919, reads: "Rogo te, Domine, sub- veni, Criste, tu solus medicus sanctis et penitentibus." Another Greek inscription found in a house in Frikya (Syria) expresses nearly the same invocation of Christ the divine physician (Leclerq, 160). But more than for physical sicknesses, Jesus the physician is invoked so that he might heal personal spiritual sicknesses. Sickness of body opens the way to spiritual purification (Ambrose, Hex. 1,31; Basil, Hom. in Ps. 45: PG 29, 417; Gregory Naz., Ep. 31: PG 37, 68B). The numerous pathologies of the spirit listed by theologians are clearly connected with their pastoral preoccupations (poisonous bites of the *Docetists: Ign,, Eph. 7,2; the passions: Clem. Alex., Quis Dives 29,3; paralysis, blindness, deafness, tumors of the soul due to sin: Origen, Comm. in Math. 13,4; concupiscence: Greg. Nyss., Hom. on the Lord's Prayer IV, 2). The blind, the deaf and the lame healed by Christ represent the spiritually sick of their time, in need of meeting the divine physician (Orig., Mat. Com. XI, 18, other loci in Fernández 89 ff.; Cyril Jer., Cat. 10,13; Hom. in Paralyt. 4). In the case of physical sicknesses, before having recourse to a physician, a spiritual discernment is necessary. According to *Basil, medicine is a divine help for humanity. But Christians believe that at times sicknesses are disorders provoked by sins. In this case, one should not seek a physician, but remain patient under the hand of God, thus showing the fruits of true conversion (Basil, Reg. fus. 55).

a. The healing remedies of Christ. In the medical soteriology of the Fathers, Christ is physician and also pharmacist, acc. to the pharmaceutical terms which express salvation. This is reflected in the liturgy of the church, which has abundantly used this rich medical-pharmaceutical vocabulary (Apostolic Constitutions 5; Sacramentary of Serapion 13; 17; 29). In the first centuries, however, such terminology must be considered as an alternative to the healing remedies offered in the shrines of Asclepius (incubation, bath therapy, physical exercises, music therapy, special diets). According to Ignatius of Antioch, the eucharistic bread is the "medicine of immortality, an antidote that allows us not to die" (Eph 20,2). In Justin, Jesus is the source of living water (Jn 4:10, 14) who healed the blind, deaf and lame, unlike Asclepius (Dial. 69,3-6). In Clement, the Logos is again the "medicine of immortality," which grants to humankind that they not slither about like serpents (Protr. 106,2). But the most efficacious medicine which Christ provides for all evils is his word (Theophilus, Ad Aut. I, 7; Origen, In Lev. 8,1; Lactantius, Inst. 4,15). Almost all the Fathers show its healing power, esp. in order to keep all suspicion of magic far from the church. Christ, in fact, heals at a distance, by his word, "without medicines or herbs" (apocryphal letter of *Abgar in Eus. HE 1,13,6). In Origen, Christ does not use extracts of herbs and of mineral oils, but "mysteries of words," contained in the Sacred Scriptures proclaimed in the church, which is at the same time his pharmacy and his hospital (In Lev. 8,1). In the 4th c., Christ assumes the identity of the Good Samaritan as well, who reserves for the sinner = "sick man" many medicines, such as the word, oil, wine (Ambrose, In Luc. 7,75; Exp. Ps. CXVIII 21,5). Yet this pharmaceutical theology reaches its culmination in proposing Christ himself as the medicine of the sick. As in modern medicine, which has found the role of the physician to be important, in his very person, just so Ambrose, Jerome and then Augustine present Christ as et medicus et medicamentum (Jer., Tract. in Marc. Ev. I, 13-31 CCL 78, 468).

In Augustine's theologia medicinalis (Schipperges, 15), the descriptions of the mortal condition in which fallen humanity finds itself must be read as corresponding to his "Christology-soteriology." Humanity, having been cast deep into death by the fall, can be raised up again only by God. God carries this out through a man, because a human must save humankind, but one who possesses the fullness of life. The Word of God became flesh, assuming humanity in Jesus. He is therefore the Mediator, God and man. He is Wisdom that has shown its capacity to cure by healing; ipsa [Sapientia] medicus, ipsa medicina (De Doctr. Chr. I, 14.13).

b. Ecclesial care of sickness. The image of Christ the physician is also reflected in the life of the church. Until Origen's time there were present in the church charisms of healing (C. Celsum I, 46), which tended to disappear in the following centuries (John Chrys., In Inscriptionem Actorum Ap. 2,3, PG 51, 81; Aug., De Vera Relig. 25,47; but also Retract. 1,13,7). On the other hand, the therapeutic activity of the community tended toward a progressive ritualization and spiritualization. If sickness is the expression of sin, sin also bears the marks of sickness. Thus, prayer and penance, which heal sin, are the chief physicians for Christians (*Cyprian, De Lapsis 14). Therefore, the whole community exercises this healing role, esp. in the sacramental liturgy (Sauser, 112 ff.). With time, the medical metaphor was also transferred to bishops, priests and laity, who carry out their role of "spiritual physicians." Nevertheless, in concrete situations of physical sickness, esp. in health emergencies due to epidemic diseases, Christians of every hierarchical order, without fear for their health, took care of the infected sick with an attitude contrary to the norm in pagan practice (Cyprian, De mort.; Letter of *Dionysius of Alex. regarding the plague of 252-267, in Eus., HE 7,22,7).

From the 4th c. on, bishops were required to organize centers which would offer care for the sick and would receive the poor and foreigners (Council of *Nicaea, Coll. Araba Can. 75, Mansi 2,1006; see *xenodochium). Arian bishops opened various centers which offered food and medical assistance to the poor. Among the orthodox, because of the marginalization of the poor in Cappadocia, Basil the Great had constructed at Caesarea the "new city" (Greg. Naz., Orat. 43.35; 43.63), a complex of buildings that arose around 372, where care was taken of the seriously ill and the poor were provided for. In this center, later named Basileiad in his honor (*Firmus of Caes., Ep. 43), the nurses and physicians were, for the most part, ascetics themselves, following the bishop (Basil, Ep. 94). In this small city of health and Christian mercy, Basil taught the monks to consider the service of their brothers as rendered to God (Reg. Brev. 160), while he taught the sick to trust the physicians, so that through their sickness they might learn to entrust themselves to the Lord and ask healing from him. Basil is quite demanding with the sick, since sickness is not a reason for spiritual laziness, but becomes the propitious occasion for a true personal conversion (Reg. Brev. 301; 26; 155; esp. 314).

Between the 3rd and 4th c., in the East, thanks to St. *John Chrysostom and to imperial assistance, and in the West, due to the generosity of many converts from the higher social classes, many hospitals and xenodochia were founded which offered free medical assistance (Mattioli, 262-263). On the other hand, in the East, the title of spiritual physician, attributed initially to bishops ("spiritual surgeons," Const. Apost. 3,41), thanks to *Athanasius and to the Life of Anthony (ch.87: "physician of Egypt"), began to designate the spiritual monk as well, who was capable of healing sicknesses of the spirit. Through his works, *John Cassian spread throughout Western monasticism confidence in Christ the physician, who uses methods and medicines to heal the passions of the soul (Conf. VII, 30; XIX, 12; Ist. XII, 8). In the Rule of St. Benedict, where it recommends the reading of Cassian (42; 73), the abbot, as vicarius Christi, is the sapiens medicus who must know how to use all the medicines necessary for those who have been entrusted to him as sick to care for (27,1-3,5). Thanks to its foundation in the notion of Christ the physician, the Eastern ascetical tradition can say that it was established as and remains a "method of diagnosis and therapy for spiritual sicknesses" (Larcet, Therapy). In the West, however, no one goes further than *Benedict in creative theological development of the metaphor of Christ the physician. In the following centuries, this concept gradually lost theological importance, though it remained quite present to some theologians. At the beginning of the Middle Ages, instead of Christus Medicus and Mediator, we find sancti medici mediatores (*Gregory of Tours, in Lutterbach).

A. Harnack, Medizinisches aus der ältesten Kirchengeschichte, TU 8 (4), Leipzig 1892, 37-152; H. Leclercq, Le Christ médicin: DACL 11 (1933) 157-160; R. Herzog, s.v. Asklepios: RAC 1 (1950) 795-799; G. Bardy, Saint Augustin et les médecins: L'année théologique augustinienne 13 (1953) 327-346; R. Schneider, Was hat uns Augustins theologia medicinalis heute zu sagen? Kerygma und Dogma 3 (1957) 397-415; R. Arbesmann, The Concept of "Christus Medicus" in S. Augustine: Traditio 10 (1954) 1-28; H. Schipperges, Zur Tradition des "Christus Medicus" im frühen Christentum und in der älteren Heilkunde: Arzt und Christ 11 (1965) 12-20; C. Andresen, Erlösung: RAC 6 (1966) 54-219; E. Nowak, Le chrétien devant la souffrance. Étude sur la pensée de Jean Chrysostome, Paris 1973; A. Oepke, ἰάομαι: GLNT IV (1968) 667-724 [TDNT 3, 194-215]; A. Brontesi, La soteria in Clemente Alessandrino, Rome 1972; E. Dinkler, Christus und Asklepios, Heidelberg 1980; G. Dumeige, Médicin (Le Christ): DSp 10 (1980) 891-901; Id., Le Christ médicin dans la littérature chrétienne des premiers siècles: RivAC 48 (1972) 115-141; D. Gourevitch, Le triangle hippocratique dans le monde gréco-romain. Le malade, sa maladie et son médicin, Rome 1981; J. Pigeaud, La maladie, l'étude de la relation de l'âme et du corps dans la tradition médico-philosophique antique, Paris 1981; G. Fichtner, Christus als Arzt. Ursprünge und Wirkungen eines Motivs: Frühmittelalterliche Studien 16 (1982) 1-18; B. Studer, Redenzione: DPAC II (1983) 2974-2977; P. Gerlitz, Heilkunde/ Medizin I: TRE 14 (1985) 738-743; G. Giurisato, L'abate come "Medico esperto" (RB 27,2–28,3), in Comunione e Comunità, Rome 1987, 291-335; E. Sauser, Christus Medicus—Christus als Arzt und seine Nachfolger im frühen Christentum: Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 101 (1992) 101-123; G.B. Ferngren - D.W. Amundsen, Medicine and Christianity in the Roman Empire: Compatibilities and Tensions: ANRW II (1996) 37,3, 2957-2980; H.C., Kee, Medicine, Miracle and Magic in New Testament Times, SNTSMS 55, Cambridge 1988; M. Herzog, Christus medicus, apothecarius, samaritanus, balneator. Motive einer "medizinisch-pharmazeutischen Soteriologie": Geist und Leben 67 (1994) 414-434; A.N. Terrin (ed.), Liturgia e terapia, Padua 1994; H. Lutterbach, Der Christus medicus und die Sancti medici: das wechselvolle Verhältnis zweier Grundmotive christlicher Frömmigkeit zwischen Spätantike und Früher Neuzeit: Saeculum 47 (1996) 239-281; U. Mattioli, Assistenza e cura dei malati nell'antichità cristiana, in E. dal Covolo - I. Giannetto, Cultura e promozione umana. La cura del corpo e dello spirito nell'antichità classica e nei primi secoli cristiani. Un magistero ancora attuale?, Troina 1998, 245-278; D. Knipp, "Christus Medicus" in der frühchristlichen Sarkophagskulptur: ikonographische Studien zur Sepulkralkunst des späten vierten Jahrhunderts, Leiden 1998; S. Fernández, Cristo médico según Orígenes. La actividad médica como metáfora de la acción divina, Rome 1999; Th.F. Martin, Paul the Patient. "Christus Medicus" and the "Stimulus carnis" (2 Cor. 12:7). A Consideration of Augustine's Medicinal Christology: Augustinian Studies 32 (2001) 219-256; J.-Cl. Larcet, Terapia delle malattie spirituali, Cinisello Balsamo 2003; G. Hammann, Die Geschichte der christlichen Diakonie: Praktizierte Nächstenliebe von der Antike bis zur Reformation- szeit, Göttingen 2003; M. Dörnemann, Krankheit und Heilung in der Theologie der frühen Kirchenväter, Tübingen 2003; I. Andorlini - A. Marcone, Medicina, medico e società nel mondo antico, Florence 2004; V. Boudon-Millot - B. Pouderon, Les Pères de l'Église face à la science médicale de leur temps, Paris 2005.

V. Lombino

PHYSIOLOGUS. The name of diverse Christian collections of questions and answers on "mirabilia" of natural science, circulated in Greek, in Latin and in Eastern languages. The answers were given by a personage called Physiologus, i.e., Aristotle, but the work is anonymous, even if certain adaptations go under the names of famous fathers of the church (*Epiphanius, *Basil, *Chrysostom, *Jerome, etc.). The Physiologus was composed in Greek in the 4th c., but displays many archaizing traits. It contains 48 "natures," for the most part of animals, but also of plants and minerals, taken from very diverse sources (biblical material, classical and Hellenistic influences, and also traditional Egyptian beliefs), the whole revisited in a Christian sense acc. to the rules of *allegorical *exegesis, which drew from them *christological applications (sometimes with accents of an *adoptionist type) and moral ones (often of an *Encratite mold). The popular character of the work favored its dissemination in the East and in medieval Europe, in numerous languages and diverse editions, variously interpolated from MS to MS, which renders difficult the research on the literary history of Physiologus. The work had a notable influence on Christian *symbolism and *iconography.

CPG 3766; W. Lüdtke, Zum armenischen und lateinischen Physiologus, Vienna 1911, 212-222; PWK 20, 1 (1941) 1074-1129; F. Sbordone, Physiologus, Mediolani . . . , 1936; F.J. Carmody, Physiologus latinus. Études préliminaires, versio B, Paris 1939; G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, I (ST 118), Vatican City 1944, 548-549; A. van Lantschoot, À propos du Physiologus: Coptic Studies in Honor of W.E. Crum, Boston 1950, 339-363; C. Conti Rossini, Il Fisiologo etiopico: Rassegna di studi etiopici 10 (1951) 5-51; A. van Lantschoot, Fragments syriaques du Physiologus: Muséon 72 (1952) 37-51; E. Peterson, Frühkirche, Judentum und Gnosis. Studien und Untersuchungen, Rome 1959, 236-253 (cf. ByzZ 47 [1954] 60-72); D. Offermanns, Der Physiologus nach den Handschriften G und M, Meisenheim am Glan 1966; D. Kaimakis, Der Physiologus nach der ersten Redaktion, Meisenheim am Glan 1974 (irrelevant); F. Sbordone, Rassegna di studi sul Physiologus (1936–1976): RFIC 105 (1976) 496-500; J.H. Declerck, Remarques sur la tradition du Physiologus grec: Byzantion 51 (1981) 148-158; Ch. Koch, Eine Notiz zum armenischen Physiologos: REArm 16 (1982) 87-88; A. Stojkova, Vizantijskata redakcija na Fiziologa v južnoslavjanskata srednovekovna knižina: Palaeobulgarica/Starobŭlgaristika 16 (1992) 68-76; A. Scott, The Date of the Physiologus: VChr 52 (1998) 430-441.

Sources: E. Brunner-Traut, Spitzmaus und Ichneumon als Tiere des Sonnengottes: NGWG 7 (1965) 123-163; Id., Ägyptische Mythen im Physiologus (zu Kapitel 26, 25 und 11): Festschrift für S. Schott, Wiesbaden 1968, 13-44; Id., Altägyptische Mythen im Physiologus: Antaios 10 (1969) 184-198 (repr.: Id., Gelebte Mythen. Beiträge zum altägyptischen Mythus, Darmstadt 1981, 99-113); U. Treu, Otterngezücht. Ein patristischer Beitrag zur Quellenkunde des Physiologus: ZNTW 50 (1969) 113-122; R. van den Broek, The Myth of the Phoenix According to Classical and Early Christian Traditions, Leiden 1971; E. Otto, Das Pelikan Motiv in der altaegyptischen Literatur: Studies presented to D. M. Robinson, I, Washington DC 1971, 215-222; L.S.B. MacCoull, The Coptic Triadon and the Ethiopic Physiologus: OC 75 (1991) 141-146. Simbolismo: LCI 3 (1971) 432-436 et passim; K. Grubmüller, Überlegungen zum Wahrheits-anspruch des Physiologus im Mittelalter: FMS 12 (1978) 160-177; M.J. Curley, "Physiologus," Φυσιολονία (!) and the Rise of Christian Symbolism: Viator 11 (1980) 1-10; G. Orlandi, La tradizione del "Physiologus" e i prodromi del bestiario latino, in L'uomo di fronte al mondo animale nell'Alto Medio Evo. Atti della XXXI settimana di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto, 7-13 aprile 1983. II, Spoleto 1985, 1057-1106; G. Lusini, Osservazioni sulla versione copta del Fisiologo: Egitto e Vicino Oriente 16 (1993) 67-72; L.K. Gibbs - M. Bettini, Per una semiotica del Physiologus. Allegoria e racconti, in Il tardoantico alle soglie del Duemila. Diritto, religione, storia. Atti del V conv. naz. dell'Associazione di Studi Tardoantichi, ed. G. Lanata (Associazione di Studi Tardoantichi. Atti dei Convegni 5), Pisa 2000, 205-221; G. Peers, Iconoclasm and the Use of Nature in the Smyrna Physiologus (Evangelical School, B. 8): Jahrbuch der Österreichischen Byzantinistik 50 (2000) 267-292.

S.J. Voicu

PIERIUS of Alexandria (d. after 309). Priest of *Alexandria, preacher and ascetic during the episcopate of *Theonas, around 281–300 (Eus., HE 7,32, 26-30; Jer., Ep. 70,4). Head of the Didaskaleion, acc. to *Philip of Side and *Photius (Bibl. cod. 119), he was nicknamed "Origen junior" (Jer., De Vir. ill. 76). The Acts of Philea, published in 1964, say that Pierius faltered during the *Diocletian *persecution. His writings were very well known. *Ammonius, an *anchorite of the Desert of Nitria, could recite many of his texts by heart: Silvia, a Roman noblewoman, read some of his homilies on the *Bible during a *pilgrimage in *Palestine (Pall., Hist. laus. 12 and 14; Jer., De Vir. ill. 76). Though far removed from this period, Photius personally knew ten of these biblical homilies: he praises their easy, clear style, free of artificial devices, the style of argument and the originality of their ideas. Unfortunately, only two fragments from these homilies remain: one on the gospel of *Luke, where he affirms that the honor or dishonor done to the *image (eikōn) is in turn done to the "prototype," thus establishing an argument in favor of *trinitarian theology; the other, from a Passover homily on Hosea, concerns the cherubim placed by Moses on the ark of the covenant and Jacob's pillar. Two other fragments can be found in what remains of Philip of Side's HE (ed. de Boor, TU 5, 2). The following writings, however, have been lost: the Life of St. Pamphilus and a treatise on the Mother of God, also mentioned by Philip of Side. Either the Diocletian persecution, or rather the anti-*Origenism of Theonas's successor, *Peter I of Alexandria, made life nearly impossible for him. Pierius found refuge in *Rome, where he lived out his last years. Speaking of several NT MSS, *Jerome refers to them as exemplaria Pierii (Com. Mt. 24,36). It is possible that *Pamphilus, a disciple of Pierius, took these copies to *Caesarea, where Jerome could have been able to consult them. There was a church at Alexandria dedicated to his name, perhaps one he established.

CPG 1630; M.J. Routh, Reliquiae Sacrae, Oxford 1846, III, 423-435; PG 20, 733ff.; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchr. Literatur bis Eusebius, Leipzig 1893, I, 439ff.; L.B. Radford, Three Teachers of Alexandria: Theognostus, Pierius and Peter. A Study in the Early History of Origenism and Anti-Origenism, Cambridge 1908; DTC 12, 1744-1746; BS 10, 574-577; L.W. Barnard, The Antecedents of Arius: VChr 24 (1970) 172-188 (see esp. 182-183); H. Chadwick, A Letter Ascribed to Peter of Alexandria: JTS 24 (1973) 443-455 (see 445 n. 2); A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus, Freiburg [3]1990, 294-302; T. Vivian, St. Peter of Alexandria, Philadelphia 1988, 12, 111 and 114-116; C. Moreschini - E. Norelli, Storia della letteratura cristiana antica greca e latina, I, Brescia 1995, 437; A. Martin, Athanase d'Aléxandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Paris 1996, 145 (see index).

C. Kannengiesser

PIETY. Piety (εὐσέβεια) refers to the application of one's entire being to the service of God. Its opposite is *impiety. Since classical antiquity the term referred to the deep sense of religious respect and love toward the divinity (see Isocr. 258; Plat., Symp. 193) and one's parents (Plat., Repub. 615). The OT presupposes the fear of God, which is not fright, but utmost respect for the divine majesty and transcendence, and taken in a wide sense, suggests the idea of religion or piety toward God. For human beings, piety takes on concrete forms in the heroic obedience of Abraham (Gen 22:12), the faith of Jacob (Gen 48:15), and Joseph's flight instead of offending God (Gen 39:9), in Josiah (Sir 49:3) and Onias III's faithfulness to God (2 Mac 3:1), and in the theological-messianic definition of Jerusalem as the "glory of piety" (Bar 5:4). In the NT, the term only appears in the Pastoral Letters and in 2 Peter. The primeval meaning was enriched by the NT's emphasis on filial love toward God, which in the *incarnation of the Word has manifested itself in a unique and sublime way. The truth, which is in conformity to piety, is another way of saying "the religion of Christ" (1 Tim 6:3). The universality of piety, which has the promises of eternal *life (1 Tim 4:7; see also 1 Cor 9:24-26; Eph 6:12; Phil 3:12-14) presupposes a close connection to Christ and religious knowledge. Because it is a means to acquire imperishable goods (1 Tim 6:6-7), piety makes up part of the *virtues for the person of God (1 Tim 6:11). The evidence of piety's authenticity is in a genuine *love for one's neighbor.

Early Christian literature received and appropriated the biblical and secular meaning of love and respect for the gods (religion), making the term piety carry a sense of obligation (Just., 1 Apol. 3,2), piety-devotion in its various manifestations (Eus., Praep. Evang. I, 1). To this meaning, which seems to have been the most prominent, other meanings were added and explained in various ways: religion (or worship?) of the *pagans, Jews and Christians acc. to their own particular characteristics (Just., Dial. 14,2; Athenag., Leg. 13,1; Eus., Praep. Evang. XI, 15), the *orthodox faith in opposition to *heresy (Athan., Contra Arianos [Against the Arians] 2,45; Epiph., Haer. 34,21), correct moral behavior (Just., Dial. 4,7), the religious observance of the pagans (Athenag., Leg. 30,3) and the Christians (Eus., HE 4,24), and the worship of the divinity (Clem. Alex., Strom. I, 24).

In Late Antiquity it became a title of honor for monks, bishops and emperors (Athan., Ad Monacos Epist. I; Epist. ad Rufinianum; Apol. 2,44). The concept of piety is also found, as a derivation and secondary meaning, under the Greek term εὐλάβεια. In the Septuagint, the meaning of fear-reverence opens the door to a privileged meaning of piety-devotion (Ex 3:6; 1 Sam 18:15-29; Jer 5:22; Mal 3:16). In the NT, only Heb 12:28 is relevant to our discussion, and here the term pertains to worship that is offered with piety and fear by the church-community to God, a consuming fire (= theological title: Dt 9:3). In the religious vocabulary of Christian writers, the meaning of reverence and piety is prevalent (Polyc., Phil. 6,3; Evagr. Pont., De orat. 42; Cyril Alex., Ps. 5,8; Eus., HE 4,15,8; Clem. Alex., Strom. 6,17; Hipp., In Dan. 3,22,1; etc.). The term pious had more success as an honorific title of monks, bishops, priests and emperors (Alex. of Alex., Epist. ad Alex. I; Greg. Naz., Epist. 102; Athan., Epist. ad Jovianum 1).

EC 9, 1388-1389; GLNT 9, 1458-1486; Enc. Bib. 5, 728-729; P. Veyne, Une évolution du paganisme gréco-romain. Injustice et piété des dieux, leurs ordres ou "oracles": Latomus 45 (1986) 259-283; J.D. Garrison, Pietas from Vergil to Dryden, University Park, PA 1992; Philodemus, On Piety, Part I, Critical Text with Commentary, ed. D. Obbink, New York-Oxford 1996; B. Colot, Pietas, argument et expression d'un nouveau lien socio-religieux dans le christianisme romain de Lactance: SP 34 (2001) 23-32.

E. Peretto

PILATE
I. Pilate in tradition - II. Iconography - III. Apocryphal texts.

I. Pilate in tradition. The canonical gospels agree that Pilate, even though recognizing Jesus' innocence, committed a judicial crime in order to placate the people. This seems to contradict what we know from other sources about Pilate, the Roman procurator of Judea from 26 to 37. Much can be said about his administration, which was full of provocation, violence, fraud and executions without trials. The letter of Herod Agrippa I, which narrates the governance of Pilate and offers a detailed description of his character, has been preserved by *Philo (Leg. Gai. 301-302), which presents him as a haughty, irascible, cowardly, hardheaded and cruel man. Even though this description contains much of Philo's political rhetoric (as in the case of his portrayal of Caligula, Flaccus, the Alexandrian populace and other enemies of *Judaism), his description of the facts are certainly worthy of credence: bribes, violent acts, fraudulent dealings, executions without trial, abusive and savage conduct. In contrast to this image, Flavius Josephus (De bello iud. II, 169-177; Antiq. Iud. XVIII, 55-59.62) presents him as a relatively capable governor and open to collaboration with the Jewish priestly authorities, though lacking common sense in dealing with the Jewish people and their law. His description of Pilate's disposition corresponds to that of a military prefect: a rugged, steadfast and harsh man in his decisions. He matches the incident mentioned by Luke (13:1) on the massacre of the Galilean pilgrims. His execution of Jesus was probably the typical crucifixion administered to messianic troublemakers; but he executed only the leader and not his followers.

What we know of his character and behavior differs from the weakness and the uncertainty he shows in the gospel accounts in the trial of Jesus. Nonetheless, these accounts do not appear to be entirely identical. According to *Mark, Pilate was far from being weak and uncertain; he was a fully capable politician, a strong representative of the imperial interests and one who manipulated the multitudes to overcome a difficult situation. According to *Matthew, Pilate was indifferent toward Jesus and very favorably inclined to placate the Jewish leaders without, however, accepting any responsibility for the act. Luke presents his weakness as his primary characteristic, which led him, under the pressure of the Jewish nation, to condemn an innocent man. *John's Pilate is a manipulator, a man certain of his authority, who supports the Jews' desires to condemn Jesus, but on the condition that they accept Caesar as their only king; he is an ally of the hostile "world" that rejects Jesus. The current situation of each community was a factor in determining the portrait that each evangelist drew of the prefect. The Christian description of Pilate's conduct can be said to be due in part to the apologetic interest of presenting a Jesus (and an early Christianity) who was innocent before the Roman authorities, attributing all hostility against him to the malice and intrigues of the Jewish leaders; but this explanation is inadequate. The fall and execution of Sejanus put Pilate's political career in danger. If the trial of Jesus is to be placed in the period following the fall of Sejanus, the year 32 or 33, one understands why Pilate appeared to be weak, yielding to the pressure against Jesus. Later, when Pilate realized that he was secure in his position, he returned to his old foibles (Fl. Josephus, Antiq. Iud. XVIII, 85-87). In the year 36, he was deposed and sent back to Rome to render an account for his work before the emperor.

The apologetic tendencies of the Gospel of Peter also pertain to the person of Pilate; it seeks to exonerate him from all responsibility in the condemnation of Jesus and place the blame on Herod and the Jews. *Justin (1 Apol. 35.48) mentions the Acts of the trial of Jesus before Pilate, but Justin is probably merely conjecturing about their existence. *Tertullian (Apol. 5, 21) speaks of a letter of Pilate to *Tiberius, where Pilate narrates the miracles of Jesus in great detail; he indicates that its author was a Christian. *Eusebius also speaks of this apocryphal letter (HE 2, 2). He does not mention the Christian Acts of Pilate; nonetheless, he was well acquainted with the anti-Christian Acts that the persecuting Emperor *Maximus ordered to be memorized by heart in the schools (HE 1, 9,3-4; 9, 5,1; 9, 7,1-2). It is possible that the Christian Acts of Pilate originated as a response to these latter texts. Christian literature began to discuss Pilate in the 2nd c. and knew many continuations of this genre until the Middle Ages and even into modern times. Because the origin of this literature varied in time, place and language, it thus revealed its various objectives. The apologetic and edifying interests of later Christians accompanied the desire to fill the gaps in the tradition and satisfy their historical and pious curiosity. Thanks to such letters, Pilate served as a *pagan witness to the divinity of Jesus. The various letters that were circulated and studied with the objective of influencing the magistrates and Roman public opinion were a relatively late development within the internal process of persuading some of the pagan authorities of the harmlessness of Christian beliefs and practices. There exists an apocryphal correspondence between Pilate and Tiberius; another between Pilate and Herod, and the letter of Pilate to the emperor *Claudius.

The account of the Paradosis Pilati is relatively ancient, in which Pilate, when brought to trial before the senate, declares his innocence of Jesus' death and blames the Jews. Condemned to beheading, he praised the Lord and asked for forgiveness. A voice from heaven declares him blessed and announces that he will be the Lord's witness during his *second coming. This allows one to understand and justify how the holy Pilate came to be venerated in the Coptic Church. A Martyrium Pilati has survived in Arabic and Ethiopian. On the opposite side of the spectrum, Greek Christian legend asserts that he committed suicide (Eus., HE 2, 7). We have three Western accounts (Mors Pil., Cura sanitatis Tiberii and the Vindicta Salvatoris). The documents of *Orosius (Hist. VII, 4) in the 5th c. and *Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. I, 21-24) in the 6th c. confirm the hypothesis of a further rearrangement of the early Acts of Pilate that have come down to us as the Evangelium Nicodemi, which heavily influenced Christian *iconography starting from the 5th c.; they claim the testimony of Pilate and that of the Jews themselves in favor of the innocence and divinity of Jesus.

EC 9, 1472-1476; K. von Tischendorf, Evangelia Apocrypha, Leipzig ²1876; Erbetta 3, 119-135; A. de Santos Otero, Los Evangelios apócrifos, Madrid ⁶1988, index, p. 759; E. Bammel, φίλος τοῦ καίσαρος: ThLZ 77 (1952) 206-210; J. Blinzler, Die Niedermetzelung von Galiläern durch Pilatus: NovT 2 (1957) 24-49; P. Winter, A Letter from Pontius Pilate: NovT 7 (1964-65) 37-47; O.V. Volkoff, Un saint oublié. Ponce Pilate: Bulletin Arch. Copte 20 (1969/70) 165-175; E. Cerulli, Tiberius and Pontius Pilate in Ethiopian Tradition and Poetry: Proceedings British Ac. 59 (1973) 141-158; W. Speyer, Neue Pilatus-Apokryphen: VChr 32 (1978) 53-59; J.-P. Lémonon, Pilate et le gouvernement de la Judée, Textes et monuments, Paris 1981; Schneemelcher 1, Neutestamentliche Apocryphen I (Tübingen ⁵1987) 395-424; H.K. Bond, Pontius Pilate in History and Interpretation, SNTSMS 100, Cambridge 1998.

R. Trevijano

II. Iconography. The interpretation of Pilate's judgment appears in Christian iconography throughout the course of the 4th c. Completely absent from the figurative repertoire of catacomb *paintings, this scene enjoyed a noteworthy dissemination and success in the figurative repertoire of the *sarcophagi, in the so-called contexts of the "passion" developed after the advent of religious peace and in the celebrative atmosphere of victory.

This scene is easily identifiable for the numerous characteristic elements that characterize it: the suggestus (platform), the sella curulis (magistrate's chair) upon which Pilate sat surrounded by a variable number of counselors; the hourglass used to determine the time in which the legal proceeding occurred; the cammillus who carried the basin in which Pilate washed his hands; finally, Christ, who is alone or placed next to the soldiers and is brought to or led away from Pilate by them.

Well-known sarcophagi, chronologically datable to around the mid-4th c., reproduce the scene: e.g., Lat. 55, called the sarcophagus of the two brothers (Rep. 45), Lat. 174 (Rep. 677,1) and that of Junius Bassus (Rep. 680,1) dating to the year 359. Scholars know around 30 instances of the scene of Pilate washing his hands. The case of the Constantinian sarcophagus of Berja (Spain) is unique (but Wilpert's intuition has been unanimously received by all recent scholars), where Pilate appears to be replaced by *Nero under the form of the persecuting ruler Nebuchadnezzar, and Jesus by the two apostles *Peter and *Paul in a symbolic context that clearly alludes to ecclesiology.

This scene from 4th c. onward develops the expression in various ways and in the various dispositions of the main characters and on the different types of monuments; one should note here, e.g., the ivory diptych of Milan's Cathedral Treasury and the British Museum ivory, both dated to the 5th c., while in the 6th c. the scene appears on the famous ciborium of the basilica of S. Marco, Venice.

If testimonies are lacking in 4th-5th-c. painting, in the period immediately following and in continuity with the examples of courtly art examined at this point, the scene returns on the *mosaics of S. Apollinare Nuovo at *Ravenna in which Christ is led by the Jewish priests. In closing, the Codex Purpureus Rossanensis, which was studied by Maffei, is worthy of special mention.

See the exhaustive bibl. collected by C. Carletti, s.v. Pilato: EC 9, 1476-1477; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952; F. Zuliani, I marmi di S. Marco, Alto Medioevo, II, Venice [1969]; A. Saggiorato, I sarcofagi paleocristiani con scene di passione, Bologna 1968, 83-89; M. Sotomayor, Sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España. Estudio iconográfico, Granada 1975, 105-106; F. de' Maffei, Il codice purpureo di Rossano Calabro. La sua problematica e alcuni risultati di ricerca, Rossano 1978; TIP 259-263.

U. Broccoli

III. Apocryphal texts. Pontius Pilate was a historic person mentioned many times in the NT. He was also mentioned by non-Christian (Tacitus and Flavius Josephus) and Christian (*Eusebius and *Orosius) historians, and the *Creed. A group of apocryphal texts exists in which Pilate plays an important role: The Gospel of Nicodemus (5th/6th c., the first part contains a description of the judgment of Pilate); various rulings of Pilate who condemned Jesus (medieval texts); the Anaphora and its continuation, the Paradosis of Pilate (5th c., Pilate's report on the death of Jesus, Pilate's delivery to justice, ending with his conviction); the Death of Pilate; the Letter of Pilate to Tiberius (16th c.?); The Healing of Tiberius and The Revenge of the Savior (two chronologically close accounts); the Ethiopian Martyrdom of Pilate attributed to *Cyriacus of al-Bahnasa; The Letter of James to Quadratus (ca. 400, in Syriac). Close to these works are The History of Joseph of Arimathea and the Testimony of Ursinius, where Pilate is mentioned.

Different problems and motifs intersect in all these works: the guilt or innocence of Pilate and the various people tied in some way to the passion of Christ; the problem of divine justice on *Jerusalem; the relationship of Pilate to the emperor; the legend of the healing of Tiberius and Titus (that mirrors the healing of *Abgar). These works have different literary forms: letters, official reports and narrations. The point of departure for some of these works is the report Pilate sent to Tiberius, which was already mentioned by *Justin and *Tertullian. Another important point was the death of Pilate, already mentioned by Eusebius of Caesarea, and the problem of his guilt or innocence. Here there are two solutions: was Pilate innocent or guilty? The first, following the line of the gospel of John, and generally accepted by Eastern texts, considers Pilate innocent or less guilty; the condemnation of Jesus was an act of weakness that became a felix culpa; acc. to this body of literature, the Jews became the first guilty party and therefore had to be punished; and in certain texts, Pilate and his wife Procula become saints (in the Coptic and Ethiopian churches). The other solution, following the line of the synoptic gospels, was generally accepted in Western apocryphal texts: Pilate was guilty and deserving of a terrible death. Alongside Pilate, the main character, other biblical persons played a more or less important role: Nicodemus, *Joseph of Arimathea, Gamaliel, the two thieves and *Mary Magdalene; historical figures: the emperors *Tiberius, *Claudius, *Nero, *Titus and *Vespasian; and fictitious persons: Nathan, Volusianus and Veronica (identified as the woman with the hemorrhage). *Judas the traitor appears only marginally alongside these individuals. These legends on Pilate enjoyed great popularity in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages: Pilate and the other individuals from this circle (such as Veronica) met with favor in popular devotion and literature.

CANT 62, 64-78. Bibliography on the Acts of Pilate: R. Gounelle - Z. Izydorczyk, in The Medieval Gospel of Nicodemus, ed. Z. Izydorczyk, Tempe 1997, 419-519; Id.: Apocrypha 11 (2000) 259-292. The majority of these texts are found in the edition of Tischendorf and in Santos Otero. One can find translations of the apocryphal gospels in all the important series such as those by Elliott, Erbetta, Moraldi, Craveri and Starowieyski. W. Creizenach, Legenden und Sagen von Pilatus, Beitrage z. Geschichte d. deutsch. Sprache und Literatur, 1874, 89-107; E. Fascher, RE 40, 1950, 1322-1323; W. Speyer, Die literarische Fälschungen im heidnischen und christlichen Literatur, Munich 1971 (see index: Pilatusliteratur); E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ, Edinburgh 1973, 357-387 [esp. 383-387]; E. Cerulli, Tiberius and Pontius Pilatus in the Ethiopian Tradition and Poetry: Proceedings British Acad. 5 (1975) 141-158; J.P. Lémonon, Pilate et le gouvernement de la Judée. Textes et monuments, Paris 1981; Id., Ponce Pilate. Documents profanes, Nouveau Testament et traditions ecclésiastiques: ANRW 26/1 (1992) 741-778; R. Staats, Pontius Pilatus im Bekenntnis der frühen Kirche: ZThK 84 (1987) 493-513; J.D. Dubois, Les Actes de Pilate au quatrième siècle: Apocrypha 2 (1991) 85-98; Écrits apocryphes chrétiens, II, ed. P. Geoltrian - J.D. Kaestli, Paris 2005, 243-413.

M. Starowieyski

PILGRIMAGES (Peregrinatio). The first known Christian pilgrim was a Cappadocian bishop named *Alexander, who shortly after 200 traveled to *Jerusalem "to pray and visit the sites there" (Eus., HE 6,11,2). *Clement of Alexandria went there as well a few years later (Jerome: PL 33, 687). Around a hundred years later, *Eusebius (Dem. ev. 6, 18, 23) states concerning Zech 14:4 that "all those who believe in Christ come together here [at Jerusalem] from every part of the world not, as in the past, to admire the splendor of the city or to pray at the ancient temple, but stop here to see the effects of the conquest and destruction of Jerusalem . . . and to pray on the Mount of Olives in front of the city . . . where the feet of the Savior stood." Elsewhere, Eusebius also alludes to the influx of pilgrims into Jerusalem (Vita Const. 3,28; Dem. ev. 7,2). Of course, not all Christians traveled there, and the Mount of Olives was not, at least at the beginning of the 4th c., the sole place where Christians prayed; Golgotha and Christ's sepulcher were inaccessible because of Hadrian's towering temple (Jer. Ep. 58,3), but on the hill to the SW of the city, on Christian Zion, before the building of *Constantine's basilica, a church had already existed.

Constantine's numerous building projects in Jerusalem and the Holy Land already bear witness to the burning interest in the holy places; such projects conferred a new impetus on the pilgrimages. Not only *Helena, Constantine's mother, traveled through the Holy Land as a pilgrim (Eus., Vita Const. 3,42), but also Eutropia, the mother of Fausta, the wife of the emperor (Soz., HE 2, 4). Both women made the trip probably because of the bloodshed that had occurred in their family, so that as a result the idea of expiation was added to the two classical motives (prayer and visits to sites), an idea that later definitively marked pilgrimages.

The most ancient extant piece of Christian information on pilgrimages pertains to a Christian pilgrim from *Bordeaux (333) and informs us that Christians in the Holy Land not only visited the sites from the life of Jesus but also those of the OT. This source makes only nine references to the NT but 22 to the OT, and it not only refers to the sites of salvific events, but also refers, e.g., to the tomb of the patriarchs in Hebron. On a theoretical level, the Christian pilgrimages were in continuity with those of the Jews, even if Eusebius heavily emphasizes the differences. In the 4th and 5th c., the fact that certain Roman women had moved to *Palestine had a particularly favorable effect on pilgrimages: after 372 *Melania the Elder (Pall., Hist. Laus. 46), *Paula in 385 with her daughter *Eustochium (Jer., Ep. 108), and in 417, *Melania the Younger (Gerontius's Vita) with *Paula. *Jerome settled at Bethlehem with Paula, who also created a hospice for pilgrims. As a result, in the East there arose Latin centers that continually strengthened an awareness of the church's unity through peregrinatio.

To the aforementioned pilgrims one should also add the Spanish sister *Egeria, whose records, which have come down to us in part, reveal a new stage. Pilgrims not only visited the sites of the memorials and tombs—among which visits were undertaken again to the tombs of Christian *martyrs—but also the dwellings of the *ascetics. Above all, Egeria visited the monks in *Egypt. In addition to visiting the memorials of the patriarchs, Egeria was greatly interested in *Mesopotamia and the numerous monks and sisters whom she regarded as holy people (Peregr. 20 and 21). The *stylites (monks living on a column), such as *Simeon the Elder in Qal'at Semān in *Syria (d. 459), *Simeon the Younger near *Antioch (d. 592), and *Daniel near *Constantinople (d. 493), attracted many pilgrims. Even after their deaths, their landmarks remained destination points for pilgrimages, as is the case of the famous tombs of the martyrs in Resafa, Syria (Bacchus and *Sergius), in *Seleucia, Isauria (*Thecla), and Chalcedon (*Euphemia), in the city of *Mennas (Abu Mina) near *Alexandria, etc.

The *Bible was and remained the travel guide even after the 5th c. when special guides for the Holy Land had been compiled (e.g., that of *Eucherius of Lyons). From it they not only gathered the routes, but also read pertinent passages on the site, they prayed and chose a song to match the occasion (Pereg. 3,6; 4,3; 14,1). Where a church was constructed, the holy sacrifice was celebrated (Pereg. 3,6; 4,3ff.), so that in certain instances the sacrifice was celebrated two times in the same day, even if those who were not priests received the sacrament only once (Pereg. 4,4). The pilgrims took part in the local religious functions and feasts, and when they returned to their homeland they recounted these events (e.g., Pereg. 24-29, on the lavish *liturgies in Jerusalem).

They also sought to carry *relics with them, e.g., a few fragments from the *cross of Christ, which was venerated at Jerusalem from ca. 350 onward. At *Rome, however, in the most important Western center of pilgrimages because of the presence of the tombs of the apostles *Peter and *Paul, which conferred upon it the prestige that exceeded that of *Carthage, Valencia or *Saragossa, the pilgrims were only given contact relics, i.e., pieces of material that had been lowered into Peter's tomb. Elsewhere, Rome offered a sufficient number of relics of the martyrs and there thus arose a new form of pilgrimage with the goal of obtaining relics (Avitus, Ep. 27; Greg. Tours, In glor. mart. 28).

Nevertheless, pilgrimages were also criticized by the great doctors: *Gregory of Nyssa exhorted the faithful to leave the body alone and to make pilgrimage toward the Lord, and not from Cappadocia to Palestine (Ep. 2,18); Jerome, though he had served as a guide for Paula's pilgrimage, insisted on saying: "*Anthony and all the ranks of monks . . . did not visit Jerusalem, and nevertheless the doors of *paradise were opened to them" (Ep. 58,2).

With the monks, however, we find another form of pilgrimage that developed alongside that of peregrinatio, namely, the ascetical detachment from one's homeland (xeniteia) in imitation of *Abraham, who left his home. It is thus better, acc. to the abbot Jacob, to live as a foreigner than to give lodging to them (Apophth. Patr. Jacob 1). This does not mean that the monk undertook a pilgrimage with a specific goal in mind, but that he had to detach himself from his house and family. For the abbot Titoe, the one who holds his tongue truly lives in a foreign land (ibid., Titoe 2; see also the response of Lucius and Longinus).

DACL 14, 45-65 (pilgimage at Rome), 65-175 (pilgimage in Palestine); B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa. Wallfahrten in den Antike and das Pilgerwesen der alten Kirche, Münster 1950; J. Wilkinson, Egeria's Travels, London 1971; H. Donnen, Pilgerfahrt ins Heilige Land. Die ältesten Berichte christlichen Palästinapilger (IV.-VII. Jh.), Stuttgart 1979; E.D. Hunt, Holy Land Pilgrimage in the Later Roman Empire A.D. 312–460, Oxford 1982; P. Maraval, Lieux Saints et Pélerinages d'Orient. Histoire et géographie des origines à la conquête arabe, Paris 1985; var. aus.

Akten des XII Internationales Kongress für christliche Archäologie, Bonn 1995; R. Lavarini, Il pellegrinaggio cristiano, Genoa 1997; D. Frankfurter (ed.), Pilgrimage and Holy Space in Late Antique Egypt, Leiden 1998; G. Otranto, Il pellegrinaggio nel cristianesimo antico: VetChr 36 (1999) 239-257; Pellegrini e luoghi santi dall'antichità al Medioevo, ed. M. Mengozzi, Cesena 1999; M. Coccopalmerio, Il ritorno del Pellegrino. Eulogie di Terra Santa, Genoa 2001; var. aus., L'idea di Gerusalemme nella spiritualità cristiana del Medioevo, Vatican City 2003; Pilgrimage in Graeco-Roman and Early Christian Antiquity. Seeing the Gods, ed. J. Elsner - I. Rutherford, Oxford 2005; G. Otranto, Caratteri identitari del pellegrinaggio dei cristiani nel rapporto con i "santuari": AnSE 22 (2005) 99-117.

H.J. Voigt

PIMENIUS, martyr. The Mart. hier. mentions his name various times, but the actual date seems to be 18 February, in keeping with what one finds from various legends and the marble *calendar of Naples. Another date, 2 December, is explained with that of *Bibiana, in whose legendary cycle Pimenius was inserted. According to the itineraries of the 7th c. (CCL 175, 309, 316, 327), his body lay in the cemetery of Pontianus on the Via Portensis. In this cemetery, one can see his image along with that of two other martyrs, accompanied by the inscription SCS Milix. SCS Pimenius. SCS Pollion. His name appears at times in the Passio of Bibiana (BHL 1322), the legend of Crescentius (BHL 1986) and that of Donatus (BHL 2289), where he is called a "priest." These documents arbitrarily claim that their main characters were martyred under *Julian the Apostate. Pimenius's relics were transferred to the basilica of S. Silvestro in Capite.

BHL 6849; BS 10, 871-873; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 230-231.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

PINIANUS (d. 432). We know about his life thanks to *Augustine (Ep. 124; 125; 126), *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. 21), *Palladius (Hist. Laus. 61) and *Gerontius's bibliography on the life of Melania. Valerius Severus Pinianus was a Roman from the aristocratic and wealthy family of the Valerii; he was a consularis at 17 years of age; he married *Melania the Younger—who at the time was 13/14 years old and the granddaughter of *Melania the Elder—who suggested to him that they live in continence. He accepted the proposal, but only after having begotten two children. They first had a daughter, whom they consecrated to God, then a baby boy, who died immediately. Because of his wife's poor health and the death of their little girl, they decided to live in continence after seven years of marriage (Vita Melaniae 6: SC 90, 136). In 404/405, Pinianus received Palladius, who had come to *Rome to defend *John Chrysostom. Around 406, he withdrew with his wife to an area near Rome to live an ascetic life and, esp., to give away their many riches dispersed throughout the entire Roman West. As a result, they met opposition from their relatives. In 407 he was residing in *Nola. Following the urging of his brother Severus, the slaves who did not want to be freed or sold raised an objection to him. Through an imperial concession, however, the governors of the provinces were placed in charge of selling their goods and giving away their assets for works of charity and the construction of monasteries. In 408/409 he was at Sicily, where he must have had contact with *Rufinus of *Aquileia; when *Alaric was approaching in 410 he fled to *Thagaste, Africa, where the bishop was *Alypius. He and his wife made large contributions to the church of Thagaste and at the same time established and supplied various monasteries. In 411, Pinianus was at *Hippo with Melania; in the presence of Augustine, the congregation asked Pinianus to enter into the clergy of Hippo. He was obliged to sign a promise to remain in Hippo if he ever decided to become a priest (Augustine, Ep. 126,3). In 417 he left Africa and settled in *Jerusalem, where he resided near Anastasis; in 418 Pinianus, Melania and *Albina informed Augustine that *Pelagius was intending to reenter the church (see Augustine, De gratia Christi 1,2). Perhaps still in 418, Pinianus and Melania traveled to *Egypt to meet the holy monks. After his return to Jerusalem, he lived an ascetic life until 432, the year of his death.

PCBE 2, 1798-1802; L.J. Swift, Augustine on the Oath of Pinianus, in Congresso Int. su S. Agostino nel XVI centenario della conversione, Rome, 15-20 settembre 1986, Atti 1, Rome 1987, 371-379; V. Sirago, Incontro di Agostino con Melania e Piniano, in L'umanesimo di S. Agostino. Atti del Congr. Int. 1986, ed. M. Fabris, Bari 1988, 629-648; G.A. Cecconi, Un evergete mancato. Piniano a Ippona: Athenaeum 66 (1988) 371-389; L.J. Swift, Augustine on Fama. The Case of Pinianus, in Nova & Vetera. Patristic Studies in Honor of Thomas Patrick Halton, ed. J. Petruccione, Washington 1998, 196-205; S. Lancel, Saint Augustin, Paris 1999, 440-442.

A. Di Berardino

PINYTUS. Bishop of Knossos. *Eusebius of Caesarea in his Ecclesiastical History (IV, 21 and 23,7-8) is the sole source that has preserved the name of Pinytus bishop of Knossos (*Crete), who lived during the time of the emperor *Marcus Aurelius (161–180). He mentions Pinytus with regard to an epistolary correspondence he had with Bishop *Dionysius of Corinth.

Dionysius warned his colleague against certain openly *Encratite movements. Pinytus responded by insisting on the obligation of giving the faithful spiritual nourishment that would lead them to a state of mature manhood. Eusebius of Caesarea could not contain his admiration of Pinytus: "with this letter, as in a complete portrait, are evident Pinytus's orthodoxy in the faith, his concern for everything that is advantageous for his faithful, his learning and his understanding of divine matters" (ed. Bardy, 204). On the basis of this statement of Eusebius, *Jerome introduced Pinytus into his work On Illustrious Men (De viris illustribus, 27 [PL 23, 679-680]).

Eusebius, HE (SC 31, 199 and 204); BS 10, 876-877.

J.-M. Sauget

PIONIUS. The martyrdom of Pionius, who is presented as a *presbyter of the church of *Smyrna, is mentioned in an ecclesiastical treatise found in *Paleoslavonic, *Armenian and *Greek; a reference to this text, moreover, is found in *Eusebius's work (HE 4,15,46-47). Eusebius places his martyrdom during the reign of *Marcus Aurelius, even if that seems very unlikely; the fact that the document associated Pionius with *Polycarp certainly misled this ancient Christian historian. Scholars generally place his dates closer to the time of the *Decian persecution.

Nevertheless, the process of editing the text within the scholastic context of Christianity in Smyrna created some confusion in the details regarding the legal Acts and has made it virtually impossible to obtain absolute certainty. The long account of Pionius's martyrdom underwent many editorial changes and interpolations, and became an example of religious propaganda from the moment that Pionius's martyrdom was connected to Polycarp's. The latter was also used to demonstrate the superiority of Christianity over *paganism and *Judaism, esp. through long speeches delivered in a sophistic style and placed in Pionius's mouth at key points in the narrative. Nevertheless, there is a historical nucleus within the account of the martyrdom. The document is also of special interest for its references to the Christian *sabbath, Pionius's use of water in the *Eucharist and the constant liveliness of the prophetic visions.

Delehaye 26-33; BS 10, 919-921; RAC 2, 1175; M. Srapian, Das Martyrium des hl. Pionios. Aus dem Altarmenischen übersetzt: Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes 28 (1914) 376-405; M. Simonetti, Studi agiografici, Rome 1955, 9-51; Sist. Cyrilla, Pionius of Smyrna: SP 10 (1970) 281-284; G. Lanata, Gli Atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 162-177; R. Lane Fox, Pagans and Christians, Harmondsworth 1986, 450-492; A. Hilhorst, Heidenen, joden en christenen in Smyrna. De verdedigingsrede van de martelaar Pionius in de vervolging van Decius: Hermeneus 66 (1994) 160-166; L. Robert, Le martyre de Pionios prêtre de Smyrne, Washington DC 1994 (bibl.); E.L. Gibson, Jewish Antagonism or Christian Polemic. The Case of the Martyrdom of Pionius: JECS 9 (2001) 339-358.

A. Stewart-Sykes

PIONIUS (pseudo). This is the name assigned to the author of an anonymous life of *Polycarp. The postscript to the Martyrium Polycarpi states that "Pionius" discovered the Martyrium, and this is the source for the attribution of the Life, from the moment in which the same hand seems to have united the Life to the Martyrium, thus forming a corpus Polycarpianum. Nevertheless, this ps.-Pionus is not the author of the Life, but was simply an editor who created the corpus, probably in the second quarter of the 4th c. The Life itself, even though anonymous, should be dated to the 3rd c.

L. Duchesne, Vita Sancti Polycarpi Smyrnaeorum Episcopi auctore Pionio, Paris 1881; A. Stewart-Sykes, The Life of Polycarp. An Anonymous Vita from Third-century Smyrna, Early Christian Studies 4, Sydney 2002.

A. Stewart-Sykes

PIRMINIUS (8th c.). Perhaps originally from *Spain, he engaged in intense missionary activity in S *Germany during the 1st half of the 8th c. He founded the *monastery of Reichenau on an island in Lake Constance. In 727 he went to Alsace, where he created Murbach and other monasteries. He wrote a treatise titled De singulis libris canonicis scarapsus (= excerptus), a *florilegium of scriptural passages designed in such a way as to illustrate the catechetical theme of world history seen as a work of divine providence for the salvation of humankind. The text must have served to help train the missionaries working in *pagan lands; it therefore develops anti-idolatrous themes derived from *Martin of Braga's De correctione rusticorum.

PL 89, 1029-1050; G. Jecker, Die Heimat des heiligen Pirmin, des Apostels der Alamannen, Münster 1927 (with the ed. of the Scarapsus); H. Löwe, Pirmin, Willibrord und Bonifatius. Ihre Bedeutung für die Missionsgebiete ihrer Zeit, in K. Schäferdiek, Die Kirche des früheren Mittelalters (= Kirchengeschichte als Missionsgeschichte II/1), Munich 1978, 192-226; BS 10, 927-932; DSp 12, 1788-89; LTK^3 8, 312; BBKL VII, 634-637.

M. Simonetti

PISENTHIUS of Kepht (d. 632). A person of great importance in the Coptic church, he lived between the end of the 6th and beginning of the 7th c. Initially, he was a monk in the *monastery of Apa Febammon at Geme near Thebes. He was then consecrated bishop of Keft (Koptos) by the patriarch Damian. Two different biographies written in *Coptic tell us about his life, albeit in a very romanticized way. But one can learn most about him from the original archive of his correspondence, which was found near the monastery of Epiphanius, likewise near Thebes, where he resided for a long time. His only extant work is an Encomium for St. Onuphrius, a good literary work, but lacking any special properties.

E.A.T. Wallis Budge, Coptic Apocrypha, London 1913, 75-127, 258-334; E. De Lacy O'Leary, The Arabic Life of S. Pisentius: PO 22 (1930) 313-488; M. Krause, Ein Fall friedensrichtlichter Tätigkeit in Oberägypten, Revue d'Égyptologie 24 (1972) 101-107; W.E. Crum, Discours de Pisenthios sur saint Onophrius, ROC 20 (1915-17) 38-67; Coptic Encyclopedia 6, 1978-1980; BBKL 20, 1185-1189.

T. Orlandi

PIUS I, pope (ca. 140–ca. 155). His pontificate may have been from 140 to 155, but the chronology is uncertain. Nevertheless, Pius was the ninth bishop of Rome after *Peter (Iren., Haer. III, 3,3; Eus., HE 4, 22,3). Some doubtful and fragmentary bits of information on his life have survived. He was probably born in *Aquileia; acc. to the Muratorian Fragment, he was the brother of *Hermas, the author of the Shepherd. During his pontificate, the apologist *Justin led his school of philosophy in Rome. At that time, the heretics were also active in the city of Rome: *Valentinus (Adv. Haer. III, 4,3) and *Marcion (Tertull., Adv. Marc. I, 19), who came to the capital of the Roman Empire to spread their *gnostic teachings. The construction of a baptistery in the home of Praxedes and Pudentiana was attributed to Pius, as well as the establishment of Sunday alone for the *Easter celebration. He was sentenced to death along with fellow believers during the *persecution of *Antoninus. For the numerous writings attributed to him, see Jaffé 43-56.

Decretales pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramni . . . , Leipzig 1863; LP I, 58-59, 132-133; Catholicisme 11, 251; Frammento Muratoriano: Erbetta 1, 25-26; LTK[2] 8, 528; BS 10, 881-883; BBKL 7, 658-659; EPapi I, 220-222.

M. Spinelli

PLATONISM and the FATHERS

I. Two different interpretive dispositions - II. The attitude of the Fathers toward Plato and their relation to contemporary Platonism - III. The 2nd c. - IV. Clement of Alexandria and Origen - V. The Greek Fathers - VI. The Latin Fathers.

I. Two different interpretive dispositions. The modern question of the relationship between Platonism and patristic thought—still heavily debated by theologians, scholars of Late Antiquity and Medieval thought, and some classical philologists—ultimately dates back to Luther's utter condemnation of the quasi cult-like devotion of this period toward *Aristotelian philosophy. He opposed it to such an extent that he banned the study of it from the universities: in this perspective Aristotle was only a charlatan, the symbol of the "arrogance of reason," which is unable to exercise a salvific role, a prerogative that is exclusive to the faith, which is entirely irreconcilable with philosophy. During the following centuries, Luther's severe judgment on Aristotelian philosophy did not fail to influence what some patristic scholars thought and wrote about Platonic philosophy, the Platonism of the imperial age and the possibility of its influence on the Fathers (see G. Reale, in C. de Vogel, Platonismo e Cristianesimo, Milan 1993, 11-12).

In effect, at the beginning of the 18th c., N. Souverain (Le platonisme dévoilé ou essai touchant le Verbe platonicien, Cologne 1700) and P. Baltus (Défense des SS. Pères, accusés de Platonisme, Paris 1711) saw Platonism as a fall, a heretical distancing from Christianity and the total destruction of the Christian tradition. This was already, in substance, the point of view held by *Tertullian, *Hippolytus and *Epiphanius (see *Hellenism and Christianity); in the 20th c., H. Dörrie appropriated this theory: "in every historical period, Platonism has signified a failure in comparison to Plato" (Die andere Theologie: TP 56 [1981] 2, cf. Gregors Theologie auf dem Hintergrunde der neuplatonischen Metaphysik, in Gregor von Nyssa und die Philosophie, Leiden 1976, 27). "The one who looks for Christian Platonism can only find it in the heretics" (with regard to Dörrie's last statement, who takes as his point of departure *Gregory of Nyssa's attitude in dealing with the *Arians, see G. Reale in C. de Vogel, pp. 12 and 14 with n.16). While Souverain—who thus anticipated Harnack's position (see below)—maintained that the Fathers from the period of the Council of *Nicaea substituted the Platonic logos for the Christian logos, obscuring the dogma of the preexisting Christ, Baltus wanted to defend the *Fathers from this accusation (on this topic, see Dörrie in Platonica minora, Munich 1976, 510-511), yet he still saw Platonism as heretical.

The diametrically opposed thesis found its convinced patron in G.W.F. Hegel, who in his Lectures on the History of Philosophy theorized the necessity of an engagement between Christianity and philosophy: the data of faith, if left in its original condition, and allowing at most a strictly literal interpretation, is destined to remain sterile and dead; it can only acquire a significant meaning if one interprets it philosophically. To be able to propose something valid, the Fathers therefore had to strive for an engagement between their faith and the philosophy of their time, thus determining Christianity's reception of Greek thought (esp. in its *Neoplatonic form). What they achieved through this objective should not be considered their mistake but, on the contrary, a perfectly legitimate decision (see E. Peroli in C. de Vogel, 107-108).

A sort of synthesis between Luther and Hegel's position can be found in the work of Adolf von Harnack. The historical reality of Christianity's Hellenization was for Harnack, as was already the case for Hegel, an undeniable fact: the dogmas of the church are the product of theology, depending in turn on the spiritual climate of the time (Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte I⁴, Darmstadt 1964, p. 12); their ideas in this structure, these dogmas, were the work of the Hellenic spirit, transplanted into the terrain of the gospel (ibid., I⁴, p. 20). Definitive theological doctrines were received into the deposit of faith, and full citizenship in the general faith of the church was granted to theological conclusions and formulas (ibid., II⁴, p. 27). The *apologists were the first to present the Christian religion as a philosophy and therefore to begin a connection between Christianity and philosophy that was recognized and continued in the following centuries, in comparison to what had occurred in *gnosticism, and gave rise to a gradual Hellenization of Christianity itself (ibid., I⁴, pp. 497-498). Theological science was primarily *Origen's creation, which could still operate in full freedom without being conditioned by preestablished dogmas (ibid., I⁴, p. 650, II⁴, p. 27). Nevertheless, the process of "Hellenization" and the relative philosophical speculation that permeated the church's entire dogmatic system (ibid., I⁴, pp. 791-794) covered and obscured the original purity of the Christian message: only with *Augustine and esp. with Luther did Christianity gain its authenticity, recovering its original character and drawing near to St. *Paul (ibid., I⁴, p. 14, see also p. 637). Harnack's thesis was adopted by F. Loofs and M. Werner (see Peroli in C. de Vogel, p. 108 with n. 8).

The Lutheran idea—adopted by Souverain and Baltus (see above)—on the absolute incompatibility between Christian faith and Greek philosophy can be clearly seen in the studies of J. Meifort and W. Völker. On the basis of a comparison between an abstract Platonic philosophy and equally abstract Christian doctrine, Meifort came to the conclusion that the two currents of thought were incompatible and, therefore, denied a substantial influence of Platonism on *Clement of Alexandria (Der Platonismus bei Clemens Alexandrinus, Tübingen 1928). Völker, in contradistinction to Harnack, denied that there was a substantial Hellenization of Christianity in the writings of the Fathers (Der wahre Gnostiker nach Clemens Alexandrinus [TU 57], Berlin 1952, p. 352 n. 3) and affirmed that Clement, despite the philosophical borrowings to which he continually had recourse, never crossed the line between Christianity and philosophy (ibid., p. 9). Clement adopted the language of the philosophers to attract his opponents (ibid., p. 8); his use of *Stoic and Platonic philosophy could be reduced to a simple assumption of terms that covered the core of a genuine Christian perspective like a shell and would be used for the purpose of converting *pagan philosophers (ibid., pp. 8, 9, 14 n. 1). What Völker affirmed with regard to Clement represents the chief argument of all his books (Das Vollkommenheitsideal des Origenes, Tübingen 1930; repr. Nedeln 1966; Gregor von Nyssa als Mystiker, Wiesbaden 1955, It. tr. Ch.O. Tommasi, Milan 1993; Kontemplation und Extase bei Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, Wiesbaden 1958; Maximus Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden 1965): the relationship between the Platonic tradition and the Christian tradition would only be formal, superficial and instrumental, and thus the latter, despite the appeals to Platonic terminology, would preserve unadulterated its genuine Christian character.

The interpretation of Christian Platonism offered by E. von Ivánka and Daniélou is no different. With regard to Clement, Ivánka affirmed that the "Platonic motifs possessed only a metaphorical value"; Clement carried out a transformation in a Christian sense and a mediation of Platonic teachings that would nonetheless exclude a Hellenization of Christianity (Plato Christianus, Einsiedeln 1964, 98). This position lies at the basis of all Ivánka's studies, collected in a volume titled Plato Christianus, as one can easily conclude from its subtitle (Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die). As in the case of Ivánka, Daniélou, in his study on *Gregory of Nyssa, tended to reduce the relationship between this Cappadocian Father and *Plotinus to a simple assumption of "images" that nonetheless would not compromise the transformation and the supersession of Platonism and the creation of a completely Christian mystical doctrine on Gregory's part (Platonisme et théologie mystique, Paris 1953, 211, 212, 214-217; for more detailed information on the agreement between Ivánka and Daniélou with regard to Gregory of Nyssa, see S. Lilla, Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den Homilien über die Seligpreisungen Gregors von Nissa [Suppl. to VChr 68] Leiden 2004, 20-24). As in the case of Völker, Daniélou likewise rejected the thesis of the "Hellenization of Christianity" (Méssage évangélique et culture hellénistique, Tournai 1961, 279).

Scholars of the 1950s and 1960s followed a very different interpretation: one merely has to recall the work of J.H. Waszink, A. Grillmeier, W. Pannenberg, W. Jaeger, H. Chadwick and I.P. Sheldon-Williams. For Waszink, "the influence of Platonism in ancient Christian thought is an historical fact"; whoever immerses oneself in the study of the writings of *Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, *Origen and Gregory of Nyssa inevitably encounters Platonic motifs that acquire a remarkable importance in the new context in which they are found; the dependence of Christian thought on "the most important and vital idealistic system of ancient culture" can be accepted a priori; "Platonism was used in the construction and development of this thought" (Der Platonismus und die altchristliche Gedankenwelt, in Recherches sur la tradition platonicienne [Entret. sur l'ant. class. III] Vandoeuvres-Geneva 1957, 139). "As soon as Christianity met ancient culture, the influence of Platonism on Christian thought was inevitable, so that in the spiritual life of the period Platonism represented the most vital element" (ibid., p. 174). In the writings of Justin Martyr and *Athenagoras, "one finds for the first time the use of ideas whose provenance from Platonism was well known to those who used them" (Bemerkungen zum Einfluß des Platonismus in frühen Christentum: VChr 19 [1965] 135); "Often an idea proper to Platonism that Christians found useful in some way and placed as a pillar in the edifice of thoughts cast as entirely Christian remained in its essence as a foreign body, exactly like the Ionic and Corinthian columns coming from the pagan temples and existing within early Christian buildings" (ibid., p. 136). "With regard to the prevailing theological system of Platonism, well-defined in its essential lines, one could not deny that it revealed a strong harmony with certain key teachings of Christianity" (ibid., p. 138; two decades later C. de Vogel would hold the same view; see below).

Grillmeier did not deny the historical reality of the Hellenization of Christianity; in his view, however, this process should not be taken as global, generic and uniform given its complexity and difficulty (Hellenisierung-Judaisierung des Christentums als Deuteprinzipien der Geschichte des Kirchlichen Dogmas: Scholastik 33 [1958] 354-538 [= Mit ihm und in ihm, Freiburg i.B. 1975, 457-467])—worthy of note, in his entire study, is his very erudite critical review of 19th- and 20th-c. studies on the phenomenon of "Hellenization."

Unlike Harnack and not unlike Hegel, Pannenberg offered a positive judgment of the reception of the philosophical elements in the Christian message beginning with the apologists (Die Aufnahme des philosophischen Gottesbegriffes als dogmatisches Problem der frühchristlichen Theologie: ZKTh 70 [1959] 1 [= Grundfragen systematischer Theologie, Göttingen [2]1971, 296]). Beginning with the idea of Greek paideia* (in which Platonism played a primary role), Jaeger recognized that "classical Greek culture and the Christian church undergo a process of mutual adaptation," and he emphasized the fusion between Christian religion and Greek cultural inheritance (Early Christianity and Greek Paideia, Cambridge, MA 1965, 62); Gregory of Nyssa was steeped in the great Greek philosophical tradition and its cultural ideals (ibid., p. 86).

Though Chadwick considered Justin Martyr, Clement and Origen Christian thinkers who worked in a Christian context in order to respond to the problems raised by the Christian religion that were not always in harmony with the views of the Platonists, he did not minimize the impact of Greek philosophy—and in particular Platonism—on their reflection. Platonism provided Justin's theology with its fundamental presuppositions (Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 16); this apologist extended his hand esp. to the Platonists (ibid., p. 22). For Clement, Plato was by far the best of all the Greek philosophers (ibid., p. 39); Clement's reception of Platonism was more thorough than Justin's (ibid., p. 45); for this Alexandrian Father, the account of creation present in the Timaeus is parallel with the one in Genesis (ibid., p. 46; cf. Waszink in VChr 19 [1965] 143). In the Stromata, one of his earlier works that has been lost, Origen had intended to demonstrate the agreement between Jesus and Plato (Chadwick, Early Christian Thought, pp. 71-72). Chadwick's position in substance concurs with that of Sheldon-Williams, for whom "Christian Platonism" is characterized by a "controlled acceptance" of certain Platonic teachings that does not therefore exclude the rejection of incompatible propositions with Christian revelation. A "Christian Platonist may be either a Platonist who requires to substantiate his speculations by a faith that transcends them, or a Christian who thinks of his faith, and desires to expound it, in terms intelligible to Platonists" (The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, Cambridge 1967, 425).

As G. Reale did not fail to note (in C. de Vogel, pp. 11-12, 16), Luther's inheritance, already well seen in the works of Meifort and Völker (see above), flourished again with particular vehemence in two important studies written by a famous scholar of the entire Platonic movement, H. Dörrie: in these works the thesis of the impossibility of Platonic philosophy's deep impact on Christian thought is generalized to the fullest and officially codified (Was ist spätantiker Platonismus? Überlegungen zur Grenzziehung zwischen Platonismus und Christentum: ThRu 36 [1971] 285-302 [= Platonica minora, Munich 1976, 508-523]; Die andare Theologie: TP 56 [1981] 1-46).

According to Dörrie, "Platonism was not received by the Fathers in its substance" (Platonica minora, pp. 516, 522, cf. Die andere Theologie, p. 443): "the following decisive dogmas were rejected without exception by the church: the graduated *Trinity, the existence of a world lacking a beginning, the changeable revelation of the logos, the transmigration of *souls and the return of the soul which recognizes its home" (Platonica minora, p. 522). "Christian theology can, actually it must, be conceived as antithetical to Platonism" (ibid.): they are two diametrically opposed forces (Platonica minora, p. 519). One cannot speak of a "Christian Platonism," but on the contrary of a "de-Platonization," an "anti-Platonism," a "Christian contra-Platonism" (Platonica minora, pp. 518, 520, 523). The expression "Christian Platonism" is only fitting, strictly speaking, for heretics (see below, with respect to Souverain and Baltus); in the area of orthodoxy, it is admissible only if understood as a cunning maneuver adopted by the Fathers to face their opponents who could not be fought with other weapons (Die andere Theologie, p. 46). The relationship between Platonism in Christianity could have only consisted in the "passing on" from Platonism to Christianity "of formulas, metaphors, examples and citations. This subtle web of borrowings cannot lead to confusion about the actual existence of an arduous fight, a strict confrontation between two religious confessions with clear-cut boundaries" (Platonica minora, p. 521). "From time to time, the teachers of the church borrowed weapons from the arsenal of Platonism; in all the bitter confrontations there is present the attempt to combat the adversary with his own weapons" (Platonica minora, p. 522; cf. Die andere Theologie, p. 46). "The few and entirely formal common points," which are opposed "to the profound diversities and lines of demarcation," in reality lead to a "transformation of Platonism by Christianity" (Platonica minora, pp. 515, 516, 520, 523). The Christian apologists, when they accepted formulas, expressions and images proper to Platonism, pursued a purely exhortatory objective aiming for their conversion of educated pagans, as Philo had already done toward the Hellenized Jews of *Alexandria (Die andere Theologie, pp. 6-13, 24, 28). With the goal of converting those pagan readers who were inclined to Christianity but were not yet disposed to receive baptism, they wanted to convince them of their spiritual proximity to the new religion and of the fact that for them it would have been sufficient to take just a small step to enter the faith (Die andere Theologie, pp. 21, 24). It was therefore natural for these apologists to have recourse to the "caricature" of the presence of the contents of the Christian faith in Greek philosophy so that they might dispel the fear that entrance into Christianity would require a new mode of thinking and a new spiritual life (Die andere Theologie, pp. 24, 30, 40).

The adoption of language and aspects of metaphysical teachings and categories of thought proper to *Neoplatonism aimed to present a Christian substance under Platonic clothing (Die andere Theologie, p. 45). All this, however, cannot obscure the substantial irreconcilability between the two theologies (Platonica minora, pp. 523): the Platonists would never have been able to accept the concepts of *redemption, *grace, original *sin, bodily *resurrection of the dead and God's salvific action in history (Die andere Theologie, pp. 18, 20, 23). One's eyes immediately jump to the utter opposition between the point of view held by Dörrie and that of Waszink and Jaeger and the strong similarity between the theses of Dörrie and those of Völker, Ivánka and Daniélou, esp. with regard to the purely formal value and apologetic objective of the adoption of Platonic terms and images by the Fathers and their transformation of Platonism.

A clear dissociation from the theses of Dörrie and a long and penetrating critique of them characterized an article written by E.P. Meijering, Wie platonisierten Christen? Zur Grenzziehung zwischen Platonismus, Kirchlichem Credo und patristischer Theologie: VChr 28 (1974) 15-28. For Meijering, the simple and abstract opposition theorized by Dörrie between the fundamental truths of the Christian faith and that of Platonic philosophy hinders one from understanding the history of Christian theology: such an understanding presupposes that one can ascertain the way in which the Fathers interpreted and justified their faith and the influence exerted by Platonism on their theological reflection (ibid., pp. 16-17). In the idea of God's immutability, Meijering saw a clear inheritance of Platonism in the thought of the Fathers, who had to reconcile this philosophy with their faith (ibid., pp. 17-18, 27). After having recalled that the doctrine of the hierarchical gradation of the divinity—a view characteristic of the Platonic tradition and adopted by *Arius—is also present in the theological reflection of certain Fathers (e.g., the apologists and Origen) and cannot therefore be adopted as a proof of the irreconcilable opposition between Platonism and Christianity (ibid., pp. 25-26), Meijering reached conclusions opposite those of Dörrie, but analogous to those of Waszink: "Platonism resided as a spiritual force in the hearts and minds of many Christian theologians"; "the Alexandrian Fathers interpreted the faith and biblical texts using the culture of their time as a point of departure"; "to limit the influence of Platonism on Christian theology to the purely linguistic and formal aspects would be to obscure a very important factor" (ibid., pp. 27-28).

In the synthetic but clear and linear presentation of the encounter between the Christian message and Greek thought, which led to the Hellenization of the former, M. Simonetti recognized without reservation the historical reality and the inevitability of this phenomenon, as Waszink had already done in Entret. sur l'ant. class. III, pp. 139-174 and in VChr 19 (1965) 135: "Here I merely point out how abstract the idea is of a primitive Christian message formulated in a pure state, which then became contaminated in contact with Greek culture: in fact, the Christian message took shape initially in Semitic categories because it was entirely formulated in a Semitic area, so that of necessity then when aspiring to universal propagation and to spread itself in areas of Greek culture, it had to be formulated anew acc. to the categories of thought typical of Hellenism. This leads me to believe that it is more correct to see in the Hellenization of the Christian message, not its deformation owed to the influence of Greek culture, but rather the result of a process of adaptation, a process inevitable and natural, even if very laborious and difficult . . . with the goal of finding on the one hand the indispensable contacts with the surrounding world and on the other to emphasize the newness of the subject and therefore the identity itself of the new community" (Cristianesimo antico e cultura greca, Rome 1983, 7-8). In these statements one finds both an acceptance and rejection of Harnack's position, to which, as was seen, one can attribute both the idea of the formulation of a Christian message "acc. to the categories of thought typical of Hellenism," fully shared by Simonetti, and its "deformation owed to the influence of Greek culture," which was instead rejected by him. Although the first idea was, in substance, also Waszink's (see above) and Meijering's (ibid., pp. 16-17), the rejection of the second has a clear precedent in the writings of R. Cantalamessa, who considered negative judgments on the process of Christianity's "Hellenization" to be erroneous (see Cristianesimo primitivo e filosofia greca, in Il Cristianesimo e le filosofie, Milan 1971, 51-52 [cited by C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004, 8-9]). Simonetti's agreement with Jaeger is also clear (with regard to the "process of adaptation") and Chadwick (with regard to the "newness of the subject" and "identity").

A.M. Ritter was also critical of Dörrie's ideas, though fully acknowledging the other merits of this scholar's studies on the Platonic tradition (Platonismus und Christentum in der Spätantike: ThRu 49 [1984] 31-56). Like Grillmeier and Meijering, Ritter maintained that Dörrie presented an image that lacked critical distinctions of Christian theology, and that it is necessary to apply a distinction between the faith and its theological interpretation if one wants to outline the history of Christian thought (ibid., p. 37). He cannot accept the thesis acc. to which "the ancient theologians were aware of the irreconcilability between Greek and Christian thought, that would have excluded a priori any sort of compromise" (ibid., p. 38): Christian theology was met with the necessity of "testing its own assimilative and critical strength" (ibid., p. 54). Ritter's contribution remains significant also because of his invaluable review of previous research (ibid., passim, in particular pp. 46-53). This was not unlike the contribution of I. Opelt, who at the end of his work on Socrates spoke of an "interaction between Christianity and Platonism" (Das Bild des Sokrates in der christlichen lateinischen Literatur, in Platonismus und Christentum, Festschrift für H. Dörrie [Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum Ergänzungsband 10], Münster 1983, 207). C. Andresen, after having presented the two opposing solutions given to the problem of the relationship between Neoplatonism and Christianity (namely, the "diacritic" relationship of which Dörrie is a spokesman and the "dialogical and synthetic" relationship supported by Meijering) focuses his attention on the Corpus Aeropagiticum and thus concludes that in this corpus of writings one finds the presence "of a synthesis between Christian theology and Greek ontology" (The Integration of Platonism into Early Christian Theology: SP XV [TU 128], Berlin 1984, 405).

In his lengthy study Platonism and Christianity: A Mere Antagonism or a Profound Common Ground?: VChr 39 (1985) 1-62, C. de Vogel developed Meijering's criticisms of Dörrie's positions. Mindful esp. of F. Ricken's studies on *Eusebius of Caesarea and *Athanasius (Die Logoslehre des Eusebios von Caesarea und der Mittelplatonismus: Theologie und Philosophie 42 [1967] 341-358; Zur Rezeption der platonischen Ontologie bei Eusebios von Kaisareia, Arieos und Athanasios: Theologie und Philosophie 53 [1978] 321-352), de Vogel presented a picture of the relationship between Platonism and patristic thought that disagreed specifically with the picture presented by Dörrie (his point of view therefore agreed not only with Meijering but also with those of Jaeger and Ritter).

De Vogel's criticism distinguished five different attitudes of Christian authors toward Greek philosophy (and therefore also Platonism): (a) complete rejection and open hostility; (b) broadmindedness characterized by the assimilation of philosophical categories; (c) an extremely critical evaluation that did not exclude, however, the reception of certain doctrines; (d) an extensive reception of philosophical categories that at times was also syncretistic; (e) an extensive reception combined with a transformation. The following figures of early Christianity conform to these categories: (a) *Tatian; (b) Clement of Alexandria, who had Philo as his forerunner; (c) Justin Martyr, *Aristides, *Athenagoras and Origen, the Cappadocian Fathers and Augustine; (d) *Minucius Felix, *Boethius and *Synesius; (e) the Corpus Aeropagiticum (de Vogel, Platonism and Christianity, pp. 19-27).

The use of philosophy by Clement is not reduced to a mere tactical maneuver to convert pagans but is part of his spirit (ibid., p. 22). Minucius Felix provided a rational and philosophical exposition of his faith without even naming the person who gave this title to Christians (ibid., pp. 22-23). In the writings of Boethius, one observes at times an excessive syncretism associated with Neoplatonic categories; he did not speak at all about Christ (ibid., pp. 23-24). Synesius became a Christian while still being a Platonist and remained a Platonist even after having become a Christian; he had a very strong relationship to the Neoplatonic school of Alexandria (ibid., pp. 24-26). Eusebius's doctrine of the logos was characterized by motifs already present in the writings of Philo, in the treatise titled De mundo and in the works of Middle Platonic authors such as *Maximus of Tyre and *Numenius (ibid., p. 33). Presenting God as a "real being," perfect, eternal and immutable, in a manner similar to *Philo of Alexandria, Plutarch and Justin Martyr, *Anastasius implemented a Hellenization of the Christian message (ibid., pp. 32, 50-54). In the Corpus Aeropagiticum, one notes a Christianized form of Proclean Neoplatonism (ibid., p. 27).

Aside from judgments on these individual authors, de Vogel's contribution also presented more generic observations: "Christian theologians who learned to think acc. to the forms of Platonic metaphysics inserted this philosophy in their own life" (ibid., p. 30); "Platonism . . . in time became an integral part of the intellectual life of prominent Christians" (ibid., pp. 30-31); "Platonic ontology was at the foundation of the thought of Christian theologians and established part of their understanding of God" (ibid., pp. 34-35). Although rejecting the thesis of Dörrie on the utter incompatibility between Christianity and Platonism, de Vogel's thesis emphasizes that these two currents of thought have some common foundational points that can be summarized into a clear distinction between sensible realities—which are not primary—and a reality that is absolute, perfect and primary, regulatory of human life. The rational expression that Platonic philosophy supplied to Christians was considered by them to be in harmony with *Scripture and capable of deepening and confirming their faith. Platonism, therefore, contributed in giving expression to the dogmas of the Christian faith. On this key point, de Vogel's thesis agreed with Harnack, even if he rejected his negative evaluation of the phenomenon (ibid., pp. 54-55). A few years earlier Cantalamessa and Simonetti expressed an analogous rejection on this matter (see above). E. Peroli's Italian translation of de Vogel's study accompanied by G. Reale's introduction has made a noteworthy contribution to spreading an awareness of Dörrie and de Vogel's opposite theses esp. in Italy (C. de Vogel, Platonismo e Cristianesimo. Antagonismo o comuni fondamenti? ed. G. Reale and E. Peroli, Milan 1993). While G. Reale presented the two positions of Dörrie and de Vogel acc. to their main themes, calling attention to the "Lutheran presuppositions" of the former and thoroughly criticizing his thesis (ibid., pp. 9-23), E. Peroli focused his study on a wide and analytic exposition of Dörrie's views, with extensive references to his own studies (ibid., pp. 110-134); he placed before this exposition a brief but dense introductory note on the debate relating to the problem of the "Hellenization of Christianity," of which Hegel was already well aware (ibid., pp. 107-110, see also above). His final conclusions criticized Dörrie's chief arguments and established the full validity of the expression "Christian Platonist," which was rejected, however, by Dörrie (ibid., pp. 134-138).

In his essay "Les débuts de la Théologie comme science (IIIe-IVe siècle)," which appeared in RSPh 80 (1996) 201-220, H.D. Saffrey outlined the development of theology as a science in a Christian and pagan context (namely, a theological context that used a rigorous scientific method changed by philosophy in view of the construction of a fully rational system). In a Christian context, such a theology saw its first manifestation at Alexandria with Clement, who, when confronted with Hellenism, "inaugurated a more rational form of Christian doctrine" (ibid., p. 204). This rational form later developed over the course of the 4th c. and esp. in the 2nd half of that century when it found its best champions in the Cappadocian Fathers, who introduced a certain measure of philosophical rationality into biblical categories in order to refute the *Eunomian heresy (ibid., pp. 210-212). In a pagan context Neoplatonism's primary objective was to form a scientific theology characterized by the metamorphosis of philosophy into theology, as soon as the doctrinal baggage of the former came to bestow a rational structure on the latter (ibid., p. 213). Such a process reached its full development in the Neoplatonism of the school of Athens with Plutarch of Athens, Syrian and *Proclus (ibid., p. 215). In the Proclean system, philosophy assumed a theological character, and theology, in turn, found its full expression and scientific rigor, becoming a "scientific theology." Specifically keeping in mind the Proclean theology of the author of the Corpus Aeropagiticum (ibid., pp. 218-219), he was able to set forward a theological system that in a Christian context functioned as a foil to that of Proclus, from which it adopted its character and laws. Reaching its acme between the end of the 5th and the beginning of the 6th c., "scientific theology" was not an exclusively medieval phenomenon, but was already present in Late Antiquity; the opinio communis which has dated it to scholastic theology of the 13th c. should be corrected (ibid., p. 201).

In his recent work Storia della filosofia patristica (Brescia 2004), C. Moreschini has adopted R. Cantalamessa's rejection of scholars' earlier condemnation of the process of "Hellenization" and of the attitude of the Fathers toward Greek philosophy (ibid., pp. 8-9). He cited Cantalamessa's words that emphasized the "sovereign liberty with which the Fathers used fundamental concepts and categories of Greek thought for the demands of the Christian message" and that, with Hellenization taken as a given, placed the emphasis "on the mode and measure with which it is verified" (ibid., p. 9). Proceeding in this direction, Moreschini on the one hand admits that the Fathers depended on Platonism; on the other, he intends to safeguard their critical sense and identity: "Patristic philosophy was, along the entire arc of its existence, . . . heavily influenced by Platonism. Clement, Origen, the Cappadocian Fathers and Augustine were experts in it and, in effect, their openness toward what was already considered the most famous philosophy of the day—both Plato's and his followers, who were contemporaries of the Christians—was very great. But such an openness was truly a conscious adoption of Greek teachings . . . and only and exclusively inasmuch as these were considered functional and adaptable to the Christian message. The same Christian philosophers which we have just mentioned openly professed their substantial differences from pagan philosophy and always stressed their specific Christian character" (ibid., p. 10). In its most essential part, Moreschini's assessment concurs with those of Chadwick, Jaeger, Sheldon-Williams and Simonetti ("patristic philosophy . . . was heavily influenced by Platonism," "Greek teachings . . . adaptable to the Christian message," "specific Christian character"); but it does not seem entirely immune from Dörrie's influence ("their substantial differences from pagan philosophy").

A detailed and analytical study of the Platonism of the Fathers has demonstrated how substantially sterile Dörrie's position was, not budging on the utter incompatibility between Platonists and Christians on certain nonsecondary points (such as metempsychosis, the resurrection of the body, the redemption and the revelation transmitted by the incarnate God). His position therefore cannot proceed in the direction indicated by Waszink, Jaeger, Meijering, Ritter, de Vogel, Reale and Peroli, even if it must broaden, examining other points of contact between Platonist philosophers and the Fathers beyond those indicated by Meijering (the immutability of God) and by de Vogel (the clear distinction between lower sensible reality and absolute and primary reality): theologia negativa (of which the immutability of God is only one aspect); ideas as God's thoughts; the relationship between God, intelligence and being; the doctrine of absolute beauty; the doctrine of the logos as the sum of ideas/powers, as the seat of the highest concepts that the Christian must imitate, as the head of the angelic world, as the forming principle and law of the cosmos; the trinitarian doctrine itself; the theme of the control of the passions; the idea of apatheia* and similarity to God; the reduction to unity; the theme of the soul's retreat into itself and self-contemplation and mystical union. S. Lilla has sought to shed light on these points (see the bibl. and Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971).

II. The attitude of the Fathers toward Plato and their relation to contemporary Platonism. Of all the Greek philosophers Plato was without a doubt the one most venerated by the Fathers (see H. Dörrie, Die andere Theologie: TP 56 [1981] 27, 46). Aside from figures such as *Tatian, the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos, *Hermias, *Hippolytus, *Epiphanius and *Tertullian, who were inclined to a radical condemnation of all Greek philosophy, and therefore Plato as well, what strikes one the most when examining the attitude of the Fathers who were open to Greek thought is that the often violent polemical attacks against Aristotle and the *Stoics (see *Aristotelianism, *pantheism)—not to mention Epicurus, who was considered an atheist tout court—did not touch Plato, considered to be the founder of the highest and most inspired philosophy. This philosophy was a true and proper "theology" capable of supplying the Christian who did not content himself with "simple faith" with an adequate conception of the divinity and the means necessary to reach it, and therefore worthy of being set next to Christianity or even of being used in the investigation of its highest truths. The rejection by certain Fathers of specific Platonic teachings or the Platonic school—such as the doctrine of metempsychosis, the coeternity of matter with God or its demonology—did not overshadow their admiration toward one who remained for them the greatest philosopher of all time (on the positive or negative attitude of various patristic authors toward Plato, see J. Geffken, Zwei griechische Apologeten, Hamburg 1907, passim; R. Arnou, Platonisme des Pères, DTC XII, 2 Paris 1935, 2300-2302; C. Fabricius, Zu den Aussagen der griechischen Kirchenväter über Platon: VChr 42 [1988] 179-187).

The cult-like tribute offered to Plato by the Fathers, however, was not an isolated phenomenon: Platonic philosophy was the object of veneration and study even by supporters of the Academy and, in a much larger context, of the *pagan intelligentsia, and thus became a current of thought in the pagan world that continued until the beginning of the 6th c. AD. In its initial phase, represented by the ancient Academy of Xenocrates, Crantor and Speusippus (4th-3rd c. BC), this current remained limited to the context of the Academy and was only one of many philosophical schools; during the imperial age it became the dominant "philosophy" par excellence of the Hellenistic period, which was influenced by many of its teachings (see H. Dörrie, Platonica minora, p. 515). The *Hellenistic Judaism of *Philo of Alexandria was also indebted to Platonic philosophy, even as it ran parallel to the development of patristic thought.

During the arc of time between the 2nd and 6th c. AD, there began between these two currents of thought an uninterrupted series of very close relationships that gave rise to a continuous osmosis. As in the study of Justin Martyr, one cannot disregard *Middle Platonism of the 2nd c.; as in the case of Clement and Origen, it is necessary to keep in mind both Middle Platonism and the initial phase of *Neoplatonism of the 3rd and 4th centuries; and ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite cannot be separated from the Neoplatonism of *Proclus and *Damascius (see *syncretism). It is already well known that Marius Victorinus and St. Augustine felt the need to consult the works of *Plotinus and *Porphyry. The study of the "Platonism of the Fathers" must also keep in mind their direct knowledge of the writings of Plato, and, therefore, esp. the study of their relationships to the current of Platonic thought reigning from the 1st to 6th c. AD. This type of study must examine both the mode in which the Fathers' own interpretation of Platonic thought was influenced by contemporary Platonism, and the doctrines coming from this Platonism, appropriated by the Fathers and used by them to interpret their religious faith.

III. The 2nd c. While Tatian does not seem to treat Plato better than the other Greek philosophers (he rebuked him for γαστριμαργία, Ad Graecos 2, p. 2, 22-23 Schwartz, 25, p. 26, 23-24, and for having imitated Pythagoras and Pherecydes, 3, p. 4, 7-8), *Athenagoras showed a great respect for him, accompanied with a precise awareness of contemporary Platonism, which left a deep mark on his thought. In his work Pro Christ. 6 (7, 5-7 and 9-11 Schwartz), in order to demonstrate that even Plato believed in one God who was not subject to becoming and is eternal, he cites with approval two passages from the Timaeus, 28c—foundational in the theology of *Middle Platonism—and 41a (the latter is also considered in ch. 23, pp. 29, 19-21); and in ch. 23 (pp. 30, 23-31, 2). He also cited a passage from the Phaedrus 246 (see also Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,8, pp. 20, 17-18) affirming that Plato called the chief divinity μέγας Ζεύς due to a need for clarity, εἰς σαφήνειαν, and adding (p. 31, 6-7) ὅτι μὴ δυνατὸν εἰς πάντας φέρειν τὸν θεόν: these last words are an echo of Timaeus 28c. Likewise from the Timaeus 28c, he derived the expression ὁ τοῦδε τοῦ παντὸς ποιητής in Pro Christ. 8 (8,23).

In the following points the influence of Middle Platonism on Athenagoras appears evident: (1) God is above all beings (Pro Christ. 8 [9,5-6]: cf. Plutarch, De def. or. 426b; De Is. et Os. 382f.; Alcinous, Did.

164,15-16). (2) God is immortal, immobile, eternal, not subject to change and becoming (Pro Christ. 22 [27,24–25,28-29], 4 [5,10], 6 [7,7]: cf. Diogenes Laërtius, III, 77; Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,6 [20,12]; Alcinous, Did. 164,21 and 28; Maximus of Tyre, Or. XI, 59 a; *Philo, De Cher. 90). (3) God is self-sufficient and above human desires (Pro Christ. 29 [39-20]: cf. Alcinous, Did. 164,28; Philo, De virt. 9). (4) God is an eternal intelligence (Pro Christ. 10 [11, 9-10]: cf. Plato, Tim. 39e, Philebus 28c-e, 30c; Alcinous, Did. 164,24; Philo, Leg. Alleg. III, 29). (5) God can be understood only with the mind (Pro Christ. 4 [5,10-11]: cf. Alcinous, Did. 165,4-5). (6) The doctrine of the three principles (God, matter and the ideas) formulated in Pro Christ. 7 [8,14-15] is a typically Middle Platonic notion (see Alcinous, Did. 163,10-12; Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,1; Diogenes Laërtius III, 76). (7) The association between λόγος and idea in Pro Christ. 10 (11,2-3) is from Philo (cf., e.g., De opif. m. 20; De sacr. Ab. et C. 83) and would be taken up again by Clement (Strom. V, 16,3 [II, 336,8-9]), who would date it back to the "barbarians," namely, Philo; at the root of Athenagoras's statement is the Middle Platonic teaching of the ideas as thoughts contained in the mind of God (see below with regard to Clement); (8) εἶδος is the idea close to matter, which because of its presence acquires the form and becomes a fixed sensible object (Pro Christ. 22 [28,7 and 21], 24 [32,7 and 20]): this originally Aristotelian teaching was common in Middle Platonism, as seen from the passages E. Schwartz collected from the writings of Plutarch, Alcinous and Philo (index p. 105 TU IV, 2, Leipzig 1888). (9) God began the world by stamping forms and order upon matter that was originally unformed and disordered (Pro Christ. 15 [16,11-15]; De res. mort. 3 [51,16-17]): this is the classical Middle Platonist perspective on the origin of the world found, e.g., in Plutarch's De animae procr. in Timaeo, in Alcinous (Did. VIII, pp. 162-163), in Philo's De opificio mundi, in Hippolytus (Ref. I, 19,1-3 [19,7; 19,4–20,1]) and in Diogenes Laërtius (III, 76-77). (10) Primordial matter is πανδεχές (Pro Christ. 15 [16,14]): this epithet, which dates back to Plato, Tim. 51 a 7 (he thus describes the receptacle as void of form, which subsequent philosophy would identify with primordial matter) is found, e.g., in Alcinous, Did. 162,26 (see also Hippolytus's δεξαμενή, Ref. I, 19, p. 19, 6-7). (11) Athenagoras adopted the contrast—originating with Plato and present in all subsequent Platonism—between the intelligible world, which is the world of being, not subject to becoming and eternal, and the sensible world, which is subject to becoming, having a beginning and end: see Pro Christ. 15 [16,2-4] and 19 [21,15-19] and Plato, Tim. 27d-28a. (12) The motif of the wonder caused by the vision of the beauty of the universe, which leads one to go back to one's designer, can be found in Pro Christ. 16 [17,13-14]: already present in Plato's writings (Philebus 28e; Laws XII, 966d-e), this motif repeatedly returns in subsequent Platonism and in the writings of various patristic authors (see *cosmos).

Justin Martyr spoke of Plato and Pythagoras as two "wise men who were the walls and support of our philosophy" (Dial. 5, p. 28, 16-17 Otto) thus conforming to the tendency of contemporary philosophy (cf. C. Andresen, Justin und der mittlere Platonismus: ZNTW 44 [1952–1953] 162; Id., Logos und Nomos, Berlin 1955, 124 and 239-240; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 44). Referring to the period before his conversion, he left the following statements about scholastic Platonism of the 2nd c. AD, which attracted him more than all the other philosophical schools: "The thought of the incorporeal essences seized me, and the contemplation of the ideas gave my mind wings; in a short time I believed that I had become wise, and in my ingenuity I soon hoped to see God: because this is the goal of Platonic philosophy" (Dial. 2, p. 10, 23-12, 2). At the beginning of the Dialogue with Trypho, Justin spoke as a Platonist of his time (see also C. Andresen, 163). Almost every single phrase echoes with reminiscences of Plato's dialogues and scholastic Platonism which lies at the base of his formation. The term ἀνεπτέρου (Dial. 2 [10,24]) connects back to the Phaedrus (246c 1, 249c 4, 249d 6, 251b 7) and foreshadows the idea—that would enjoy great success in the writings of subsequent Fathers, esp. *Gregory of Nyssa—of the *winged mind that flies upward. The statement "what tears the soul away from sensible things and makes it apt to those intelligible, so that it can see beauty and the absolute good" (Dial. 2 [10,11-13]) refers to the motif of the souls distancing themselves from the body and the present sensations (e.g., in the Phaedo 65e, 67c) and to the idea of the contemplation of beauty (Sympos. 211d-212a). The motif of philosophy as the sole source of happiness (Dial. 3 [14,13-15]) follows the Stoic and Platonist point of view of the self-sufficiency of virtue which was appropriated by Middle Platonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 68-72). The definition of philosophy as "the science of being and the knowledge of the truth" (Dial. 3 [14,18-19]), aside from basing itself on very common terminology in Plato's writings, recalls Alcinous's definition of the contemplative life: "that consists in the knowledge of the truth" (Did. 152, 28-29).

The definition given for God (Dial. 3 [16,1-2]) recalls the two Platonic doctrines of the immutability of ideas (Tim. 28a) and the absolute good upon which the existence of all beings depends (Rep. VI 509b; see also Timeaus 29a and Alcinous, Did. 164, 35-36). The definition of science as the knowledge of things human and divine (Dial. 3 [16,8-10]) takes up the definition that *Stoicism formulated for wisdom, a definition that became commonplace in Middle Platonism (see C. Andresen, ZNTW 44, 162 n. 20). The motif of the knowability of God only through the mind (Dial. 3 [18,1-2]) is the same as what one finds in the writings of Athenagoras and Alcinous (see above Athenagoras no. (5) and C. Andresen, ZNTW 44, 166) and certainly goes back to the Platonic conception of the knowability of the ideas through the intelligence (Phaedo 66a 1; Phaedrus 247c; Tim. 28a 1). Justin Martyr says, "The eye of intelligence has been given to us for this reason: to be able to see with this pure instrument the being that is the cause of all intelligible beings, and which has neither color, form, nor size concerning those things that the eye is able to see, but which is something which is found above every essence, which is unspeakable and inexpressible, which alone is beauty and the good that is suddenly found in the well gifted souls because of their affinity to it and for their desire to see it" (Dial. 4, p. 18, 7-13). He has in mind Plato's various dialogues: the expression εἰλικρινεῖ αὐτῷ ἐκείνῳ has its precise correspondence in the Phaedo 66a; "being which is the cause of all intelligible beings" is the absolute good of the Rep. VI 509b; the idea of the absence of color, form and size in God goes back to the Phaedrus 247c, Parm. 137d, Sympos. 211e. C. Andresen demonstrated (ZNTW 44, 166) that it also occurs in the writings of *Celsus (frag. VI, 64 Bader) (it is the famous "via negativa," a commonplace in Middle Platonism and in Neoplatonism, which was also adopted by later Fathers: for its presence in Middle Platonism and in Neoplatonism, see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 221 and 222 n.5). The superiority of the supreme being with respect to every essence is based upon the famous passage in the Rep. VI, 509b, a text that would become foundational for Neoplatonist theology; its ineffability goes back to the Sympos. 211a, Parm. 142a, Tim. 28c, and was a commonplace also in Middle Platonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 220-221); the identification between Beauty and the absolute Good (namely, between the Beauty of the Sympos. 210e-212a and the Good of the Rep. VI, 509b) is found in the Platonism of the 2nd c. AD (see, e.g., Alcinous, Did. 164, 30-33; 165, 27), but not in Neoplatonism (where the Good would be identified with the first *hypostasis, and Beauty with the second); the words "that are suddenly manifested in the soul" recall Epist. VII, 341c 6-d 1; and the motif of the desire (ἔρως) for contemplation is already found in the Phaedo 66e, Sympos. 210e. The statement "esp. when it detaches itself from the body and stands alone by itself, it obtains what it loves" (Dial. 4 [22,2-3]) refers to the Phaedo (66a 3-5, 66e 2-3, 67c 6-d2, 68a 6-7).

The doctrine of the unbegotten and immortal soul, which Justin explicitly attributed to "some Platonists" (Dial. 5 [24,9-10]), finds a precise confirmation in Middle Platonism (see Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19, 10, p. 21, 5). The theory of the unbegotten universe, which was defeated by Justin (Dial. 5, p. 24, 11-12), was held not only by the Peripatetic school, but also by supporters of Middle Platonism—such as Alcinous, Apuleius, Celsus and Taurus, who did not interpret the Timaeus literally (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 197-198). The idea of considering the universe's materiality and being subject to becoming as a proof of the universe's generation by a superior cause—a thesis accepted both by Justin and Trypho (Dial. 5, p. 24, 13-16)—goes back directly to the Timaeus 28b (in Middle Platonism Plutarch and Atticus supported the teaching of the universe's generation; see also Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,4, p. 20, 4-6; C. Andresen, ZNTW 44, 163-164; Id., Logos u. Nomos, 280-283; and S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 197). When Justin spoke about the universe, which, although being subject to corruption per se, is made immortal by God's will (Dial. 5 [26,8-10]), he explicitly referred to the Timaeus (on the agreement between Justin and Middle Platonism in the interpretation of this passage from the Timaeus, see C. Andresen, ZNTW 44, 163). The attributes "unbegotten and incorrupt" which are properly said of God (Dial. 5 [28,3-4]) were already observed in the writings of Athenagoras and are commonplace in Middle Platonism (one can find a precise correspondence in one of Hippolytus's works [Ref. I, 19,6, p. 20, 12]). The motif of the dialectical process that finishes in the absolute beginning Dial. 5 (p. 28, 14-15) is the same as that found at the end of the sixth book of the Republic (511 b) and in Alcinous's work (Did. 162,8-10).

Even after his conversion, Justin continued to express himself in a language specific to the Platonism of his time. His conception of the chief divinity remained characteristic of this Platonism, as was proven by the citation and famous passage from the Timaeus 28c in his 2 Apol. 10 (1304,22-24). This passage is based, as Andresen demonstrated (ZNTW 44, 167-168), not on the original text of Plato's dialogue, but on a scholastic tradition of Middle Platonism. Justin's views on the primordial unformed material and the origin of the world, which he believed took place thanks to God's ordered intervention upon matter (1 Apol. 10 [I, 156,6-7] and 50 [I, 252,26-254,1]), likewise depended on Middle Platonism, in a way equal to that of Athenagoras (see C. Andresen, ZNTW 44, 164-165). Also in the criticisms directed toward the Peripatetics, the Stoics and the Epicureans, one can detect the influence of 2nd-c. scholastic Platonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 45-51). A resonance of the Pythagorean maxim ἕπου θεῷ, also widespread in Middle Platonism, is found in the 1 Apol. 14 (I, 164,18-19): C. Andresen (ZNTW 44, 163 n. 20) demonstrated that this passage corresponds exactly to Plutarch's De recta rat. aud. 1,37 d.

The author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos rebuked Plato and Aristotle for contradicting each other and esp. themselves (cc. 6-7, p. 28-32 Otto). Though recognizing that Plato was right about the true God (c. 20, p. 62, 2-3), he did not hesitate to claim that in this regard the Athenian philosopher was indebted to Moses: like *Orpheus, *Homer, Solon and Pythagoras, Plato too was able to come to know the books of Moses during his stay in *Egypt, and thereby reach a higher understanding of God's inability to be named (c. 14, p. 48, 25-29; c. 20, p. 60, 6-8; p. 62, 3-6). This thesis allowed ps.-Justin the opportunity of accusing Plato of cowardice: though having learned from Moses the "true theology," Plato did not have the courage of professing it openly at Athens for fear of meeting Socrates's fate. By introducing in the Timaeus (41a) the speech directed by the demiurge to the gods of the stars, he desired to protect himself from every possible accusation of impiety toward the traditional religion and to give the impression of professing polytheism (c. 20, p. 60-62; c. 22, p. 64, 27-30). Beyond these criticisms, the knowledge that ps.-Justin showed of Platonic philosophy betrayed the unmistakable stamp of Middle Platonism: the doctrine of the three principles (God, the ideas and matter) (c. 6 [28,10-14]) was the one in vogue in the Platonism of the first two centuries AD (see above Athenagoras no. 6). The juxtaposition of the ideas to God (c. 6 [28,17-18]) foreshadowed the Middle Platonic doctrine of the ideas as thoughts of God, explicitly mentioned in the subsequent chapter (7 [30,14-15]; see below with regard to Clement). Numerous other expressions of ideas go back to Plato and other Platonist authors. Here we will only mention that in c. 22 (66,5-9) the words of the Timaeus 27d on immutability are placed in relation to ὁ ὢν of Ex 3:14: this tendency to refer to God the words that in Tim. 27d-28a pertain to being is from Middle Platonism (see Alcinous, Did. 165, 4-5).

*Hermias's few words reserved for Plato derive from a Middle Platonic source (Irrisio gent. philos. 11 [Diels, Dox. gr. 653, 27-301]). A chapter *Hippolytus devoted to the exposition of Plato's system is also Middle Platonist in origin (Hippolytus considered Plato's system to be *heresy—Ref. I, 19 [19-23 Wendland: cf. Diels, Dox. gr. 567-570]). This represents one of the most important sources for our understanding not only of scholastic Platonism of the first two centuries AD in general, but also of its various currents (see also K. Praechter, in F. Überweg, Grundriss der Gesch. der Philos. I, Berlin 1926, 556).

IV. Clement of Alexandria and Origen. In the writings of *Clement of Alexandria the veneration for Plato and the influence of contemporary Platonism acquired a broader dimension and richer development than in Justin Martyr's work. In the Protr. 68, 1 (I, 51,25-27), Clement asked Plato to accompany him in his search for God; immediately after, he cited two famous passages from the Timaeus 28c and the Epist. VII, 341c, relating to God's ineffability, and he turned again to Plato, approving his words and renewing the invitation made a few lines earlier (Protr. 68, 2 [I, 52,1-2]). In Strom. I, 42,1 (II, 28,2-4), Plato is represented as "a friend of truth . . . moved by God as it were"; in the Strom. II, 100,3 (II, 167,23-168-4), he was praised for his definition of the end of man as ὁμοίωσις θεῷ (cf. Theaetetus 176b); and in the Strom. V, 29,4 (II, 345,3) he was commemorated along with Pythagoras as the one who "was able to seize some reflections on the correct sense of the truth." The thesis about the use of the OT by the Greeks, which for *Tatian and the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos only caused an attitude of contempt and self-sufficiency toward Greek philosophy, for Clement, even more than Justin Martyr, increased his admiration for the Athenian philosopher. Though affirming Plato's dependence on Scripture as Justin Martyr did (see the passages gathered in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 42 n. 4), Clement, similar to and yet more than Justin, saw in it not a reason for condemning his philosophy, but a further occasion to praise its divine origins and to invite Christians to follow it.

The most obvious proofs that Clement believed Plato was influenced by Moses are presented by ch. 25 of the first book of the Stromata and two passages of the Strom. II, 100,3 and V, 29,3-4. In these three cases the agreement between Plato and Moses provided Clement the opportunity to emphasize the loftiness of Plato's understanding of the contemplative life, the formula ὁμοίωσις θεῷ, and, in general, Platonic-Pythagorean theology. Therefore, one should not be surprised by the large number of citations and the Platonic echoes present in the writings of Clement, who in all likelihood had direct knowledge of Plato's dialogues (in addition to the Register of the critical edition done by Stählin, see also F.L. Clark, Citations of Plato in Clement of Alexandria: Trans. Proc. Am. Phil. Ass. 33 [1902] XII-XX). Among the numerous passages of Clement, it will be sufficient here to call attention to the Strom. V, 83,1-4: the terms πτεροῦται and βρῖθον used to recall the soul's inclination toward higher things (see above regarding Justin Martyr) hearken back to the Phaedrus 246c, 255cd, 247b. Moreover, to indicate the divine origin of virtue, he cited two passages from the Meno (100b and 99e), in which the expression θείᾳ μοίρᾳ appears, an expression used also by Philo and contemporary Platonism (cf. S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, p. 66 n. 1). An important "Platonic" motif appropriated by Clement—brought to light esp. by J. Wytzes (VChr 9 [1955] 148-158; 11 [1957] 226-245; 14 [1960] 129-153)—was that of the educational and providential function of the wounds inflicted by God on humankind. This idea is also found in the writings of *Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa.

*Middle Platonism of the 2nd c., Philo and incipient *Neoplatonism are the source for a large number of Clement's teachings, and, therefore, they placed an unmistakable mark upon his Christianity (Clement and *Ammonius Saccas lived in the same city, *Alexandria, between the end of the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd c. AD). Clement's attitude with regard to the various Greek philosophical schools (the cult of Plato and Pythagoras and the condemnation of *Stoic materialism, Epicurus and the *Aristotelian doctrine of providence) faithfully conform to the canons of Middle Platonism, and he derives his understanding of philosophy as a "cultivation of wisdom" from Philo and Middle Platonism—wisdom defined in Stoic terms as "a knowledge of things divine and human and their causes" and the subordination of philosophy to theology (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 41-59).

An examination of Clement's ethical system demonstrates the triple influence of Middle Platonism, Philo and Neoplatonism. The following doctrines derived from Middle Platonism and Philo—even if in the final analysis they derive from the Stoics, Plato and Aristotle: virtue as the soul's coherent and compliant disposition toward the logos, as the very harmony of the soul and as its just means; its self-sufficiency; its derivation from the natural disposition, from exercise and learning; the definitions of the four cardinal *virtues and their application to the three parts of the human *soul; the tight connection between the various virtues; the origin and the nature of the passions, irrational movements produced not by flawed judgments of reason but to lower parts of the soul (the irascible and the concupiscible) and from the same bodily conditions; the regulation of the passions by the logos—which is the charioteer described in the Phaedrus 246b—and the obedience to the law of nature established by the universal logos, which is also present in the human reason (the ethics of the μεριοπάθεια). The adoption of ἀπάθεια and the identification between the latter and the ὁμοίωσις connect Clement very closely to the Alexandrian tradition represented by Philo and Neoplatonism (cf. S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 60-117).

Almost all the foundational elements of Clement's understanding of gnosis* go back to the Platonic tradition and Philo: the use of cryptic language, the heavy esoteric sense attributed to higher understanding, the ideal of the contemplative life and the union with intelligible realities that has its presupposition in catharsis or detachment from the body and the sensible world in general, and the role of the auxiliary disciplines are all motifs present in the writings of Plato, Philo, Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 144-173). One can say the same thing with regard to cosmology and *theology. One can also trace back to the Timaeus the distinction—appropriated by Philo and the Platonic tradition—between the intelligible world (or the model) and the sensible world (or the image), present in the Strom. V, 93,4. The doctrine of matter ἄχρονος, which, acc. to *Photius, Clement adopted in the Hypotyposes (ed. Stählin, III, p. 202, 10-11), is found in Middle Platonism; similarly, in Middle Platonism is the understanding of matter deprived of quality and form (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 191-194; its presence was already noted in the writings of Athenagoras and Justin Martyr). At one particular point, however, Clement distanced himself from scholastic Platonism, drawing nearer to Neoplatonism. In the Strom. V, 89,5-6 (II, 385,5-9), he somewhat anticipated *Gregory of Nyssa's approach, rejecting the Middle Platonic teaching on matter as a principle, and countering that this was defined by Plato not only as devoid of quality and form, but also as nonbeing (μὴ ὄν). This last expression in reference to matter is found in Plotinus's writings (Enn. II, 4,10 [II, 64,34-35]). Plotinus inherited it from the Neo-Pythagorean Moderatus (see Simplicius, In phys. 231,4-5; see also S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 197-199).

Clement's doctrine of the ideas as thoughts contained in the mind of God clearly comes from Middle Platonism and Philo (see Strom. IV, 155,2 [II, 317,11]; V, 16,3 [II, 336,8-9]; V, 73,3 [II, 375,18-19]). One particular teaching in which Clement foreshadowed Neoplatonism is his definition of the logos as the unity that encompasses all things (πάντα ἕν; Strom. IV, 156,2): the same idea is found in the Plotinian conception of the nous (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 205-206) and in the writings of St. *Augustine (see below). The various motifs that characterize Clement's understanding of God's transcendence (remoteness with respect to beings; superiority with respect to space, time and virtue; and ineffability and "via negativa") are those of Philo, Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 212-224). On the close parallelism between Strom. V, 81,6 (II, 380,22-23) and Enn. VI, 9,6 (V12, 170,10-11) with regard to God's infinity, see S. Lilla, JTS 31 (1980) 100 n. 2, and also the entry *Pantaenus.

With regard to Plato, Origen did not show the enthusiasm and admiration that was characteristic of Clement. The lack of a true, genuine and open cult-like devotion toward Plato in Origen's writings constitutes one aspect of his more reserved and detached attitude with respect to Greek philosophy, a lack brought to light by H. Koch (Pronoia und Paideusis, Berlin-Leipzig 1932, 176-180, 307), J. Quasten (Patrologia, Turin 1967, I, 318) and by H. Chadwick (Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 101-103). In Origen's work Contra Celsum, however, there is no lack of a positive assessment of the Athenian philosopher: in III, 63 (I, 257,4-5) he rebuked Celsus for not having followed the Platonic teaching on humility and composure (cf. Laws IV, 716a). In III, 80 (I, 270,16-22), he affirmed the substantial identity between the Christian conception of the blessed life in communion with the divine and the Platonic doctrine of the soul's ascent to the heavenly vault and contemplation of the hyperuranian world (see Phaedrus 247a-c, 250bc). In IV, 39 (I, 312,26-29), he reused Clement's argument (cf. Strom. II, 100,3; II, 167,24-168,4): Plato found himself in agreement with the Mosaic law either by chance or because he was able to become directly acquainted with its texts during his stay in *Egypt (this last point reiterates the same argument raised by the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos). In VI, 3 (II, 72,20), he fully approved the passage in Epist. VII, 341 c-d; in VI, 5 (II, 74-75); he relates the light of which this passage speaks with the light of Jn 1:9 and Mt 5:14 and renewed his approval (p. 75, 16-17); in VII, 43 (II, 194,6), repeating the words of the Timaeus 28c, he showed that he fully agreed with them (on Origen's attitude toward Plato's philosophy, see esp. H. Crouzel, Origène et la philosophie, Paris 1962, 49-65).

As H. Chadwick observed (Early Christian Thought, 102), despite his restraint with regard to Greek philosophy, Origen achieved a more profound synthesis between Christianity and philosophy than did Clement. *Porphyry tells us that he was a student of *Ammonius Saccas, the founder of Neoplatonism (see Eus., HE 6, 19,6) and that he always lived together with Plato and the most important Neo-Pythagorean and Platonist philosophers (Eus., HE 6, 19,8). In effect, his entire system of thought reveals the deep imprint of Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism. H. Koch (Pronoia und Paideusis, 17, 206-207, 237-238, 268-274, 286-291) demonstrated that Origen's judgments on the various Greek philosophical schools (substantially analogous to those of Clement and Justin Martyr, see, e.g., C. Celsum I, 21 and III, 75: I, 266,20–267,6) agree with those of the supporters of Middle Platonism. Its role in cultural formation at his time was therefore no less important than it had been for the cultural formation of his two predecessors. He certainly depended on Middle Platonism, in addition to the Phaedrus 247c, the passage of De princ. IV, 3,15 (347,9-12) on incorporeal creatures bears this out: si sit aliqua substantia in qua neque color neque habitus neque tactus neque magnitudo intellegenda sit, mente sola conspicabilis ("if there is any substance in which neither color nor habit not touch nor greatness should be understood, it can be seen by the mind alone"). This passage has two exact parallels in the writings of *Maximus of Tyre (Or. XI, 60a [139,20-140,5]) and Alcinous (Did. 164,14); esp. the words mente sola conspicabilis that refer not to God but to his spiritual creatures; these words should be compared with the Phaedrus 247c 7-8 and the Timaeus 28a 1, Maximus of Tyre (Or. XI, 60a [140,4-5]), Alcinous (Did. 165,4-5), ps.-*Justin (Coh. ad Gr. 66,19-20), Justin Martyr (Dial. 3 [18,1-2]), *Athenagoras (Legat. 4 [5,10-11]).

It has already been noted, however, that the Middle Platonist authors and the apologists refer directly to God. Origen's conception of God connects on the one hand to scholastic Platonism of the 2nd c. and on the other hand to Neoplatonism. Equal to the chief divinity of the Middle Platonists, Origen's God is unbegotten, incorruptible and superior to all beings (C. Celsum VI, 66: II, 136,26; IV, 14: I, 284,27; cf., e.g., Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,6; Alcinous, Did. 164,15-16, 18-19, 166,12), immutable and unchangeable (De or. 24,2, p. 354, 8-9; cf., e.g., Philo, De Cher. 90; Maximus of Tyre, Or. XI, 59a; Alcinous, Did. 166,12), self-sufficient (C. Celsum VII, 65: II, 215,6; Comm. on Ioh. XIII, 34, p. 259, 20; cf. Celsus in C. Celsum VIII, 21: II, 238,16; Alcinous, Did. 164,28; Philo, De spec. leg. II, 38), void of form, size and color (C. Celsum VI, 64: II, 134,15; De princ. I, 1,6, p. 21, 16; cf. Plato, Phaedrus 247c; Parm. 137d; Hippolytus, Ref. I, 19,3; Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 382b: II, 552,2-4; Maximus of Tyre, Or. XI 60a), beyond any spatial locality (De or. 23,1, p. 349, 25-27; 23,3, p. 351, 2-4; De princ. I, 1, p. 21, 15, p. 22, 4; cf. Plato, Parm. 138a; Sympos. 211a; Philo, De post. C. 14; De conf. ling. 136; Apuleius, Apol. 64,7), ineffable and void of names (C. Celsum VI, 65; VII, 43; cf. Plato, Parm. 142a; Sympos. 211a; Tim. 28c; Epist. VII, 341c; Alcinous, Did. 164,7; 164,28; 165,4; Celsus in C. Celsum VI, 65, p. 135, 18 and 26; VII, 42, p. 192, 30; 193, 1; Maximus of Tyre, Or. XI, 60a; Apuleius, De Plat. I, 190; Apol. 64,7), absolutely void of passions (C. Celsum VI, 65, p. 136, 6-7: where Celsus's thesis is accepted; De princ. II, 4,4, p. 131, 27; cf. Philo, De Abr. 202: IV, 45,8-9; Celsus in C. Celsum VI, 65, p. 136, 6-7). Origen, moreover, applied respectively to the Father and the logos the expressions πρῶτος θεός δεύτερος θεός characteristic of *Numenius and Alcinous (De martyr. 46 [42,18 e 23]; C. Celsum VI, 47 [II, 119,2]; V, 39 [II, 43,22-26]; cf. Numenius, frag. 11 and 21 Des Places [p. 53, 3-4; 60, 4-5] and Alcinous, Did. 164,19). Almost all of these teachings can be also found in the writings of *Plotinus.

With regard to the proximity of Neoplatonism, one should esp. recall the following points: (1) God is simple, not a mixture and indivisible (C. Celsum IV, 14 [I, 284,27-28]): cf. Plato, Rep. II, 380 d., Parm. 137 d; Plotinus, Enn. IV, 2,1 (IV, 7,17-8,30; 30,41-42); V, 2,1 (V, 33,3) and also Philo, Leg. Alleg. II, 2 (I, 90,10); Alcinous, Did. 166,6; Clement, Strom. V, 81,6 (II, 380,21-22): this entire passage from Clement (380,20-25) is based on a Neo-Pythagorean interpretation of the first hypothesis of Plato's Parmenides (cf. S. Lilla, JTS 31 [1980] 97 n. 4). (2) In addition to the nous*, God can be defined as something that is superior to the nous and ousia (C. Celsum VI, 64 [II, 134,24–135,5]; VII, 38 [II, 188,11]; Comm. in Ioh. 19,6 [305,16-17]). This teaching was debated in the Platonic and Neo-Pythagorean schools and was a commonplace in Neoplatonism (cf., e.g., Plotinus, Enn. V, 1,8 [V, 26,7-8]; V, 5,6 [V, 98,11]; V, 6,6 [V, 118,30-31]), which on the one hand goes back to Plato, Rep. VI 509b, and on the other to Aristotle, Περὶ εὐχῆς, frag. 46 Rose (as J. Whittaker noted, VChr 23 [1969] 92). Nevertheless, this is present also in the writings of Celsus (cf. C. Celsum VII, 45 [II, 197,2-3]). (3) God remains absolutely unknown to human reason (C. Celsum VI, 65 [II, 135,18-20]; De princ. I, 1,5 [20,7; 20,22-23]): this is the same teaching present in the writings of Plato (Parm. 142a; Sympos. 211a), Clement, Numenius and Plotinus (cf. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 217-219, 222) and also in Celsus (C. Celsum VI, 65 [II, 135,17-18,24-25]). (4) God created various beings, causing them to emanate from his own unity, and in this sense he can be considered their source (cf. De princ. II, 1,1 [107,3-5]; I, 1,6 [21,13]; I, 3,8 [61,14]). This is a typically Neoplatonic idea, which in later patristic writings would be adopted and developed by ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite: for Plotinus the One generates the nous (in which is contained the totality of beings) inasmuch as it "overflows" and emits from itself its overflowing energy (Enn. V, 2,1 [V, 33,7-8]; V, 3,12 [V, 66,40-41]).

The Platonic tradition also left evident traces in *Origen's understanding of the logos: (1) in the fragment preserved in the Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (PG 14, 1308C), Origen, in describing the generation of the logos by the Father, appropriated the teaching of the Wisdom of Solomon (7:25), acc. to which σοφία (wisdom) is an ἀπόρροια τῆς τοῦ παντοκράτος δόξης εἰλικρινής ("pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty"). Plotinus returns to the same idea of the emanation from the original beginning to describe the generation of the nous from the One (Enn. V, 2,1 [V, 33,7-8]; V, 3,12 [V, 66,40-41]). (2) For Origen, the logos is the splendor that proceeds from the light represented by the Father (De princ. I, 2,4 [33,1-2]; I, 2,7 [37,7-8]; IV, 4,1 [349,17-19]; Comm. in Ioh. XIII, 25 [249,29-30]; In Ier. hom. IX [70,19]). Even this teaching, though appealing to Wisd 7:26, presented an analogue to Plotinus (Enn. V, 1,6 [V, 22,28-29]; V, 2,12 [V, 66,40-42]), where the nous generated from the One is presented as the light that emanates from the sun (see also W. Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 24). (3) Just as Origen's logos was generated by the Father ab aeterno (De princ. I, 2,4 [33,1]; In Ier. hom. IX [70,16-22]), so too the nous of Plotinus was generated ab aeterno from the One (Enn. V, 1,6 [V, 22,29-30]) (cf. Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, 24). (4) Just as Origen's logos received its existence and divinity from contemplating the Father (Comm. in Ioh. II, 2 [55,5-8]; cf. H. Crouzel, Origène et la connaissance mystique, Bruges 1961, 497), so too Plotinus's nous exists as a nous inasmuch as it contemplates the One (Enn. V, 2,1 [V, 33,9-11]; V, 4,2 [V, 81,24-26]). (5) Appealing to Ps 35:10 and Jn 8:12, Origen (Comm. in Ioh. II, 23 [80,16]) called both the Father and the Son "lights"; Plotinus spoke in the same way, speaking of the One and the nous (Enn. V, 3,12 [V, 66,44]). (6) The logos, the second god generated from the first god (cf. above), was also called by Origen "the demiurge" (C. Celsum VI, 47 [II, 119,2]), just as Numenius had called his second god "the demiurge" (cf. 20-21 Des Places, p. 60), and Plotinus called the "demiurge"

the nous, the second hypostasis (Enn. II, 3,18 [II, 45,15]; V, 9,3 [V, 163,26]). (7) While the Father is the absolute Good, the logos is the image of his "goodness," but not the absolute good (In Matt. XV, 10 [375,12-376,13]; De princ. I, 2,13 [46,13-47,9]; Comm. in Ioh. XIII, 34 [261,27-28]). Numenius spoke in entirely analogous terms (frag. 20 Des Places [p. 60]); when referring to Plato (Rep. VI 509b), he called the first god αὐτοαγαθόν (cf. Origen's αὐτοαγαθόν in De princ. I, 2,13, p. 47,4) and the model (ἰδέα) of the second god, who is "good" inasmuch as he participates in the Good represented by the first god (see also Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, 24). (8) To emphasize the superiority of the logos with respect to all other beings, Origen (Comm. in Ioh. XIII, 25 [249,27]) used the words ὑπερέχων οὐσιᾳ καὶ πρεσβεία καὶ δυνάμει, deriving these words from Plato (Rep. VI, 509b). (9) In his divine wisdom, identical to the logos, are present all the forms (τύποι), which, if on the one hand they are models of sensible things, on the other they are the "thoughts" or the "rational principles" conceived beforehand by God (Comm. in Ioh. I, 19 [I, 24,1-2; 7-8]; cf. Comm. in Ioh. I, 34 [I, 43,20-22]; see also Theiler, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, 21-22). (10) Origen's doctrine of the presence of various logoi or rational principles in sophia or logos has an exact correspondence in Plotinus's conception of the anima mundi*, that contains in itself the totality of logoi (cf. on the one hand, Comm. in Ioh. I, 19 [I, 24,7-8]; I, 34 [I, 43,20-22]; De princ. I, 2,2 [30,7-8]; C. Celsum V, 39 [II, 43,22-27] and on the other, Plotinus, Enn. VI, 2,5 [VI1, 104,12-14]): it is a Stoic doctrine (cf., e.g., SVF I, 98; I, 102; II, 1027) that would be adopted by *Gregory of Nyssa (De anima et res.: PG 46, 28,38-29,2) and ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite (Nom. div. V, 8: PG 3, 824C). (11) For Origen, the logos is also the power of God that embraces and holds together the entire universe (De or. 23,1 [349,28–350,1]), also found in the writings of Philo and Clement (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 210-211). On the one hand, Origen reverts to the Stoic understanding of the logos (cf., e.g., SVF I, 530; III, 439), on the other, to that of the anima mundi specific to Plato's Timaeus, which also encompasses and embraces the sensible universe (Tim. 34b 3-4; 36 e 2-3), and is also found in Middle Platonism (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 211-212, and JTS 31 [1980] 98 n. 2). As Theiler demonstrated (Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, p. 23 n. 37), in Origen's writings one finds Plotinus's doctrine of "intelligible matter," the fundamental elements of the ideas (or forms) that constitute the nous (cf. *Calcidius, par. 278). Plotinus dedicated the fourth treatise of the second Ennead to this problem.

Though decisively rejecting the Platonist and Orphic-Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of the soul from the human body into that of an animal (cf. Chadwick, pp. 115-116; Theiler. pp. 18-19; M. Simonetti, I principi di Origene, Turin 1968, p. 68 no. 35, 228-229 nos. 29-30 with regard to De princ. I, 8,4 and also C. Celsum VIII, 30 [II, 245,24-25]; see Plato, Phaedo 81e-82a; Phaedrus 249b 2-3; Tim. 41d-42d), Origen considered the presence of the soul in the human body as the result of its fall from heaven caused by its inclination toward the corporeal and the material and the "cooling" of its love for God; the difference between various people mirrors the differences between the souls' original conditions (De princ. II, 8,3, p. 157,14–158,2; 158,17–159,1; 159,4-14; 160,1-7, 19-20; 161,2-3; IV, 2,7, p. 319,10-14). This is the same understanding explained in Plato's Phaedrus (246c-248e) and also adopted by Plotinus (Enn. VI, 9,9 [VI², 184,22-24]). Aside from his rejection of transmigration into the bodies of animals, the cyclical rhythm described by the Phaedrus and what one finds in Origen's De princ. IV, 3,11 corresponds exactly: in the Phaedrus, the souls fall from heaven into human bodies and, if they remain attached to corporeal things, they transmigrate from these into irrational animals, to then recover the opposite path; Origen established a parallel between the soul's descent from heaven to this earth and its subsequent descent from this earth to hell (De princ. IV, 3,11, p. 339,7-9) and between the soul's reascent from hell to earthly life and its ascent from earth to the firmament (De princ. IV, 3,11, p. 339,10-15). Theiler (p. 29) noted that the same motif of the soul's fall into the human body as a result of a punishment and its subsequent reascent after a period of time more or less reappears in the writings of Hierocles.

Another Platonist motif in Origen's writings, to which H. Koch called attention (pp. 13-144), is the idea of the value of punishments: they are not inflicted by God on the sinner as a form of retaliation, but are a true and proper cure and a medicine (De princ. II, 5,3, p. 135,30–136,2); they cause purification (De orat. 29,15, p. 390,12-15) and represent therefore an important element of the divine paideia (C. Celsum V, 31 [II, 33,9-10]). Clement expressed his position in analogous terms, and so would Gregory of Nyssa. Passages such as the Phaedo 113de and the Gorgias 525b prove that the idea that punishment has an educational and cathartic function goes back to Plato. This idea is also present in Middle Platonism: for Plutarch, divine punishment is a medicine and a cure of the soul (De sera num. vind. 549f-550a [III, 421,22–422,8]); the terms iatreia and pharmakon used by Plutarch (p. 421,24; 422,2) should be compared with the words curari . . . medicamentis from Rufinus's Latin translation (De princ. II, 5,3 [135,32]). The punitive function, acc. to Origen, is often carried out by angels; analogously, for Hierocles they are the rational beings who punish humankind (on this last correspondence, see Theiler p. 29).

Even in the doctrine of the *apokatastasis, the points of correspondence between Origen and Hierocles brought to light by Theiler (pp. 27-28) are very close: for both men, the apokatastasis consists in the return to the original condition; it results in deification and union with the divinity (on this harmony, see also Koch, p. 297) and presupposes the person's spontaneous submission to God.

In ethics, Origen was connected to the Alexandrian tradition represented by Philo, Clement and Plotinus. Even for Origen, as was the case for Plato (Rep. IV, 439d 1-2; 444d 13-e 2; Tim. 86b 5-7) and *Chrysippus (cited in C. Celsum VIII, 51 [II, 266,18-30]), Posidonius, *Galen, Philo and Clement (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 96, 98), the passions are a true and proper sickness of the soul (Comm. in Matt. XIII, 16 [I, 220,12-14]). At first, even he leaned toward arguing for their control and moderation in such a way that they conformed to nature (Hom. XXII in lib. Jesu Nave, 4 [436,17-20]), but he also saw in their total destruction the highest ethical ideal (Comm. in Matt. XIII, 16 [I, 219,28-29]; XV, 4 [II, 358,22-23, 32-33)]; XV, 17 [II, 398,27]; fr. 64 [III, 41]; Hom. I in lib. Jesu Nave [294,18-20]; Comm. in Ioh. XX, 36 [376,27]). H. Koch's affirmation (p. 267), acc. to which Origen rejected apatheia in a manner equal to Alcinous, does not correspond to the truth of the matter. Origen also saw in the "likeness to God" (Plato, Theaetetus 176 b) humanity's ultimate end: De princ. III, 6,1 (280,2–281,5), Comm. in Ioh. XX, 17 (349,26-27).

With regard to superior knowledge or gnosis*, H. Crouzel (Origène et la connaissance mystique, Bruges 1961) has emphasized and carefully examined Origen's use of terms coming from mystery language or technical language such as μυστήριον, μυστικός, ἀπόρρητος, ἄρρητος, κρυπτός, ἀόρατος (pp. 25-46), θέα, θεωρία, θεᾶσθαι, θεωρεῖν, θέαμα (pp. 375-379), ὁρᾶν, διορατικός (pp. 380-381), νοεῖν, ἐννοεῖν (pp. 383-389), χωρεῖν, χωρητικός (pp. 392-395), γνῶσις, γνωστικός (pp. 395-398). These are terms already present for the most part in the writings of Plato, adopted by the entire subsequent Platonist tradition and profusely used also by Philo and Clement (see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, 146-150). Even subsequent patristic authors such as Gregory of Nyssa and ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite would make regular use of these terms.

Finally, an indelible mark was left by the Platonic tradition on Origen's understanding of the *resurrection of the body: Origen vociferously argued against those who, interpreting Scripture literally, believed in the resurrection of the material body, subject to the same physical needs of the body that lives on earth (De princ. II, 11,2 [184-186]). He emphasized the fact that the resurrected body comes to an end by taking up a completely spiritual nature (De princ. III, 6,6 [288,6-7; 289,7-8]): iam tum corpus quasi spiritui ministrans in statum qualitatemque proficiat spiritalem ("by that point, then, the body, ministering to the spirit as it were proceeds toward a spiritual state and quality"). *Methodius criticized Origen's perspective on this matter (De res. III, 16,9 [413,5-8]).

*Gregory Thaumaturgus's Panagyric to Origen is replete with statements that echo Plato's ideas both directly and filtered through later authors: A. Brinkmann brought these to light (Gregors des Thaumaturgen Panegyricus auf Origenes: RhM 56 [1901] 56-58); he esp. emphasized the definitions of the four cardinal virtues.

V. The Greek Fathers. *Epiphanius considered Platonic philosophy a heresy deriving, on a par with the other Greek philosophical schools, from the mystery religions in vogue among the Egyptians, Phrygians, Phoenicians and Babylonians (Pan. 4,6-9 [182,13–183,10 Holl]). His brief outline of Platonism (Pan. 6,1-3 [185, 13-25]) depended both on 1st- and 3rd-c.-AD *Middle Platonism and Neo-Pythagoreanism: although the doctrine of the three causes and the coeternity of matter to God (p. 185, 19-20, 24-25) reveals a clear Middle Platonist stamp and should be compared to the information provided by *Hippolytus (see also ed. Holl, ap. font., p. 185). The mention of the opposite thesis, acc. to which matter that is generated by God is not coeternal with him (pp. 185, 21-22), goes back to the speculations of certain Neo-Pythagoreans on matter, as one can see from the writings of *Calcidius (In Tim. 295 [297,16-19 Waszink]).

*Eusebius of Caesarea dedicated the entirety of books XI-XIII and part of book XIV of his Praeparatio evangelica to Plato. Book XI aimed to demonstrate, exhaustively, the thesis—already present in the Cohortatio ad Graecos, *Justin Martyr and *Clement—of the dependency of Plato's theological-metaphysical system on the wisdom of *Moses (see esp. the title for ch. 2, vol. II, p. 6). Eusebius's attitude toward such a suggestion is not polemical as in the case of *Tatian and the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos, but is closer to that of Clement: marked by a deep respect. Eusebius presented Plato as the "greatest of the Greek philosophers" (XI, 1,3, vol. II, 5,17) and as "the one who, though not expressing himself always in the most felicitous way, for the most part said things in conformity to the truth (XI, 1,5, vol. II, 6,6-8) (for Eusebius's judgments on Plato, see E. Des Places, Eusèbe de Césarée juge de Platon dans la Préparation évangélique, in Mélanges A. Diès, Paris 1966, 69-77). A careful reading of book XI of the Praeparatio demonstrates that for Eusebius, more than proving Plato's dependence on Moses, it forces one to discover Platonic philosophy in the books of the OT, interpreted acc. to the canons of Middle Platonism and *Neoplatonism. Eusebius cited extensive extracts not only from Plato's dialogues, but also from subsequent authors such as Atticus, *Aristotle, *Numenius, Plutarch, *Philo, Amelius and Clement. The interpretation of Plato's writings, which Eusebius followed, was, in effect, heavily conditioned by the Platonic tradition and by earlier patristic authors. In ch. 10 (II, pp. 24-25), he adopted the Platonic distinction appropriated by all subsequent Platonism, between the mutable sensible world and the immutable intelligible world, placing the famous passage from Tim. 27d-28a not only in relation to Eccl 1:9 but also to Ex 3:14 (see the foregoing discussion on the Cohortatio ad Graecos and, below, with regard to St. Augustine); in chs. 15-19, on a par with Middle Platonist and Neoplatonist philosophers, whose authority he invokes, he affirmed the existence of the "second cause" in the Platonic system; in ch. 21 (II, p. 46) he saw in the famous passage from Epist. II, 312d-e the proof of the existence of the three *hypostases and Platonic theology. Plotinus used the same passage—cited by Eusebius in ch. 18 (II, 39,22–40,8)—to provide a "Platonic" foundation for his three hypostases (Enn. V, 1,8); the title of ch. 21, Περὶ τῶν ἀρχικῶν ὑποστάσεων, is that of the first treatise of the fifth Ennead; Book XII (II, 83-162) is entirely devoted to demonstrating the agreement between Platonic philosophy and Mosaic wisdom.

Book XIII (II, 163-256), on the one hand, praises Plato's rejection of Greek religion and presents Aristobulus and Clement as the primary authorities capable of confirming the thesis of the Greeks' dependence on the OT and their agreement with it. On the other hand, it criticizes several points of Platonic philosophy, inasmuch as it is incoherent with the teaching of Moses. The fourth chapter of Book XIV (II, 263-268) recalls with approval Plato's criticism of earlier materialist theories. Following the example of *Numenius, chapters 5-9 outline the history of the Platonic Academy up to Carneades. Book XV contains a brief criticism of *Aristotelian philosophy, acc. to the point of view expressed by the Middle Platonist philosopher Atticus. These books from the Praeparatio reveal Eusebius's great interest not only in Plato, but also in the entirety of subsequent Platonism: they represent the primary source for our understanding of Numenius and Atticus's ideas. The excerptum on the *soul selected by the seventh treatise of the fourth Ennead and preserved in ch. 22 of book XV of the Praeparatio (II, pp. 387-399) is considered by P. Henry an authoritative witness to the history of Plotinus's text (Les états du texte de Plotin, Études plotiniennes I, Paris 1938, ch. IV, pp. 68-71, 77-124).

The Platonist echoes present in the works of *Basil the Great were brought to light by K. Gronau in his still very important study De Basilio Gregorio Nazianzeno Nyssenoque Platonis imitatoribus (Göttingen 1908). Basil's use of Platonism, esp. in the Timaeus, is evident in his nine Homilies on the Hexameron (see S. Giet, SC 26 bis, Paris 1968, 57-60, the commentary in the footnote to the edition and the index of authors cited, p. 537), even if this use, as Gronau demonstrated (Posidonius, Eine Quelle für Basilius' Hexaemeros, Braunschweig 1912, and Posidonius und die jüdisch-Christliche Genesisexegese, Leipzig-Berlin 1914, 7-112), was not based only on a direct reading but also and esp. on an intermediary source represented by the commentary on the Timaeus of the Stoic philosopher Posidonius, who had a great influence on the entirety of Late Antique and patristic thought.

Among the many echoes of the Timaeus we will only mention here the expression aphthonos agathotēs in reference to God (Hom. 1,2 [96,12 Giet]): this connects to Tim. 29e 1-2. The motif of contemplation of what is found beyond heaven, an idea present in the De fide, ch. 1 (PG 31.465B 7-10), goes back to the Phaedrus 247b-d; likewise from the Phaedrus (246b, 247b) derives the image of the charioteer who allows himself to be pulled violently by two horses, a symbol of reason overcome by the passions (Ad iuv. IX [57,74-76 Boulenger]). The motif of the body, however, as an obstacle and prison of the soul that finds its deliverance in philosophy (Ad iuv. IX [54,4-55,6; 57,87]), goes back to the Phaedo 65a, 67b, 83a.

Even more relevant is *Basil's dependence on *Neoplatonism—and, in particular, on *Plotinus—which while rather underestimated by Giet with respect to the Homilies on the Hexameron (SC 26 bis, Paris 1968, 60-61), was given its proper weight by other scholars. A. Jahn, in his work Basilius Magnus plotinizans (Bern 1838), demonstrated the heavy dependence of the De spiritu (PG 29, 768-774) on the Enn. V, 1,1-5 and of the ninth chapter of the De Spiritu sancto (PG 32, 108-109) on various treatises of the Enneads. P. Henry (Les états du texte de Plotin, Études plotiniennes I, Paris 1938, ch. 5, pp. 159-196), through numerous and precise synoptic comparisons, called attention to several points of correspondence, even terminological, between the Enneads and Basil's various writings (Epist. II; In hexaem.; De fide; De Spir. sancto; De spir.) and maintained with valid arguments the authenticity of the De spiritu, which was rejected by Garnier. H. Dörries too (De Spiritu sancto, Der Beitrag des Basilius zum Abschluss des trinitarischen Dogma, Göttingen 1956, 53) has admitted, although with several reservations and qualifications, the presence of Plotinian motifs in ch. IX of De Spiritu sancto; J.M. Rist is of the same perspective (Basil's Neoplatonism, in Basil of Caesarea, Christian, Humanist, Ascetic. A Sixteen-hundredth Anniversary Symposium, ed. P.J. Fedwick, I, Toronto 1981, 207). H. Dehnhard, for his part (Das Problem der Abbängigkeit des Basilius von Plotin [PTS 3], Berlin 1964), readdressed the question of Basil's use of Plotinus's writings, esp. in De spiritu, emphasizing the numerous points of contact between the two authors (see esp. pp. 6-13, 57).

Similarly, with respect to *Gregory of Nyssa, K. Gronau (Posidonius) listed the numerous Platonic echoes. Even if Gregory clearly refuted certain Platonic ideas or those of subsequent scholastic Platonism (esp. the doctrine of *metempsychosis: De an. et res.: PG 46, 108B-121A; the doctrine of the fall of souls from heaven, characteristic of the Phaedrus and appropriated by Origen: De an. et res.: PG 46, 112B, 116B–117C; the doctrine of matter as the unbegotten and coeternal principle with God, adopted, as was seen, by the apologists: De an. et res.: PG 46, 121C 8-124A 5), one can say that every phrase of his writings represents a reworking of motifs taken from both Plato and the subsequent Platonic tradition and expresses them in their characteristic terms. Among Gregory's numerous themes present already in the writings of Plato, it will be sufficient to mention here just a few: the passage concerning the absolute good (De virg. ch. 11 [296,15-20 Cavarnos]) that goes back to the Sympos. 211a; the rejection of attributing to the divinity feelings of envy (Adv. Maced. 99,23-24 Müller; cf. Plato, Tim. 29e; Phaedrus 247a; Epin. 988b; and W. Jaeger, Gregor von Nyssa's Lehre vom heiligen Geist, Leiden 1966, 38); the motif—very frequent in Gregory's writings and deriving from the Phaedrus 246d 6-7—of the *winged understanding that, delivered from every material bond, flies toward the divine (cf., e.g., De virg. ch. 11, 294,8-10); the views on the *soul's nature deriving from the Phaedo: the soul is an intelligible and invisible essence (De an. et res.: PG 46, 36A; cf. Phaedo 80b); it is imprisoned and impeded by the body (PG 46.88A; cf. Phaedo 66b-67b, 67d); it must meditate on itself and separate itself from the body and is to contemplate the intelligible (PG 46, 88A, 89C; cf. Phaedo 65c, 65d, 67a, 79d, 80e, 83b); and if it has shown an excessive attachment to the body, it is condemned to wander like a phantasm around the tombs (PG 46, 88B-C; cf. Phaedo 81c-d). (On these points of similarity, see also M. Pellegrino, Il platonismo di Gregorio Nisseno nel Dialogo intorno all'anima ed alla risurrezione: Riv. fil. neosc. 30 [1938] 437-474.) The perception of the cathartic and educational value of punishment was also adopted, as was seen, by Clement and Origen (De an. et res.: PG 46, 88A, 89B, 97C-100A, 100C, 157B-C, C-D, 160C; cf. Phaedo 113d; Gorgias 525b).

In Gregory's theology, the Platonic tradition, and in particular Neoplatonism, left obvious marks: the supreme divinity is superior to color, form, size and all bodily properties (De virg. 10, 290,23–291,2; In cant. cantic. hom. V, 157,17-18 Langerbeck; cf., e.g., Plato, Sympos. 211e; Phaedrus 247b; Parm. 137b; Alcinous, Did. 164, 14; Plotinus, Enn. V, 5,6 [V, 97,4-5]), the good itself (In eccl. hom. VII, p. 425, 8-13 Alexander; cf. Philo, De opif. m. 9 [I, 3,21]; Iamblicus, De myst. VIII, 2 [196,12-14 Des Places]), intelligence (In cant. cantic. hom. V, 157,15; for references to Neoplatonism and Aristotle, see above on Origen, and Langerbeck, op. cit., ap. font., p. 157), all beings (De perf. 188,15-16 Jaeger; cf. Plotinus, Enn. V, 5,6, [V, 97,9-10]; V, 1,6 [V, 22,13]). Gregory only admits that the "via negativa" (De an. et res.: PG 46, 40C; In cant. cantic. hom. V, 157,16-19; for the presence of this motif in Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism, see above with regard to Justin Martyr) is infinite (C. Eunom. II [I, 246,16-17 Jaeger]; In cant. cantic. hom. V, 157,20-21; De an. et res.: PG 46, 97A; cf. E. Mühlenberg, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes bei Gregor von Nyssa, Göttingen 1966; Plato, Parm. l37d; Plotinus, Enn. IV, 3,8 [74,38]), absolutely simple (De an. et res.: PG 46, 93C; for references to the entire Platonic tradition, see above on Origen), undefinable and therefore incomprehensible and ineffable (De virg. 10,288, 21-22, 25-26; 290, 21-23; De profess. Christ. 134,7-8 Jaeger; De perf. 194,14-26; C. Eunom. II [II, 58,26-28]; Quod non sint tres dei 52,15-20 Müller; for the parallels in the Platonic tradition, see above with regard to Clement and Origen), flees from the one who searches (C. Eunom. II [I, 246,16-22]; De perf. 194,12-14; cf. Philo, De post. C. 13 and 18; Plotinus, Enn. V, 5,10 [V, 102,9]), is self-sufficient, loves itself and desires nothing outside itself (De an. et res.: PG 46, 92C, 93A-B; cf. Plotinus, Enn. III, 8,11 [III, 167,9-10-168,42-43]; VI, 8,15 [VI², 153,11; 152,1–153,6]), and is the absolute beauty that renders all things beautiful that participate in it (De virg. 11, p. 292, 14-15; cf. Plato, Sympos. 211b; Plotinus, Enn. I, 6-7 [I, 103,25-30]; I, 6,8 [I, 104,6-8]; for Plotinus, however, beauty is to be identified not with the first principle, but with the second hypostasis).

Two other important characteristic motifs of the Platonic tradition also appropriated by Gregory are those of God's noetic activity, or more precisely, the presence of thoughts in divine wisdom (before creating the sensible universe, divine wisdom thought it [De perf. 182,14-15; 183,3-4]; cf. Philo, De opif. m. 19; and above, with respect to Origen's logos, no. 9), and that of God's power that embraces, holds together and permeates the entire universe (De profess. Christ. 138,27-139,4; De an. et res.: PG 46, 24C, 28A; cf. above, with regard to Origen's logos, no. 11). Gregory too, on par with his predecessors, adopted the Platonic ideal of ὁμοίωσις θεῷ (cf. Theaetetus 176b) that unites with the expression from κατ' εἰκόνα καὶ ὁμοίωσιν from Gen 1:26; while Clement and Origen, following Philo, saw in the term εἰκών of Gen 1:26 a reflection of the divine logos in human reason and in the ὁμοίωσις, a reflection of the perfection understood as the crowning of humanity's ethical duty, and therefore attainable only at a later time. Gregory considered the two expressions of Gen 1:26 synonyms and therefore was led to consider the εἰκών-ὁμοίωσις as the expression of the original perfection of humanity, which was lost by following sin—which is dark in the image of the primordial beauty—and which humanity must strain to restore by cutting off as much as possible ties to the body. It was to the credit of H. Merki (Homoiosis Theo. Von den der platonischen Angleichung an Gott zur Gottähnlichkeit bei Gregor von Nyssa, Freiburg in der Schweiz 1952, 92-164) to have analyzed in depth the meaning of the term homoiosis in Gregory's writings and have brought to light the analogues that it presented to Neoplatonism: Plotinus also put in strict relation the ὁμοίωσις with ἀπάθεια, the καθαρότης (purity) and the soul's return to its original beauty, darkened by its ties to the body (cf. the parallels in Merki, pp. 98-99, 115-117). Gregory is also connected to Platonism with respect to the motif of the superior understanding of the divine realities (θεωρία): even in his writings, as was already the case in those of Clement and Origen, it acquired a heavily esoteric stamp; it was expressed in terms taken from the mystery language and found its scriptural symbols in the images of the cloud and darkness (for all these points, see J. Lemaître, R. Roques, M. Viller, a portion of the entry Contemplation dedicated to Gregory, DSp 3, 1772-1775; and esp. J. Daniélou, Platonisme et théologie mystique, Paris 1944, and the subsection Mystique de la ténèbre chez Grégoire de Nysse: DSp 3, 1872-1885).

With regard to the motif of the soul's union with God, examined above by Daniélou (see the studies cited above), here we will only mention several points of the De anima et resurrectione and analogous Plotinian motifs: both for Gregory and Plotinus the pure and beautiful soul is connected to and mixes with the divine beauty to which it is similar (De an. et res.: PG 46, 89B, 93C; cf. Enn. I, 6,7 [I, 103,13]; I, 6,9 [I, 105,12; 106,29-30]); it sees in its own beauty the image and the reflection of the original beauty that serves as a model (PG 46, 89C; cf. Enn. I, 6,7 [I, 103,25-30]); it actualizes a likeness to God by seeking to imitate the transcendent beauty (PG 46, 89D-92A; cf. Enn. I, 6,7 [I, 103,27-28], I, 6,9 [I, 106,29-30, 32-33]); it already possesses what it hopes to possess (PG 46, 93B; cf. Enn. VI, 9,9 [VI², 185,46]). On the relationship between Gregory of Nyssa and the Platonic tradition, see also H.F. Cherniss, The Platonism of Gregory of Nyssa, New York 1971 (reprint of the 1930 ed.); and also E. Peroli, Il platonismo e l'antropologia filosofica di Gregorio di Nissa, Milan 1993; S. Lilla, Neoplatonisches Gedankengut (cited below in the bibl.).

Also in the writings of Gregory of Nazianzus, K. Gronau (Posidonius) found numerous Platonic echoes (see also R. Gottwald, De Gregorio Nazianzeno platonico, Diss. Breslau 1906; H. Pinault, Le platonisme de saint Grégoire de Nazianze, La Roche-sur-Yon 1925; E. Fleury, Saint Grégoire de Nazianze et son temps, Paris 1930, 79-80; C. Moreschini, Luce e purificazione nella dottrina di Gregorio Nazianzeno: Augustinianum 13 [1973] 535-549; Id., Il platonismo cristiano di Gregorio Nazianzeno: ASNP serie III, 4 [1974] 1347-1392; Id., Filosofia e letteratura in Gregorio di Nazianzo, Milan 1997). Among the various Platonic statements, we will mention only the one present in his second Theological Oration (Orat. 28): the allusion to the famous passage of the Timaeus 28c (PG 36, 29C), to which other authors also appealed (such as Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Justin Martyr and Origen); there is also the denial of God's presence in the feeling of hatred, also found in the writings of Gregory of Nyssa (PG 36, 40B); the motif of a *winged thought that flies toward heaven, going back to Phaedrus 246e (PG 36, 65B); and the parallel between God and the sun of the sensible world, which connects with Rep. VI, 508b 12-c2 (PG 36, 69A); other passages from other homilies have been cited by C. Moreschini (Augustinianum 13 [1973] 538). Also in Gregory of Nazianzus's theology, one finds the characteristic motifs of the entire Platonic tradition, already observed in the writings of earlier Fathers (see esp. the writings of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa): God is unbegotten, unchangeable and incorruptible (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 36C), infinite, void of form and untouchable (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 33B), simple (Orat. 30 theol. 4: PG 36, 105B), not composite (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 44A; Orat. 31 theol. 5: PG 36, 169B). God cannot be found in any place (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 37C), is very far (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 29B), incomprehensible and unreachable (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 29C, 32B, 40B, 53B-C), ineffable and void of names (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 29C; Orat. 30 theol. 4: PG 36, 125B), is desired by all rational beings (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 44A; cf. Plotinus, Enn. I, 6,7 [I, 103,1-5], and also Aristotle, Met. L 1072a26b 3), but is only recognized through the via negativa (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 44A 4-6; Orat. 29 theol. 3: PG 36, 76B 15); he permeates everything (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 33D) and holds it together (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 32C). Two other Neoplatonic motifs adopted by Gregory of Nazianzus are those of the communion of beings among each other (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 48A; cf., e.g., Iamblichus, De myst. I, 5,17 [47,12-13 Des Places]) and the use of the term παράγειν to refer to the creation of beings by the divinity (Orat. 28 theol. 2: PG 36, 48A 15-16; cf., e.g., Plotinus, Enn. VI, 8,20 [VI2, 159,21]). On one particular point, however, Gregory of Nazianzus took a stand against Neoplatonism: in Orat. 29 theol. 3 (PG 36, 76C), he openly criticized the Plotinian understanding of the production of the second hypostasis following the automatic and involuntary overflow of the power present in the One (see Enn. V, 2,1 [V, 33,8-9]).

Neither was *Nemesius of Emesa able to shield himself from the influence of Neoplatonism, as demonstrated by chs. 2 and 3 of the De natura hominis. In ch. 2 (p. 59,12-70,2 Matthaei), to refute the thesis of the corporeality of the human soul, he appealed to the authority of Ammonius Saccas and the Neo-Pythagorean Numenius, one of the most read and admired philosophers by Plotinus. In ch. 3, Nemesius solved the problem of the relationship between the divine and human nature in the person of Christ (cf. p. 140,6-141,1), having recourse to what Ammonius Saccas and Porphyry, in his Symmikta Zetemata, had maintained with regard to the soul's union with the body (see esp. pp. 129,9-14; 139,4; 140,5 and S. Lilla, Ps.-Denys l'Aréopagite, Porphyre et Damascius, in Denys l'Aréopagite et sa postérité en Orient et en Occident, Paris 1997, 133-134). As one can see from the Adversus Iulianum, *Cyril of Alexandria's trinitarian theology is established on the Neoplatonist doctrine of the three hypostases. And in the 10 remaining books of this document, which aim to be a refutation of the three books Against the Galileans composed by the emperor *Julian, Cyril wanted to demonstrate that the Christian doctrine of the *Trinity is essentially shared by various Greek philosophers, and to this end he refers to the writings of Plato, Numenius, Hermes, Trismegistus, Plotinus and *Porphyry of Tyre, citing more or less extensive passages from these authors. As in the case of Eusebius, the document that mostly served for Cyril's undertaking was a Plotinian treatise Περὶ τῶν ἀρχικῶν ὑποστάσεων (the first treatise of the fifth Ennead), from which the Alexandrian Father approvingly cited various sections esp. Book VIII and also Books IV and II (see esp. PG 76, 921B-C, 921D–924A, 924B, 929C, 917D–920A, 920C for Book VIII; PG 76, 724A-B for Book IV; PG 76, 604B for Book II; all of these citations were noted by P. Henry, Les états du texte de Plotin, Études plotiniennes, I, Paris 1938, 123-140).

In his work Graecarum affectionum curatio (PG 83, 784-1152; P. Canivet, SC 57,1-2, Paris 1958), *Theodoret named on several occasions both Plato and the supporters of the subsequent Neo-Pythagorean, Middle Platonist and Neoplatonist tradition (see the very detailed indices by Canivet, under the entries for Amelius, *Ammonius Saccas, Atticus, Neoplatonists, Numenius, Plato, Platonists, Plotinus, Plutarch of Cheronea and Porphyry, SC 57,2, pp. 473, 475, 482, 483-486). He also made numerous citations of the writings of all these authors (see the index of authors cited, pp. 451-466). Plato had a magnificent style (I, 9, p. 105,25); he overshadowed all the philosophers with the beauty of his diction (I, 12, p. 106,21-23) and was the best of the philosophers (II, 6, p. 138,15-16). In a manner similar to Pythagoras and Anaxagoras, Plato went to *Egypt to learn the true wisdom from the Jews (II, 23-26, p. 144,19–145,9); he agreed with Pythagoras esp. on the doctrine of the soul, an essence divine in origin that falls into a body as a result of its punishment (V, 13, p. 229,18-20; V, 28, p. 234,9-15); he saw in the purity of the soul the precondition for the reception of divine teachings (I, 85, p. 126,4-7, with a citation of the Phaedo 67b). He spoke of a multiplicity of gods only for fear of the Athenians (II, 38, p. 149,11-13; II, 42, p. 150,10-11; III, 74, p. 192,4-6); he believed in one God (II, 38, p. 149,9-11; II, 42, p. 150,6-9, with a citation from the famous passage of the Tim. 28c); he distinguished in a marvelous way the supersensible and immutable being from becoming sensible and mutable (II, 33-36, p. 147,14–148,19, with a citation from the Tim. 27c-28a, 37e-38a). He identified the supreme ethical ideal with detachment from things of this world (XII, 22, p. 424,19-21) and with the likeness to God as much as possible (XI, 9, p. 394,3-7; XII, 22-23, p. 424,21–425,6, with a citation from the Theaetetus 176 a-b). He also studied Scripture (VI, 61, p. 276,5-6), followed the teachings of Moses and the prophets and adopted them (II, 26, p. 145,8-9; II, 43, p. 150,13-18; VI, 31, p. 265,14-15; VI, 33, p. 266,10-11; XI, 27, p. 40,13-22), and was, as Numenius affirmed, "a Moses that spoke Attic Greek" (II, 114, p. 169,17-18). His philosophy was far more elevated than that of *Aristotle, who did not know how to pay him respect and opposed him esp. in the two doctrines of the soul's mortality and divine providence (V, 46-47, p. 242,13-15).

Especially worthy of admiration and praise are Plato's metaphysical-theological conceptions: the universe was born from a cause represented by the demiurge, good by nature and free from any feeling of envy; everything owes its existence to the Good which is superior to essence in dignity and power; the best proof of the universe's derivation from a cause is in its sensible and corporeal nature, subject to birth and becoming. It is difficult to find its artisan and demiurge; it is even more difficult to express it. The sensible universe is the most beautiful of beings that have been born, just as the demiurge is the most beautiful of the causes. Furthermore, immutability is proper to the most divine realities, while change is proper to those who are corporeal (IV, 32-45, p. 212,16–217,5, with a citation from the Timaeus, the Republic and the Statesman). The universe was formed acc. to an idea-model, but that should be identified with the thought of God and the intelligible heaven (IV, 49, p. 218,13-19).

One should not approve, however, of several aspects of Plato's teaching and his conduct, such as the doctrine of matter understood as a coeternal principle with God, a doctrine shared by Pythagoras, the Stoics and Aristotle (IV, 46, p. 217,10-11, cf. IV, 37, p. 214,7-8); the doctrine acc. to which evil should be sought out in the body (IV, 46-48, p. 217,12-218,12); the doctrine of metempsychosis, adopted by Pythagoras (XI, 34, p. 403,11-13); and his predilection for the sumptuous table of the tyrant of Syracuse (XII, 70, p. 439,1-6, with a citation from Xenophon's apocryphal letter to Aeschines). These judgments on Plato and his philosophy are connected to both the Platonic tradition of the first centuries AD and earlier patristic authors.

In the final analysis, the following derive from Middle Platonism: the veneration for Plato, the juxtaposition of his philosophy to that of Pythagoras, the distinction between the intelligible world and the sensible world—see also above with regard to Athenagoras no. (11)—the exaltation of likeness to God as the supreme ethical ideal, the opposition between the Platonic and Aristotelian doctrines pertaining to the soul and providence (one merely has to think of the Middle Platonist philosopher Atticus), the well-known citation of the passage from the Rep. VI, 509b on the superiority of the Good (cf. discussion above with respect to Justin Martyr), the citation of two famous passages from the Tim. 28b-c and 28c on the derivation of the corporeal universe from a superior cause and the demiurge which is difficult to find and impossible to express (cf. discussion above with regard to Justin Martyr). Also from Middle Platonism is the doctrine of matter as a coeternal principle with God and that of the ideas, a model of the sensible world and the thoughts of God. One finds the emphasis placed on the beauty of Plato's language and style already in the Cohortatio ad Graecos (see also *Aristotelianism). The two theses acc. to which Plato went to Egypt to study Hebrew wisdom and expressed polytheistic ideas only for fear of the Athenians are also present in the Cohortatio; the theory of his dependence on *Moses and the Prophets and the theft perpetrated by him from their texts is a classical theory proposed by Justin Martyr, the author of the Cohortatio, Clement and *Eusebius of Caesarea. One finds the thesis of his love for the sumptuous table already in the writings of *Tatian.

In the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, the metaphysical-theological system characteristic of the final phase of Neoplatonism—namely, that of *Proclus and *Damascius, of whom he was in all likelihood a "listener" at Athens—became both the foundation of theology and the interpretive canon of Scripture and the liturgy, as a rich series of studies has demonstrated beyond any shadow of a doubt (see S. Lilla, Introduzione allo studio dello Ps. Dionigi l'Areopagita: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 533-577, revised and republished in Dionigi l'Areopagita e il Platonismo cristiano, Brescia 2005, 159-185; for the list of related studies, see esp. pp. 541-542, 571-573). It will suffice to mention the most important of the Proclean motifs appropriated by ps.-Dionysius: the law of the monē, the proodos and the epistrophē; the emphasis on the transcendence of the first principle, defined as nonbeing; the application to the monē of negative concepts of the first hypothesis of Plato's Parmenides and to the proodos some positive concepts of the second hypothesis; the definition of the Son and the Holy Spirit as "flowers" and "superessential lights" of the Father; the perspective acc. to which everything is found potentially included in the unity of the first principle and emanates from it into the proodos as a result of the overflow of its superabundant power, without, however, exhausting its original source, which remains unchangeable. These motifs also include the simultaneous adoption of positive theology, which alongside proodos arises from the first principle to beings, and the adoption of negative theology, which from beings searches to reascend to the first principle; the preference accorded to negative theology; certain fundamental laws of the angelic hierarchy (the superior beings transmit to the inferior the divine illuminations and possess all the properties of the inferior, while the inferior beings do not possess all the properties of the superior; the angels are revealers of the mystery of the divinity); the idea of "mystical tradition"; the union of the human mind with the chief principle, which acts without intermediaries and presupposes the silence and overcoming of every knowledge and noetic activity. (These and other motifs have been examined in detail, alongside their dependency on the Platonic tradition and in particular on Proclus, in S. Lilla, Introduzione allo studio dello Ps. Dionigi, where attention is also called to the most relevant contributions of earlier scholars; see also Dionigi l'Areopagita e il Platonismo cristiano). One should not forget that ps.-Dionysius's dependence on Proclus is not limited to the adoption of teachings, but extends even to the use of technical terminology, which is not lacking in the Corpus Dionysiacum; at points certain passages from Plato's dialogues reappear: here we will only mention that of the Div. Names I, 5 (PG 3, 593A 10-B2), which draws on the Parm. 142a, and that of the Div. Names IV, 7 (PG 3, 701 D3-704A 2), relying on the Sympos. 210 a-b.

Not a few Neoplatonic motifs and terms—esp. those of late Neoplatonism—entered the work of *Maximus the Confessor through the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite. Maximus thoroughly read and studied the Corpus Dionysiacum: he was the author of the Ambiguorum liber or De variis difficilibus locis S. Dionysii et Gregorii (PG 91, 1032-1417) and at least one part of the scholia to the Corpus, passed down under his name; in his writings he refers more or less openly to ps.-Dionysius (cf. the list of relevant passages in P. Sherwood, DSp 3, 296-297). In addition to the study by Sherwood (DSp 3, 295-300), Maximus's dependence on ps.-Dionysius has also been studied by W. Völker, in three of his works (Festschrift für Bischof Dr. A. Stohr, Mainz 1960, 243-254; Der Einfluss des Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita auf Maximus Confessor, in Studien zum neuen Testament und Patristik E. Klostermann zum 90 Geburtstag dargebracht, TU 77, Berlin 1961, 331-350; and Maximus Confessor als Meister geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden 1964; see also C. Moreschini's recent book, Ambigua: Problemi metafisici e teologici su testi di Gregorio di Nazianzo e Dionigi Areopagita, Milan 2003).

The same dependence can be seen in the De Trinitate, a document falsely attributed to *Cyril of Alexandria, but in actuality composed in the 7th c. (see B. Fraigneau-Julien, RecSR 49 [1961] 188), and the Expositio fidei by *John of Damascus. The use of ps.-Dionysius (and in particular his De divinis nominibus) by John of Damascus was not always direct, as shown by B. Kotter (Die Schriften des Johannes von Damaskos II); various chapters of the Expositio fidei reproduce sections of the De Trinitate, which in turn depend on ps.-Dionysius's De divinis nominibus. Two detailed lists of parallels between the De divinis nominibus and the Expositio fidei can be found in S. Lilla, Studi in memoria di C. Ascheri: Differenze 9 (Urbino 1970) 176-177, and Augustinianum 13 (1973) 611-623; this latter study also contains references to the De Trinitate.

VI. The Latin Fathers. Of the Latin Christian authors in which Platonism left evident marks, one should esp. remember *Minucius Felix, *Lactantius, *Hilary of Poitiers, *Marius Victorinus, St. *Ambrose, St. *Augustine and *Boethius. Minucius Felix in the Octavius XIX, 14 (29,31–30,4 Waltzing) approvingly cited the famous passage from the Timaeus 28c, which became a classic not only in Middle Platonism but also in the writings of the Greek Fathers: Platoni itaque in Timaeo deus et ipso suo nomine mundi parens, artifex animae, caelestium terrenorumque fabricator, quem et invenire difficile prae nimia et incredibili potestate et cum inveneris in publicum dicere impossibile praefatur ("Therefore, in the Timaeus, for Plato, God by his very name is the parent of the world, the artisan of the soul, the maker of things heavenly and earthly, whom, he declares, is both difficult to find because of his exceeding and incredible power and when you have found him, it is impossible to speak of in public"). See also XXVI, 12 (45,13-14): Plato, qui invenire deum negotium credidit ("Plato, who believed it difficult to find God"). In XXVI, 12 (45,15–46,3), making explicit reference to the Symposium, he called attention to the Platonic opinion concerning demons (see in particular Sympos. 202d-e). The direct dependence of Octavius XIV, 6 on the absolute need for not hating true reason, from the Phaedo 88c-91a was discovered by J.P. Waltzing (Minucius Félix et Platon, in Mélanges Boissier, Paris 1903, 445-460; see esp. p. 459). P. Shorey (Plato and Minucius Felix: Classical Review 18 [1904] 302-303) emphasized the dependency of Octavius

XVI, 1 (19,30-32) on the Phaedrus 243d: ut conviciorum amarissimam labem verborum veracium flumine diluamus.

A. Kurfess (Lactantius und Plato: Philologus 78 [1923] 381-392) listed the various points of Lactantius's Divinae institutiones, Epitome and De ira dei, in which Lactantius either explicitly refers to Plato or clearly depends on him. From all these passages one must not conclude, however, acc. to Kurfess, a direct knowledge of Plato's writings by Lactantius, whose direct source would have been Cicero—and in particular the Tusculan Disputations—anthologies used by the apologists, compendia of philosophy ad usum christianorum and *Arnobius. Here we will restrict ourselves to mentioning the echo of the famous passage from the Tim. 28c which is present in the Div. inst. I, 8,1, the definition of death as the soul's separation from the body taken from the Phaedo 64c, 67d and present in the Div. inst. II, 12,9, and the reference in the Div. inst. II, 14,9 to the doctrine of demons expounded by Plato in the Sympos. 202e (cf. Kurfess pp. 383-384; the echoes of the Tim. 28c and the Sympos. 202e can be found, as was seen, also in the writings of Minucius Felix). A. Wlosok has rightly insisted on the determinative importance exerted by *Hermetism and *Middle Platonism in Lactantius's interpretation of the passage of Tim. 28c (Laktanz und die philosophische Gnosis, Heidelberg 1960, 252-253); this last study also has to its credit the fact of emphasizing the close relationship that bound Lactantius's theology and his idea of revelation, knowledge of God and contemplation with the Hermetic-Platonic tradition of the 2nd c. AD (see esp. the section Das Verhältnis des Laktanz zur philosophischen Gnosis, pp. 222-231).

Hilary of Poitiers's work was the first major example of an affirmation in the Latin Christian world of that marked negative theology that was so in vogue, as was seen, in the writings of the Greek Fathers. L. Longobardo (Il linguaggio negativo della trascendenza di Dio in Ilario di Poitiers, Naples 1982) dedicated a meticulous analysis to the concepts of ingeneracy, infinity, incomprehensibility, ineffability, incorporeity, immutability, incorruptibility and impassability that characterized Hilary's theology, showing their connections to the Platonic and patristic tradition: practically speaking they are the same concepts already noted in the writings of Clement of Alexandria, Origen and the Cappadocian Fathers and were clearly derived from Platonism, Middle Platonism, Neoplatonism and Philo. Here we will only mention that the idea acc. to which the Son's generation by the Father has led to no change in the nature of the latter, an idea articulated by Hilary in the De trin. V, 37 (PL 10, 155B; cf. Longobardo p. 55), imitates the Neoplatonist idea of the absolute inalterability of the first principle, not compromised by the emanation of intelligence and beings from this first principle (cf. Plotinus, Enn. V, 3,12 [V, 66,34-36]; VI, 7,36 [VI2, 111,24-25]; VI, 9,5 [VI2, 178,36-37]).

In his still-important study Plotin et l'Occident (Louvain 1934, 1-24), P. Henry, taking his point of departure from Porphyry's Vita Plotini, investigated the diffusion of Plotinian philosophy in the Latin West. Those who contributed to this diffusion were not only Porphyry and the Latin-speaking disciples of Plotinus (such as Amelius, who was of Etruscan origin), but also, in the mid-4th c., the African orator *Marius Victorinus, who converted to Christianity only at an advanced age (cf. Henry, Plotin et l'Occident, p. 44): as Augustine mentioned in the Confess. VIII, 2,3 (cf. P. Hadot, Marius Victorinus. Recherches sur sa vie et ses oeuvres, Paris 1971, 201), he was the author of a Latin translation—read with great interest by Augustine (see the passages of the Contra Academicos and the De beata vita cited by Hadot, p. 202)—of certain libri platonicorum which, in all likelihood, included several treatises of Plotinus collected and commented on by Porphyry (this was the conclusion Hadot reached, pp. 202 and 207, sharing the thesis of W. Theiler, Porphyrios und Augustin, Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 163. Henry [Plotin et l'Occident, p. 46], on the other hand, saw in the libri platonicorum only Plotinus's Enneads). Marius Victorinus's interest in Neoplatonic philosophy, however, was not limited to the simple activity of a translator: P. Henry and esp. P. Hadot's investigations demonstrated the breath of the dependence of Victorinus's theological-dogmatic writings on Neoplatonism. Although P. Henry (Plotin et l'Occident, pp. 47-62) has called attention to the presence of Plotinian motifs in the Liber de generatione divini verbi ad Candidum arianum and esp. in his Adversus Arium. In this last document (IV, 22) one can actually perceive a textual citation of Enn. V, 2,l (V, 34,1-2 Bréhier) referring to the one that is simultaneously all things and nothing in particular (cf. Henry, Plotin et l'Occident, pp. 49-54).

P. Hadot, in his foundational work (Porphyre et Victorinus, I-II, Paris 1968), dedicated a comprehensive and detailed investigation to the presence of "Porphyrian" motifs in the theological works of Victorinus (in the first volume, all the parallels between Porphyry and Victorinus's theology are analyzed; see esp. pp. 102-461): among the "Porphyrian" motifs present in Victorinus's writings, one should mention above all the motif of the first principle conceived as nonbeing and the motif of the intelligible triad formed from being, life and thought. In the second volume, he cited texts from the Adversus Arium and the Ad Candidum deriving from Porphyry, the text of Porphyry's commentary on the Parmenides, and a section of Proclus's commentary on the Parmenides containing "important elements for understanding some of Victorinus's Porphyrian themes (cf. Hadot, vol. II, preface). The foundational "Porphyrian" character of Victorinus's theology was reinforced by Hadot in his subsequent work titled Marius Victorinus (p. 203). The various studies by A. Solignac, J.H. Waszink and P. Courcelle (see the pertinent references in P. Hadot, Marius Victorinus, p. 204 n.10) have called attention to the existence of a circle of learned Latin Neoplatonists at *Milan around 386, both Christian and *pagan. St. *Ambrose and his teacher *Simplicianus, the old friend of Marius Victorinus, were part of this group (see P. Courcelle, RevPhilol 76 [1950] 56, and Hadot, Marius Victorinus, p. 204).

In effect, St. *Ambrose deeply assimilated certain Platonic teachings and the Neoplatonism of Plotinus and Porphyry, as the studies of P. Courcelle, L. Taormina, P. Hadot and A. Solignac have demonstrated, following the guidance of specific textual comparisons. P. Courcelle (Plotin et Saint Ambroise: Rev. Philol. 76 [1950] 29-56; see also his book Recherches sur les Confessions de Saint Augustin, Paris 1950, 106-132) has brought to light numerous echoes of Plotinus present in Ambrose's De Isaac vel anima and in the De bono mortis, and has emphasized the dependence of his sermon In Isaiam on Porphyry's De regressu animae (on this last point, see esp. Recherches sur les Confessions de Saint Augustin, Paris 1950, 133-137). L. Taormina (Sant'Ambrogio e Plotino: MSLC 4 [1954] 41-85) has focused on the numerous similarities between the bishop of Milan and Plotinus, esp. with regard to the doctrine of God's transcendence and certain ideas about the soul. P. Hadot (Platon et Plotin dans trois sermons de Saint Ambroise: REL 34 [1956] 202-220), following the direction indicated by Courcelle, discovered further parallels between Plato and Plotinus on the one hand and the De Isaac vel anima and Ambrose's De bono mortis on the other. Although in the De Isaac VIII, 64-65 there appear echoes of the Phaedrus 246a, 247b (cf. Hadot, Marius Victorinus, p. 208), Plato's most used dialogue in the De bono mortis is the Phaedo, even if in the De bono mortis V, 17 the famous passage from Theaetetus 176b concerning the flight from the world understood as the likeness to God resurfaced (cf. Hadot, Marius Victorinus, p. 213).

The direct source for Ambrose could be, acc. to Hadot, Porphyry's De regressu animae (Platon et Plotin, p. 220) or some document of the Cappadocian Fathers, the only ones in whom one finds the fusion of elements from the writings of Philo, Origen and Plotinus, which is characteristic of the De Isaac (on this last hypothesis, see Marius Victorinus, p. 206). Courcelle's example was also followed by A. Solignac, Nouveaux parallèles entre Saint Ambroise et Plotin. Le "De Jacob et vita beata" et le Perì eudaimonías (Enn. I, 4): Archives de Phil. 20 (1956) 148-156. Lastly, P. Courcelle, in one of his studies (Nouveaux aspects du platonisme chez Saint Ambroise: REL 34 [1956] 220-239), returned to the question of Ambrose's dependence on Neoplatonism: in the first section (Ambroise lecteur de Plotin et Porphyre, pp. 221-226) he emphasized further parallels between the Enneads on the one hand and Ambrose's De Iacob and the De officiis on the other, and accepted Hadot's hypothesis (Nouveaux aspects, p. 220), acc. to which Porphyry's De regressu animae was the direct source for Ambrose's De bono mortis (the various echoes of Plato's Phaedo thus reached Ambrose through Porphyry's treatise). In the second section (Ambroise lecteur du Phèdre de Platon, pp. 226-232), using and in part modifying W. Wilbrand's hypothesis (Ambrosius und Plato: RQA 25 [1911] 42-49), acc. to which the direct source for the echoes of the Phaedrus present in Ambrose's De Abraham, De Isaac and De virginitate were presented by Origen, he brought to light further parallels between the Phaedrus 246d-247e, 248b, 254a and De virg. XV, 96 and XVII, 109. Though not excluding that the direct source for Ambrose could have been Origen's Commentary on the Song of Songs, he is disposed to think that Ambrose directly read the section of the Phaedrus 246-254 (Wilbrand, Ambrosius und Plato, pp. 231-232). In the third section (Ambroise lecteur de Macrobe, pp. 232-239), he demonstrated several parallels between Macrobius's commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis and several of Ambrose's writings (Exaemeron, De Cain et Abel, De bono mortis, De Noe, De Isaac et anima, De Nabuthae historia).

Even St. Augustine, on par with *Justin Martyr, *Clement, *Eusebius and *Theodoret, showed a great admiration for Plato: the praise he gives him in ch. 4 of book VIII of the De civitate Dei, where he presented him as the chief theologian among the Greek philosophers (CCL 47, p. 219, 1-3: non quidem immerito excellentissima gloria claruit, qua omnino ceteros obscuraret, Plato), reiterates the praise attributed to the Athenian philosopher by Middle Platonism (Augustine was also a reader and admirer of one of Plato's most famous supporters, Apuleius, the author of the De Platone et eius dogmate: Apu- leius Afer extitit Platonicus nobilis [Civ. Dei VIII, 12: CCL 47, 229, 23-28]). In Civ. Dei XXII, 22 (CCL 48, 845, 123-124), he cited with approval Cicero's paraphrase of the passage from the Tim. 47b on the divine origin of philosophy, nec hominibus, inquit, ab his aut datum est donum maius aut potuit ullum dari, and in the Civ. Dei VIII, 11 (CCL 47, 227-228) he does not hesitate to closely associate the Platonist teachings with the books of Moses in order to emphasize the substantial identity between Platonic philosophy and Mosaic wisdom, as had already been done by Justin Martyr, Clement and Eusebius, and as Theodoret would do a little later. The beginning of the book of Genesis was interpreted along the lines of the Timaeus, and the famous passage from Ex 3:14, ego sum qui sum, is connected to the Platonist doctrine, or more correctly the Middle Platonist doctrine of the immutability of the first principle: qui vere est quia incommutabilis est . . . vehementer hoc Plato tenuit et diligentissime commendavit—as was already observed that the same relationship between Ex 3:14 and Tim. 27d and immutable ideas was established by the author of the Cohortatio ad Graecos (ch. 22), which, influenced by Middle Platonism, refers (as it does also in Augustine) to Tim. 27d in reference not to the realm of ideas but to the first principle (and by Eusebius Praep. ev. XI, 10; cf. above).

It was precisely this correspondence between Plato and Moses that led Augustine to adopt the thesis of the Athenian philosopher's knowledge of the OT, ut paene assentiar Platonem illorum librorum expertem non fuisse (Civ. Dei VIII, 11 [CCL 47, 228, 41-42]), even with a caution that the Greek Fathers did not show: if Plato was truly able to learn Mosaic wisdom during his stay in Egypt, this could have only occurred thanks to an oral teaching and not through a Greek translation of the Hebrew books, which at that time still did not exist: qua propter in illa peregrinatione sua Plato nec Hieremiam videre potuit tanto ante defunctum nec easdem scripturas legere, quae nondum fuerant in Graecam linguam translatae, qua ille pollebat; nisi forte, quia fuit acerrimi studii, sicut Aegyptias, ita et istas per interpretem didicit, non ut scribendo transferret . . . sed ut conloquendo quid continerent, quantum capere posset, addisceret, "for this reason during his stay Plato could neither see Jeremiah, who had died much earlier, or read the same scriptures, which had not yet been translated into the Greek language, in which he was very eloquent; unless perhaps, because he was very tenacious in study, as with the Egyptian language, he also learned those scriptures through an interpreter, so that he translated not by writing . . . but by discussing in conversation what it contained, he would learn more, as much as he could grasp" (Civ. Dei VIII, 11 [CCL 47, 228, 15-23]).

Plato's dependence on the OT, however, did not exclude God's direct inspiration of or revelation to him. Augustine actually seems to have preferred this last hypothesis: sed undecumque ille ista didicerit, sive praecedentibus eum veterum libris sive potius, quo modo ait apostolus, quia quod notum est Dei manifestum est in illis; Deus enim illis manifestavit (Rom 1,19) (Civ. Dei VIII, 12 [CCL 47, 229, 1-4]). Augustine's presentation of the hypothesis of the divine inspiration of Platonic philosophy along with the other hypothesis of Plato's dependence on the books of Moses reveals a surprising similarity with Clement's statements regarding Plato and Pythagoras in the Strom. II, 100,3 (II, 167,23-168,4) and in Strom. V, 29,3-4 (II, 344,23-345,3).

Not only Plato, but also the supporters of subsequent Platonism, in particular those of Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism, received high praise from Augustine, who believed that their teachings in large part agreed with the Christian faith: elegimus enim Platonicos omnium philosophorum merito nobilissimos, propterea quia sapere potuerunt licet immortalem ac rationalem vel intellectualem hominis animam nisi participato lumine illius Dei, a quo et ipsa et mundus factus est, beatam esse non posse; ita illud, quod omnes homines appetunt, id est vitam beatam, quemquam isti assecuturum negant, qui non illi uni optimo, quod est incommutabilis Deus, puritate casti amoris adhaeserit (Civ. Dei X, 1 [CCL 47, 271,13-272,21]); recentiores tamen philosophi nobilissimi, quibus Plato sectandus placuit, noluerint se dici Peripateticos aut Academicos, sed Platonicos ex quibus valde sunt nobilitati Graeci Plotinus, Iamblichus, Porphyrius; in utraque autem lingua, id est Graeca et Latina, Apuleius Afer extitit Platonicus nobilis (Civ. Dei VIII, 12 [CCL 47, 229, 23 to 28]). But the light of Platonic philosophy shined again esp. in Plotinus, who is to be considered Plato reborn: os illud Platonis, quod in philosophia purgatissimum est et lucidissimum, dimotis nubibus erroris emicuit maxime in Plotino, qui Platonicus philosophus ita eius similis diiudicatus est, ut simul vixisse, tantum autem interest temporis, ut in hoc ille revixisse putandus sit (C. Acad. III, 18,41 [CCL 29, 59,41-60,46]). It was the reading of Marius Victorinus's translation of some books of Plotinus—most likely accompanied by Porphyry's commentary; see above—that incited at Milan in 386 a burning fire in Augustine's soul: . . . libri quidam pleni . . . etiam mihi ipsi de me ipso incredibile incendium concitarunt (C. Acad. II, 2,5 [CCL 29, 20, 51-57]); lectis autem Plotini paucissimis libris . . . conlataque cum eis, quantum potui, etiam illorum auctoritate, qui divina mysteria tradiderunt, sic exarsi, ut omnes illas vellem ancoras rumpere (De beata vita I, 4 [CCL 29, 67, 98-102]).

This reading convinced the 30-year-old Augustine of a substantial identity between the metaphysics of Plotinus and the theology of John, present acc. to him in the Enneads: procurasti mihi . . . quosdam platonicorum libros ex graeca lingua in latinam versos et ibi legi non quidem his verbis, sed hoc idem omnino multis et multiplicibus suaderi rationibus quod in principio erat verbum et verbum erat apud Deum et Deus erat verbum: hoc erat in principio apud Deum . . . et quia hominis anima, quamvis testimonium perhibeat de lumine, non est tamen ipsa lumen, sed verbum, Deus, est lumen verum . . . et quia in hoc mundo erat, et mundus per eum factus est (Confess. VII, 9,13 [CCL 27, 101, 4-16]); quod enim ante omnia tempora et supra omnia tempora incommutabiliter manet unigenitus filius tuus coaeternus tibi et quia de plenitudine eius accipiunt animae, ut beatae sint, et quia participatione manentis in se sapientiae renovantur, ut sapientes sint, est ibi (Confess. VII, 9,14 [CCL 27, 102, 32-36]); gratulatus est mihi (Simpliciano) quod. . . in istis autem omnibus modis insinuari deum et eius verbum (Confess. VIII, 2,3 [CCL 27, 114, 6-9]). The identification of God and the logos in the prologue of John's gospel, respectively, with Plotinus's first and second *hypostasis is none other than the adoption of Plotinian metaphysics, as was seen (see above), but Eusebius of Caesarea, *Cyril of Alexandria and Augustine honored it. In fact, Neoplatonist philosophy can rightly be considered, acc. to Augustine, the truest philosophy and the pinnacle of all human thought (see W. Theiler, Porphyrios und Augustin. Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 160).

His enthusiasm for Plotinian philosophy accompanied Augustine throughout the entirety of his life: as his biographer Possidius noted (Vita Aug. ch. 28), at the point of death he repeated the words of a wise man (sapiens): non erit magnus magnum putans quod cadunt ligna et lapides et moriuntur mortales. P. Henry (Plotin et l'Occident, 137-138) had the credit of noting that the sapiens in question was Plotinus, because the quote was a translation from Enn. I, 4,7 (I, 77,23-24 Bréhier). One should not be amazed, therefore, that the relationship between Augustine and Neoplatonism has been the object of numerous studies: here we should stop to recall the work of L. Grandgeorge (Saint Augustin et le Néoplatonisme, Paris 1896; see esp. the lists of the various treatises by Plotinus and Porphyry cited and alluded to by Augustine, pp. 39-41); P. Henry (Plotin et l'Occident, Louvain 1934; see the two chapters Saint Augustin le converti, pp. 63-119, and Saint Augustin l'évêque, pp. 120-145, containing numerous synoptic comparisons between Augustine and Plotinus; likewise important is a collection of passages from the works of Augustine in which he spoke of the Neoplatonists, pp. 79-82; on the use of Porphyry's writings, see esp. p. 121); P. Courcelle (Recherches sur les Confessions de Saint Augustin, Paris 1950, 153-174); W. Theiler (Porphyrios und Augustin. Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 160-251), who not only examined in depth the multiple analogies between the Bishop of Hippo and the student of Plotinus, but also supplied (pp. 250-251) an exhaustive list of all the passages from Augustine's writings that provide doctrines that trace back to Porphyry; A.H. Armstrong (St. Augustine and Christian Platonism, in Plotinian and Christian Studies, London 1979, XI, 1-66, and Spiritual or Intelligible Matter in Plotinus and St. Augustine, ibid., VII, 277-283); R. Russell (The Role of Neoplatonism in St. Augustine's De civitate Dei, in Neoplatonism and Early Christian Thought. Essays in Honour of A.H. Armstrong, London 1981); and J.J. O'Meara (The Neoplatonism of Saint Augustine. Neoplatonism and Christian Thought, New York 1981).

In this entry, it is not possible to cite even a few of the multiple analogies between Augustine, Plotinus and Porphyry discovered by these and other scholars. One can only note the parallels between Augustine's understanding of God and Plotinus's conception of the One, brought to light by Grandgeorge (Augustin et le Néoplatonisme, pp. 57-84), even if on this topic a more precise and in-depth investigation would be necessary. For the common attitude of the two authors toward the "sensible universe," see Grandgeorge, Augustin et le Néoplatonisme, pp. 123-125; the teaching on "intelligent matter" was present, as was seen (see above) also in the writings of Origen (A.H. Armstrong has called attention to its presence in Augustine's writings in his Plotinian and Christian Studies, London 1979, VII, 277-283). There is also the motif of human self-contemplation, a precondition for union with the first principle, brought to light by Henry (Plotin et l'Occident, 112); we also see the Platonic ideal of the likeness to God (see Theaetetus 176b) accomplished by flight from this world, which Augustine appropriated, reiterating the words of Plotinus (see Henry, p. 107).

Augustine's understanding of the "Word" or divine wisdom that contains in itself the rational principles of all things merits special attention: veritatem fixam, stabilem, indeclinabilem, ubi sunt omnes rationes rerum omnium creaturarum, "established, stable and unchangeable truth, where all the reasons of all created things exist" (Sermo 141: PL 38, 776); spiritus sapientiae multiplex, eo quod multa in sese habeat; sed quae habeat, hoc et est, et ea omnia unus est, neque enim multae sed una sapientia est . . . in quibus sunt omnes invisibiles atque incommutabiles rationes rerum etiam visibilium et mutabilium, quae per ipsam factae sunt, "the manifold spirit of wisdom has many things in itself; but it is also these very things that it has, and all those things are one, for wisdom is not many but one . . . in which are all the invisible and unchangeable reasons of things even visible and changeable, which were made through it" (Civ. Dei XI, 10 [CCL 48, 331,72-332,78]). In this regard, the similarity is surprising not only in comparison to Origen's understanding of the logos (see above, with respect to Origen's logos, no. 9), but also Plotinus's doctrine of the nous* that contains in itself all the ideas and that is a composed unity, identical to this multiplicity or totality of ideas. Augustine's words eo quod multa in sese habeat; sed quae habeat, haec et est, et ea omnia unus est ("[wisdom] has many things in itself, but it is also these very things that it has, and all those things are one, for wisdom is not many but one") are explained by keeping in mind ἓν ἄρα πολλά from Enn. V, 3,15 (V, 69,11), ἓν πάντα from Enn. V, 3,15 (V, 69,23) and the ἔχει οὖν ἐν ἑαυτῷ πάντα Enn. V, 1,4 (V, 20,2l); see also the expression πάντα ἕν with which Clement described the logos (Strom. IV, 156,2 [II, 318,1]). Even Plotinus's anima mundi*, the third hypostasis, contains within itself the rational principles received from the nous (see e.g., Enn. II, 3,16 [II, 42,19-20] and VI, 2,5 [VI1, 104,12-13]). On the points of correspondence between Plotinus's second hypostasis and Augustine's "Word"/wisdom see also the dissertation by O. Perler, Der Nus bei Plotin und das Verbum bei Augustinus als vorbildliche Ursache der Welt, Freiburg Schweiz 1931. Lastly, one should remember that Augustine's famous doctrine of evil as a deprivation of the Good (see, e.g., Civ. Dei XI, 22 [CCL 48, 341, 22-23]; XII, 3 [CCL 48, 357, 26], and the references in Courcelle, Recherches, p. 124 n. 4) are found already formulated by Plotinus in the eighth treatise of the first Ennead (see Enn. I, 8,1 [I, 115,11-12; I, 115,19]). According to Courcelle (ibid., p. 124), Augustine was most likely led to embrace this Plotinian doctrine from St. Ambrose's sermon De Isaac, which likewise depended on Plotinus (see Courcelle, ibid., p. 106-107).

The role played by Plato and Neoplatonism—esp. that of Proclus—in certain aspects of *Boethius's thought has been highlighted by P. Courcelle (La consolation de la philosophie dans la tradition littéraire, Paris 1967, passim; with regard to Proclus, see pp. 203-231), and H. Chadwick, in his book Boethius: The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology and Philosophy, Oxford 1981 (see esp. pp. 16-22 and the entirety of chs. 4-5, pp. 174-253).

In addition to the studies cited throughout the course of this entry, R. Arnou's Platonisme des Pères: DTC 12, 2294-2392 remains foundational. A useful anthology of texts is found in another of R. Arnou's works, De Platonismo Patrum, Rome 1935. See also G. Madec, "Platonisme" des Pères: Catholicisme 11, Paris 1988, 491-507. Among the numerous recent publications, we shall only mention D. Wyrwa, Die christliche Platonaneigung in den Stromateis des Clemens von Alexandrien, Berlin-New York 1983; H. Ziebritzki, Heiliger Geist und Weltsecle. Das Problem der dritten Hypostase bei Origenes, Plotin und ihren Vorläufern, Tübingen 1994; J. Whittaker, Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984; S. Lilla, The Neoplatonic Hypostases and the Christian Trinity, in Studies in Plato and the Platonic Tradition, Essays presented to J. Whittaker, Aldershot 1997, 127-189; Id., Neuplatonisches Gedankengut in den Homilien über Seligpreisungen Gregors von Nyssa (Suppl. VChr 68) Leiden 2004; Id., Dionigi l'Areopagita e il Platonismo cristiano, Brescia 2005 (republication of earlier studies); J. Rist, Platonism and Its Christian Heritage, London 1985; Id., Eros and Psyche. Studies in Plato, Plotinus and Origen, Toronto 1964; Id., Augustine. Ancient Thought Baptized, Cambridge 1997; D. Carabine, The Unknown God. Negative Theology in the Platonic Tradition. Plato to Eriugena (Louvain Theological and Pastoral Monographs 19), Louvain 1995; Y. de Andia, Henosis. L'union à Dieu chez Denys l'Aréopagite (Philosophia antiqua 71), Leiden 1996; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004.

Bibliographic review: DTC 12/2 (1934) 2390-2391; E.P. Meijering, Zehn Jahre Forschung zum Thema Platonismus und Kirchenväter: Theologische Rundschau 36 (1971) 303-320; H. Dörrie, Platonica minora, Munich 1976, 538-542; Catholicisme 11 (1998) 505-507; E. Peroli, in C. de Vogel, Platonismo e Cristianesimo. Antagonismo o comuni fondamenti? Milan 1993, 147-153.

S. Lilla

PLEROMA (πλήρωμα). This word means "fullness," perfection and totality. In classical texts, the term pleroma referred to something full, the complete content of something; the large quantity, the complete sum, the totality; the completion, crowning or, more rarely, that which is filled, and the very action of filling, in competition with πλήρωσις. The word is already found in the Greek translation of the OT (or LXX) primarily to indicate complete and contented fullness and abundance (Song 5:12), and was extensively used by Christian authors, esp. the gnostics, but also by the mainstream church. In the writings of *Philo, one finds the substantive used in various contexts, usually in the sense of "fullness" or "crowning." For example, in Abr. 268, faith in God is called πλήρωμα χρηστῶν ἐλπίδων, "fullness of good hopes," probably in the positive sense, namely, the faith that fills one with good hope; in Praem. 65, the *soul, in virtue of its natural gifts, apprehension and exercise, becomes a πλήρωμα ἀρετῶν, "fullness of virtue," such that the Feast of Tabernacles becomes the pleroma of the sacred Jewish feasts, i.e., their crowning and their apex (Spec. leg. II, 213). In most cases in Philo's writings, the idea of pleroma has a theological connotation and seems to bear *Stoic echoes; in a more secular sense, in Leg. Gai. 11, πλήρωμα εὐτυχίας is the "fullness of a happy condition."

In the NT, St. *Paul esp. repeatedly used the term pleroma with quite different meanings, e.g., in Eph 1:10 and 23; 2:17; 3:19; 4:10 and 13, and in Col 1:19 and 2:19, etc. If in Rom 11:25 pleroma is a numeric totality, in Rom 15:29 it indicates fullness and richness (the Vulgate renders it abundantia) of blessing with which Christ accompanied his apostle. In a similar manner, in Eph 3:19 pleroma is a richness of gifts that God grants to the community. In Eph 1:23 the church is the "body" and the "fullness" of Christ who "fills," i.e., governs, the world (see R.R. Jeal, A Strange Style of Expression: Filologia Neotestamentaria 10 [1997] 129-138). In Jn 1:16 pleroma refers to the fullness of divine grace that was made present and operative in the incarnate Word. For this reason, the believer receives the fullness and superabundance of *grace. Similarly, in Col 1:19 it is said that the entire πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος, i.e., the fullness of the divine nature, resided in Jesus Christ (on the use of the term pleroma in Col 1:15-20, see F. Capponi, Filologia e dogmatica: Invigilata lucernis 15-16 [1993-94] 77-97); and in Eph 1:23 pleroma indicates the body completely filled by the action of Christ, acc. to an idea also present in 1 Cor 12, Eph 4:16, etc. It is most likely used in an active sense in Rom 13:10, where the pleroma is the full and absolute fulfillment of what God asks, while in Rom 11:12 pleroma is in contrast to ἥττημα, and indicates the attainment of numeric completeness of the redeemed from Israel. In Gal 4:4 pleroma designates the fullness of time reached with the advent of the Son.

When it refers to the divinity, we can say that in St. Paul's epistles, the term pleroma designates the fullness and perfection of divinity in Christ, and Christ himself as the totality of the divinity, visible in his body, which is the church, and which, acc. to *Origen, is also *Scripture, the other and perpetual incarnation of Christ. In fact, acc. to the Alexandrian exegete, Christ is the fullness of divine revelation (In Io. VI, 3).

*Tertullian (Adv. Marc. II, 10) translated the word pleroma with the Latin term universitas to indicate both the fullness and the overabundance of Christ's spiritual gifts, and the complete and perfect belonging of all creatures to God, who leaves no space for another divinity. Moreover, very frequent in the writings of nongnostic Christian authors, the term pleroma connotes in a temporal sense "the fullness of times," "the totality of ages" (πλήρωμα τῶν αἰώνων), referring in particular to the perfect condition of the world in the Son of God and with him, as one finds in the Odes of Solomon* 17,7; 19,5; 26,7; 36,6 and 41,13, or perhaps in the writings of *Ignatius of Antioch, in the prefaces of the letters to the Christian inhabitants of *Ephesus—where the term pleroma is used to designate the generous fullness with which God has blessed the recipients—and of Tralles, where the expression ἐν τῷ πληρώματι, "in the fullness," seems to refer to ἀσπάζομαι, "greetings, embrace," that immediately precedes, or again in Philosoph. VIII, 10,3, or in the apocryphal and *Encratite Acts of Thomas, 148. Likewise, The Odes of Solomon (7,13; 35,6 and 36) transmit the idea that pleroma allows for perfect knowledge: what one finds at the end of the process of investigation, where there is rest.

In the writings of *Gregory of Nyssa, the idea of pleroma, referring to God and the attitude that is found in him, appears tightly connected to his theory of ἐπέκτασις, of humanity's continual inclination toward God, outside himself (see L. Karfíková, Die Unendlichkeit Gottes und der unendliche Weg des Menschen nach Gregor von Nyssa: SE 40 [2001] 47-81). In Gregory's thought, pleroma is also the collection of humanity that will enter into the perfect unity of the *apokatastasis. *Clement of Alexandria, however, used the term pleroma both when speaking of nourishment in Paed. I, 96,3; II, 103,2, and in a series of the facts he relates about the gnostics, who considered the pleroma a foundational concept.

In fact, among the *gnostics, the pleroma is a fullness and totality of the divine, multiple and simultaneously one, and contains therefore the transcendent beings, which have their origin in the pleroma and to which they return as the place where they attain their perfect condition. In the writings of the Valentinians, the pleroma is the conglomerate of thirty eons, τὸ πᾶν πλήρωμα τῶν αἰώνων, acc. to *Epiphanius's testimony (Haer. XXXI, 13,6). The eons themselves, which complete the perfect number of the pleroma (τὸ πλήρωμα ἀριθμῷ τελείῳ συνηθροισμένον, "the pleroma gathered together in a perfect number"), are referred to as the πληρώματα (Clem. Al., Strom. IV, 90,2; Exc. ex Theod. 32,1; 33,1; Iren., Haer. I, 14,2.5). If the pleroma is the fullness, its opposite is the κένωμα, a place of emptiness, imperfection, nothingness, which in gnostic language refers to the material world: in this realm, being external to the pleroma, the souls are like exiles and fallen humans. In effect, in their dualistic tendencies, the gnostics generally distinguished between two primary creators, one of the material world, frequently identified with the God of the OT, and another of the spiritual world: only the latter was considered the true God, unknowable and ineffable, on the basis of the principles of apophatic theology. *Basilides (e.g., acc. to Philosoph. VII, 21,1) laid down the principle of a God "who does not exist," οὐκ ὤν, "void of thought, sensibility and will etc.," totally transcendent, but from whom, through a series of operations, the pleroma composed of eons would be manifested.

In fact, for the gnostics, generally speaking, the known God, distinct from the unknowable Father, appears androgynous, endowed with a feminine component at times called Σιωπή, Πρόνοια, Ἔννοια (Silence, Providence, Thought), such that this God's reflection on himself is generative and manifests toward itself the true reality, through more subsequent developments: first the production of a son, Barbelo or *Νοῦς, that reveals the face of the original couple, therefore, this series of emanations that establishes the pleroma of the eons, generally is understood as circular. God "Father of all things" does not belong, properly speaking, to the pleroma, but remains outside it, producing outside himself the first eons, as the Philosoph. VI, 29,6 and Irenaeus (Haer. I, 1,1) attest: although the pleroma is by nature the closest in proximity to God, God remains above it, μόνος ἀγέννητος, οὐ τόπον ἔχων, οὐ χρόνον, ἀναπαυόμενος αὐτὸς ἐν ἑαυτῷ μόνος, "the only unbegotten, that has neither place nor time, which, being alone, rests in itself by itself" (Philosoph. VI, 29,5).

The last of the eons of the pleroma is Σοφία, Wisdom, to which is attributed a *sin, variously described, that, in any case, explains the rise of evil and, in the final analysis, also explains the material world, with the fall of Sophia from the world of the pleroma. The material world is therefore outside the pleroma; actually it is the contrary to it: it is κένωμα, "emptiness," the absence of every divine element. The exit of Sophia from the pleroma, in fact, establishes the premise for the work of a demiurge that creates the world from preexistent matter, which contains shadows; it is an illusion and lacks real existence; it is inspired by models, τύποι, transmitted to it by Sophia, acc. to the Valentinians (Iren., Haer. I, 5, 3). Sophia reigns over the cosmos together with the seven archons that are to be identified with the seven planetary spheres and which are also created by her. This myth, found in certain gnostic texts, is probably inspired by the episode contained in the gospels of Jesus' *baptism in the Jordan and the epiphany of God, acc. to G. Lettieri (Il fondamento cristologico del mito gnostico, Cassiodorus 1 [1995] 151-165). In effect, alongside a total opposition between the pleroma and the κένωμα-world, we also find attestations of a mimetic relationship between the invisible and the spiritual pleroma (τὸ ἀόρατον καὶ πνευματικὸν, Epiphanius, Haer. XXXI, 10,13) and the cosmos that is created "according to the image of the invisible pleroma" (Clem. Alex., Exc. ex Theod. 22,4; 42,1; Iren., Haer. II, praef. 1: secundum imaginem invisibilis . . . Pleromatis factam). The gnostics at times returned to the image of the matrix to indicate the pleroma from which everything draws its origin, although the same image was employed—esp. in the Paraphrase of Shem—also for the visible world, seen negatively, whose continuation is only assured by the union of the races; the death of the body is therefore construed as an exit from this matrix, just as birth was a fall into it (see T. Onuki, Le monde comme matrice: Apocrypha 11 [2000] 123-145).

